SAN FRANCISCO PUBLIC LIBRARY
3 1223 90075 2198

ROOM

SAN FRANCISCO
PUBLIC LIBRARY

HISTORY DEPARTMENT

REFERENCE BOOK

Not to be taken from the Library

C

MAY 19 1972

DICTIONARY OF CANADIAN BIOGRAPHY

DICTIONARY OF CANADIAN BIOGRAPHY

DICTIONNAIRE BIOGRAPHIQUE DU CANADA

GENERAL EDITORS
GEORGE W. BROWN
1959–1963

DAVID M. HAYNE
1965–1969

FRANCESS G. HALPENNY

DIRECTEUR ADJOINT
ANDRÉ VACHON

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO PRESS
LES PRESSES DE L'UNIVERSITÉ LAVAL

DICTIONARY OF CANADIAN BIOGRAPHY

VOLUME X

1871 TO 1880

EDITOR

MARC LA TERREUR

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO PRESS

STAFF OF THE DICTIONARY

TORONTO

Mary McD. Maude textual editor

Diane M. Barker, Henri Pilon manuscript editors

QUEBEC

Gaston Tisdel directeur des recherches

Huguette Filteau, Johane La Rochelle chargées de recherche

ENGLISH TRANSLATION OF FRENCH BIOGRAPHIES

John S. Wood

FRENCH TRANSLATION OF ENGLISH BIOGRAPHIES

J.-M. Lacroix Claire Wells

*920.071
D561
v.10

72-49

© University of Toronto Press and
Les Presses de l'université Laval, 1972
Printed in Canada
Regular Edition: ISBN 0-8020-3287-7
Laurentian Edition: ISBN 0-8020-3288-5
Microfiche Edition: ISBN 0-8020-0206-4

SAN FRANCISCO
PUBLIC LIBRARY

CONTENTS

GENERAL INTRODUCTION vii

INTRODUCTION TO VOLUME X ix

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS xxvi

EDITORIAL NOTES xxviii

LIST OF ABBREVIATIONS 2; 732

BIOGRAPHIES 3

GENERAL BIBLIOGRAPHY 733

CONTRIBUTORS 767

INDEX 775

Digitized by the Internet Archive
in 2026

https://archive.org/details/dictionaryofcana0000marc

GENERAL INTRODUCTION

VOLUME X is the third volume of the Dictionary of Canadian Biography/Dictionnaire biographique du Canada to be published. Volume I, devoted to persons of Canadian interest who died between the years 1000 and 1700, inaugurated the programme of publication in 1966. It was followed in 1969 by volume II, containing the biographies of persons having died between 1701 and 1740. The introductions to those volumes contain an account of the generous bequest of James Nicholson (1861–1952) by means of which the DCB was founded, and of the establishment of the DBC with the support of l'université Laval; the principles of operation and selection for the DCB/DBC are also described therein. The present volume, dealing with persons who died between 1871 and 1880, does not follow volumes I and II in numerical or chronological sequence. Its appearance at this stage has both a historical and a practical explanation.

In 1967 Canada celebrated 100 years of confederation. The government of Canada, as one of its first contributions to the events of the year, created the Centennial Commission, which helped in a variety of ways to ensure the undoubted success of this significant anniversary. The DCB/DBC, a major historical undertaking in Canada's two languages, was privileged to receive one of the commission's early awards, a grant of $160,000, designated especially for biographical research in the years 1850–1900. Research in this period brought under scrutiny many of the figures involved in the confederation era. The grant has also assisted the work of the DCB/DBC in the 18th century. The first general editor of the DCB/DBC, George W. Brown, was greatly interested in the extension of its research to the 19th century and it is fitting that his contribution to this period at an early stage should be recorded here.

In July 1965 a research office for the DCB/DBC was opened in Ottawa, directed by Marc La Terreur from 1965 to 1967, and by Bernard Pothier from 1967 to 1969. This office built up a large file of biographical information for the 19th century (now assimilated into the files at Toronto and Quebec), and as the work progressed it became clear that a delay in the preparation of volumes based on its findings would be unfortunate. Moreover, it was desirable not to postpone taking advantage of the activity of historians and other scholars who have of recent years been making important contributions to knowledge of 19th century Canada. The organization of the DCB/DBC allows preparation and publication of volumes as chronological units but does not require publication of volumes in chronological sequence, and in 1967 the decision was taken to begin preparation of 19th century volumes. Persons dying between 1871 and 1880 were the first group to be assembled, and volume X contains, therefore, many of the figures and events associated with confederation. Mr La Terreur took on the responsibility of editing the first 19th century volume. The volumes between II and X will be prepared and published next.

Volume X covers only one decade, as compared with 700 years for volume I, 40 years for volume II and 30 years for volume III (now in preparation). With the growth in the population of Canada through the 18th and 19th centuries, the number of possible candidates for inclusion increases, and, although criteria for inclusion become more stringent, the time span to be covered by individual volumes gradually contracts.

The 256 contributors to volume X, who submitted manuscripts in either English or French, are listed on pages 767–74. The Directives they were given include this key paragraph:

> Each biography should be an informative and stimulating treatment of its subject, presented in readable form. All factual information should be precise and accurate, and be based upon reliable (preferably primary) sources. Biographies should not, however, be mere catalogues of dates and events, or compilations of previous studies of the same subject. The biographer should try to give the reader an orderly account of the personality and achievements of the subject, against the background of the period in which the person lived and the events in which he or she participated. It is evident that such biographies cannot be written to any one specification, but it is expected that the biographer will attempt, within the space available, to appraise the circumstances shaping his subject's character and career, enumerating the parts played by ancestry, parentage, education, physical and social environment, and other formative influences; that he will make discreet use of relevant anecdote; and that he will conclude his biography by an equitable and discriminating evaluation of the subject's strengths and weaknesses, successes and failures, and probable place in Canadian history.

After submission, the articles for a volume are reviewed by the DCB/DBC editors, and correspondence between them and the contributors takes up points of style, fact, and coverage in text and bibliography. Lastly, each biography is translated into the other language, and final copy of the two parallel volumes is prepared for the printer.

Volume X includes an introduction by the volume editor, tracing the scope of the biographies as a collection, and also a general bibliography and full nominal index with cross-references to other volumes to come. The glossary of Indian tribal names which appeared in volumes I and II was not thought to be necessary for volume X.

The names of members of the staff who have been engaged upon volume X in Toronto and Quebec are recorded on page v. The description of their responsibilities given in the paragraph above indicates the extent of their contribution to the DCB/DBC, but not the competence, devotion, and enthusiasm with which it has been made.

At the time volume X was inaugurated, and for the first two of its four years of preparation, Dr David Hayne was general editor of the DCB/DBC. Volume II had his supervision as general editor throughout, and for volume I he served as chairman of the Toronto Translation Committee. All those who have been associated with the DCB/DBC in any capacity and at any time would wish that tribute be paid here to Dr Hayne's wise and considerate guidance, to the variety of knowledge at his command, to the standards of scholarly and editorial execution he set, and to the contribution he made to the happy association of our two language groups in this important bilingual undertaking.

FRANCESS G. HALPENNY
ANDRÉ VACHON

INTRODUCTION TO VOLUME X

MARC LA TERREUR

The aim of the Dictionary of Canadian Biography/Dictionnaire biographique du Canada is to provide "a complete record of the activities of all noteworthy inhabitants of Canada from earliest times to the ultimate date of publication." The philanthropist who made this undertaking possible had stipulated in his will that the persons whose biographies were to be included should be "noteworthy from all points of view." The task assigned was therefore to create the Canadian equivalent of the Dictionary of National Biography and the Dictionary of American Biography: a venture bordering on temerity in a country with resources so inferior to those of Great Britain and the United States. But, through the extraordinarily close collaboration afforded by many scholars, the first volume, containing the biographies of persons of primary and secondary importance who died before 1700, was produced, and established criteria of research and presentation of such a kind that comparison with these other works of reference no longer appeared presumptuous. The enthusiastic reception given to its first volume prompted the DCB/DBC, already concerned with preparing volume II (for persons whose deaths occurred between 1701 and 1740), to "open a second front" by beginning a study of the 19th century. Such an activity would be nearer to the present time, and the numerous specialists whose work did not bear on the French colonial period could be called upon; moreover, with at least two volumes always in preparation, the speed at which the whole undertaking could be completed would be increased.

A timely grant from the Canadian Centennial Commission made possible a preliminary study of the period 1851–1900. General works, specialized studies, and archival sources were consulted in order to draw up a rough list of persons who might be included in the volumes for this half century. Numerically, the results were frightening. Whereas for the volumes of the French regime it had almost been necessary to use a magnifying glass to discover a full complement of men and women who would have a biography, now politicians and business men, engineers and administrators, judges and journalists, ecclesiastics and artists came into view, all bearing credentials for posterity. The editorial task was no longer searching, but pruning. The large first list was broken up by grouping explorers and fur-traders, important people of British Columbia, the Prairies, Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, and Newfoundland, and a "special list" of those not easily classified. There were then ten lists of persons who had died between 1851 and 1900. A decision now had to be made about the decade to be covered by the first published volume.

Each decade offered attractions and disadvantages from the point of view of the number of significant individuals who died within it – a somewhat cynical criterion, we admit, by which to judge the importance of a period, but a convenient one, in conformity with the general policy of the DCB/DBC by which each volume covers "a specific number of years . . . with the contents arranged alphabetically. . . ." The years 1871–80 were finally adopted for several reasons: though they were an indirect preparation for the volumes of later decades, they necessarily contained the major themes of 19th-century Canadian history; they furnished an opportunity to study men such as Paul KANE, Louis-Joseph PAPINEAU, James DOUGLAS, William LOGAN, and John Sandfield MACDONALD; and through the study of politicians such as George-Étienne CARTIER, George BROWN, and Joseph HOWE, it was possible to follow the stages leading to the British North America Act and thus to comply with the implicit intention of the Centennial Commission.

This decision taken, the provisional lists for 1851–1900 were reviewed and the names belonging to the 1870s were extracted. The ten regional lists were further broken down into professions or activities as an aid to verification and the results were submitted to various experts. Their advice was highly valuable: they supplied missing dates of births and deaths, pointed out omissions, indicated the relative importance of persons, and made recommendations about possible biographers. The staff of the DCB/DBC had to make sure for its part that any person dying between 1 Jan. 1871 and 31 Dec. 1880 who had had a definite role in some sector of Canadian life appeared on these lists; to try to ensure that no person of note had escaped attention, a number of newspapers were scrutinized. Then, again in conjunction with experts, the persons actually to be included in the volume were selected, and the importance to be attached to them was determined, the categories of length extending from short factual notes to major studies of 10,000 words. At this point in the process of cutting down and classifying, the differences between the volumes for the French regime and the present volume really became apparent.

The geographical borders of 17th century New France and the Canada of the last third of the 19th century have some similarity, but there the resemblances between an embryonic colony and a partially industrialized country appear to end. The sedentary white population of New France consisted of a few score of persons in 1625 and of about 2,000 in 1660, whereas in 1870 Canada could count nearly 4,000,000 and its principal city, the former Ville-Marie, could boast of 107,225 inhabitants and the famous Victoria Bridge, then the largest tubular bridge in the world. What had been an immense, unknown territory, explored only along its waterways – a testimony to the boldness and endurance of missionaries and voyageurs – was now in many regions marked out by roads, lined with sections of iron track soon to be transformed into a transcontinental railway, and traversed by boats that almost mocked natural obstacles, thanks to the canals that were being built. The New World, which had been virtually cut off from all communication with the Old from November to May, was linked to it definitively in 1866 by submarine cable, so that news of any event was no longer delayed by frontiers or ice-floes. Whereas New France depended on the mother country for every manufactured article, Canada possessed a number of industries that could transform raw materials locally. The old colony, with an essentially autocratic regime the head of whose supreme and omnipresent authority resided beyond the seas, had become a country with a number of governments, in which functions were becoming more and more complex, most of which had two houses and also a ministry responsible to the elected representatives of the population, judicial systems, and a host of civil servants to assist legislators and ministers. There had once been a single institution of secondary teaching and a few primary schools; now the country had universities, with some specialized faculties, colleges, and systems of secondary and primary education. The religious and linguistic unity of the French regime had become linguistic and cultural dualism, as well as religious pluralism. The microcosm of the old regime, without lawyers and printers, had become a varied community endowed with newspapers and literary or scientific journals which were kept supplied by a pleiad of journalists, artists, scientists, and men of letters; professional and bourgeois classes instead of seigneurs were the unofficial leaders of this diversified society, which was more and more receptive towards the outside world but still much occupied in building a country in which industrialization was increasing and resources were being more fully exploited.

These fundamental changes suggest the pitfalls that have made the selection of the 574 persons in this volume a large task. To the difficulties inherent in any choice, and multiplied here by the number of individuals, were added those created by the immense size of the territory in which they lived and the need for regional representation.

Because date of death determines the contents of any volume, each covers a considerable period of time. The important activities of most men coincide with their maturity, and their old age is often not active. A person who died in the 1870s may have made his place in history through actions 20 or 30 years before, or even earlier. There is, for example, François BEAULIEU, who in 1791 accompanied Alexander Mackenzie* on his journey overland to the Pacific Ocean; yet on the next page one may find discussed the contract finally granted in 1880 to the company which was to build a railway to that same Pacific Ocean. Another good example of longevity is Étienne MAYRAND (1776–1872), who in the days of the North West Company went out to grow rich in the fur trade, returned to put his capital to work in "the old province," was elected to the Legislative Assembly, and finally sat in the Legislative Council. As his biographer points out, he had served "his country loyally under four sovereigns, George III, George IV, William IV, and Queen Victoria, no less than 19 governors general, and 21 lieutenant governors." Born at the time the Quebec Act was becoming effective, he lived under the constitution proclaimed in 1791 and under the union, and finally was a witness of the first five years of the federation of 1867. These instances are, of course, extreme, but none the less this volume, from the standpoint of biography, does describe in a fairly continuous fashion three-quarters of a century rich in events. In that sense, it does not mark a pause in time, but rather is the portrayal of an evolution.

The geographic factor that had to be taken into account was closely linked with the demographic factor alluded to above. The considerable size of the Canadian population necessitated the rigorous elimination of persons who are of secondary importance for our undertaking. Among some 20 judges, for example, we selected one who had distinguished himself in politics before acceding to the magistrature, or who had stood out among his colleagues because of his legal writings, or who had delivered judgements in noteworthy cases. In addition, we endeavoured to make a place for at least one person from the principal spheres of activity, and to have representatives of workers, craftsmen, farmers, fishermen, surveyors, etc. Indeed it is figures like these, often without precise outline or relief, and almost forgotten by history, who have ensured the stability of the family and who from day to day have fashioned Canadian society. For this reason the volume has itinerant missionaries defying distance and bad weather to sow the seeds of faith [see MILNER], and an Antoine LÉGARÉ teaching for 50 years at the little school of Saint-Roch in Quebec, reminding us of the "half century of servitude" that Flaubert speaks of in connection with the servant Catherine Nicaise. These humble people deserve their chronicles as much as politicians, artists, businessmen, scientists, doctors, and bishops. Thus the volume tries to present a faithful picture of a past when there were still numbers of dwellings of squared logs, when the pioneers' furniture was rudimentary, when hours of work were long and reward was slight. And is not history a description of past life? Despite the alphabetical arrangement of the biographies, a reader should not forget that volume X presents a full perspective of Canadian life, a life that, even allowing for the extent of the territory, shows certain common currents.

That immense expanse, which was to become Canada, begins at its eastern extremity with Newfoundland. Inhabited seasonally by fishermen, divided into six districts in 1792, Newfoundland changed its appearance in the 19th century, when English merchants gradually set up operations in such centres as St John's and Harbour Grace, and thus dominated still more closely the island's economic life. Its institutions were transformed, and, bit by bit, the mediaeval vestiges of the old judicial regime disappeared. In 1824 Newfoundland acquired the status of a colony, and in the following year received its first resident governor, the ostentatious but effective COCHRANE, who was instructed to divide its territory into three districts and who governed with the approval of a docile council. Pressures were such that in 1832 a civil government was established, although the seven executive councillors, appointed by Cochrane, did not sit in the assembly of 15 elected representatives. But quarrels flared: merchants against officials, immigrants against islanders, Catholics against Protestants, fishermen against suppliers, bankers and merchants of St John's against the rest of the island. The embryonic political parties collapsed, and in 1842 a new constitution was adopted by which the representatives, elected or appointed, theoretically worked on an equal footing in an assembly that was always exposed to the restlessness of a population swayed by many fluctuating influences. Finally, in 1855, Great Britain granted responsible government to Newfoundland, and a more modern if often still tumultuous political era began. This was the setting in which toiled a small population – 75,000 inhabitants in 1836 and 120,000 in 1857. On the island, where everything functioned in terms of the sea and its resources, the decline of the fisheries at the end of the 1850s and during the 1860s had disastrous consequences, but they were not enough to bring the independent islanders to accept union with Canada.

Also washed by the ocean but very different from Newfoundland, were the three Atlantic provinces. Their history, economy, expansion, and life were intimately linked, even if they preserved their individuality. Prince Edward Island experienced a population explosion during the 19th century: from 4,000 inhabitants in 1798 to 47,000 in 1814 and to 87,000 in 1864. But one problem predominated: the land question. The Island, a French possession until 1763, was shortly after divided into 67 lots – long belts of land, each of about 20,000 acres, stretching from north to south. The concession holders, mostly British and Protestant, did not live on their properties and were unable to attract a stable population to them; they entrusted the administration to agents, who attempted to extract as much money as possible. In 1841 less than a third of the farmers owned the soil they tilled. The absenteeism of the owners was a cause of division among the Island's population, and numerous but vain attempts were made to change the system of tenure. Steps taken by the government of Prince Edward Island to buy the lands were frustrated by the influence the owners had with the British authorities and their desire to keep their domains; on the other hand, in the 1860s, the farmers' refusal to pay their rents only resulted in armed repression [see HODGSON]. This phenomenon poisoned political life [see COLES, POPE], and also affected daily living. A case in point is Father John MCDONALD, parish priest and landowner at the same time, a man divided between his duties and his interests, torn between God and Mammon, who, suffering the reproaches of his bishop and the ire of his flock, finally left lands and parish but did not give up his rents.

Conflicts of this kind did not exist in Nova Scotia, the first colony on Canadian soil to have a legislative body, and which, with the annexation of Cape Breton Island in 1820, had its frontiers set. Coal and iron mines gave rise to small industries, so that it did not depend solely on fisheries, lumbering, or agriculture. Commerce, moreover, played a major role. Merchants, chiefly British, sent to Nova Scotia supplies for fishing and manufactured articles, and loaded their vessels with fish which they sold in the West Indies and Brazil in exchange for sugar and rum. These slow, heavy cargo boats, built in Nova Scotia and often commanded by Nova Scotians, could also transport wood to Great Britain or coal to the United States. Local financiers shared more and more in this kind of trading. Shipbuilding, which was often a family undertaking [see CHURCHILL], prospered during most of the 19th century, but declined in the 1870s and 1880s because of a falling off in trade and the use of iron vessels, and because of the lack of cooperation from local banks. For as early as 1825 – thanks to enterprising businessmen such as Enos COLLINS, Samuel Cunard*, and H. H. Cogswell* – this colony possessed a bank, the Halifax Banking Company. Having no competition, and with five of its directors in the Legislative Council, it strove persistently, but in vain, to block the founding of the Bank of Nova Scotia in 1832. This rival, under the control of Tories such as M. B. ALMON and J. W. JOHNSTON, made a breach in the Halifax Banking Company's monopoly. The competition between these two establishments of the Nova Scotian oligarchy weakened the economy of the province, brought about a depreciation of the currency, and supplied the Reformers, who used every means to attain their ends, with weapons by which to attack the ruling class. Nevertheless, the impression of the province that remains is of an industrious population – nearly 400,000 inhabitants in 1870 – in which Acadians, British, Germans, loyalists had all been concerned with progress, where there prevailed an atmosphere of activity and prosperity, and where interest in common welfare was often intense.

The image is somewhat different in the case of New Brunswick, a territory detached from Nova Scotia in 1784. At that time it was a homogeneous colony: 20,000 loyalists easily submerged 1,500 Acadians. This homogeneity disappeared with the arrival of other English-speaking immigrants (the population passed the quarter-million mark in 1867). Social and geographical cleavages were to persist in the colony, and local problems monopolized all political activity. But larger issues of responsible government and confederation were nevertheless fought out here in much the same way and as vigorously as in the other colonies [see WILMOT, FISHER, and CHANDLER]. The basis of the economy was lumbering; agriculture and fishing seem poor juniors when compared to the seemingly inexhaustible resources of the forests. Until 1840, Great Britain drew from New Brunswick her supplies of timber for building ships; the preferences granted made possible the creation of "forest empires" in the valley of the Miramichi. The removal of preferences later did not prove disastrous, for the New Brunswick lumbermen early "discovered" the American market. It was the timber trade over which bitter struggles were fought at the beginning of the century. Its control passed from the officers of the crown to the legislative body [see Robert GOWAN and Wilmot], but the change proved difficult, and could not erase the memory of certain rather unsavoury deals involving "patronage." Yet it was by means of these forest resources used for shipbuilding at Saint John and in several other Bay of Fundy ports that New Brunswick became famous in the 19th century. The ships thus built were durable, and remarkable for their burden, which in certain cases almost reached the figure of 2,400 tons; they were the biggest sailing ships built in British North America [see HARLEY, HILYARD, WRIGHT].

Different from the Atlantic provinces, and enjoying a diversified economy, was the immense area whose development and population were related to the St Lawrence. It became the Province of Canada in 1841, in a union of the former Lower Canada and Upper Canada, but none the less remained divided: on the one hand there was Canada East, which continued to be called Lower Canada and in 1867 was to become the province of Quebec; on the other, Canada West, which was commonly known as Upper Canada and in 1867 was to be the province of Ontario.

The province of Quebec – it had already had that name before 1791, when the two Canadas were formed out of its territory – was the old "Canada," which had been conquered by force of arms, and it was the watchful guardian of the French and Catholic heritage. The French had eyed with distrust the British immigrants, who even if few in number were active, who tended to group together, and who showed both business sense and suspicion of the state, accustomed as they were to freedom of the press, freedom of speech, and free enterprise. For their part, the French had lived under the arm of the state or the church, and had not known a democratic tradition; individualistic as they were, they kept to areas with which they were familiar, agriculture and the fur trade. The loyalist immigration that followed the American revolution disturbed this society. The demographic transformation of the province of Quebec brought about changes in its political institutions, and the introduction of parliamentarianism into the two new provinces. Lower Canada, with 150,000 inhabitants of whom some 10,000 were Anglophones, was enabled officially to remain loyal to its traditions, but would have to adapt itself to this minority, which was different in its language and religion, and above all economically and financially powerful. At the beginning of the 19th century, Lower Canada's traditional sources of livelihood, agriculture and the fur trade, began to diminish in alarming fashion. The decline in the harvest continued unabated, but the revenues obtained from pelts were to be replaced by those from the export of lumber, facilitated again by the preferential tariffs of Great Britain. But lumbering benefited particularly the Anglophones, for it supplied the requirements of shipbuilding and the export trade. The Sharples [see John SHARPLES] and John GILMOUR are symptomatic. They bought their lumber to the east and west of Quebec, cut it at Sillery, and used their own ships to transport pine and oak in the form of square timber, and planks for construction, to England and Scotland.

The decline of prices after 1815, the vexatious practices of the seigneurs, who now were not controlled in civil matters, and the economic inferiority of the French Canadians, led the latter to transpose their frustrations and resentments to the political plane, so greatly had the old order changed. The bourgeoisie engaged in business and the bureaucrats, grouped under the generic term "English," were attacked by Francophones of the professional classes. The rebellion followed [see Papineau and NELSON]. Durham made his report, and in 1841 the two Canadas, almost by nature in opposition, were united.

Upper Canada had been created by the Act of 1791; it had given the loyalists, whose main concern was then agriculture, a constitution that allowed them to live under the shelter of the British institutions and flag they cherished. A local aristocracy, which was not, however, exclusively loyalist, assumed the lead, socially and politically, in the majority of institutions, and was able to boast of its defence of British territory in 1812–14. But the social stratification that it wanted, perhaps unconsciously, to create in the province could not resist the growing influence of Jacksonian democracy after 1820, or the spirit of enterprise shown by numerous immigrants. Upper Canada, an agricultural province, but one supported by the forest industry and strengthened by the creation of small undertakings involving some skilled labour, succeeded fairly well in providing a system of communications for the transporting of its products. The social confrontation which the 1837 uprising represented, Francis Bond HEAD's ephemeral victory, and the union with Lower Canada in no way diminished the progressive spirit of Upper Canada; all these events served rather as a stimulus.

After the union of 1841, the two colonies had willy-nilly to keep in step, with numerically equal representation in a parliament that continually changed its seat, and despite the demographic disproportions which first worked in favour of Upper Canada, whose population in 1841 was 455,000 in comparison with the 700,000 of Lower Canada. Ten years later, Upper Canada numbered 952,000 persons and Lower Canada 890,000. Since at that time equal representation bore unjustly upon Upper Canada, the latter raised the cry of injustice, gave out on every occasion its slogan "rep by pop" [see Brown], and reacted in varying ways to those who recommended double majority [see J. S. Macdonald]. This situation did not, however, prevent the economic development of the Province of Canada from entering a new phase.

In the 1840s, the popularity of free trade in Great Britain resulted in the virtual abolition of the preferential tariffs favourable to Canadian products, in particular those of the forest. This occurred at the time when a persistent agricultural crisis was forcing Lower Canada to turn to Upper Canada for its grain, and when businessmen and merchants were looking more and more to the United States, with the thought of annexation [see

Holton]. But the beneficial reciprocity treaty and an increase in customs duties on British products restored a certain balance. The abolition of the seigneurial regime and the settlement of the clergy reserves extinguished servitudes of the past and were an augury of a new age. It was marked by a revolution in transportation [see Killaly], which threw the economy into confusion and gave it a different orientation, by enabling it to reach previously inaccessible markets rapidly; it was marked also by the appearance of entrepreneurs capable of adapting themselves to changes and even of anticipating them. The Torrances [see David Torrance] come to mind: wholesale merchants and owners of steamships that plied between Montreal and Quebec, they rivalled the Molsons on the St Lawrence [see William Molson], and organized a more rapid and less costly method of shipping merchandise. John Young, importer, turned his attention with foresight and success towards railways, and even obtained a charter to link Canada to Great Britain and then to Asia by cable. These businessmen possessed a common spirit of enterprise, but diversified their interests [see Workman], and did not hesitate to enter the political arena in order to promote the country's prosperity, and consequently their own. French Canadians took little or no part in these great ventures, with the exception of a few such as Jean-Baptiste Prat (John Pratt), Jacques-Félix Sincennes, and Marc-Damase Masson; they confined themselves to embryonic manufacturing activity in textiles, furniture, and footwear, without attaining a level at which exporting was really profitable.

Upper Canada was more open to industrialization; it had many imaginative entrepreneurs who directed their capital away from progressive family industries into insurance companies and railroad and banking operations. They took precautions to safeguard their manufactured products from American competition, and the words protection and reciprocity were to constitute the poles of attraction of Canadian political economy in the second half of the century. All politicians dreamed, at one time or another, of renewing the beneficial reciprocity treaty abrogated in 1866. Meanwhile, through confederation, efforts were made to find new markets for the surpluses of United Canada, and later, in 1879, the protectionist budget of S. L. Tilley* gave if not prosperity to Canada at least success to the party of John A. Macdonald*.

The country situated to the west of the Great Lakes and bordering on the Arctic and the Pacific was to be one of these outlets. At the beginning of the period represented in volume X, it was theoretically under the control of the Hudson's Bay Company. From its trading posts on the bay whose name it had adopted, the company easily drained off the furs of Rupert's Land (from Labrador to the Rockies and from Red River to Hudson's Bay), for the Indians came to it to barter. But the North West Company, whose headquarters were at Montreal and not in London, made its way into this empire of ill-defined frontiers. A relentless struggle went on at the beginning of the century, and the merchants of the HBC had to leave their trading posts and go to meet the Indians. In 1821, Great Britain forced the two rivals to join together, the North West Company being taken over by the HBC; from that time the latter enjoyed the monopoly of trade from Labrador to the Oregon and from Red River to the Yukon. Through this huge territory, sparsely populated by Indians and Métis, with symbolic agricultural settlements on the Red River travelled Protestant and Catholic missionaries; in bringing the succour of their religion they tried to instil the rudiments of civilization, which for them meant the white man's way of life. To accomplish their ends, they learned Indian dialects, built chapels and schools with their own hands, followed hunting expeditions, even took the side of the Métis against the powerful company [see BELLECOURT]. The HBC ran up against not only the Red River Métis, who obtained freedom of trade in 1849, but also the Americans, who wanted to break its monopoly, and the Ontarian immigrants, whose violent spokesman was the Nor'Wester [see James ROSS]. The new dominion was anxious to acquire the Hudson's Bay Company's territories [see Cartier], and in 1869 bought the rights of the company. The assumption of authority was carried out clumsily, causing an insurrection [see BUNN, O'DONOGHUE] and resulting in hasty concessions to Bishop Taché* and Louis Riel* that the government subsequently wanted to attenuate or challenge. The creation of a new province, Manitoba, gave form to a tiny part of this immense territory, namely the Assiniboia and the Portage region, which had a population of about 10,000. The birth of this fifth province came about amid dissension; the transition from a nomadic life to a civilization based on colonization and agriculture contained within it the source of educational, religious, and ethnic problems that were later to shake the whole country.

Out of the former territory of the Hudson's Bay Company were also carved, in 1905, two other provinces: Saskatchewan and Alberta. Their history prior to the creation of Manitoba is indistinguishable from that of the trading posts of the HBC. The life of its employees, especially the juniors, was rough, and the isolation was hard to bear; the distances to be covered were enormous, and trips to the home land were rare. But the profits compensated for "the humdrum life we led there," to use the expression of one of these traders. Some, however, turned to experimental agriculture, others tried painting, like A. H. MURRAY, or botany, like B. R. ROSS. The company's interest in the aborigines was particularly as purveyors of furs in exchange for manufactured goods: a contact for them with a different culture was the work of the missionaries. This volume does not contain the biographies of the great Oblate propagators of the faith, such as Albert Lacombe* and Vital Grandin*, but in it will be found Brother REYNARD, who was paradoxically deemed too good to be ordained priest and to direct a mission. He was a skilful carpenter, sparing of neither time nor effort; he put up buildings, and relieved the missionaries of material concerns. For James NISBET, the first Presbyterian minister in this region, agricultural preoccupations even prevailed over the concern for spreading Christianity; G. M. MCDOUGALL, a Methodist, arrived at a more felicitous balance, rather like that of the Catholic missions. All of them witnessed the migrations of the Métis, the epidemics that decimated the Indian population, the often dubious contributions from a lay society tainted by a ruthless pursuit of gain and tarnished by the trade in spirits. At least the zeal of the missionaries added a moderating touch of humanity to the penetration of whites, and their influence was a considerable help to the government in the settling of the problem of the Indian reserves [see WIKASKOKISEYIN and SOTAI-NA]. In that way they contributed to the development of the territory.

Beyond the Rockies the characters of the volume tread a soil that Russia and Spain once fought over, and that was mapped by Captain George Vancouver* at the end of the 18th century. The HBC established itself there after taking over the North West Company, which, thanks to Simon Fraser* and David Thompson*, had explored the rivers and set up trading posts. The HBC headquarters was first situated at Fort Vancouver, on the Columbia River, but in the 1840s, when the American government established control of Oregon, it transferred the seat of its operations to Victoria. The fur trade at such forts as Macleod, St James, and George still remained the company's predominant interest, but gradually it extended its activity to farming, timber, and mines. Immigrants were still coming in mere handfuls – less than 100 per year up to 1858 – at the time James Douglas, while remaining chief HBC officer west of the Rockies, was appointed civil governor of Vancouver Island. The discovery of gold in 1858, in the sands of the Fraser and the valley of the Thompson, threw the life of the colony into a turmoil; Douglas left the company to become governor of both Vancouver Island and British Columbia. Rapidly the miners crowded in; at the height of the rush, Barkerville and its vicinity numbered 25,000 inhabitants. Douglas enacted regulations and the "hanging judge" Matthew Begbie* saw to it that they were obeyed by the throng of prospectors and profiteers; justice was done, often of a spectacular kind, despite its lack of orthodoxy [see Cox]. Few miners got rich, but the government ran into debt endeavouring to build roads; the population decreased rapidly and the government kept its debts. In 1866 the two colonies were joined and in 1868 Victoria became the capital. When sawmills were being set up, when wood from British Columbia was on its way to Peru, California, Great Britain, Australia, and China [see MOODY and STAMP], when the first salmon canneries were being established [see DEAS], thought was also being given to railroads for this colony of about 20,000 inhabitants and to its political status. Promises that its debt would be absorbed, and that it would be linked by rail to Canada, convinced British Columbia of the advantage in becoming the sixth province of the Canadian confederation. Delays almost led it to withdraw from the union, and not until nine years after its entry was the railway really begun. A new era of development, less ephemeral than the one spawned by the gold rush, opened for British Columbia.

This bird's-eye view of the territory would be incomplete without mention of the Arctic, whose vastness haunts the mind and has the same appeal to the imagination as the exploration of America and the Pacific Ocean in the 15th and 16th centuries and the conquests of space in the 20th. "Terra incognita" was sufficient reason for the search for a northwest passage which would connect the Atlantic and the Pacific. At first, it was thought that it would be a shorter route to the Orient, and the charter of the HBC enjoined the "honourable" merchants to discover this passage. At the end of the 18th century, the voyages of Samuel Hearne* and Alexander Mackenzie pointed to a conclusion that this passage did exist, somewhere to the north of the mouths of the Coppermine and the Mackenzie, and the outlets from Hudson Bay, and that it must lie ice-bound in the wastes of the Arctic. Commercial ambitions faded, but the desire to make a last major geographical discovery remained. For the British navy, the most powerful of the day, it was a challenge to be taken up. Geographical knowledge could be perfected: mapping of localities, observation of air and water temperatures, study of maritime currents and variations of the magnetic needle, gathering of new geological and botanical species. The voyages took place under indescribable conditions, and the courage of captains and crews is sometimes beyond comprehension. Their expeditions lasted for years, and the wintering-over periods in the ice-fields exceeded ten months, for three of which they did not directly see the sun. The travellers were never assured of returning, and accidents could be tragic: 19 people swept away on an ice-floe went 1,300 miles in 6 months [see C. F. HALL]. Exposed to intense and sustained cold, these men became the prey of scurvy and of an immense boredom described by Sir John Ross*: "We were weary for want of occupation, for want of variety, for want of the means of mental exertion, for want of thought, and (why should I not say it?) for want of society. Today was as yesterday, and as was to-day, so would it be to-morrow: while if there was no variety, as no hope of better, is it wonderful that even the visits of barbarians were welcome, or can any thing more strongly show the nature of our pleasures, than the confession that these were delightful. . . ."

From 1819 to 1825 William Edward Parry* – whose mission was to explore Lancaster Sound thoroughly and to proceed as directly as possible, if he found a way through, to Bering Strait – discovered Prince Regent Inlet, Wellington and Barrow straits, and Bathurst and Melville islands. He was the first explorer to penetrate so deeply to the west within the Arctic Circle. From the expeditions of John Franklin*, John Ross, and George BACK some plausible hypotheses could be made: that the eastern entry to the famous passage was Lancaster Sound and the western entry was probably somewhere along Barrow Strait, with Bering Strait necessarily the western exit. Franklin, entrusted with localizing the passage, was lost with his crew in 1845. Forty expeditions searched for him, and scoured the entire Arctic except the region where he had actually perished [see Jane GRIFFIN and Richard KING]. One of these included Robert MCCLURE on the Investigator and Robert Collinson* on the Enterprise. They made their way into the Arctic through Bering Strait and went towards Melville Island, while Henry Austin* and then Edward BELCHER used Lancaster Sound. Finally, McClure passed Cape Bathurst on the starboard side, took possession of Nelson Head, discovered Prince of Wales Strait between Banks and Victoria islands, and proceeded up it to ascertain whether it communicated with Melville Sound. He had discovered a northwest passage. The date was 1851. Stefan Zweig would have called this a "great starlit hour." Only later was it learned that Franklin also had discovered a northwest passage, by way of Victoria Strait.

The geographical space covered by volume X appears, therefore, immense: immense and so varied that its regions seem to have been assembled at the whim of nature. The links between these different regions were tenuous, even non-existent, and it might be wondered whether any kind of unity would ever be realized. A world separated the fisherman of Newfoundland from the miner of Cape Breton, the parish priest of Quebec, the merchant of Toronto, or the lumberman of British Columbia. In the 1870s, when a central government succeeded in placing seven provinces in its orbit, regional aspirations rather than national sentiments became evident. "Our country is too divided and split by the barriers of divergent opinions; in reality, around each province there is a Dixie line," a Manitoban representative ruefully put it in the commons in 1885. A federal election represented a total of seven local elections; the campaigns were conducted separately, on issues often contradictory from one province to another, and with regional factors outweighing national considerations. Governing thus became a perilous art, based almost exclusively on a system of regional, ethnic, and religious adjustments, an art of adapting to conflicting pressures as varied as they were numerous. These regional differences merely prolonged in a more visible fashion the situation prevailing before 1867. All the same, amid the diversities one does find common features, even if they occur only in relation to problems attending the formation or evolution of the pieces on the chessboard.

The first is the state of dependency that over a long period characterized a number of aspects of the life of these different regions. A dependency on natural forces, and on rudimentary means of transportation. Dependency also because of the structure of land rights: much of Prince Edward Island was in the hands of absentee landlords; the Province of Canada had to grapple until 1854 with the enclaves of the seigneurial regime and the clergy reserves; until 1869 the west was entirely the domain of the HBC. Politically the dependency showed itself more sharply. Administrators and sometimes judges were given appointments by the British government, often through political or family influence [see LE MARCHANT], and their stay on Canadian soil was only a stage in their careers. Some wanted to domineer over "their" colonials [see Cochrane], others embarked on risky initiatives [see Head], or took advantage of their position to exercise favouritism or nepotism. To assess in any comprehensive way the contributions they made to Canada would not be easy: suffice it to say that their presence and their actions readily engendered unrest, whose source was eliminated with the granting of responsible government, but at the price of political agitation and even open insurrection.

The notion of responsible government haunted the minds of those preoccupied with reform during the first half of the century. The extreme limits of the country may be mentioned briefly: in Newfoundland responsible government was granted in 1855; for British Columbia, the departure of James Douglas – who hated the very notion, "the term is associated with revolution," he said – and later entry into the Canadian confederation were accompanied quite naturally by the application of the principle. But the Atlantic colonies had governments established by the ruling classes; the local aristocracy constituted the executive and monopolized the posts centring around it. Joseph Howe was undoubtedly the leader in the struggle for ministerial responsibility; he wanted for Nova Scotia a regime similar to that of Great Britain. In his twelve resolutions of 1837 he demanded only that the Legislative Council be elective, but when subsequently the group of Reformers he had brought together won the 1847 election, they were invited to form a government. The Reformers of Prince Edward Island proposed to Great Britain that they would meet the costs of the civil list, on condition that they have the benefit of ministerial responsibility [see Coles]. Their election victory in 1851 prompted Great Britain to grant their request. The administration was also monopolized by a local élite in New Brunswick, but the opposition to it was less clear cut than in Nova Scotia. E. B. Chandler, with reservations about political parties and their alternation in power, accepted a diluted form of ministerial responsibility, and directed affairs effectively in a paternalistic way. Charles Fisher's party was to acquire a certain cohesion, and finally formed a government in 1854 [see MANNERS-SUTTON and Wilmot]. Three years later the secretary of state for the colonies officially recognized the right of New Brunswick to responsible government. In the Atlantic provinces the acquisition of responsible government was thus brought about against local oligarchies, but without violence other than verbal.

Such was not the case in the Canadas, where there were rebellions against the power of the cliques. These revolts were, however, preceded by a series of claims put forward by the representative legislative assemblies, which, desirous of more or less radical changes, and aware of the necessity of fostering economic and social progress in the colonies [see Papineau, PARENT, BIDWELL], came up against the die-hard character of the executive councils. In Lower Canada, ethnic differences accentuated this fundamental problem; in each colony, Reformers were divided as to the means of obtaining more power for the elected representatives, the moderates wanting to exhaust all legal methods, the extremists precipitating armed insurrection. The union of the two colonies under the aegis of one parliament was the end result. It was the former moderate Reformers who, forgetting their ethnic differences and their reservations in regard to the new province, made responsible government a reality in United Canada [see under DRAPER]. Characteristically enough, in this achievement the mutual understanding that had existed among these moderate Reformers disappeared, and their spokesmen, Robert Baldwin* and Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine*, chose to leave to others the task of administering the province with the type of government they had finally secured. That responsibility brought about the appearance of political parties. During the 1850s, John A. Macdonald and George-Étienne Cartier succeeded in creating if not in establishing the Liberal-Conservative party, made up of Tory elements and moderate Reformers [see J. H. CAMERON]. Former extremists of both sections found it extraordinarily difficult to decide upon a durable basis of ideological agreement; their history, under the union, was that of their prejudices, susceptibilities, and incompatibilities. The ministry that best maintained itself in power was the one that made most use of compromise; the most intransigent members constituted an opposition party, often sufficiently cohesive to bring about political instability in United Canada [see David CHRISTIE, George Brown, J. S. Macdonald, Holton]. To remove this danger, a number of politicians abandoned for a time their partisan concerns and tried to shape a new country by uniting the British colonies of North America. One great theme, the struggle to obtain responsible government, thus preceded another, that of federal union.

It is unnecessary here to go into the details of the achievement of union, which favoured the Liberal-Conservative party and excluded the French Canadian Liberals. Ultimately democratic process gave way before the will of men holding office [see under Cartier, Brown, Médéric LANCTOT, LABERGE, and Howe]. The participation of the Maritimes in confederation was achieved with difficulty (that is the very least one can say!), but the artisans of federation, Macdonald, Cartier, Tilley, and Tupper*, knew that in order to create any common identity the geographical elements had to be fused together. This desire for unity was a characteristic of the period: the acquisition of the HBC's territories, the entry of Manitoba [see A. H. SCOTT], of British Columbia [see CARRALL], and of Prince Edward Island [see Pope] into confederation, and likewise the almost obsessive urge to link the two oceans by a railway, are all illustrations of it.

Already other similarities had begun to appear in the colonies: the urgent need for railroad construction and the fear of American influence. The two phenomena were, indeed, connected. The Americans had begun early to build their network of railways, and their neighbours to the north saw in this the source of their great prosperity. The British colonies began to dream of similar accomplishments, and to get more and more into debt as they tried to realize their dreams. Prince Edward Island is a good example, for debts occasioned by railway building were by no means irrelevant to its entry into confederation. Nova Scotia and New Brunswick hesitated for a while between a line that would link them with the United States and one that would link them with Canada, but the latter choice prevailed. Many plans for an intercolonial were drafted. Meetings were held in 1851–52 and in 1861–62 [see Howe, McCULLY, Chandler]; all of them ran up against the problem of the route through New Brunswick: should it follow the valley of the Saint John or the east and north coasts? Businessmen favoured the first route for commercial reasons, the British government inclined towards the second for military ones. The provinces fell back on building local roads, until confederation held out the dazzling hope of an intercolonial line. United Canada also experienced its fever of railroad construction, with the Grand Trunk, the cause of numerous headaches for politicians [see Holton, Cartier]. The departure and terminal points of this line were at Detroit and Portland, which stressed in too obvious a fashion the subordinate position of United Canada with regard to its great neighbour; the latter did not fail to give itself – at least in the eyes of Canadians – arrogant or protective airs.

The proximity of the United States emphasized all the ways in which Canada was a British dependency. In that country the routed or exiled Patriotes and followers of W. L. Mackenzie* took refuge [see O'CALLAGHAN and Édouard-Élisée MALHIOT], and from it the luckless Fenians set out [see O'NEILL and O'Donoghue]. Canada feared the United States, while she continually cast longing glances in her direction. Thus J. W. Johnston, in the 1850s, reflected on the benefits a form of commercial union with the Americans might bring to Nova Scotia. An important annexationist movement developed in Lower Canada [see Holton, LYMAN, SANBORN], in which French Canadian Liberals joined Anglophone merchants, and Alexander Tilloch Galt* rubbed shoulders with Jean-Baptiste-Éric Dorion*; the movement also found some support in Upper Canada [see H. B. WILLSON]. A group of Americans from Pembina tried to bring the Red River Settlement under their flag [see STUTSMAN]; in the 1860s, in British Columbia, annexation to the United States appeared to some preferable to union with Canada or to continuance as a British colony. All these developments, however important or serious, had little chance of success. For the colonies had a common denominator: their sentimental attachment to Great Britain, an attachment that among Francophones was rather in the nature of a loyalty.

All the changes mentioned took place in a society where political manners were somewhat primitive, and fairly similar from one region to another. Violence at elections was common. In 1840, at Conception Bay, a magistrate who tried to re-establish order during a by-election barely got away with his life [see RIDLEY]; an Ontario representative, T. R. FERGUSON, who had endeavoured to part belligerents after a political meeting, never recovered from his physical and mental injuries. Open voting allowed intimidation and corruption. The 1841 election in Lower Canada, the "Sydenham election," provides a good illustration. Major T. E. CAMPBELL, an "agent" of the governor, placed polling booths so as to be particularly accessible to supporters of the union, and for still further surety his troops forbad opponents to come near. Alexandre-Maurice DELISLE, one of the few French Canadians to stand as a governor's man, took the precaution of getting himself made a police magistrate. Money was vital when each person knew for whom his neighbour voted: it was said of a millionaire candidate that his principal drawing cards were his money and his mortgages [see STREET]. The secret ballot and simultaneous elections only refined the tactics employed, for behaviour was rapidly adapted to the twists and turns of electoral laws. Already the avenging voice of Richard Cartwright* denounced the cynicism of John A. Macdonald, who gave votes to the dead and spent astronomical sums to win his elections.

In this age of virulent politics, when duelling had not disappeared (Howe fought for political reasons, Ogle Robert GOWAN called out Francis Hincks*, Cartier sent out seconds almost at random, J. W. Johnston wounded an adversary in the foot to end his career as a dancer!), the task of a member of parliament was hardly restful. J. A. BARRY was imprisoned for a whole session because he accused a colleague of smuggling; a speaker of the Legislative Assembly of Manitoba, who had given a decision against certain local interests, was trapped and doused with hot oil [see BIRD]; an inebriated legislative councillor of British Columbia had the lenses pushed from his glasses by his seat-mate, and, being shortsighted, had perforce to break off his speech [see COX]. Personal antagonisms were numerous, and a widespread lack of sobriety did not restrain the expression of personal or ideological differences.

Accompanying the many events in the physical expansion and political development of the country were a variety of other movements and changes related to religion, education, the arts, and social life in general. A large number of the biographies of volume X present people who were noteworthy in such areas, from leaders of denominations and churches to teachers and scientists, painters, musicians, and writers.

The influence of the church was general at the time, and not merely confined to Quebec as some might be inclined to think. It is true that in Quebec relations between the religious power and one particular political group were especially difficult. The Ultramontanes [see LA ROCQUE], partisans of a theocratic system, saw in the proclamation of the dogma of papal infallibility a striking confirmation of the veracity of their doctrine. In their adversaries, particularly those of the Institut Canadien, they detected more anticlericalism and atheism than there really was. Bishop Ignace Bourget* wielded the weapon of excommunication with as much assurance and conviction as he handled the sprinkler. Gonzalve DOUTRE, for example, was refused the sacrament, which was equivalent to being banned from society. Sadly, Doutre pleaded for "graciousness" from his bishop, and was anxious to know whether "in order to be a Catholic one must strip off the inalienable attributes of man." After Bishop CONROY's visit, Ultramontane rigidity was gradually eased, and the interference of the Catholic clergy in politics grew less marked. On Prince Edward Island, the question of whether reading of the Bible should form part of the daily programme of every pupil divided politicians and their supporters for 20 years along religious lines [see COLES]. Extraordinary controversies filled the newspapers; they might even publish a list of the prices of indulgences [see POPE]. In Newfoundland, the Catholics favoured responsible government, but the Protestants rejected it. In Nova Scotia, in the 1840s, Howe received the support of the Catholics, and Conservatives raised the cry of "Catholic supremacy"; ten years later the Catholics changed their political allegiance, and Howe's Liberals styled their opponents "Romo-Johnstonites." Edward John HORAN, bishop of Kingston, was a fervent supporter of John A. Macdonald, and acted as his promoter in exchange for small favours for his friends: he could allow himself to urge "the Catholic vote in a proper direction." The development of the Orange lodges constituted another force with which politicians had to reckon. The Conservatives were able to accomplish the unparalleled feat of obtaining the backing of the Ultramontane Catholics and the Orangemen [see O. R. Gowan, J. H. Cameron]; to retain it required constant attention.

The activities of the churches were not primarily political: they resorted to politics in order to defend principles they deemed essential, or to develop institutions they considered necessary, in a period when their social and educational role was of great importance, though supplementary to their main task.

In the middle years of the century the various denominations extended the geographical range of their work by means of missions or preaching stations or itinerant circuits, not only in the west but in more remote areas of the older colonies, often with support from overseas organizations such as the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, and often requiring heroic service from those appointed to the scattered posts [see ELLIOT, MIERTSCHING]. At the same time, parishes and congregations in the settled areas and in the towns and cities multiplied, and ecclesiastical structures became more complex. All denominations give evidence of this growth in volume X: larger bodies such as the Roman Catholics (see CHAREST, DEMERS, GUIGUES), Church of England (A. N. BETHUNE, CRONYN, FEILD), Methodists (GREEN, RICHARDSON, John and William RYERSON), and Presbyterians (JENNINGS, TOPP), and a variety of smaller groups, often fragments of the larger denominations, and characteristic of the intense religious feeling of this century in North America: Bible Christians (METHERALL), Primitive Methodists (LAWSON), Secession Presbyterians (SMART, William TAYLOR), Free Church of Scotland (STEWART and Michael WILLIS).

Strong religious convictions were significant not only in their relation to the spiritual needs of believers. They also contributed impetus to social causes such as temperance (J. G. MARSHALL, QUERTIER) and to many philanthropic efforts in a period when private charity was an essential means of alleviating the distress caused by epidemics, fire, economic depression, and personal afflictions such as deafness and leprosy (BERTHELET, COGSWELL, GADBOIS, GAUVREAU, MALLET, RODIER).

In their concern for the development of education, the churches were often involved in decisions about its administration and its guiding principles from the elementary school to the university. Large questions about the roles of church and state in education were debated vigorously throughout the century (Robert BELL, Brown, CONNOLLY, Howe, Draper, HATHEWAY), and often marked the activities of schools or school districts or institutions of higher learning.

Founders and teachers and administrators from Canadian educational history are numerous in volume X, as one would expect in a century when patterns of Canadian education were largely developed or instituted (BARBER, Mathilda DAVIS, W. A. JOHNSON, MACALLUM, MEILLEUR), and a number of universities were passing through their first years marked by difficulties of finance and jurisdiction. The early history of many of the institutions we know today is represented: Bishop's University (NICOLLS), Dalhousie University (REID), King's College (MCCAWLEY), McGill (John BETHUNE), McMaster (FYFE), University of New Brunswick (MARSHALL d'Avray), Queen's College, Newfoundland (GREY), Queen's University (LIDDELL), St Francis Xavier University (MACKINNON), and the University of Toronto (HINCKS, SOULERIN, Michael Willis).

In the years covered by volume X the life of the mind was certainly not confined to the realm of education. Eclectism might still exist, but men like William Logan, Elkanah BILLINGS, and Charles SMALLWOOD stand out as genuine scientists, pioneers who trained followers in their own fields and established solid professional bases for their successors. Regular training for the professions developed at the same time, particularly in medicine [see PAINCHAUD, BOVELL, HODDER], and around these representatives of a new social élite appropriate structures began to form. It was to be expected that a need to preserve for the future a world already fading should have been felt in this period: hence Paul Kane applied himself to painting Indians still living in accordance with their traditional customs, and AUBERT de Gaspé described the seigneurial way of life as he set down "some episodes of the good old days." Cornelius KRIEGHOFF, in contrast, took the peasantry around him as the main theme of his work, and acquired thus a fame that eluded the economic theories of John RAE, too advanced for his day. Intellectual discussion was lively in the back-shop of a bookstore in Quebec, even if its prime inspirer, Octave CRÉMAZIE, died a sad death in exile. May Agnes FLEMING published popular novels, which may not have opened to her the gates of literary glory but which enriched her annually to the tune of $10,000. Meanwhile, newspapers increasingly better edited and informed [see Brown, Parent], if often violent, were a strong influence on community life and spread new ideas.

In all this one can see an active society, open to progress, in which individuals rejected the accustomed and feared adventure neither for themselves nor for those they led.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

THE Dictionary of Canadian Biography/Dictionnaire biographique du Canada receives assistance, advice, and encouragement from many institutions and many individuals. They cannot all be named nor can their kindness be acknowledged adequately. None are forgotten in our consciousness of what we owe to those who have supported our endeavours in a multitude of ways.

The DCB/DBC owes its founding to the generosity of the late James Nicholson; it has been sustained over the years by its parent institutions, the University of Toronto and University of Toronto Press and the Université Laval and Les Presses de l'université Laval. Its work in the 19th century has been materially assisted by the Centennial Commission; this volume has been aided by grants from the Canada Council and the Ministère des Affaires culturelles du Québec. To all of these our debt is immediate and is gratefully acknowledged.

Our contributors form a large and distinguished company, and they have been especially helpful in assisting us with this first volume in the 19th century to be published. We have had the benefit of special consultation over a long period with a number of individuals, some of them also contributors: A. S. Abel, Frederick H. Armstrong, Louis-Philippe Audet, Roland-J. Auger, Mrs Zilda Barker, J. Murray Beck, Phyllis R. Blakeley, J.-C. Bonenfant, John A. Bovey, Hartwell Bowsfield, J. M. S. Careless, Gaston Carrière, O.M.I., Alan G. R. Cooke, Andrée Désilets, R. B. Donovan, C.S.B., C. Bruce Fergusson, Eugene Forsey, Armand Gagné, Henri Gérin-Lajoie, F. Burnham Gill, Jean Hamelin, J. Russell Harper, J. L. H. Henderson, Clive A. Holland, Mme Françoise Caron-Houle, Barry Hyman, Alice M. Johnson, J. K. Johnson, Frederick Jones, W. Kaye Lamb, Jean-Jacques Lefebvre, Douglas Leighton, George MacBeath, Ian McDonald, W. S. MacNutt, George Mainer, André Martineau, J. S. Moir, Jacques Monet, S.J., Marjorie G. Morley, George R. Newell, G. D. O'Gorman, C.S.B., Margaret A. Ormsby, Bruce B. Peel, K. G. Pryke, H. Keith Ralston, J. E. Rea, Mrs M. Robertson, Yves Roby, G. O. Rothney, G. F. G. Stanley, Mrs Carole B. Stelmack, Norah Story, Donald Swainson, Philippe Sylvain, Émile Tardif, O.M.I., L. G. Thomas, L. H. Thomas, Gerald Tulchinsky, Allan R. Turner, Mrs Elinor Vass, Nive Voisine, Peter B. Waite, Carl M. Wallace, and Brian J. Young.

Throughout the preparation of volume X we have enjoyed the most willing cooperation from the libraries and archives of Canada and other countries. We are particularly grateful to the administrators and staffs of those institutions to which we have most frequently appealed: in Toronto, the University of Toronto Library, the Metropolitan Toronto Central Library, the Ontario Legislative Library, and the Ontario Department of Public Records and Archives; in Quebec, the Bibliothèque générale de l'université Laval, the Bibliothèque and the Archives du séminaire de Québec, the Bibliothèque de l'Assemblée nationale, the Archives nationales du Québec, and the Archives de l'archidiocèse de

Québec; in Montreal, the Archives de la ville de Montréal, the McCord Museum, and the Archives judiciaires de Montréal; in Ottawa, the Public Archives of Canada. We are also indebted to other archives and libraries across Canada: the Provincial Archives of Newfoundland and Labrador, the Public Archives of Nova Scotia, the Provincial Archives of New Brunswick, the New Brunswick Museum, the Public Archives of Prince Edward Island, the Public Archives of Manitoba, the Saskatchewan Archives Board, and the Provincial Archives of British Columbia.

In our own offices we have had working with us at various times a number of persons who have contributed in important ways to the preparation of volume X. Marc La Terreur and Bernard Pothier directed the Ottawa office and in it compiled information on the 19th century which will serve as background material for a number of volumes; on their staff over the four years of its operation were: Fernande Blondeau, Louis Garon, and Mme Yvette Thériault. In Toronto, research assistance has been given at different times by Phyllis Creighton, Mme Évelyne Gagnon, Maud M. Hutcheson, Catherine Lane, Louise Trottier, and S. A. Barker; secretarial services have been provided by Mrs Paula Brine Reynolds, Anita Noel, Mrs Inez Woodhouse, and Mrs D. A. Sutherland. In Quebec, Michel Paquin and Jean-Pierre Asselin were a constant help during the last stages of the volume; Mme Marika Cancelier was in charge of the secretariat, assisted successively by Mme Céline Massicotte and Pierrette Desrosiers; Louise-Hélène Boileau and Mme Gilberte Massey provided assistance to the manuscript editors. We should also like to recognize the guidance and encouragement we have received at all times from the two presses with which the DCB/DBC is associated, and in particular Marsh Jeanneret, Eleanor Harman, Harald Bohne, and H. Van Ierssel at University of Toronto Press; Georges Laberge, Lucien Zérounian, and Roch-André Rompré at Les Presses de l'université Laval.

DICTIONNAIRE BIOGRAPHIQUE DU CANADA   DICTIONARY OF CANADIAN BIOGRAPHY

Editorial Notes

PROPER NAMES

Persons have been entered under family name rather than title, pseudonym, popular name, nickname, or name in religion. Where possible, the form of the surname is based on the actual signature. In the case of French family names "Le," "La," "Du," and "Des" (but not "de") are considered as part of the name and are capitalized. When both parts of the name are capitalized in the signature, French style treats the family name as two words, e.g. Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine. Some compound French names occur in this period: Philippe-Joseph AUBERT de Gaspé; cross-reference is made in the text from the compound to the main name entry: from Gaspé to Aubert.

Married women and religieuses have been entered under their maiden names, with cross-references from their married names or their names in religion: Rosanna Eleanora MULLINS (Leprohon); Marie-Julie-Marguerite CÉRÉ de La Columbière, dite Soeur Mance.

Indian names have presented a particular problem, since an Indian might be known by his Indian name (spelled in a variety of ways by the French or English unfamiliar with Indian languages), by a French or English nickname, and often by a French or English baptismal name. An effort has been made to include the major variants of the original name, as well as the nicknames, with appropriate cross-references in the text. Since it is impossible to establish the original spelling of the Indian name the form chosen is that which appears in the major sources. E.g. Abraham WIKASKOKISEYIN (Sweet Grass, Herbe odoriférante).

CROSS-REFERENCES

The first time that the name of a person who has a biography in volume X appears in another biography his family name is printed in capitals and level small capitals: e.g. James DOUGLAS, Louis-Joseph PAPINEAU.

An asterisk following a name indicates either that the person has a biography in a volume already published or that he will receive a biography in a volume to be published: e.g. John A. Macdonald*, Antoine-Aimé Dorion*. Birth and death (or floruit) dates for such persons are found in the index as an indication of volume.

PLACE-NAMES

Place-names are generally given in the form used at the contemporary time of reference with the modern name included in parentheses. The modern name is based whenever possible on the Gazetteers of Canada issued by the Canadian Board of Geographical Names, Ottawa, and on the Répertoire géographique du Québec, published by the Ministère des Terres et Forêts du Québec, Québec, 1969.

Many other sources have been found useful as guides in establishing 19th century place-names: Lovell's gazetteer of British North America . . . , ed. P. A. Crossby (Montreal, 1881); Hormidas Magnan, Dictionnaire historique et géographique des paroisses, missions et municipalités de la province de Québec (Arthabaska, Qué., 1925); Manitoba historical atlas . . . , ed. John Warkentin and R. I. Ruggles (HSSM pub., Winnipeg, 1970); Municipalités et paroisses dans la province de Québec, C.-E. Deschamps, compil. (Québec, 1896); Place names of Nova Scotia (Fergusson); W. H. Smith, Smith's Canadian gazetteer comprising statistical and general information respecting all parts of the upper province, or Canada West . . . (Toronto, 1846; repr. Toronto, 1970); Walbran, B.C. coast names. The Geography Division, Surveying and Mapping Branch, Department of Energy, Mines and Resources of the government of Canada was helpful in establishing Arctic place-names.

QUOTATIONS

Quotations have been translated when the language of the original passage is different from that of the text of the biography. All passages quoted from government documents and works published in both languages are given in the accepted translations of these works.

BIBLIOGRAPHIES

Each biography is followed by a bibliography. Sources frequently used by authors and editors are cited in shortened form in individual bibliographies, and the general bibliography (pp. 733–65) gives these sources in full. Many abbreviations are used in the individual bibliographies, especially for archival sources; a list of these can be found on p. 2.

The individual bibliographies are generally arranged alphabetically according to the five sections of the general bibliography – manuscript sources, primary printed sources (including a section on contemporary newspapers), reference works, studies, and journals. Wherever possible, references to manuscript material give the location of the original documents, rather than copies. In general the items in individual bibliographies are the sources as listed by the contributors, but these items have been supplemented by bibliographical investigation in the DCB/DBC offices. Any special bibliographical comments by contributors appear within square brackets.

TRANSLATION INTO ENGLISH (a note by the translator of the French biographies)

In general the translator has followed the principles that the Translation Committee adopted for previous volumes. The policy of the committee was to avoid any temptation to elaborate on the text, and to admit amplification or modification of the original, however slight, only in the interest of clarity. Certain 19th century terms, no longer in current usage, have been used: e.g. bâtonnier, clerk of the peace, etc. There are a number of distinctly Canadian words, usually relating to the fur trade or to lumber operations: see: A dictionary of Canadianisms, ed. W. S. Avis et al. (Toronto, 1967).

OFFICIAL NAMES

An effort was made throughout the volume to use the official names of organizations: companies, institutions, societies, religious bodies, etc. Many Roman Catholic institutions were international in operation during this period, and their English names were therefore used where it was appropriate. Canadian companies sometimes incorporated with both a French and an English name (though more often with one or the other), and again the form of the name appropriate to the text has been used.

BIOGRAPHIES

List of Abbreviations

AAQ	Archives de l'archidiocèse de Québec
ACAM	Archives de la chancellerie de l'archevêché de Montréal
ADB	Australian Dictionary of Biography
AHO	Archives historiques oblates
AHSJ	Archives générales des Religieuses hospitalières de Saint-Joseph
AJM	Archives judiciaires de Montréal
AJQ	Archives judiciaires de Québec
AJTR	Archives judiciaires de Trois-Rivières
ANQ	Archives nationales du Québec
APQ	Archives de la province de Québec. Now ANQ
AQ	Archives du Québec. Now ANQ
ASGM	Archives des sœurs grises de Montréal
ASHS	Archives de la Société historique du Saguenay
ASJ	Archives de la Société de Jésus
ASJCF	Archives de la Société de Jésus, province du Canada français
ASN	Archives du séminaire de Nicolet
ASQ	Archives du séminaire de Québec
ASSM	Archives du séminaire de Saint-Sulpice de Montréal
ASTR	Archives du séminaire de Trois-Rivières
AVM	Archives de la ville de Montréal
AVQ	Archives de la ville de Québec
BCHQ	British Columbia Historical Quarterly
BNQ	Bibliothèque nationale du Québec
BRH	Bulletin des recherches historiques
CCHA	Canadian Catholic Historical Association
CHA	Canadian Historical Association
CHR	Canadian Historical Review
DAB	Dictionary of American Biography
DCB	Dictionary of Canadian Biography
DNB	Dictionary of National Biography
HBC	Hudson's Bay Company
HBRS	Hudson's Bay Record Society
HSSM	Historical and Scientific Society of Manitoba
JALPC	Journal de l'Assemblée législative de la province du Canada
JIP	Journal de l'Instruction publique
MTCL	Metropolitan Toronto Central Library
PABC	Provincial Archives of British Columbia
PAC	Public Archives of Canada
PAM	Public Archives of Manitoba
PANB	Provincial Archives of New Brunswick
PANL	Provincial Archives of Newfoundland and Labrador
PANS	Public Archives of Nova Scotia
PAO	Ontario Department of Public Records and Archives
PAPEI	Public Archives of Prince Edward Island
PRO	Public Record Office
RHAF	Revue d'histoire de l'Amérique française
RSCT	Royal Society of Canada Transactions
RUL	Revue de l'université Laval
SAB	Saskatchewan Archives Board
SCHÉC	Société canadienne d'histoire de l'Église catholique
SGCF	Société généalogique canadienne-française
SH	Social History
SHQ	Société historique de Québec
SHS	Société historique du Saguenay
SPRI	Scott Polar Research Institute
USPG	United Society for the Propagation of the Gospel
UCA	United Church Archives

BIOGRAPHIES

A

ABBOTT, WILSON RUFFIN, businessman; b. of a Scotch-Irish father and a free Negro mother in Richmond, Virginia, in 1801; d. in Toronto Ont., in 1876.

Wilson Ruffin Abbott was in his youth apprenticed as a carpenter but left home at 15 to work on a Mississippi River steamer as a steward. Seriously injured when cord wood fell upon him, he was nursed by a Boston traveller's maid, Ellen Toyer, whom he later married. He then moved to Mobile, Alabama, where he opened a general grocery store. The Abbotts were indignant when the city required all free Negroes to provide bonds signed by two white men in pledge of their good behaviour. In 1834, receiving an anonymous warning that his store was to be pillaged, he withdrew his savings, put his wife and two children aboard a steamer for New Orleans, and slipped away alone on the night his store was attacked. After a brief sojourn in New York, the Abbotts moved to Toronto in late 1835 or early 1836, one of hundreds of American Negro families to seek a greater degree of freedom in Upper Canada at this time.

After a false start as a tobacconist, Abbott became a dealer in properties and increasingly made his mark in real estate; although he could not read until his wife taught him, he was known for an unusual ability to do complex calculations in his head. By 1871 Abbott owned 42 houses, five vacant lots, and a warehouse, largely in Toronto, but also in Hamilton and Owen Sound. He helped purchase freedom for fugitive slaves, kept his wife's sister, Mary, as a housekeeper on wages, and aided another sister-in-law, Jane, who married A. H. Judah in Toronto.

As the Abbotts' fortunes grew, they took an increasing interest in public affairs. Abbott served in the militia during the rebellion of 1837. In 1838 he was one of six organizers of the Colored Wesleyan Methodist Church, aiding in the purchase of property for it. He supported the Anti-Slavery Society of Canada under the Reverend Michael WILLIS, was elected to the city council from St Patrick's ward, which he carried by some 40 votes, and served as a member of the central committee established in 1859 by the Reformers in Canada West. In 1840 Mrs Abbott helped organize the Queen Victoria Benevolent Society to aid indigent black women, and in later years she was active in the British Methodist Episcopal Church.

The Abbotts had four sons and five daughters. One son, Anderson Ruffin, would become the first Canadian-born Negro to receive a licence to practise medicine. Through him, the Abbott family would become linked with another distinguished Toronto Negro family, the Hubbards, and it would be Anderson who would urge William Peyton Hubbard to enter politics, in emulation of his own father.

Wilson Ruffin Abbott was unusual in being a successful black businessman and politician in the late 19th century. Toronto, and Ontario, had once had a substantial Negro population, but this had fallen off after the American Civil War until there were perhaps not more than 2,000 Negroes in Toronto where once there had been reported to be three times as many. By the latter part of the century, prejudice had expressed itself against black men in a variety of ways in the province, and most Negroes went to segregated schools and separate churches. In Toronto, however, the virus of anti-black prejudice spread less deeply: Knox Presbyterian Church would place a visiting Negro in the pulpit, on occasion other black men would achieve at least modest successes in business, and Toronto's schools were never segregated. Abbott did not encounter any serious discrimination, even though Negroes elsewhere in the province did; thus, his experience was not a typical one. His undoubted abilities no doubt helped offset most of the residual prejudice he may otherwise have met.

ROBIN W. WINKS

MTCL, Hubbard-Abbott collection. Evening Telegram (Toronto), 17 May 1911. Globe (Toronto), 11 Dec. 1847. R. W. Winks, The blacks in Canada; a history (Montreal, 1971). D. G. Hill, "Negroes in Toronto; a sociological study of a minority group," unpublished PHD thesis, University of Toronto, 1960; "Negroes in Toronto, 1793–1865," Ont. Hist., LV (1963), 73–92.

ALDER, ROBERT, Methodist minister and Anglican priest; b. in England in 1796; d. at Gibraltar, on 31 Dec. 1873.

A compositor in his early years, Robert Alder volunteered in 1816 to become a Wesleyan Methodist missionary, evidently hoping that he would be stationed in Ceylon. Instead he was sent as the first ordained Methodist minister to Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, to whose 5,000 citizens, bedevilled by New Light teaching, he proclaimed a "free, full and present salvation." He then served on several circuits in the Maritime provinces and Lower Canada before returning to England in 1827. Alder was resident in London as one of the secretaries of the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society from 1833 to 1851. In this post he was responsible specifically for the supervision of the Wesleyan missions in British North America and thus exercised a strong influence on their development.

Before becoming a secretary, Alder helped in 1832–33 to effect a union between the Methodist Episcopal Church in Upper Canada and the English Wesleyan Methodist Conference. He visited Upper Canada in 1834 and again in 1839 to consolidate the union and to iron out differences between the two conferences. These latter efforts were largely unsuccessful; his intransigence on the points at issue precipitated an epic clash with the Ryerson brothers – WILLIAM, Egerton*, and JOHN – which was one factor in the dissolution of the union in 1840. In the ensuing seven-year period he supervised the operations of a separate Wesleyan district in Canada West. When his brethren decided in 1846–47 to make a settlement with the Canadian conference, he fell into line. As the representative of the parent conference, he forced the Wesleyans in Canada West to accept reunion. Ironically but fittingly he was designated as the first president of the Canada Conference after the union was re-established in 1847.

In this same period Alder watched vigorously over the growth of the Methodist organization in the Maritime provinces. Apart from regular and detailed correspondence, he visited the area in 1839 and in 1847. On the first occasion he presided at a special meeting of the missionaries from the four provinces, in which they decided to seek permission to found an academy (later Mount Allison University) and agreed to support publicly the principle that a Christian government has a responsibility to provide for the religious needs of its subjects. Ill health prevented him from holding extended meetings in 1847, but he did press directly for the formation of a Maritimes conference; the creation in 1855 of the Conference of Eastern British America owed much to his initiative and persuasion.

Similarly, although he never travelled to the immense territories of the Hudson's Bay Company, he participated in the negotiations with that body which led to the inception in 1840 of the Wesleyan mission in the North West. So long as he was in office he guided and encouraged the missionaries – men such as James Evans*, Robert Terrill Rundle*, and the Indian minister, Peter Jacobs*. When Jacobs visited London in 1842 he lived in Alder's home and was introduced by him to English customs and churches. It is noteworthy that Jacobs held Alder in great esteem, as did the Wesleyans in the eastern provinces.

In his limited ecclesiastical sphere, Alder played a role analogous to that of the colonial officials in the broader secular context, and, like them, he brought ambivalent attitudes to his tasks. His legacy was in consequence equally mixed. A man of vision, who, with his associates, was continuously challenged by the disparity between the magnitude of the missionary task and the society's limited income, he sought from the outset to foster self-reliance among his brethren in British North America. The Methodists in the Maritime provinces, especially, were pressed to organize their work efficiently, to recruit lay and clerical leaders, and to raise their own funds. Yet independent initiatives on their part were regularly criticized by Alder as insubordinate or imprudent.

Underlying his curious behaviour was not only the natural paternalism and caution of the parent organization, but a concern lest Methodism in British North America not develop on sound lines. What was required, in Alder's view, was continued deference to the Anglican establishment, a friendly relationship with the Church of England, and a strong bias toward the liturgical element in the Wesleyan tradition. This orientation was reinforced by his conservative political ideas; for him, as for many in his generation, democracy and infidelity were intimately related. Not surprisingly, therefore, he regarded the Upper Canadian Methodists as Yankees in disguise and sought to bring them fully into the Wesleyan orbit. He was strongly critical of their independent stand on the clergy reserves and on political change, and, as has been indicated, for some time tried to undermine their conference by fostering a rival Wesleyan organization in Canada West.

The tension generated by Alder and his like-minded associates was often a source of concern to his brethren, but its effects were instructive. Out of it came a deeper awareness among Canadian Methodists of the need for religious and thus secular independence. Conversely, the restraints that were imposed and the attitudes that were transmitted by the English conference helped to maintain continuity between the religious traditions of England and British North America and hence between the two cultures.

Although he was greatly respected in England and America, as indicated for example by the conferring on him in 1839 of an honorary doctorate of divinity by Wesleyan University in Middletown, Connecticut, Alder resigned his position as a missionary secretary in 1851. This decision was doubtless precipitated by the deepening conflict between the Methodist reformers and the Wesleyan leaders, and the consequent discrediting of the latter. Two years later he left the Methodist ministry and was ordained in the Church of England. His effulgent oratory and measured zeal brought him prompt recognition in that body. He became a canon of Holy Trinity Cathedral in Gibraltar. It was fitting that his career ended in this great outpost of the Victorian empire.

G. S. French

Methodist Missionary Society (London), records of the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society (copies at UCA). Christian Guardian (Toronto), 1832–47. Minutes of the Methodist conferences, from the first, held in London by the late Rev. John Wesley, A.M., in the year 1744 (12v., London, 1812–55), IV, VII, XII. Wesleyan Methodist Magazine (London), 3rd ser., XLV (1822)–LXVII (1844). Carroll, Case and his cotemporaries. G. G. Findlay and W. W. Holdsworth, History of the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society (5v., London, 1921–24). G. S. French, Parsons & politics: the rôle of the Wesleyan Methodists in Upper Canada and the Maritimes from 1780 to 1855 (Toronto, 1962). Anson Green, The life and times of the Rev. Anson Green, D.D. . . . (Toronto, 1877).

ALEXANDER, JAMES LYNNE, teacher, writer of verse, and Church of England clergyman; b. Glenhead (Cairnalbana), County Antrim, Ireland, 23 Oct. 1801; d. Grimsby, Ont., 22 Aug. 1879.

James Lynne Alexander emigrated to Upper Canada with his parents when he was 16 years of age. He taught at the Markham school and the district grammar school at York (Toronto) before he became an assistant teacher in the district school at Niagara.

The history and scenery of the Niagara frontier provided the setting and descriptive passages for Alexander's Wonders of the west, or a day at the falls of Niagara, in 1825, a poem, which was printed by Charles Fothergill* at York in 1825. This long poem, in a form imitative of Walter Scott's metrical romances, tells a conventional bitter-sweet love story about French tourists. It is noteworthy only because it contains descriptions of local scenery and because it was one of the first books of verse printed in Upper Canada.

When Bishop Charles James Stewart* opened a seminary at Chambly, Lower Canada, in 1828, Alexander left Niagara, took up a scholarship, which had been awarded to him by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, and enrolled for theological studies under Joseph Braithwaite. He was ordained deacon on 13 Sept. 1829 and became assistant at Cornwall to the Reverend Salter Jehoshaphat Mountain*. In January 1831 the SPG appointed him a travelling missionary, and at about the time of his ordination as priest, on 7 Jan. 1832, he went to Leeds, Megantic County, Lower Canada, to open a mission. He served there until late in 1843.

In 1844 he began his work in the mission of Binbrook and Saltfleet, near Hamilton, Canada West, and on 15 August of that year he married Emelia, youngest daughter of Colonel Robert Nelles of Grimsby. Binbrook received most of his attention in the early years of his ministry in this parish, but later he served chiefly in Saltfleet and lived at Stoney Creek. His home was in Grimsby from the time of his retirement in August 1873 until his death in 1879.

Carl F. Klinck

[J. L. Alexander], Wonders of the west or a day at the falls of Niagara, in 1825, a poem, by a Canadian ([York, Upper Canada], 1825); Ontario's oldest poem, a day at Niagara in the year 1825 by the Rev. James Lynne Alexander, Anglican vicar, ed. R. L. Denison (Toronto, 1952).

USPG, C/CAN/Que., f.368, f.399; Tor., f.559; E, Toronto, 1854–55. Upper Canada, House of Assembly, Journal, 1828, app., "Common school returns." Examiner (Toronto), 4 Sept. 1844. Weekly Globe (Toronto), 29 Aug. 1879. Dom. ann. reg., 1879, 382. T. R. Millman, The life of the Right Reverend, the Honourable Charles James Stewart, D.D., Oxon., second Anglican bishop of Quebec (London, Ont., 1953), 90, 94, 143, 180, 187. Pascoe, Two hundred years of the S.P.G., 869, 873.

ALLARD, OVID, HBC clerk; b. 11 July 1817 in Montreal, Lower Canada, of French extraction; d. 2 Aug. 1874 at Fort Langley, B.C.

According to family tradition, Ovid Allard joined the Hudson's Bay Company at Lachine in 1834 and was immediately sent west with the party of traders and trappers who later established Fort Boise, where he is said to have been second in command. In 1839 he was transferred to the headquarters of the Columbia Department at Fort Vancouver, and thence to Fort Langley, New Caledonia, the first HBC post established on the lower mainland of what is now the province of British Columbia. Toughened by his five years on the buffalo plains and well versed in Indian ways, Allard was a useful member of the Fort Langley establishment. When on 11 April 1840 the fort burned to the ground he helped to rebuild it on the same site; he is also said to have acted as Indian trader and supervisor. James Murray YALE reported to Sir George Simpson* on 17 Dec. 1845: "Ovid Allard otherwise called Chatelain, is still here, and acts as Interpreter &^{c}, his habits were not very praiseworthy when he first came here but he has reformed much of late, and was always a smart fellow." During this period, he married an Indian woman, Justine, who, according to family tradition, was a sister of the chief of the Cowichans. They had four children.

When the Oregon boundary treaty of 1846 made inevitable the withdrawal of the HBC from the Columbia to the Fraser, Allard helped to establish the new brigade route from Fort Kamloops to Fort Langley. In November 1847 he was sent with a party of six men to build Fort Yale and was afterwards placed in charge of the store; there he seems to have displayed considerable courage and resource in his dealings with the Indians. Allard was a member of the party which constructed Fort Hope during the winter of 1848–49 and again he was given charge of the store. He remained there until at least 2 June 1850, when he reported to Yale that he was "near out of all Articles of Trade." Subsequently he returned to Fort Langley as Indian trader and supervisor, but after an acrimonious dispute with Yale, he was transferred to Fort Victoria late in 1852. The next year Allard was sent to Nanaimo where the HBC was developing its coal deposits. He remained there for five years, superintending the Indian labourers, who, according to his superior officer, Chief Trader Joseph W. McKay*, were "worse than useless if not kept under strictest surveillance."

When the Fraser River gold rush began in the spring of 1858, Governor James DOUGLAS sent Allard to reopen Fort Yale, which had been abandoned on the completion of Fort Hope nearly ten years before. Now an experienced man was again needed there to trade with the Indians and avert clashes with the miners pouring into the area. Allard remained at Yale until 1864, when business had so far declined that he was sent to take charge at Fort Langley. There he spent the remaining ten years of his life, looking after the affairs of the HBC farm and trading with the Indians for salmon, cranberries, and furs. He seems to have given satisfaction in this post, though he never attained a rank higher than that of clerk. Presumably his lack of education held him back. His letters are ungrammatical, and he admitted to his supervisors in Victoria that he did not feel himself competent to open a new set of books, for "your system of accounts confuses me much."

This "faithful servant of the HBC" also took an interest in the affairs of the little community outside the fort. He served as chairman of the school board in the 1870s and was postmaster from 2 Sept. 1870 until his resignation early in 1871. It would seem that his health began to fail in 1867, but he was still in charge at Fort Langley when he died. He was buried in the old HBC graveyard near the fort, and his name is perpetuated on the cairn erected to mark this pioneer cemetery by the government of British Columbia. The fort he helped to rebuild in 1840 was restored in 1958 and is now the Fort Langley National Historic Park.

DOROTHY BLAKEY SMITH

HBC Arch. B.113/b/2, ff.2–6, 6–6v, 18, 25v–26, 36; B.113/b/3, ff.44v–45, 60v; B.113/c/1, f.3. PABC, Jason Ovid Allard, "Biographical notes on Ovid Allard"; "Reminiscences," undated; "Sketches of early life in British Columbia," copied and annotated by George Green, 1942; Fort Nanaimo correspondence, August 1852–September 1853.

Colonist (Victoria), 1858–74. Gazette (Victoria), 1858–74. Mainland Guardian (New Westminster, B.C.), 5 Aug. 1874. Denys Nelson, Fort Langley, 1827–1927, a century of settlement in the valley of the lower Fraser River (1st ed., Vancouver, B.C., 1927; 2nd ed., 1947). George Green, "The fort builder," Vancouver Province, 24 Jan. 1953. F. W. Howay, "The raison d'être of Forts Yale and Hope," RSCT, 3rd ser., XVI (1922), sect.II, 49–64. B. A. McKelvie, "Jason Allard: fur-trader, prince, and gentleman," BCHQ, IX (1945), 243–57.

ALMON, MATHER BYLES, banker, politician, and philanthropist; b. at Halifax in 1796, son of William James Almon* and Rebecca Byles; d. at Halifax, 30 July 1871.

Mather Byles Almon was a member of a prominent Halifax family; his father was a loyalist and his mother was a daughter of Mather Byles Jr., a loyalist. Almon may have been educated privately for there is no record of his having attended the University of King's College in Windsor, N.S., or of his having been educated abroad. On 31 Jan. 1825 he married Sophia, fourth daughter of John Pryor, a loyalist, a member of the assembly of Nova Scotia, and a merchant. Mather Byles and Sophia Almon had 14 children, of whom five died at a relatively early age.

The Almon family's numerous social, political, and ecclesiastical connections undoubtedly aided Mather Byles Almon throughout his career. He set up his own general and wholesale firm in Halifax in the 1820s and continued to operate this business, which may have been financed by his family or with money from his wife, until he became active with the Bank of Nova Scotia. He was subsequently an insurance agent for the Halifax Fire Insurance Company and for the Halifax Marine Insurance Association, which he helped establish in 1838. He also acted as agent for several British firms including the Colonial Life Assurance Company, the Pelican Life Insurance Company, and the Phoenix Fire Insurance Company. In addition, he was associated with the Halifax Water Company and was particularly active, after 1836, with the Halifax Steamboat Company.

In 1832 Almon joined William Lawson*, William Blowers Bliss, Andrew Belcher, James William Johnston, James Boyle Uniacke*, and others to establish the Bank of Nova Scotia; Almon became a member of its first board of directors and in 1837 became its president. The bank established a branch in Windsor in 1832 and branches in Pictou, Yarmouth, Annapolis, and Liverpool in 1839. During this period the bank also made financial arrangements with the Baring Brothers in London and with the Merchant's Bank of Boston, as well as with banks in New York, Portland, Maine, Saint John, N.B., and Montreal. This proved to be the limit of its expansion; during the depression of the early 1850s the bank closed its branches in Windsor, Annapolis, and Liverpool. One reason for its failure to grow was revealed by Almon on 28 July 1870 when he disclosed that James Forman, cashier of the bank since 1832, had embezzled $315,000 from the bank during a lengthy period of time. Evidence produced in a suit brought by the bank against Forman's sureties indicated that Forman had carried out his defalcations since 1844. Almon, who was ill and virtually blind, had probably been unable to provide much leadership for some time. In September 1870 he resigned on the grounds that he was unable to sign the notes of the bank as required by law. It would seem obvious that he was incapable of handling any problems created by the loss of funds and any resulting loss of public confidence. The possibility exists that the bank might have been better served if he had resigned before 1870.

During his lifetime Almon built up an estate which, at his death, was evaluated at $616,000. Of this sum, $152,735 was invested in the United States, particularly in government bonds, and in insurance and banking stocks. He also held stock in several banks and public utilities in Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, and Quebec. Of the sum invested in his own province, $261,000 was in the form of mortgages and notes of hand. His chief investment in provincial manufacturing was through an American company which operated a coal mine in Pictou County and in a British firm, the Acadia Iron Company. The range of his investments indicates that he wanted an assured return which would provide protection against fluctuations in the provincial economy. His own reluctance to invest directly in provincial companies probably helps explain why the Bank of Nova Scotia did not become involved in the growth of the provincial economy in the mid-1850s.

In political life, Almon took some part in the administration of Halifax in the 1830s but withdrew from civic affairs after Halifax was incorporated in 1841. In October 1838 Almon, as a representative of the mercantile community, along with James B. Uniacke, James W. Johnston, and George Renny Young*, was appointed as a Nova Scotia delegate to meet Lord Durham [John George Lambton*] in Quebec. Charles Buller* thought this group to be "not only of striking ability, but of a degree of general information and polish of manners which are even less commonly met with in colonial society." Almon became the centre of a political controversy in Nova Scotia in 1843 when Lieutenant Governor Falkland [Lucius Bentinck Cary*] named him to the Legislative and Executive Councils. He presented his mandamus as a member of the Legislative Council on 19 Feb. 1844. Lord Falkland told the colonial secretary, "I have admitted Mr. Mather B. Almon to the seat at the board which became vacant in February last [1843] by the retirement of Mr. [Thomas Andrew Strange] De Wolf"; thus Almon was probably a temporary member of the council in 1843 but it was not until after the election of 1843 that he was officially appointed. In December 1843 Joseph Howe and two supporters resigned their seats on the Executive Council accusing the governor and the Tory attorney general, J. W. Johnston, who was Almon's brother-in-law, of weighting the council in favour of the Tories.

Almon and several other directors of the Bank of Nova Scotia played a prominent role in the Tory party. This political tie helped the bank, but it also gave the party a commercial tone. Almon, like other wealthy merchants of the day, probably gave financial contributions to the party. In 1864 Almon broke with the Conservatives and their new leader, Charles Tupper*, over the issue of confederation and became a prominent anti-confederate. In the critical year of 1866, however, failing health prevented his attending the Legislative Council. He remained a supporter of the anti-confederate provincial government until his death.

Almon was deeply interested in education, being a governor of Dalhousie University (1842–48) and a governor of King's College (1854–68 and 1869–71). He became a member, and generous supporter, of almost every Protestant charitable society in Halifax; he was also a life member of several Church of England colonial missionary bodies. A great deal of his time, however, was devoted to St Paul's Church. He was one of the faction which opposed the doctrinal changes proposed by Bishop Hibbert Binney*, who had been influenced by the Oxford movement. After several years of dissension, part of the congregation moved to St Luke's in 1858, and the bishop followed in 1864. St Paul's, which in the 1830s had been the dominant church in the province, retreated, under the leadership of men such as Almon, into respectable obscurity and parochialism. Thus, Almon's religious beliefs, like his political ideas, failed to play a significant role in the changing community. Although he did help adapt Tory attitudes to a commercial, Victorian society, he was forced to watch as St Paul's, the missionary societies, and the Legislative Council all lost their dynamic role in provincial affairs.

K. G. Pryke

Bank of Nova Scotia Archives, Toronto, letter book, 1832–40; president's memoranda and bank note issue book, 1856–71; Mather Byles Almon letters. PANS, Mather Byles Almon papers; "Senator William Johnson Almon and his descendants," comp. by C. S. Stayner; "The Almons," comp. by K. A. MacKenzie. Halifax County Court of Probate, will of M. B. Almon. Acadian Recorder (Halifax), 31 July 1871. Morning Chronicle (Halifax), 31 July 1871. Novascotian (Halifax), 1838, 1843–44. Harris, Church of Saint Paul, 206–9. History of the Bank of Nova Scotia, 1832–1900; together with copies of annual statements ([Toronto, 1900]), 45–51.

ALSOP, ROBERT, merchant and politician, b. in 1814 to a prosperous Newfoundland merchant family; d. 25 March 1871 at St John's, Nfld.

Nothing is known of Robert Alsop's upbringing or education. He became a principal in the merchant and shipping firm of R. Alsop and Company, which in the 1840s and 1850s was one of the most extensive trading out of St John's, Newfoundland. Like many of the older firms, it suffered severely during the late 1850s and 1860s because of the failure of the fisheries. After the decline of the firm Robert Alsop was induced to enter political life. In September 1866 he ran in a by-election in Trinity Bay as a supporter of a coalition government headed by Frederic Bowker Terrington Carter*. He won the election and was named chairman of the Board of Works, thus entering the Executive Council. His entry to the council was opposed by the Liberal newspaper, the Patriot, whose editor, Robert John Parsons*, while affirming his support of the coalition, asserted that John Kavanagh, a Catholic who had been elected in 1859 and 1861, had a better claim to the post. However Alsop's victory in the Trinity Bay riding was acclaimed by the Patriot, which rejoiced to see "a liberal Protestant, as is Mr. Alsop" returned.

The path of Alsop, a Liberal in the coalition government which had seen the coalescing of confederation forces under the Tory Protestant, F. B. T. Carter, and the Liberal Catholics, Ambrose* and Edward Dalton Shea* and John Kent, was to prove thorny. Carter's victory at the polls in 1865 had not really been a triumph for the confederate forces; many of his supporters had made pledges to their constituents not to support the union. As a new election campaign approached in 1869 the confederates tried to stem the mounting wave of opposition being organized by Charles Fox Bennett*. The government was, however, having trouble controlling its own members, including Robert Alsop, who received a terse communication from the colonial secretary, John Bemister*, on 7 Sept. 1869 asking "what course you [intend] to adopt at the approaching election on . . . confederation, it being, as you are aware, a government measure." This was the second such query to Alsop.

Alsop, like most of the St John's mercantile class, was hostile to confederation. He openly declared his opposition to it when he sought re-election for Trinity Bay as a Bennett supporter; he won by 22 votes. He was named colonial secretary in Bennett's new government on 5 March 1870. Alsop sought re-election in Trinity in the autumn of 1870, when, during a particularly bitter campaign, he was accused of turning "Catholic," and opposition manifestos warned voters that Alsop had "put the Queen and the British Government against us and made them take away the troops who were the people's protectors against the St. John's rowdies." He was also branded as one who would haul down the "Old Flag and put up the Stars and Stripes." Such abusive electioneering devices had their desired effect on the outport fishermen. Alsop was defeated by a narrow margin, but he continued to serve as colonial secretary until the time of his death and was given the consolation of being named to the Legislative Council though he never occupied his seat because of ill health.

Sometime prior to his death Alsop was converted to Roman Catholicism. He was described as a man of honour and integrity, and he served efficiently as colonial secretary. His entry into political life had not been without misgivings as he was by nature a retiring person preferring a contemplative life to the excitement and hazards of politics.

Elinor Senior

PANL, Newfoundland, Department of the colonial secretary, letter books, 1867–1934, John Bemister to Robert Alsop, 7 Sept. 1869. Courier (St John's), 21 Sept. 1870. Newfoundlander (St John's), 27 Sept. 1870, 28 March 1871. Newfoundland Patriot and Terra Nova Herald (St John's), 15, 22 Sept., 17 Nov. 1866. Royal Gazette (St John's), 28 March 1871. St John's Daily News, 14 Oct., 18 Dec. 1869. Prowse, History of Nfld., 706.

ALSTON, EDWARD GRAHAM, lawyer and public servant; b. 6 Sept. 1832 at Cambridge, England, second son of the Reverend George Alston and Anne Charlotte Oxenden; m. at Victoria on 2 Sept. 1861 Elizabeth Caroline Abbott (d. 1865) by whom he had two children, and on 6 Feb. 1867 Anna Maria Tuzo by whom he had three children; d. 12 Nov. 1872 at Freetown, Sierra Leone.

Edward Graham Alston was educated at St Paul's School, London, and Trinity College, Cambridge (BA, 1855), and was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1857. Arriving in Victoria by way of the Panama on 26 May 1859, he was admitted to the bar of Vancouver Island on 15 June 1859 and on 14 Feb. 1861 was appointed registrar of titles for Vancouver Island, a position he held until 1 June 1870, when he became registrar general of the united Colony of British Columbia. He was one of three commissioners who drew up the Consolidated statutes of British Columbia (Victoria, 1870) and he acted as attorney general from 12 May to 23 Aug. 1871, during which period British Columbia officially entered confederation.

Alston was a member of the Legislative Council of Vancouver Island, 1861–62; a commissioner of the Indian reserve and a member of the General Board of Education of Vancouver Island, he resigned these offices in 1865, when after the death of his first wife he went to England for a year. Following his return he was appointed a member of the Legislative Council of British Columbia, 1868–71; justice of the peace (3 Dec. 1868); commissioner of savings banks (15 April 1869); registrar of joint stock companies (26 Aug. 1869); and inspector general of schools (6 May 1870).

Outside his official duties Alston took an active interest in community affairs. A member of the Church of England, he was appointed registrar of the diocese in 1866 and he contributed an "Historical and political summary for . . . 1858–1868" to the Report of the Columbia Mission for 1868. He held office in the Mechanics' Literary Institute and as a freemason was the prime mover in establishing the benevolent fund of the Victoria Lodge no.1085, A.F. & A.M. During the Fenian scare of 1866 he was "idiot enough to join the corps [Vancouver Island Volunteer Rifles] & go into camp & sleep out & make myself very juvenile & foolish." In 1868 he accompanied the expedition which crossed Vancouver Island from Nootka Sound to the east coast, a region whose exploration had been left unfinished by Dr Robert Brown*'s party in 1864; "Mount Alston" at the head of the Nimpkish River still commemorates his journey. In the 1870 edition of the Hand-book to British Columbia and Vancouver Island Alston himself comments on this 1868 expedition and affirms his belief that "this colony, with its latent wealth and splendid climate, has a rich – though it may be distant – future before it. . . ."

In this future, however rich, Alston himself had no wish to share. He was quite out of sympathy with the growing trend in British Columbia toward a more democratic form of government. When the colonies were united in 1866 he was privately delighted to have "got rid of the House of Apes" on Vancouver Island, and when the united colony joined confederation in 1871 he asked the imperial government for a transfer since he could see "no hope of preferment within the Colony, inasmuch as a Responsible form of Government has been established, in which all vacancies will be filled by the political friends of the ministry of the day." A month after British Columbia had officially become a province of Canada, Alston left Victoria to take up his appointment as queen's advocate in Sierra Leone where his career was cut short by African fever the following year. Evidently, as his son said, Alston found himself "more at home" in a colony like Sierra Leone where he was a member of the Legislative and Executive Councils and served as acting governor, and where the local newspaper bore witness that "his abilities and high character gave him a foremost place in the staff of officials."

Dorothy Blakey Smith

PABC, Alfred Edward Alston papers; Edward Graham Alston correspondence, 1860–71; diary, 1859–60, 1865; Crease papers, correspondence inward, 1862–70. E. G. Alston, "Historical and political summary for ten years – 1858–1868," in Report of the Columbia Mission, 1868 (London, 1869) and reprinted in E. G. Alston, A hand-book to British Columbia and Vancouver Island . . . (London, 1870), 3–5.

British Columbia, Blue Books, 1859–70 (copies in PABC); Legislative Council, Journals, 1868–71. British Columbia Government Gazette (Victoria), 1871. Colonist (Victoria), 1859–68. Gazette (Victoria), 1858–72. Government Gazette (New Westminster and Victoria), 1868–70. Negro (Freetown, Sierra Leone), 20 Nov. 1872. Victoria Daily Standard, 23 Aug. 1871. Alumni Cantabrigienses . . . , comp. John Venn . . . and J. A. Venn, PT.2, I (Cambridge, 1940), 47. S. D. Scott, "The attitude of the colonial governors and officials towards confederation," in British Columbia & confederation, ed. W. G. Shelton (Victoria, 1967), 143–64.

ANDERSON, THOMAS BROWN, merchant, banker, member of the Special Council for Lower Canada; b. June 1796 in Edinburgh, Scotland; d. 28 May 1873 in Montreal.

Little is known of Thomas Brown Anderson's early life. Sometime before 1827 he came to Montreal and worked as a clerk in the commercial firm of Forsyth, Richardson and Company, which in copartnership with Forsyth, Walker and Company of Quebec, traded in furs, wholesale provisions, and real estate, acted as the East India Company's Canadian agent, and served as the financial repository for the receiver-general's department of Lower Canada. Anderson's marriage on 12 Dec. 1827 to Ann Richardson (widow of David Ogden), eldest daughter of John Richardson*, a senior partner in Forsyth, Richardson and Company, undoubtedly assisted his business career; he became the company's last president. His only child, Elizabeth Magdalene, became the wife of Lieutenant-Colonel Joseph Bell Forsyth.

In 1847, when the major shareholders in Forsyth, Richardson and Company withdrew their capital, Anderson dissolved the copartnership with Forsyth, Walker and Company and reorganized the Montreal business under the name of Anderson, Auldjo and Company. Anderson's partners, Louis Auldjo, William Evans, and Thomas Forsyth, had also been clerks with Forsyth, Richardson and Company. In 1852 Auldjo left the company to establish his own business, and Anderson's firm became Anderson, Evans and Company, hardware merchants and importers. In 1858 Thomas and Samuel Evans joined the company and its name was changed to Anderson, Evans and Evans. This partnership was dissolved in 1861 and Anderson thereafter devoted his full time to banking.

Anderson, the son-in-law of one of the Bank of Montreal's most prominent founders and shareholders, served as a director of this bank from 1830 until 1834 and again from 1835 until his retirement in 1869. In 1837 he worked on a directors' committee to determine the bank's policy toward the exchange crisis of that year. In 1840 he supported the efforts of Peter McGill*, the bank's president, to extend its operations into Upper Canada; and a year later he represented the Bank of Montreal before the Legislative Assembly's committee on money and banking to request stronger legislation to facilitate branch banking in Canada. On 8 June 1847 Anderson succeeded Joseph Masson* as vice-president of the Bank of Montreal and, on 5 June 1860, when old Peter McGill retired, Anderson was unanimously elected to succeed him.

Although Anderson has been described as "one of the old race of Canadian merchants" he readily recognized the change in the country's economy away from its old mercantile base to a more sophisticated corporate structure, and he reorganized the Bank of Montreal's business and administration to profit from this change. From 17 April 1855 he had served as chairman of the Canadian board of directors for the Liverpool, London Fire and Life Insurance Company. (This position he retained until 20 July 1872; thereafter he remained a director of the company, at the board's request, until his death.) When he became president of the Bank of Montreal he authorized branch bank managers and agents to represent insurance companies and other corporate interests. In 1862 Anderson created the post of general manager and selected a clever Scottish banker, David Davidson, as its first occupant. When Davidson retired a year later Anderson promoted Edwin H. King*, later known as "the king of Canadian bankers," to fill Davidson's place; this young, shrewd, and skilful Irish banker, who succeeded Anderson as president, soon justified Anderson's confidence. During the American Civil War, the north's chronic need for credit, Canada's ready access to English gold, and King's knowledge of the American money market enabled the Bank of Montreal to exploit the situation to its advantage.

In November 1863 the Bank of Montreal wrested the Canadian government's account from its chief rival, the floundering Bank of Upper Canada. This account, owing to the government's extravagant financial commitments, seemed at times a dubious asset, but provided the Bank of Montreal with a position of valuable influence, which it rarely hesitated to use. In 1866, for example, the bank, despite the opposition of its rivals, persuaded the government to enact legislation enabling banks to convert specie and government debentures into provincial notes, legislation from which it, as the government's banker, stood most to gain. The next year, John A. Macdonald*, upon E. H. King's advice and contrary to that of his minister of finance, Alexander Tilloch Galt*, refused to assist the faltering Commercial Bank of the Midland District, the Bank of Montreal's chief rival following the failure of the Bank of Upper Canada. Consequently "one of the most powerful and seemingly most substantial institutions in the country" failed.

Despite Anderson's cautious and, at times, pessimistic annual reports, the Bank of Montreal thrived under his administration. In nine years deposits trebled, owing, in part, to the flight of American capital during the Civil War; gold, silver, and coin holdings and government debentures increased, adding to the stability of the institution. On 20 Oct. 1869 Anderson retired from the Bank of Montreal for reasons of health. He had developed a speech impediment probably caused by a slight stroke. The bank directors voted him a stipend of $2,000 in recognition of his faithful services.

Although Thomas Anderson retained a lively interest in British politics, remaining a devoted Tory, he, unlike many other prominent Montreal merchants of his day, played a relatively inconspicuous part in municipal or provincial politics. On 2 April 1838, the governor, the Earl of Gosford [Acheson*] appointed Anderson to the Special Council for Lower Canada, a position he retained only until 1 June 1838. In 1849 Anderson joined the Annexation Association, became one of its eight vice-presidents, and signed the Annexation Manifesto.

Anderson readily supported a variety of civic, charitable, religious, and educational organizations. In 1829 he joined the executive of the recently organized Montreal Committee of Trade, which in 1842 became the Montreal Board of Trade. Although he was never president of the Board of Trade, in 1849 he was chosen vice-president and he served on the executive council and board of arbitration continuously from 1842 until 1850. He acted as treasurer of the Montreal General Hospital, an institution to which his father-in-law had contributed liberally. He supported the Longueuil Mission. His wife also assisted charitable works; her principal interests were the Lying-in Hospital and the Ladies Benevolent Society, which her mother had reorganized in 1832. Although not of the Presbyterian faith, Anderson, like many Scottish Montreal merchants, retained a pew in the St Gabriel Street Church. A devoted Anglican and member of the Christ Church Cathedral congregation, and later of St James the Apostle, he actively participated in parish and diocesan work. In 1856 he joined a committee of 11 to draw up plans for the construction of the new Christ Church Cathedral. He also served as the financial secretary of the parochial endowment fund, investing some of its money in Bank of Montreal shares. From 2 May 1845 until his death Anderson was a member of the board of governors of McGill University, during which time he served on many committees and contributed generously to the original McGill endowment fund. From 1851 until 1852 he was vice-chairman of the board and thereafter first member of the finance committee.

Thomas Brown Anderson, through cautious methodical management and a fortunate marriage, enjoyed a successful business career in Montreal and made a definite if moderate contribution to its public life.

Carman Miller

AJM, Registre d'état civil, Christ Church parish, 12 Dec. 1827; Registre d'état civil, St James the Apostle parish, 1873. PAC, MG 24, I79 (T. B. Anderson papers). McGill University Archives, Dawson papers; Minutes of the board of governors, 1851–74. Annual report of the governors, principal, and fellows of McGill University, Montreal . . ., 1851–73. [Bruce and Grey], Elgin-Grey papers (Doughty), IV, 1493. Canada, Province of, Sessional papers, XVIII (1860), PT.1, no.5; XXI (1863), PT.3, no.9. Canada Gazette (Quebec), 15 May, 3 July 1847. Gazette (Montreal), December 1827, 17 May–4 Aug. 1847, May 1873. Montreal Herald, May–June 1873. Montreal Transcript, May–November 1836. Montreal Witness, May 1873. L'Opinion publique (Montréal), 27 mai–11 juin 1873.

Canada directory, 1851–73. The Canadian men and women of the time: a handbook of Canadian biography, ed. H. J. Morgan (1st ed., Toronto, 1898). Desjardins, Guide parlementaire. Montreal directory (Mackay), 1842–50. McGill University calendar, 1856–73. Canadian banking and monetary policy: recent readings, ed. J. P. Cairns and H. H. Binhammer (Toronto, 1965). Denison, Canada's first bank, I. W. R. Graham, "Sir Richard Cartwright and the Liberal party, 1863–1896," unpublished PHD thesis, University of Toronto, 1950. Cyrus Macmillan, McGill and its story, 1821–1921 (London, New York, Toronto, 1921), 207. G. H. S. Mills, "The annexation movement of 1849–1850 as seen through Lower Canadian press," unpublished MA thesis, McGill University, 1947. O. D. Skelton, The life and times of Sir Alexander Tilloch Galt (Toronto, 1920). F.-J. Audet, "Membres du Conseil spécial," BRH, VII (1901), 82–83. J. I. Cooper, "The origins and early history of the Montreal City and District Savings Bank, 1846–1871," CCHA, Report, 1945–46, 15–25. George Hague, "The late Mr. E. H. King, formerly president of the Bank of Montreal: some personal reminiscences," Journal of the Canadian Bankers Association (Toronto), IV (1896–97), October 1896, 20–29. D. C. Masters, "Toronto vs. Montreal; the struggle for financial hegemony, 1860–1875," CHR, XXII (1941), 141–42. Adam Shortt, "Founders of Canadian banking: the Hon. John Richardson, merchant, financier and statesman," Journal of the Canadian Bankers Association (Toronto), XXIX (1921–22), October 1921, 17–27; January 1922, 165–78.

ANDERSON, THOMAS GUMMERSALL, Indian agent; b. at Sorel, Province of Quebec, 12 Nov. 1779, sixth son of Captain Samuel Anderson, loyalist, and Deliverance Butts; d. at Port Hope, Ont., 10 Feb. 1875.

Anderson

Thomas Gummersall Anderson was taken to New Johnstown (Cornwall) when the Anderson family settled there in 1783. In 1795 he was apprenticed for five years to Thomas Markland*, a Kingston merchant. Robert Mackenzie of Montreal, half-brother of Markland, induced young Anderson to accompany him in 1800 to the American post of Mackinac (on Mackinac Island, later in the state of Michigan) to trade with the Indians. For the next 14 years Anderson traded in the upper Mississippi valley in what is now the state of Wisconsin. He was usually based at Prairie du Chien on the Mississippi, a general depot for Mackinac traders, but also became familiar with such places as Milwaukee (where he sometimes wintered), when they were small pioneer settlements. The items he traded for buffalo and beaver furs included pots and pans and ball shot. He worked with Jacob Frank for a number of years and was an independent trader by 1810, gaining a reputation for honourable dealing among the Indian tribes of the region – Sauks, Winnebagos, and Potawatomis, and later principally the Santees.

In one of the first actions of the War of 1812 Mackinac was captured by the British. Anderson learned there that the Americans had captured Prairie du Chien and had built a fort. Anderson immediately raised a company of volunteers and, with the aid of the commanding officer at Mackinac, Robert McDouall*, hastened to Prairie du Chien and captured the fort. Until the end of the war he remained in charge of Fort McKay, so named for an old Norwester, William McKay*, who accompanied the expedition. In 1815, through McDouall's recommendation, Anderson was given employment at Mackinac in the Indian Department as storekeeper, interpreter, and clerk. The department remained under military jurisdiction from 1816 to 1830, and Anderson had the rank and allowance of captain.

By the time he returned to Mackinac in September 1815, however, it had been given up by the British to the Americans, and the garrison, still under McDouall, had moved to Drummond Island. Anderson followed and remained there nine years as agent. Another move was made late in 1828 when Drummond Island was transferred to American sovereignty and the Indian agency was moved to Penetanguishene, Upper Canada.

Anderson had married in 1820 Elizabeth Ann Hamilton, eldest daughter of Captain James Matthew Hamilton of the 5th regiment of foot, by whom he had seven children. One son, Gustavus Alexander, was ordained priest in the Church of England; like his father, he devoted much of his life to the welfare of the Indians and was for several years incumbent of the Mohawk Church at Tyendinaga in Hastings County.

Until 1830 the objectives of the Indian Department were mainly political; its policy was essentially to retain the friendship of the Indians because of their usefulness as military allies. A change towards a more humanitarian attitude was indicated in the winter of 1829–30 when Anderson was summoned to York (Toronto) by Sir John Colborne* and ordered to undertake the settlement and civilization of three tribes of Chippewa Indians under chiefs Yellowhead*, John Aisance, and Snake at Coldwater and The Narrows (now Orillia). At these places Anderson, with the title of superintendent, built mills, houses, and schools for the Indians. His activities were hampered by a shortage of funds and the two Indian settlements were eventually abandoned in 1837. The initial success of the settlements, however, had led to an expansion of the plan in 1833. After an extensive search for a suitable locality had been conducted by Anderson and the Reverend Adam ELLIOT, it was determined to form a general establishment on Manitoulin Island with a view to drawing there most of the Indians from the settled parts of the province.

The Anderson family remained on Manitoulin Island for nine years. Although Anderson was tireless in his efforts to promote the settlement and although there was this time no shortage of funds, his stay at Manitoulin was marked by failure. Few Indians came because of the remoteness of the island, and it was eventually opened, in 1862, to settlement by whites. In 1845, Anderson was transferred to Toronto where he succeeded Samuel Peters Jarvis* as chief superintendent and was also named visiting superintendent. He moved his office to Cobourg in 1847 and retained the government post, one which required much travelling, until his resignation, 30 June 1858. His wife died the same day. The rector of Cobourg, Archdeacon Alexander Neil BETHUNE, preached a memorial sermon, later privately printed, on the Sunday following her funeral. T. G. Anderson's later years were spent for the most part in Cobourg and Port Hope, with shorter periods of residence at Tyendinaga and Toronto. He died at Port Hope where his old friend of Manitoulin days, Frederick Augustus O'Meara*, was rector of St John's Church.

As trader and government employee, Anderson had close contact with Indians for 58 years. He was a shrewd judge of their character, was devoted to their interests, and was highly regarded by them. He wrote copious journals and reports, a number of which were printed after his death.

T. R. MILLMAN

The Thomas G. Anderson papers at MTCL consist of copies of family papers in private hands. Material from this collection has been published by Sophia Rowe as "Anderson record, from 1699 to 1896," including "Reminiscences of Capt. Thomas Gummersall Anderson," in Ont. Hist., VI (1905), 109–35, as well as in Loyalist narratives from Upper Canada (Talman) and in the New Dominion Monthly (Montreal), November 1874. The State Historical Society of Wisconsin has a collection of Thomas G. Anderson papers (copies at PAO), part of which has been reproduced in the Wis. State Hist. Soc. Coll. as "Personal narrative of Capt. Thomas G. Anderson, early experiences in the North-West fur trade – British capture of Prairie du Chien," in IX (1880–82), 137–206; "Prairie du Chien documents, 1814–'15," in IX (1880–82), 262–81; and "Papers of Capt. T. G. Anderson, British Indian agent," in X (1883–85), 142–49. The society's journal also published "Capt. T. G. Anderson's journal, 1814; journal of the proceedings at Fort McKay, from the departure of Lieut. Col. McKay, for Mackinaw, comprehending the particulars of every occurring circumstance in and out of the fort within the vicinity of Prairie du Chien," Wis. State Hist. Soc. Coll., IX (1880–82), 207–61; the original of Anderson's journal is at PAC, MG 24, F19 (Thomas Gummersall Anderson papers).

See also: Fifth annual report of the Society, for Converting & Civilizing the Indians, and Propagating the Gospel, among Destitute Settlers in Upper Canada; for the year ending October, 1835 (Toronto, n.d.). The Stewart missions; a series of letters and journals, calculated to exhibit to British Christians, the spiritual destitution of the emigrants settled in the remote parts of Upper Canada ..., ed. W. J. D. Waddilove (London, 1838), 42, 43, 49, 53, 75ff.

ANDERSON, WILLIAM JAMES, physician, amateur geologist, and historian; b. 2 Nov. 1812 at sea off the Danish coast, to Scottish parents; d. 15 May 1873 in Quebec City of tuberculosis. He was married and makes reference to a daughter.

William James Anderson studied medicine at Edinburgh, and held the degree of MD and a LRCS. In the 1830s as a young emigrant doctor in the Maritimes, he fostered his taste for history by exploring Nova Scotia. At Chignecto Bay and South Joggins he investigated mining operations. Anderson's health collapsed during a typhus epidemic in Pictou in 1847. He left the Maritimes and the medical profession and operated a sawmill in Borelia, Upper Canada. In the 1850s he moved on to Toronto.

After a brief return to mining districts in the Maritimes, he settled in Quebec City in 1860, resuming his profession. There his other interests took much of his attention. In 1862, through newspaper articles on gold-mining, he became acquainted with Dr James Douglas*, a fellow mining enthusiast and member of the Literary and Historical Society of Quebec. Dr Anderson led a group of members who revived the society, reanimated its interest in securing and publishing documents on Quebec, and re-established its library and museum. He himself first reported to the society in November 1863; his first papers in its Transactions were on the gold-fields of Nova Scotia and of the world, and the bitumen of Point de Lévy. He continued to publish in this subject area. On a visit to Nova Scotia in 1862 he had toured Acadian regions and inspected the Provincial Archives at Halifax.

In 1866 he began a series of major historical contributions in the Transactions of the Literary and Historical Society, with historiography a particular theme; these papers dealt with the life of the Duke of Kent, including letters from him held by the de Salaberry family (the son of Charles-Michel d'Irumberry* de Salaberry, the "Victor of Châteauguay," had been one of Anderson's patients); Evangeline (his paper's subtitle, "The poetry and prose of history," is an indication of the author's approach); the capitulation of J.-B.-N.-R. de Ramezay* in 1759 (the essay explores closely differences between French and English accounts of the incident); and the siege of Quebec by Richard Montgomery* and Benedict Arnold* in 1775–76. In writing these essays Anderson made use of archival papers in Halifax, arranged for the transfer of others from Halifax to Quebec, and got archival materials transferred to Canada from Britain. While on the executive of the Literary and Historical Society, he fostered publication of two series of Historical documents (1866, 1871) and his last publication in 1872 advocated an archives for Canada. He was a friend of other historians of the confederation years: François-Xavier Garneau*, Jean-Baptiste-Antoine Ferland*, Philippe AUBERT de Gaspé, and James MacPherson Le Moine*. As president of the society he brought it into contact with Francis Parkman*, Joseph HOWE, and Louis-Joseph PAPINEAU.

Obituaries refer to Anderson's "dignified mien," his "long beard frosted by suffering," his "utterance measured slow," and his Scottish humour. His many publications attest to his energy, his breadth of interest, and his penchant for historical research.

ELIZABETH WATERSTON

W. J. Anderson, "The archives of Canada," and "Canadian history, the siege and blockade of Quebec, by Generals Montgomery and Arnold in 1775–1776," in Lit. and Hist. Soc. of Quebec, Trans., new ser., IX (1872), 117, 49 (the second appeared as an off-print, Quebec, 1872); "Curiosities of Canadian literature: Washington and Jumonville," Canadian Monthly and National Review (Toronto), III (1873), 55; "Evangeline and the archives of Nova Scotia," Lit. and Hist. Soc. of Quebec, Trans., new ser., VII (1870), 5; "Gold fields of Nova Scotia," Lit. and Hist. Soc. of Quebec, Trans., new ser., II (1864), 35; The gold fields of the world, our knowledge of them, and its application to the gold fields of Canada (Quebec, 1864); The life of F.M., H.R.H. Edward, Duke of Kent, illustrated by his correspondence with the de Salaberry family, never before published, extending from 1791 to 1814 (Ottawa and Toronto, 1870); The lower St. Lawrence, its scenery, navigation and commerce, forming a complete tourist's guide (Quebec, 1872); "Military operations at Quebec from the capitulation by De Ramesay on 18th September, 1759, to raising the siege by De Levis between the night of the 17th and the morning of the 18th May, 1760," Lit. and Hist. Soc. of Quebec, Trans., new ser., VII (1870), iii; "On Canadian history and biography, and passages in the lives of a British prince and a Canadian seigneur," Lit. and Hist. Soc. of Quebec, Trans., new ser., V (1867), 15; "On the coal-like substance or 'altered Bitumen' found in the excavations at Fort no. 3, Point Levis, and the presently accepted theories on the origin of coals, bitumens and petroleum springs, with an account of the 'Carboniferous system' of British North America," Lit. and Hist. Soc. of Quebec, Trans., new ser., IV (1866), 19; "Opening address – 'Review of the past year, moving accidents by flood and field'," Lit. and Hist. Soc. of Quebec, Trans., new ser., VIII (1871), 5.

[James Murray], Journal of the siege of Quebec, 1759–1760, by General Jas. Murray (Lit. and Hist. Soc. of Quebec, Historical Documents, D.6., 3rd ser., Quebec, 1871). Recueil de ce qui s'est passé en Canada au sujet de la guerre, tant des Anglais que des Iroquois, depuis l'année 1682 (Lit. and Hist. Soc. of Quebec, Historical Documents, D.6., 3rd ser., Quebec, 1871). Morning Chronicle (Quebec), 18 May 1873. Quebec Daily Mercury, 18 May 1873. The centenary volume of the Literary and Historical Society of Quebec, 1824–1924, ed. Henry Ievers (Quebec, 1924). Index to the lectures, papers, and historical documents published by the Literary and Historical Society of Quebec . . ., ed. F. C. Wurtele and J. W. Strachan (Quebec, 1927), 30, 46, 47. List of historical documents and new series of "Transactions" published by the Literary and Historical Society of Quebec (Quebec, 1927). Morgan, Bibliotheca Canadensis. "Les disparus, William-James Anderson," BRH, XXXV (1929), 620.

ANDREWS, ISRAEL DE WOLFE, United States consul, special agent, and lobbyist; b. at Eastport, Maine, in May 1813; d. 17 Feb. 1871 in Boston, Mass.

Although an American, Israel de Wolfe Andrews had close family ties with British North America through his grandmother and father. As a youth he engaged in a trade "which consisted more or less of smuggling," and its inconveniences impressed him with the desirability of moulding North American economic relations in conformity with geography.

Appointed United States consul in Saint John, New Brunswick, in 1843, Andrews observed the problems of trade and fishing which were plaguing Anglo-American relations, and which were not ameliorated until the passing of the reciprocity treaty of 1854. Andrews was instrumental in shaping that treaty by defining what was eventually its content, by assisting its negotiation, and by working for its ratification. The basic American demands which later formed the matrix of the treaty were elaborated by Andrews as early as 1848 in a letter addressed to the American secretary of state, James Buchanan. When the projet for the treaty was finally drawn up in 1853 by Secretary of State William L. Marcy and the British minister in Washington, Sir John F. T. Crampton, Andrews was present. His most vigorous efforts were devoted to getting the treaty ratified. He sought to mould a favourable attitude in Congress through two reports on trade which, as a special agent to the Treasury Department, he was commissioned to compile. He endeavoured to affect relevant segments of opinion by seeing that articles sympathetic to reciprocity were placed in key journals, and by exercising his persuasive efforts with influential members of the executive branch of the American government. When the treaty was ready for ratification, he exerted pressure on persons in the Maritime provinces, including William Hayden NEEDHAM and Moses Henry Perley*, whose willingness to accept American fishing demands would be crucial. He also worked indefatigably to marshal support for ratification of the treaty by the U.S. Senate during the summer of 1854.

Andrews' extravagant expenditures in encouraging the treaty – supposed to be between $50,000 and $60,000 on behalf of the American government and $40,000 for the Canadian government – earned him an unenviable reputation both among contemporaries such as Lord Elgin [James Bruce*] and among historians. However, his actions, if unwise, were based upon strong convictions. His own writings and the maps he submitted with his second report reveal that he was a continentalist who believed that geography had created two great outlets, the Mississippi and the St Lawrence, for the heartland of North America. The accidents of politics had placed these two continental arterials in separate hands. Recognizing the political barriers inherent in the provincial attachment of the colonies to Great Britain, Andrews sought to encourage economic cooperation.

On 10 March 1855 Andrews was appointed American consul general to the British North American provinces, a new office deriving from the treaty. He held the post until his resignation on 11 July 1857. Thereafter he continued his lobbying activities, which included sending a memorial to Congress in 1860 protesting the possible termination of the reciprocity treaty, submitting a history of the treaty's negotiations to the secretary of state, William H. Seward, in 1862, and corresponding from 1861 to 1863 with John A. Andrew, then governor of Massachusetts, on the strains placed upon Anglo-American relations by the American Civil War. Israel Andrews apparently also attempted to encourage North American unification during the Civil War. His enthusiasm and devotion to the ideal of continentalism may seem bizarre today, for history has failed to vindicate that cause. Had the outcome been different, Andrews might have been hailed as a visionary rather than damned as a knave.

IRENE W. D. HECHT

PAC, MG 24, A16 (Elgin papers), correspondence concerning the reciprocity treaty of 1854. Diplomatic correspondence of the United States, Canadian relations, 1784–1860, ed. W. R. Manning (4v., Washington, 1945), III, IV. T. C. Keefer, A sketch of the rise and progress of the reciprocity treaty; with an explanation of the services rendered in connection therewith (Toronto, 1863). United States, Treasury Department, Report of the secretary of the treasury in answer to a resolution of the Senate calling for information in relation to the trade and commerce of the British American colonies with the United States and other countries since 1829 . . . ([Washington, 1851]); Communication from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of March 8, 1851, the report of Israel D. Andrews, . . . on the trade and commerce of the British North American colonies, and upon the trade of the Great Lakes and rivers; . . . (Washington, 1853). I. W. D. Hecht, "Israel De Wolfe Andrews and the reciprocity treaty of 1854," unpublished MA thesis, University of Rochester, 1961. D. C. Masters, The reciprocity treaty of 1854: its history, its relation to British colonial and foreign policy and to the development of Canadian fiscal autonomy (London, New York, and Toronto, 1936). C. C. Tansill, The Canadian reciprocity treaty of 1854 (Johns Hopkins University Studies in Hist. and Pol. Sci., XL, Baltimore, 1922). R. W. Winks, Canada and the United States: the Civil War years (Baltimore, 1960). I. W. D. Hecht, "Israel D. Andrews and the reciprocity treaty of 1854: a reappraisal," CHR, XLIV (1963), 313–29. T. H. Le Duc, "Correspondence – I. D. Andrews and the reciprocity treaty of 1854," CHR, XV (1934), 437–38. D. C. Masters, "A further word on I. D. Andrews and the reciprocity treaty of 1854," CHR, XVII (1936), 159–67. W. D. Overman, "I. D. Andrews and reciprocity in 1854: an episode in dollar diplomacy," CHR, XV (1934), 248–63.

ARCHAMBAULT, PIERRE-URGEL, legislative councillor, one of those responsible for founding the École d'Agriculture de L'Assomption; b. 11 Jan. 1812 at L'Assomption, L.C., of the marriage of Pierre-Amable Archambault and Madeleine Bruguière; d. 19 Aug. 1871 in the same municipality.

Pierre-Urgel Archambault was one of the descendants in the imposing line of Archambaults that sprang from Jacques Archambault and Françoise Toureault (Thoureault), who came to Canada from Dompierre-sur-Mer in 1645. A merchant's son, Pierre-Urgel Archambault continued his father's business at L'Assomption, which was important as a commercial centre to the northeast of Montreal before the railways were built. He was mayor of his town from 1847 to 1854, was elected legislative councillor for the division of Repentigny in 1858, and remained a councillor until 1867. Like several members of his family he joined the militia. He became major of the 1st battalion of L'Assomption in 1851, then lieutenant-colonel in 1859.

Pierre-Urgel Archambault played an important part in the establishment of an agricultural school at the college of L'Assomption. In 1866 the agricultural societies of the counties of L'Assomption, Montcalm, and Joliette requested the college authorities to establish a school of agriculture. Pierre-Urgel Archambault, president of the Société d'Agriculture of L'Assomption, and Louis Archambault*, MLA for the county and in 1868 minister of agriculture and public works at Quebec, sought government support for this purpose. Their action was successful, and the superior of the college, Abbé Pierre-Férréol Dorval, was able to announce at prize-giving that the college would undertake the organizing of this school. (This prize-giving was in 1867, according to Dr Jean-Baptiste MEILLEUR, but Marc-A. Perron, in his book on Édouard-André Barnard*, claims it was in 1868.) One of the most distinguished teachers of the school was Isidore-Amédée Marsan*, who taught there from its inception until 1899.

The curriculum of this agricultural school was almost the same as that of the college of Sainte-Anne-de-la-Pocatière: it included theoretical and practical courses. The courses lasted two years for those who came with sufficient education. From 1864 on, the Board of Agriculture offered 20 scholarships of $50 each, which starting in 1868 were divided equally between the schools of Sainte-Anne-de-la-Pocatière and L'Assomption. In addition the government assisted in the payment of teachers' salaries as well as with running costs. The members of the Conservative party who had helped to found the agricultural school, particularly Pierre-Urgel Archambault, continued to take a keen interest in the work, and this interest explains in great part the prosperity of the early years. One should doubtless add the active sympathy of Pierre-Joseph-Olivier Chauveau*, the superintendent of education at that time and subsequently the minister of public instruction, who gave every kind of encouragement to the establishing of professional schools, especially those designed to prepare young French Canadians for their rural vocation. Serious difficulties, however, were to arise for the school at L'Assomption when the Parti National, with Honoré Mercier*, came to power in 1887: Mercier advocated the maintenance of a single school of agriculture for the whole of Quebec. This policy was taken up in 1897 by the Liberal party, under Félix-Gabriel Marchand*, and resulted in the closing of the École d'Agriculture de L'Assomption in 1899.

In 1835, at L'Assomption, Pierre-Urgel Archambault had married Joséphine Beaupré. They had two sons and three daughters; one of the daughters, Georgine, married twice, her second husband being Louis-Olivier Taillon*, prime minister of Quebec for a few days in 1887 and from 1892 to 1896, and postmaster general of Canada in 1896. Pierre-Urgel Archambault remarried about 1862, his second wife being Louise Poulin. He was first cousin of Louis Archambault, who had six children, one being Urgel-Eugène*, the organizer of the Montreal Catholic school commission and the founder of the Académie du Plateau and the École Polytechnique of Montreal. Pierre-Urgel Archambault died on 19 Aug. 1871 at L'Assomption; he was 59 years old.

Louis-Philippe Audet

AJM, Registre d'état civil (notes biographiques fournies par J.-J. Lefebvre). J.-B. Meilleur, Mémorial de l'éducation du Bas-Canada (2e éd., Québec, 1876), 171–72. Anastase Forget, Histoire du Collège de L'Assomption (Montréal, [1933]). M.-A. Perron, Un grand éducateur agricole, Édouard-A. Barnard, 1835–98; étude historique sur l'agriculture de 1760 à 1900 (n.p., 1955), 52–56. L.-P. Audet, "Urgel-Eugène Archambault (1834–1904)," Cahiers des Dix, XXVI (1961), 143–75. J.-J. Lefebvre, "Les Archambault au Conseil législatif," BRH, LIX (1953), 25–29.

ARMSTRONG, JAMES ROGERS, merchant, foundry owner, and politician; b. 17 April 1787 at Dorchester (Iberville), Que., son of an Irish father, John Armstrong, and Mary Rogers, oldest daughter of loyalist Major James Rogers* who commanded a battalion of King's Rangers during the American Revolution; d. 13 July 1873 at Whitby, Ont.

After the early death of both his parents, James Rogers Armstrong was in 1796 sent to school in Vermont. He was living in Upper Canada by 1807, when on 9 October he married, at Hallowell (later part of Picton), Hannah Dougall, daughter of William Dougall, a pioneer Prince Edward County doctor. Armstrong acquired land in Hallowell Township (and, as the son of a loyalist, in Vaughan Township, York County) and farmed in Hallowell for a short time. He then became a merchant, first in Picton, then in Kingston about 1822, and finally in York where he opened a dry goods store in 1828. Some time in the 1840s he established the Toronto firm of J. R. Armstrong and Company, Toronto City Foundry, which specialized in the manufacturing of stoves, some of them of Armstrong's own design. At the age of 69 he moved to Whitby, where he spent the rest of his life, leaving the management of the company to his son James Rogers Armstrong.

During the 1830s he played some part in public life. He served briefly on the first York Board of Health during the cholera epidemic of 1832. He was elected to the House of Assembly of Upper Canada for Prince Edward County in 1836 as a Conservative but he was not a candidate in the election of 1842. In 1837 he was appointed a justice of the peace for the Home District.

Armstrong was a prominent member of the Wesleyan Methodist Church, a fact evidenced by the marriage of his daughter Mary to the Reverend Egerton Ryerson* (as his second wife) and of his daughter Eleanor to Dr John Beatty, professor at Victoria College. A third daughter, Phoebe Anne, married George Duggan, recorder of Toronto and judge of the county of York.

J. K. Johnson

PAC, RG 1, L3, A15/10, 31; RG 68, 1. PAO, James Dougall papers, J. R. Armstrong to the electors of Prince Edward County, 11 June 1836. "Assessment of the township of Hallowell for the year 1808," Ont. Hist., VI (1905), 168–70. J. of Education for Ont., XXVI (1873), 140. "Marriage register of Stephen Conger, J.P., Hallowell," Ont. Hist., I (1899), 109–12. Town of York, 1815–1834 (Firth). Upper Canada, House of Assembly, Journals, 1837–40. The Canada directory . . . 1851, ed. R. W. S. Mackay (Montreal, 1851). The Canada directory for 1857–58 . . . (Montreal, 1857). Chadwick, Ontarian families, II, 7–10. Canniff, Medical profession in Upper Canada, 223–24, 241–42, 344–45.

ARRAUD, JACQUES-VICTOR, priest, Sulpician, procurator, chaplain; b. 8 Sept. 1805 at Blaye, diocese of Bordeaux (department of Gironde), France, son of Augustin Arraud and Marguerite Florence; d. 22 March 1878 at Montreal.

Jacques-Victor Arraud was only a subdeacon when he was admitted to the solitude (noviciate) at Issy-les-Moulineaux (department of Hauts-de-Seine) during the year 1828. He had been there only a few weeks when Jean-Henry-Auguste Roux*, the superior of the Sulpician seminary at Montreal who was passing through Paris, obtained authorization from both the English government and the superior general of Saint-Sulpice to take him to Canada with three other French Sulpicians. A recruiting of this importance had not been seen for more than 30 years. As soon as Arraud arrived he was given a class at the Sulpician college of Montreal, then, after his ordination on 26 July 1829, he became curate of the parish of Notre-Dame.

In 1844, after three years of negotiation, Bishop Ignace Bourget* persuaded Rose-Virginie Pelletier, dite Marie de Sainte-Euphrasie, superior general of the Good Shepherd Nuns of Angers (department of Maine-et-Loire), to establish her nuns at Montreal. Arraud was instructed to arrange accommodation, provide for their immediate needs, and work for the development of the community. First a residence suitable for their charitable works had to be found. The community wanted to set up a place of refuge for unfortunate women, and a needlework school and teaching establishment for poor girls. It was Arraud who, out of his own pocket and from the alms he collected, paid for their first house and had the necessary repairs and enlargements carried out. In addition, as the nuns were near to being completely destitute, he became their almost daily providence. He played the part of a beggar for their sake, even to the extent of himself conveying, in a cart, the clothes, small items of furniture, and provisions that he collected from door to door. After a few years, when the community began to grow and was in a position to assume total responsibility for its charitable undertakings, Arraud concerned himself with finding the necessary funds and supervising new buildings, for example, in 1870 when a boarding-school was founded at Saint-Hubert (Chambly County), and in 1872 when the community took charge of the women's prison. For all these services and for many others the Good Shepherd Nuns always looked upon M. Arraud as their second founder.

At the same time as he applied himself to providing for the nuns' most urgent needs, Arraud had to give his attention to another institution of a very different kind. In 1844 Joseph-Vincent Quiblier*, the superior of Saint-Sulpice, founded the Oeuvre des Bons Livres and chose Arraud as its administrator. The latter thus became the first director of the first French public library in Montreal. During the five years of his term of office, from 1844 to 1849, he succeeded in placing the institution on a solid base by recruiting about 150 subscribers, installing the library in more than adequate premises, and raising the number of volumes from 2,400 to 12,000.

M. Arraud's abilities, demonstrated in his various occupations, led his superiors to entrust important administrative offices to him, including that of procurator of the seminary from 1863 to 1876. He died suddenly on 22 March 1878, on his return from the Hôpital Général, of which he had been the ecclesiastical superior since 1876.

Antonio Dansereau

ASSM, Biographies, Jacques Victor Arraud; Oeuvres et institutions diverses. "Correspondance de Mgr Ignace Bourget pour 1842 et 1843," L.-A. Desrosiers, édit., APQ Rapport, 1948–49, 438. "Correspondance de Mgr Jean-Jacques Lartigue de 1827 à 1833," L.-A. Desrosiers, édit., APQ Rapport, 1942–43, 23, 34, 52. Allaire, Dictionnaire. Gauthier, Sulpitiana. Annales des religieuses de Notre-Dame de Charité du Bon-Pasteur d'Angers (2v., Montréal, 1895), I, 5, 12–16, 151, 156–59, 367–69. Au soir d'un siècle, le Bon-Pasteur d'Angers à Montréal, 1844–1944 (Montréal, 1944). Édouard Gouin, Le Bon-Pasteur d'Angers et ses œuvres à Montréal (Montréal, 1916). Olivier Maurault, "L'Oeuvre des bons livres," Revue trimestrielle canadienne (Montréal), XII (1926), 152–77; "Vieux cahiers, vieux journaux," Revue canadienne (Montréal), 3e sér., XVIII (juill.–déc. 1916), 209–31.

ATWATER, EDWIN, landowner, businessman, alderman; b. 14 Sept. 1808 at Williston, Vt., son of Linus Atwater; d. 18 June 1874 at Montreal.

Edwin Atwater emigrated to Canada around 1830. He took up residence at Montreal and carried on his trade as a painter. Together with his elder brother Albert, he founded a business in paints, varnish, and plate-glass. The Atwater brothers were the first importers of glass in Canada, and their varnish factory was to reduce considerably the imports of this product on the national market. Edwin was active and enterprising, and soon rose to become one of the important figures of Montreal.

In 1846 he took part in the founding of the Montreal City and District Savings Bank [see Marc-Damase Masson]. Bishop Ignace Bourget* of Montreal deserves the credit for the idea of creating this mutual institution, dedicated to the best interests of the depositors. Edwin was an honorary director from 1846 to 1871, a director from 1848 to 1874, vice-president from 1852 to 1859, and president from 1859 to 1861. After a difficult beginning, the bank was obliged to close its doors from 1847 to 1849 because of local and international crises; it resumed its advance at the start of 1850. From 1850 to 1873 it held the confidence and esteem of the public by overcoming all the difficulties brought about by an unfavourable economic situation. In 1871 it received a new charter, under the jurisdiction of the Dominion of Canada.

To meet another pressing need, Atwater in 1846 went into partnership with some prominent people of Montreal to establish the Montreal Telegraph Company. Already, in 1844, the first telegraphic message had been transmitted from Baltimore to Washington, and Montreal, a great North American city, could not remain cut off from the rest of the world. In 1847 the company established a telegraph service between Montreal and Toronto and between Montreal and Quebec; on 17 April 1849 it received its official charter. In the same year Atwater took part in the founding of the Montreal and Troy Telegraph Company.

Not content with the services he gave to the Montreal community as a financier, Edwin Atwater entered municipal politics: he was elected to the city council of Montreal as a councillor (1850–51), then as an alderman (1852–57). He represented the Saint-Antoine ward, and stood out because of his energy and dynamism. He was a member of numerous committees created by the council to find solutions to the city's problems. From 1851 to 1857 he was president of the aqueduct commission, and it was under his direction that a new, more modern service was established. In 1865, as a delegate from Montreal, he attended an important assembly of municipalities at Detroit, Michigan.

An ambitious and hard-working man, Atwater was made president of the Montreal Board of Trade in 1861, and thereby became a member ex officio of the Harbour Commission, according to the practice in force from 1855 to 1873. He was also on the board of directors of the Merchants' Bank, which had been started by Hugh Allan* in 1861, and of the Citizens' Insurance Company of Canada; he later became vice-president of both undertakings. He was in addition an active member of the American Presbyterian Church.

After an illness of some weeks, Edwin Atwater died on 18 June 1874, leaving one of the largest fortunes of Montreal, the fruit of 40 years of unremitting toil. In 1871, to thank him for his devotion to the progress of the Montreal community, the city council gave the name of Atwater to a street in Saint-Antoine ward. On 23 May 1833 Edwin Atwater had married Lucy Huntington Greene, of Vergennes, Vermont, who gave him four sons and four daughters.

PIERRE LANDRY

Canada, Province of, Legislative Assembly, Journals, 1841–51. "The manufactures of Montreal," RHAF, VI (1952–53), 138. La Minerve (Montréal), 19 juin 1874. E. J. Chambers, The book of Montreal; a souvenir of Canada's commercial metropolis ([Montreal, 1903]), 63–65. Denison, Canada's first bank, II, 73, 152, 175. T. T. Smyth, The first hundred years; history of the Montreal City and District Savings Bank, 1846–1946 (n.p., n.d.). Storied Quebec (Wood et al.), IV, 428–29. Toponymie (Service d'urbanisme de Montréal, Bulletin d'information, 4, [Montréal], 1966), 10. M.-C. Daveluy, "Un Canadien éminent: Raphaël Bellemare (1821–1906)," RHAF, XII (1958–59), 539–40.

AUBERT DE GASPÉ, PHILIPPE-JOSEPH, lawyer, writer, fifth and last seigneur of Saint-Jean-Port-Joli (L'Islet County); b. 30 Oct. 1786 at Quebec; d. 29 Jan. 1871 at Quebec, and buried in the church of Saint-Jean-Port-Joli.

Philippe-Joseph Aubert de Gaspé was the eldest son of Pierre-Ignace Aubert de Gaspé, a legislative councillor, and Catherine Tarieu de Lanaudière. His father had distinguished himself at the siege of Quebec in 1775, as had his grandfather, Ignace-Philippe*, throughout the Seven Years' War. The founder of the line, Charles Aubert* de La Chesnaye, an important figure in the fur trade, had arrived in New France in 1655, became subsequently a member of the Conseil souverain, and was ennobled by Louis XIV in 1693. One of his sons, Pierre, was the first to adopt the name Gaspé, in 1709. By his ancestors on both his mother's and his father's side, Philippe Aubert de Gaspé belonged to the most illustrious families in Canada bearing names such as Coulon de Villiers, Legardeur de Tilly, Jarret de Verchères, and Le Moyne de Longueuil. He also numbered among his forbears Robert Giffard* de Moncel and Pierre Boucher*.

At an early age Philippe was sent to Quebec; he boarded first with the Misses Cholette (1795–98), then at the seminary of Quebec, where he received his classical education (1798–1806). Louis-Joseph PAPINEAU and the doctors Joseph PAINCHAUD and Pierre-Jean de Sales Laterrière* were his fellow-students. From 1804 to 1806, while taking philosophy at the seminary, he lived at the boarding-school of the Reverend John Jackson, Church of England minister, where he was, he said, the only French Canadian. Afterwards he studied law first under Jonathan Sewell*, the future chief justice, then under Jean-Baptiste-Olivier Perrault*. He was called to the bar on 15 Aug. 1811. On 25 September of the same year, at Quebec, he married Susanne Allison, daughter of Thomas Allison, a captain in the 5th regiment of foot, and Thérèse Baby. Thirteen children were born of their marriage.

The young Gaspé, with a generous and enthusiastic disposition, had every advantage at the beginning of his career: high birth, financial sufficiency, an excellent education, advantageous connections in political, judicial, military, and social circles. He took part in a host of cultural, sporting, and even financial ventures. He was vice-president of the first literary society of Quebec in 1809, and a founding member of the Jockey Club in 1815 and of the Quebec Bank in 1818. In addition, in 1804 he had received a commission as lieutenant in the Quebec and District militia; in 1812 he became a captain in the 1st Battalion of Quebec District, and in the same year was promoted to the general staff of Lower Canada, as deputy judge advocate. He practised law at Quebec and "on the Kamouraska circuit" until 9 May 1816, when he received a commission as sheriff of the district of Quebec. In this capacity it was he who had the responsibility or the honour of proclaiming in the streets of the town, on 24 April 1820, the announcement of the recent accession of George IV to the throne.

Until that time success had thus come readily in everything to this man now in his thirties, who no doubt on that account had lived in the most easy-going contentment. However, by his liberality and want of foresight he had gradually brought himself to the brink of ruin. That ruin was startlingly revealed when "the iron hand of misfortune" descended upon him. In debt to the crown for a large sum of money and unable to reimburse it, he was relieved of his office as sheriff on 14 Nov. 1822. Shortly afterwards, on 13 Feb. 1823, his father died. It was then that he was forced to seek refuge, with his large family, which already numbered seven children, in the manor-house of his mother, the seigneuress of Saint-Jean-Port-Joli.

This forced retirement lasted 14 years, during which he lived in the midst of his family, continually haunted by fear and the threat of creditors who might some day have him imprisoned for debt. And this is what finally happened, on 29 May 1838. To extricate him from this predicament, in a troubled period, required as many negotiations and legal proceedings as had been necessary to get him implicated. They are summarized in a report which a special committee of nine members presented to the Legislative Assembly on 3 Aug. 1841, when commenting on the petition that Gaspé had presented on the previous 18 July. The report shows that he was put in prison in conformity with a judgement delivered against him on 20 June 1834, on behalf of the crown, for the sum of £1,169 14*s.*; that subsequently, in May 1836, he had attempted to avail himself of the provisions of the law respecting insolvent debtors by transferring all his personal and landed property, an expedient which the Court of King's Bench had endorsed; but that the Court of Appeal had reversed its decision in November 1836, on the grounds that this statute did not extend to debtors of the crown. The report ended thus: "Considering the long period during which Mr. De Gaspé has been imprisoned, his advanced age [55], and that his health is impaired by his long confinement, and that he has 'given unto Court, upon Oath, a faithful statement of all the property and estate he possessed in the world,' with a view to the discharge of his debts, they [the members of the committee] respectfully recommend that an Act be passed for his relief, and accordingly report a Bill for the purpose."

This bill, ratified by both houses, was passed without amendment on 18 Sept. 1841, and received royal sanction some days later. At the beginning of October Gaspé was therefore enabled to regain his liberty, after a captivity of 3 years, 4 months, and 5 days.

The long period of misfortunes since his dismissal in 1822 does not show items solely on the debit side. True, he was kept apart from public life, where he doubtless might have played an eminent role, but his withdrawal to the country, followed by his seclusion, was a splendid preparation for the literary career that was to add lustre to the last part of his life. First of all, his tribulations made him a wiser man. They led him to look into himself and to reflect deeply upon his past conduct and his family memories. Furthermore, the solitude of the long winters allowed him, while he saw to the education of his numerous children, to complete his own literary education by steady association with authors, both ancient and modern, English and French, through contact with whom his taste was refined. An outcast as it were from urban society, he appreciated all the more the frank, simple companionship of the farmers, the censitaires of the seigneury. He found pleasure in associating with them, and accompanied them on hunting and fishing trips, lending an attentive ear to their talk and their stories, and recording in his prodigious memory the legends, tales, and songs that were to provide material for his books.

More especially, without being clearly aware of it, he acquired his first experience as a novelist through that of his eldest son and namesake. In 1837 the latter published, under his name alone, L'Influence d'un livre. But there is no doubt that the first French Canadian novel bears in more than one place the mark of the father, and not only, according to a tradition that is related by Philéas Gagnon* and Abbé Henri-Raymond Casgrain*, in the legend of Rose Latulipe (chapter five, "L'Étranger"). To support this new interpretation, it is necessary to retrace briefly the career of the son.

Aubert de Gaspé

Young Philippe-Ignace-François Aubert de Gaspé (1814–41) was tutored by his father before entering the seminary of Nicolet in 1827. Once his studies were completed, or broken off, in 1832, he was for several years a stenographer and journalist with the Quebec Mercury and Le Canadien. Following an altercation with Dr Edmund Bailey O'CALLAGHAN, member of the assembly for Yamaska, who questioned his professional integrity, he was sentenced in November 1835 to a month in prison. In February 1836, to avenge himself, the turbulent protester placed in the hall of the House of Assembly a bottle of asafoetida, which forced the members to evacuate the building. The situation was serious. To escape another warrant for his arrest, he left town and sought refuge in the manor-house at Saint-Jean-Port-Joli, where nobody worried him further. It was there, under his father's watchful eye, that he composed his novel.

This book recounts the misfortunes of an over-credulous peasant under the spell of Le Petit Albert, a collection of magical recipes by means of which he hopes to acquire wealth. Hence the justification for the title L'Influence d'un livre. The main theme also includes the story of a quack hanged at Quebec for a murder that was actually committed at Saint-Jean-Port-Joli in 1829. The whole is embellished with a little love plot, as well as with legends and folksongs. Absurd though the novel may appear at first sight, and despite many borrowings from books, it is none the less based on the attentive observation of many customs of the time, and on anecdotes some of which the son could have learned only through his father. An example is the hero's visit to the sorceress Nolet from Beaumont in chapter eight. This is a transposition into the novel of a recollection of 1806 belonging to Gaspé Sr. As the old woman Nolet died in 1819, his son was certainly not able to question her himself. In this way one can establish a series of significant rapprochements between the memories and works of the father and the novel of the son. These cross-checks are in no sense intended to deprive the son of his title of first French Canadian novelist, but rather to emphasize that by 1837 the father had acquired a certain amount of experience in the writer's trade.

We know that L'Influence d'un livre appeared at a most unfavourable moment, when all people were concerned more with politics and rebellion [see PAPINEAU] than with literature. The author was even the object of sharp criticism. He had stated in his preface: "Public opinion will decide whether I should go no further than this first venture," and he found he had to defend himself against the attacks of Le Populaire. There was no one to bring him the slightest word of encouragement. On the contrary, a correspondent of La Gazette de Québec concluded, on 10 Feb. 1838, that "great was the disappointment of the subscribers over M. de Gaspé's historico-poetic mish-mash." This total lack of comprehension eventually discouraged the young novelist and destroyed his career. Subsequently he went to Halifax to try his luck, and died there suddenly on 7 March 1841, while his father was in prison at Quebec.

It is not impossible that even at this time Gaspé Sr thought of accepting the challenge and taking up the pen that his son had broken. This hypothesis is confirmed to some degree by a contemporary testimony. Aimé-Nicolas, dit Napoléon Aubin* relates in his prison memories (Le Fantasque, 8 May 1839) that "there, buried in his black thoughts, lay Mr Hunter, who, like the old Indian, considered that not enough beavers were being killed in prison." The allusion to Gaspé is transparent, if we recall that it was precisely around this anecdote that the author of Les Anciens Canadiens was to build the speech for his own defence which he attributed to one of his characters.

But before carrying out the plan that was to rehabilitate him in his own eyes and in those of his compatriots, Gaspé had to wait some 20 years for favourable circumstances. In the meantime his existence returned to normal. In October 1841 he was restored to his family, who during his captivity had found shelter at the house of his mother, the seigneuress Aubert de Gaspé, a few steps away from the prison on Rue Sainte-Anne. The seigneuress died shortly afterwards, on 13 April 1842, only a week after her sister, Louise Tarieu de Lanaudière. A double inheritance then brought Philippe Aubert "the usufruct and possession of the fiefs and seigneuries of Port Joly and La Pocatière," as well as the "other lucrative and honorary rights" that were attached to them. He now went to take up residence on Rue des Remparts at Quebec, and resumed his summer trips to Saint-Jean.

For several years there is nothing noteworthy in his biography except for the succession of intimate events that are particularly frequent in a large family. His children got married, his daughters making the most advantageous matches available in Lower Canada: Susanne was married to William Power*; Adélaïde, to Georges-René Saveuse de Beaujeu; Elmire, to Andrew Stuart*; Zélie, to Louis-Eusèbe Borne; Zoé, to Charles Alleyn*; Atala, to J.-Eusèbe Hudon; and Wilhelmine-Anaïs, to William Fraser. The youngest girl, Philomène, became a nun in France. As for his son Thomas, he became a priest in 1847, the same year that his mother died. Philippe Aubert also discovered and practised early the art of being a grandfather. With his numerous descendants around him, he was able once more to enjoy respect.

Around 1850 and even before, he had begun to frequent Quebec society once more. He was a regular visitor to the Club des Anciens, which met each afternoon during the off season at Charles Hamel's store on Rue Saint-Jean. There he met the historians and archeologists of the old capital, among others François-Xavier Garneau*, Georges-Barthélemi Faribault*, and the commissary general James Thompson Jr The conversation of all these veterans usually turned on the antiquities of Quebec. Gaspé more than any others, because of his lengthy absence, was able to gauge the manifold changes that had taken place in the old capital since the beginning of the century. It was before this circle, as well as in family reunions, that he related his memories before writing them down.

From the first, no doubt thinking of his son, he was minded to give them the form of a novel and to place them at the most crucial moment in the history of New France. A witness of three generations, he had been in his childhood the recipient of the direct memories of the survivors of the old régime. The historical novel, a type of literature conceived after the manner of Walter Scott, one of his favourite authors, offered him the advantage of painting a general picture and at the same time using precise details of seigneurial life as he had lived it at the end of the 18th century or as it had been recounted to him in his family.

Hence the rather simple plot of Les Anciens Canadiens. The spatial setting of the novel is the very places where the author had had his own personal experiences; the main centres of the action are the town of Quebec and the manor-house of Haberville (slight modification for Aubert), to which must be added the picturesque trip along the south shore, with the old servant José Dubé as a mentor. The first part, which covers a good half of the novel (11 chapters), describes at some length seigneurial customs in 1757, at the end of the French régime. Traditional elements are deliberately given first place: the legends of the sorcerers of the Île d'Orléans and the appearance of "la Corriveau" [Marie-Josephte Corriveau*], the spring break-up, the popular feasts of the first of May (the planting of the fir-tree) and Saint-Jean, elaborate meals served as occasion requires, the paying of the seigneurial rents, etc. The protagonists are two young men who on leaving college propose to follow a military career: Jules d'Haberville, the seigneur's son, in the French army, and Archibald Cameron of Locheil, a Scottish orphan brought from France to New France by the Jesuits after the disaster at Culloden in 1746, in the English army. They are given a warm welcome at the Haberville manor-house before they leave for Europe.

The action of the second part (three chapters only) takes place during the war of 1759. It is the climax of the collective and individual drama. The workings of destiny have brought the two young officers back to New France, but in opposite camps. Archy receives from the invader a ruthless order to burn the dwellings on the south shore, including the manor-house of his former protectors. The dictates of military discipline and honour prevail over his reluctance to carry out this sinister plan. But, taken prisoner by the Indians, the young officer escapes torture and death only because of the gratitude of Dumais, a Canadien whom he had formerly rescued from certain drowning. A little later, on the Plains of Abraham, at the time of the battle of Sainte-Foy, Archy comes face to face with his former comrade and friend. He magnanimously spares Jules d'Haberville's life, when he has him at his mercy.

The third part, also short (four chapters), tells the story of slow reconciliation after terrible years of anguish. In it Gaspé makes a critical assessment, as it were, of the misfortunes that befell New France after the shipwreck of the Auguste; then he shows the changes that occurred around 1767 in the environment in which his characters move. As wounds are not entirely healed, Blanche d'Haberville refuses the hand of her suitor Archy, but Jules marries an English girl. And the final episode of the novel portrays a typical scene of the times, with songs, dances, and mirth bringing back gaiety to the Haberville manor-house.

This not improbable plot was only a pretext for Gaspé, whose ambition was above all to "set down some episodes of the good old days." He received, he said, the encouragement of "some of our best writers, who begged me to omit nothing concerning the customs of the Canadians of old"; he was referring to such men as Faribault, his lifetime friend, Octave CRÉMAZIE, who wrote a prefatory poem on Quebec specially for Gaspé's book, and Joseph-Charles Taché*, whom he entrusted with his first chapters for publication in Les Soirées canadiennes. But he was none the less fearful of unkindly criticism. Consequently he informed purists that he was more aware than anybody of the weaknesses of his book. Let them, he exclaimed, "call it a novel, memoirs, a chronicle, a mish-mash, a hotch-potch: I care little!" The last two expressions, which do not strictly speaking represent literary categories, were without a doubt recalled to his mind by the unfavourable reception given earlier to L'Influence d'un livre.

But his fears were exaggerated. On 3 Jan. 1863 he read the manuscript to Abbé Casgrain; he had already published two chapters in January and February 1862. Casgrain immediately took it to Georges-Pascal Desbarats*, the publisher of Le Foyer canadien, where it appeared at the beginning of April. It was an immediate success. In 1864 there was a second edition "revised and corrected by the author," as well as an English translation, The Canadians of old. In 1865 the novel was adapted for the stage. One can say after more than a century that the popularity of this work has never declined. To the present time there has been a total of some 20 editions, including three English translations and one Spanish. The work's popularity is due not so much to the Corneille-like dilemma that faces the principal characters as to the personal recollections of the author, which abound on each page and even overflow into notes and explanations every bit as worthy of attention as the plot itself. This is because the writer of memoirs is everywhere present behind the novelist. The characters themselves are all identifiable prototypes in the family circle or among the former relations of the Gaspé family. For example, José is an old servant the author actually knew in his youth. Archy was suggested to him by an episode in the life of Lieutenant-Colonel Malcolm Fraser*. Moreover, he depicted himself at two periods of his life, first through the impulsive, spirited nature of young Jules d'Haberville, then in the person of Monsieur d'Egmont, an old man grown wise through trials similar in every respect to those Gaspé had experienced himself during his years of tribulation.

The Mémoires published by Gaspé in 1866 are the natural sequel to the notes and explanations in Les Anciens Canadiens. Once freed from the limitation of the novel form, the old author – he was then 80 – allowed his pen to run on at the command of his memory, which he himself called outstanding. He also had a high opinion of his propensity for always telling the truth. "I was born naturally truthful," he stated. Indeed, these are two qualities in which he is rarely found wanting. But there is another of which he does not boast, although he finds a way to praise it in others. That is the kindness, accompanied by a touch of humour, with which he surrounds the persons of whom he speaks. As their number exceeds a thousand, the effect is the more remarkable.

It is not easy to summarize the Mémoires, which do not unfold in a strictly chronological order. Roughly speaking, the author lingers more over the years previous to 1822, except in so far as his friends, the habitants of Saint-Jean-Port-Joli, are concerned. If he makes only brief mention of his helpmeet, "beautiful among the beautiful," and speaks only a little of his children, it is because he is writing for them. On the other hand, he never ceases to talk about the early generations of his ancestors, the families friendly with his own, and in general the society he frequented: students of the seminary of Quebec, lawyers, judges, doctors, military men, ecclesiastics, and politicians.

About each of the names he mentions he recalls anecdotes, a little at random, as he must have done during casual conversation. In short, his art is that of a brilliant conversationalist, and therefore of a story-teller. The anecdotes contained in the Mémoires, taken as a whole, constitute one of the best pictures we possess of Canadien society, both urban and rural, at the beginning of the 19th century. Above all Gaspé, although an aristocrat, was the first to make heard through a written work the pleasing voices of the habitants of the country. For his period, his work provides an unrivalled description of popular traditions of all kinds.

In a word, on many events and on a vast number of people, Gaspé sheds a light resulting from a balanced judgement, which makes the Mémoires, as also the posthumous fragments collected under the title of Divers (1893), a human testimony of major importance for Canadian history and literature. By his irreplaceable work the author of Les Anciens canadiens and Mémoires thoroughly redeemed the errors of his youth. He became the most illustrious of his line to bear the name of Gaspé. Like Alfred de Vigny he might have said, paradoxically, had it not been for his modesty: "My ancestors will spring from me."

LUC LACOURCIÈRE

AQ, Autographes, ff.68–73. Archives de l'université de Montréal, Collection Baby, Correspondance générale, dix lettres de Philippe Aubert de Gaspé. Archives du collège Bourget (Rigaud, Qué.), Philippe Aubert de Gaspé, Les Anciens Canadiens. Archives judiciaires de Montmagny (Qué.), Greffe Simon Fraser, 17 juin 1841. ASQ, Cartons, S, 110; Cartons, T, 128, 130; Fonds Casgrain, I, 115, 118–19; Fonds Casgrain, II, 17, 20.

Philippe-Joseph Aubert de Gaspé, Les Anciens Canadiens (1re éd., Québec, 1863; 2^{e} éd., revue et corrigée par l'auteur, 1864; 16^{e} éd., 1970); The Canadians of old, trans. G. M. Pennée (1st ed., Quebec, 1864), trans. C. G. D. Roberts (3rd ed., New York, 1898); Divers (1re éd., Montréal, 1893); Mémoires (Ottawa, 1866). Philippe Aubert de Gaspé (fils), L'Influence d'un livre; roman historique (1re éd., Québec, 1837).

D. M. Hayne et Marcel Tirol, Bibliographie

critique du roman canadien-français, 1837–1900 (Toronto and Quebec, 1968), 42–59. H. R. Casgrain, Philippe Aubert de Gaspé (Québec, 1871). V. I. Curran, "Philippe Aubert de Gaspé; his life and his works," unpublished PHD thesis, University of Toronto, 1957. [François Daniel], Histoire des grandes familles françaises du Canada . . . (Montréal, 1867), 347–70. P.-G. Roy, A travers les « Anciens Canadiens » de Philippe Aubert de Gaspé (Montréal, 1943); A travers les « Mémoires » de Philippe Aubert de Gaspé (Montréal, 1943); La famille Aubert de Gaspé (Lévis, Qué., 1907). André Bellessort, "Les souvenirs d'un seigneur canadien," Reflets de la vieille Amérique (Paris, 1923), 216–58. Narcisse Degagné, "Philippe Aubert de Gaspé, étude littéraire," Revue canadienne (Montréal), 2ᵉ sér. XXI (1895), 456–78, 524–51. Charles ab der Halden, "Philippe Aubert de Gaspé," Études de littérature canadienne-française (Paris, 1904), 43–52. Luc Lacourcière, "L'enjeu des Anciens Canadiens," Cahiers des Dix, XXXII (1967), 223–54; "Philippe Aubert de Gaspé (fils)," Livres et auteurs canadiens, 1964; panorama de la production littéraire de l'année (Montréal, [1965]), 150–57. Camille Roy, "Les Anciens Canadiens," Nouveaux essais sur la littérature canadienne (Québec, 1914), 1–63.

AUMOND (Aumon), JOSEPH-IGNACE, lumber merchant; b. 21 March 1810 in L'Assomption, L.C., son of Ignace Aumon and Euphrosine Robichaud; m. Jane Cumming, 21 April 1833, by whom he had five sons and three daughters; d. 9 Nov. 1879, in Ottawa, Ont.

Joseph-Ignace Aumond went to Montreal as a clerk in the store of J. D. Bernard after having attended local schools. He then moved to the site of Bytown (Ottawa) as a storekeeper in a store opened by Bernard. A few years later he set up a general store of his own in Bytown.

Aumond entered the Ottawa valley timber trade about 1830. Within a few years he was a major figure in this trade, and in 1844 sent about 40 rafts annually to Quebec, representing nearly 2,000,000 feet of timber. He employed as many as 1,000 men and did business of more than £100,000 a year. The areas he exploited, mainly on his own account but also in conjunction with John Egan*, were along the upper Ottawa River and its tributaries. He held licences for cutting timber along the Madawaska, Petawawa, and Gatineau rivers, and in 1849 he acquired timber limits as distant from Bytown as Lake Timiskaming.

Although Aumond's business was damaged in the late 1840s by the removal of imperial preference, he remained one of the most important producers in the Ottawa valley and constructed in these years one of the largest steam sawmills in Canada. Yet by the mid-1850s he was in severe financial difficulties, and claimed to have lost £40,000 and to have been "all but ruined." However, he continued in the lumber trade, on a much smaller scale, until his death and saw his son Charles established in it at Ottawa.

Aumond played a prominent part in advancing the interests of the Ottawa valley lumber trade and its focal point of Bytown. He was a member of the Ottawa Valley Lumber Association when it was formed in 1836, and two years later he was promoting the construction of an iron suspension bridge across the Ottawa. In 1846, Aumond and Egan purchased two steamers at £10,000 from John Molson* of Montreal, one to ply Lake Deschênes, east of the Chats falls, and the other Lac des Chats, west of the falls, on the Ottawa River. The two routes were linked by a horse-drawn railway constructed by Aumond, Egan, and Ruggles Wright*.

Aumond was the first president of the Bytown and Montreal Telegraph Company in 1849, and was director (Egan was president) of the Bytown and Aylmer Union Turnpike Company which completed the road between the two towns in 1850. He participated in the formation of the Bytown and Prescott Railway (later the St Lawrence and Ottawa) in 1851 and was on the first board of directors. He was also a trustee of the Consumers Gas Company formed in 1854, and a member of the first board of directors of the City Passenger Horse Railway in 1866.

As one of the principal industrialists in the community, Aumond participated actively in Ottawa's civic life. He was one of the organizers of the first regular fire company in Bytown in 1838, was on the first board of school trustees in 1842, and was appointed to the original Board of Health in 1847. He was also prominent in the Mechanics' Institute and the Board of Trade, as well as the Ottawa Association of Lumber Manufacturers. In 1874 he was persuaded to run along with J. M. Currier* in Ottawa City, a two member riding, as a Conservative supporting Sir John A. Macdonald*, but he was defeated. He had been appointed major in the 4th Battalion of Carleton militia in 1847, but was dismissed in 1850 after his name appeared, without his knowledge, on the Annexation Manifesto. He was reinstated as a major in 1856, and promoted lieutenant-colonel later that year and colonel in 1869.

The "reverses of fortune" which Aumond suffered in his long career only made it representative of the careers of many other early lumbermen in the Ottawa valley. His standing in the trade made him one of the "lumber kings," and his activities in the development of Ottawa entitle him to be called one of the area's most important founders.

HENRI PILON

PAC, MG 24, D8 (Wright papers), 12155, 12412, 12465, 17340–41, 17351; I9 (Hill collection), 8572–73, 8707; MG 30, D62 (Audet papers), 2, pp.768–829. Ottawa Citizen, January 1874, 10 Nov. 1879. Ottawa Free Press, 25 Oct. 1878. Packet (Bytown), 1846–51. Canada, Province of, Legislative Assembly, Journals, 1844–45, app. O.O., "Report of the select committee to which were referred the petition of John P. Waterston and others . . . and various other petitions, for amendments to the lumber act . . ."; 1849, app. P.P.P.P., "First report of the select committee on the lumber trade"; 1850, app. P.P., "Return to an address of the Legislative Assembly . . . regarding the setting apart of a tract of land in the valley of the river Gatineau for the use of certain Indians." [W. S. Hunter], Hunter's Ottawa scenery, in the vicinity of Ottawa city, Canada West (Ottawa, 1855), 12–17. Dom. ann. reg., 1879, 383. A. H. D. Ross, Ottawa, past and present (Toronto, 1927), 49, 82, 99, 139, 155–56.

AVRAY. See MARSHALL

AYLWIN, THOMAS CUSHING, lawyer, politician, and judge; b. 5 Jan 1806 at Quebec, son of Thomas Aylwin, merchant, and of Louise-Catherine Connolly; d. 14 Oct. 1871 at Montreal and was buried in Mount Hermon cemetery at Quebec.

Thomas Cushing Aylwin's education was at first entrusted to the Reverend Daniel Wilkie*, a Presbyterian minister, then, after a brief stay at Harvard University, Aylwin studied law with Louis Moquin, a Quebec lawyer. He was called to the bar of Lower Canada in December 1827, and rapidly acquired a reputation as an excellent criminal jurist. The young lawyer entered the rough-and-tumble of political life on the side of the Patriotes, and in the thick of the fight took up the defence, in the press of Lower Canada, of the prisoners whose cases he had argued.

However, it was not until after the union of the Canadas that Aylwin appeared in the assembly: he was member for Portneuf in 1841, and held the office of solicitor general for Canada East during the first government of Robert Baldwin* and Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine*. His English Canadian origin and the fact that he represented a county in the Quebec area were largely responsible for his appointment. La Fontaine thus hoped to win over in that region the elements hostile to the Union. The control of patronage for that locality was, moreover, left in Aylwin's hands. In 1843 he was among the ministers who resigned because they did not agree with the governor, Sir Charles Theophilus Metcalfe*, on the question of the use of political patronage. Aylwin was elected member for the City of Quebec in the general elections of 1844 and 1847, and in the assembly he led the attacks, sometimes with violence according to Le Canadien, against the various Conservative ministries: "Short, nearsighted, and (at this time at least) never quite sober, Aylwin commanded not by his physical presence as much as by his charming, genial bluffness and, above all, by his prodigious bilingual gift for words."

When Baldwin and La Fontaine were recalled to office in March 1848, Aylwin was appointed solicitor general with William Hume Blake*, but he was the only one to hold a seat on the Executive Council. On the suggestion of Francis Hincks*, La Fontaine offered him a post as judge to make room for Blake: ". . . if Aylwin were to go on the bench," wrote Hincks, "I think it would remove the difficulty with Blake. . . ." On 26 April 1848 Aylwin became a judge in the Court of Queen's Bench, and declared himself happy to have given up political life. His electors thought otherwise: Aylwin's appointment, wrote Joseph-Édouard Cauchon*, "was censured by almost everybody, because he was too quick to get himself settled even though his services were needed." Aylwin seems, however, to have discharged his duties as judge satisfactorily; in 1854 he formed part of the Seigneurial Court responsible for instituting the transformation of the seigneurial régime. In 1868 he retired, for reasons of health.

On 2 June 1832, at Quebec, Thomas Cushing Aylwin had married Margaret Nelson Hanna; after her death, he married Eliza Margaret Felton of Sherbrooke on 14 May 1836; having become once more a widower, he married Ann Blake on 7 Sept. 1850. No child was born of any of these marriages.

ANDRÉ GARON

BNQ, Société historique de Montréal, Collection La Fontaine, Lettres, 480, 484, 491 (copies in PAC). Le Canadien (Québec), 16 déc. 1844. Gazette (Montreal), 16 Oct. 1871. Political appointments, 1841–1865 (J.-O. Coté). P.-G. Roy, Fils de Québec, III, 126–28. Wallace, Macmillan dictionary. Dent, Canadian portrait gallery, IV, 105–7. Monet, Last cannon shot.

B

BACHAND, PIERRE, lawyer and politician; b. 22 March 1835 at Verchères, L.C., son of Joseph Bachand, a farmer, and Josephte Fontaine; d. 3 Nov. 1878 at Saint-Hyacinthe, Que.

After spending his youth at Saint-Damase, where his family lived, Pierre Bachand entered the college of Saint-Hyacinthe, but had to leave the institution before the end of his classical studies. He then began to study law under the direction of Louis-Victor Sicotte*, who had a strong influence upon his professional and political career; he was called to the bar on 3 Dec. 1860. While studying law, Pierre Bachand held at Saint-Hyacinthe the posts of deputy protonotary of the Superior Court and assistant clerk of the Circuit Court; he gave up these offices in 1862 when he entered into partnership with a lawyer of his own age, Jean-Baptiste Bourgeois, who became a judge of the Superior Court in 1876. In 1859 Bachand had married Delphine Dufort, who died in 1864, and in 1868 he remarried, his second wife being Marie-Louise Marchand, daughter of Louis Marchand, a Montreal broker. According to contemporary descriptions, Bachand was a dark-haired man, rather slender, calm, serious, active, and loquacious.

Bachand built up a large clientele for himself throughout the whole county, among both the agricultural population and the industrialists. With the advantage of railways and a number of plants using water-power, Saint-Hyacinthe experienced rapid growth, especially after 1870; its principal industries were shoe, furniture, and carriage factories, tanneries, some foundries, a brewery, and an organ works [see Joseph CASAVANT]. At the end of August 1871, with a view to promoting this industrial development, Bachand and a few prominent citizens set up the Chamber of Commerce of the district of Saint-Hyacinthe. But it was by starting the Banque de Saint-Hyacinthe that Pierre Bachand took the greatest part in the economic development of his region; this bank, which officially began financial operations on 27 Jan. 1874, made rapid progress despite the economic crisis. Bachand was its president until his death, and when in February 1878 he presented his annual report, he was able to compare the bank favourably with several much older ones. He was also active in the Société Saint-Jean-Baptiste of Saint-Hyacinthe, and was a member of its executive committee for several years.

A pupil of Louis-Victor Sicotte, Pierre Bachand, while still young, had a hand in partisan struggles. Although he shared the fears of the Rouges about confederation, he avoided identifying himself with the radical group of this party. The creation of a provincial government marked the beginning of his parliamentary career; he canvassed successfully for the provincial mandate of Saint-Hyacinthe, triumphing over Magloire LANCTÔT, a supporter of the government and a lawyer highly regarded by the bishopric of Saint-Hyacinthe. In 1867 the majority of radical Liberals aspired to a seat in the House of Commons, whereas the moderate Liberals, including Bachand, turned rather towards the provincial house. Bachand rallied to confederation and, influenced by Félix-Gabriel Marchand* of Le Franco-Canadien, for a while urged that an end be put to the partisan struggles in the Legislative Assembly of the province of Quebec. In 1871 and 1875 his mandate as an MLA was renewed without opposition.

In the house, Bachand stood out as one of the chief critics of the members of the government. During the first two sessions he was spoken of as one of the possible leaders of the opposition; it was not until March 1869 that the Liberals constituted themselves the official opposition, and they chose Henri-Gustave Joly* as their leader; Bachand and Marchand were his principal lieutenants. Throughout his parliamentary career, Bachand stressed the necessity of a reduction in the expenses of the provincial government, which had limited sources of revenue at its disposal; only a prudent budgetary policy could avoid too frequent recourse to direct taxation, the surest road to legislative union. On several occasions Bachand outlined the dangers that threatened the province's autonomy. A tenacious adversary of the double mandate, he considered the power of disallowance vested in the federal government baneful and urged the provincial cabinet to free itself from the tutelage of the central government. Bachand was interested in modernizing agriculture, was alarmed at the disastrous emigration of French Canadians to the United States, demanded that justice be administered in a less costly way and made more accessible, and argued that greater attention should be given to primary education and to "industrial and commercial education."

Although a provincial representative, Bachand did not remain aloof from the political struggles on the federal scene. Thus, on the occasion of the "Pacific Scandal" [see CARTIER], he was a leading figure on the hustings in the Saint-Hyacinthe region, together with his associate, Jean-Baptiste Bourgeois, the "Danton of the Reform party," and Honoré Mercier*, whose reputation as an orator already extended beyond the frontiers of the county. Bachand took part in the organization of the Parti National at the end of 1871 [see Cartier] and was a member of the council of the reform association of the Parti National of Montreal.

During the session 1877–78, Charles-Eugène Boucher* de Boucherville's government had to face the violent attacks of the opposition, who criticized the laying of the railway between Quebec and Montreal and the famous bill of the attorney general, Auguste-Réal Angers*, which forced municipalities to pay the subsidies promised for the building of the railway; on this occasion, Joly entrusted Bachand with the task of leading the Liberal troops in the attack. Following Lieutenant Governor Luc Letellier* de Saint-Just's "coup d'état," which dismissed the administration of Boucherville, Joly offered Bachand the post of provincial treasurer; it was the first time a Liberal and a Francophone had held this office. He defended the lieutenant governor's position vigorously, and assumed such an importance in the Liberal cabinet that the newspapers spoke of the "Joly-Bachand administration."

In the 1878 election Bachand had to face an outstanding candidate in his county: Antoine Casavant, a farmer from Saint-Domingue, nephew of Joseph, a member of the agricultural council of the province, and active in several industrial undertakings. Casavant could appeal to the solidarity of the agricultural class, and bank on a certain rivalry between the town of Saint-Hyacinthe and the surrounding country districts; Bachand, however, won with a majority of 68 votes. On 18 June 1878, during the stormy session of that year, he made his financial report, and set at $2,334,041 the financial estimates for the following year: it was the first time the budget speech was delivered in French in the Legislative Assembly of the province of Quebec. Ill and exhausted, Bachand found it difficult to take part in the business of the session, and the preparation of the budget required considerable effort on his part. On 3 Nov. 1878, after an illness of some months, he died at the age of 43. His funeral took place on 6 Nov. 1878 at Saint-Hyacinthe.

MARCEL HAMELIN

PAC, MG 30, D62 (Audet papers), 3, pp.131–32. Le Courrier de Saint-Hyacinthe, 31 août, 14 sept. 1867; 31 déc. 1869; 16 févr., 22 juin, 5 nov., 7 nov. 1878. L'Événement (Québec), 1er mai 1868, 13 déc. 1869, 13 mars 1878. L'Opinion publique (Montréal), 14 nov. 1878. Le Pionnier de Sherbrooke, 8 nov. 1878. Can. parl. comp., 1878. Auguste Achintre, Portraits et dossiers parlementaires du premier parlement de Québec (Montréal, 1871), 24–26. C.-P. Choquette, Histoire de la ville de Saint-Hyacinthe (Saint-Hyacinthe, Qué., 1930), 292–96. Rumilly, Hist. de la prov. de Québec, I, II.

BACK, Sir GEORGE, naval officer, Arctic explorer, and artist; b. 6 Nov. 1796 in Stockport, England, second son of John and Ann Back; d. 23 June 1878 in London.

The heroic exploits of the Royal Navy during the Napoleonic wars stimulated George Back's desire to go to sea, and a visit to Liverpool confirmed it. His father therefore took him to London and, with the help of a relative, he joined HMS Arethusa as first class volunteer on 15 Sept. 1808. Shortly afterwards, Arethusa joined battles off Cherbourg and along the north coast of Spain. In April 1809, when serving near San Sebastian in one of the boats seeking prizes, he was captured by French soldiers. From there he travelled to Verdun, where he spent the next five years as a prisoner of war. Although he began to "associate with dissolute characters and see something of vice and roguery," he soon settled down to resume his education in drawing and French. He was released early in 1814 and returned to England in May.

On 4 July 1814 he joined HMS Akbar, stationed at Halifax, Nova Scotia, as midshipman. He saw plenty of action before his ship returned to Portsmouth in December 1816. On 5 March 1817 Back was appointed passed Admiralty midshipman on board HMS Bulwark. This ship remained at Chatham, where, by his own account, he spent his time "drawing, reading and studying." After a request for promotion was refused, he volunteered for service under Commanders John Ross* and David Buchan* in an expedition that opened a new era of British Arctic exploration. He was appointed midshipman on board HM brig Trent in the expedition's eastern branch under Buchan, who was ordered to sail Dorothea and Trent across the Arctic Ocean from Spitsbergen to Bering Strait. Ross, commanding the western branch, was to attempt a northwest passage by way of Davis Strait. Dorothea and Trent left the Thames on 25 April 1818 and returned on 22 October, having spent a perilous three weeks beset in the ice off Spitsbergen, their only success being a record latitude of 82°34′N.

Although the expedition itself was a failure, it provided Back with the key to his future by bringing him into contact with Lieutenant John Franklin*, commanding officer of the Trent. Franklin's flattering report of Back's conduct, and particularly of his usefulness as an artist, was to make him a natural choice for the overland expedition that Franklin himself led in 1819 to explore the north coast of America from the mouth of the Coppermine River to Repulse Bay.

Back returned to Bulwark for a short time, then, on 23 May 1819, set out with Franklin for York Factory on the Hudson's Bay Company ship Prince of Wales. Dr John Richardson*, a naturalist, Robert Hood*, another midshipman, and John Hepburn*, a seaman, completed the party from England. The expedition passed one winter at Cumberland House, and a second at Fort Enterprise, a base camp they had built by Winter Lake, between Great Slave Lake and the Coppermine River.

Soon after their arrival at Winter Lake, Franklin asked Back to return south to hasten the passage of essential goods expected from Cumberland House. He set out on 18 Oct. 1820, and on 2 Jan. 1821 arrived at the trading posts on Lake Athabasca. Here, George Simpson*, who had recently taken charge of the HBC's Athabasca department, was justifiably irritated by Back's rudeness and impatience. "That Gentleman," he wrote of Back, "seems to think that every thing must give way to his demands." A month later the goods arrived, and Back returned with them to Fort Enterprise, saving the expedition from early failure.

On 14 July 1821 the party left their base in two canoes, descended the Coppermine River to the sea, then explored the coast as far east as Bathurst Inlet. Here, short supplies, the approach of winter, and unrest among their Canadian voyageurs obliged them to abandon hope of reaching Repulse Bay. Dogged by starvation and increasing debility, the party struggled back overland across the barren tundra towards Fort Enterprise. Half the party was saved when Back, who had gone ahead to search for Indians, located a tribe and sent them to the main group with supplies. Ten men, including Hood, died before he could send help.

These two courageous life-saving journeys, together with his numerous fine paintings of northern scenes, leave a strong impression of Back's contribution to this ill-fated expedition, but indications are that he did not always live up to a hero's reputation. A number of fur-traders spoke critically of him, but charges made years later by John Hepburn are probably the most reliable and are supported by similar accusations levelled at Back by others through much of his life. Hepburn recalled a quarrel between Back and Hood over an Indian woman, which nearly ended in a duel – behaviour in line with Back's later reputation as a dandy and a womanizer. He also held that "Back is not very brave . . . he is charming to those from whom he hopes to gain something." There are echoes of this remark in the description of Back that Sophia Cracroft, Franklin's niece, gave to Henry Grinnell in 1856: "He is never the man to originate a handsome act, but if he finds it popular, and that it will be successful, he steps in to take as much of the credit as he can secure. You must not think it harshness or severity when I describe him as intensely selfish, sly, and sycophantic."

Back was promoted lieutenant on 1 Jan. 1821 when the expedition was still in progress. Soon after his arrival in England in October 1822, he returned to service at sea to gain the qualifications necessary for promotion to commander. During his absence on HMS Superb, which was stationed in the West Indies, appointments were made for Franklin's second overland expedition to explore the coast eastwards and westwards from the mouth of the Mackenzie River. The Admiralty apparently wanted to reappoint Back, but Franklin had been poorly impressed by Back's conduct during the first land expedition and encouraged them to appoint Lieutenant John Bushnan instead. However, Bushnan died before the expedition left, and Back was then invited to take part. He readily accepted the offer and joined Franklin in London in December 1824.

By contrast with the first overland expedition, this one went ahead smoothly and almost without incident. The newly reorganized HBC was better able to fulfil its promise of assistance. The planning was better in London also; supplies were sent out well in advance, and British seamen replaced Canadian voyageurs who, the explorers felt, were less reliable.

The party arrived by packet in New York in March 1825 and travelled to Great Bear Lake, where they built Fort Franklin on the western shore. After a winter there, they set out for the Mackenzie delta on 22 June 1826. At Point Separation the party divided. Richardson and Edward Nicholas Kendall*, the surveyor, in the 24-foot boats Dolphin and Union, explored the coast eastward to the mouth of the Coppermine River; Franklin and Back, in the 26-foot boats Lion and Reliance, set their course westward towards Bering Strait where HMS Blossom (Capt. Frederick W. Beechey*) was awaiting them.

Soon after reaching the sea, on 7 July, Franklin and Back spent an exhausting day fighting off Eskimos who tried to raid the boats, but the main impediment was poor weather and ice conditions. Six weeks' coasting brought them to Return Reef, only half-way to Icy Cape, so, with winter fast approaching and supplies dwindling, Franklin decided to turn back. They reached Fort Franklin on 21 Sept. 1826, three weeks after Richardson and Kendall, who had completed their survey [see BEAULIEU]. During the winter Back learned that he had been promoted commander on 30 Dec. 1825.

By the end of this second expedition, Franklin, Back, and Richardson had explored along half the length of America's northern coast – from Kent Peninsula to Prudhoe Bay, Alaska. The prospect of completing this north coast survey – from Kent Peninsula to Melville Peninsula – remained on Back's mind for many years; it was partly for this reason that he undertook his 1833–35 expedition, and it was the sole object of his abortive 1836–37 voyage.

Franklin made free use of Back's watercolours and drawings to illustrate his published narratives of both land expeditions. As the products of one of the first competent artists to penetrate into the Canadian Arctic, these illustrations are now considered an invaluable record of early northern history. Those which Franklin published are still used to illustrate books on northern exploration, but many other fine drawings, watercolours, and sketch-books from Back's three land expeditions, still preserved in the Public Archives of Canada, in the Scott Polar Research Institute, and elsewhere, remain unused and virtually unknown.

After his return to England on 10 Oct. 1827, Back tried for nearly three years to obtain another appointment. At the same time his health began to fail and he decided to restore himself by making a tour of Europe. Setting out on 3 Aug. 1830, he travelled up the Rhine to Switzerland, then spent more than a year visiting the artistic centres of Italy. In January 1832, when he was in Naples, he was disquieted by rumours about John Ross, who had not been heard of since he had set out on an attempt at a northwest passage in 1829. Back returned to England at once and offered to command a search. He learned that Dr Richardson had already submitted a plan for reaching Ross by way of the Thlew-ee-choh or Great Fish River (Back River), a river known only by Indian report, which was supposed to rise somewhere near Great Slave Lake and flow northwest into the Arctic Ocean. Richardson had received insufficient support and stepped down. Back adopted the same plan and raised enough support from the government, the HBC, and public subscription to go ahead with the expedition under the direction of the Colonial Office.

Taking with him Dr Richard KING as naturalist, Back left Liverpool by packet for New York on 17 Feb. 1833. In June he was at Fort Alexander on Lake Winnipeg, where George Simpson, now governor of all the HBC's activities overseas, greeted him cordially, apparently having forgotten their brush in 1821. From Fort Resolution Back set out to search for the Thlew-ee-choh and located it on 29 August. He then returned to the expedition's wintering station, Fort Reliance, at the eastern end of Great Slave Lake. When news reached him in spring 1834 of Ross's safe return to England, it only remained for him to explore the Thlew-ee-choh and the seacoast adjoining its mouth.

On 7 June 1834 his party left the fort for their depot on Artillery Lake, and, travelling by Clinton-Colden Lake and Aylmer Lake, reached the Thlew-ee-choh on 28 June. The descent of this river took them one month, after which they spent three weeks exploring Chantrey Inlet. Poor weather prevented their making a more extensive survey of the sea-coast, and they were back in Fort Reliance on 27 September. On 21 March 1835 Back left for England, leaving King to follow with the men and equipment.

Arriving in England on 8 Sept. 1835, Back received a hero's welcome. He was promoted captain on 30 Sept. 1835 by order in council, an honour that had only one precedent and that was necessary in Back's case because he had not served the prescribed year at sea since being made commander. Among other honours he received the royal medal of the Royal Geographical Society, and, on 8 Feb. 1836, was elected a fellow. The Thlew-ee-choh gradually became known as the Back River.

Richard King was noticeably absent from the throng of Back's admirers. He evidently believed that the expedition might have achieved much more and his narrative shows that his opinions frequently differed from Back's. Like HBC employee Thomas Simpson*, who met the expedition in 1833, he considered Back a weak leader, but above all he resented Back's interference with his duties as a naturalist.

King, however, had a way of making himself unpopular, and little notice was taken of his complaints. The high regard with which Back was generally held enabled him to dictate terms for a further expedition. On his behalf the Royal Geographical Society approached the government with a scheme that Back had had in mind since 1828: to take a ship to Repulse Bay or Wager River, and then trace the coast by boat as far as Point Turnagain, the farthest point reached by Franklin on the first land expedition. Back was given command of HMS Terror and the expedition set out in June 1836. Among the officers of the Terror were mates Graham Gore, who later perished in the ill-fated Franklin expedition, and Robert MCCLURE, who in 1850–54 commanded Investigator in search of Franklin. The year was notoriously bad for ice throughout the whole of the eastern Arctic and the 325-ton Terror with her crew of 60 men was beset in August on entering Frozen Strait. She drifted throughout the winter in the pack off northeast Southampton Island and suffered heavy damage. When freed in July 1837, Back had no alternative but to turn homeward. He landed with his ship in a sinking condition at Lough Swilly in Ireland on 3 Sept. 1837.

Further honours followed this expedition, among them the gold medal of the Société de Géographie de Paris and a knighthood on 18 March 1839. Although Back was now only 40 years old, this voyage proved to be the last of his naval career. His health had weakened during the expedition and it continued to deteriorate. In July 1839 he took the cure at Marienbad (Mariánské Lázně), a fashionable German spa. Finding this treatment ineffective, he travelled to Italy, where he remained until 1842. In 1844 Francis Rawdon Moira Crozier*, who was to die on the Franklin expedition, wrote to James Clark Ross* from Florence that Back had not left a good impression behind him, and that he had gained a reputation for vanity. "He was a very pleasant fellow," one man told Crozier, "but if he was in love with himself he had no right to suppose every lady he met was the same."

Returning to England, Back led a comfortable life in London society and maintained an active interest in Arctic exploration, which was again entering the news. He opposed the choice of Franklin as commander of the 1845 expedition on grounds of age and encouraged James Ross to accept the appointment. On 13 Oct. 1846 he married Theodosia Elizabeth Hammond, a widow, spent six months with her in Italy, and returned in August 1847 to take an active part in the preparation of expeditions in search of Franklin. He served with a number of other Arctic veterans on the Arctic council which advised the Admiralty about preparing search expeditions. Unhappily Back and nearly all other members of the council were completely wrong in their opinions on the whereabouts of the missing men, and their advice resulted in the Admiralty's sending expeditions to all the wrong places. In 1851 he served on the Admiralty's Arctic committee, which met to investigate the conduct of Horatio Austin* and William Penny* on their respective expeditions. In 1856 the Admiralty made its final decision to abandon the Franklin search, and Back, almost alone among the Arctic veterans, agreed with them. He was forcibly condemned by Sophia Cracroft, who had for some time disliked him. "That miserable Sir G. Back," she wrote, "will say anything that a Lord of the Admiralty tells him, and is held in contempt or something worse by all who have served with him" [see Jane GRIFFIN].

With the end of the Franklin search, Back withdrew again into quiet retirement, receiving promotion to rear-admiral on the reserve list on 19 March 1857. He had been made an honorary doctor of civil law at Oxford University in 1854. Until the end of his life he participated actively in the Royal Geographical Society, of which he was vice-president for seven years and a member in council for many more. He was promoted vice-admiral on 24 Sept. 1863 and admiral on 18 Oct. 1876. One of his last acts in public life, on 6 Dec. 1876, was to preside over a meeting of Arctic veterans who had gathered to greet the returning expedition commanded by George Strong Nares* in Alert and Discovery. Thus this man who had been a leading figure from the first of Britain's great 19th century expeditions to the Canadian Arctic survived just long enough to witness the return of the last.

CLIVE A. HOLLAND

SPRI, MS 248/249/2 (letter from Sophia Cracroft, 8 April 1857); MS 248/250/4 (letter from Sophia Cracroft, 4 July 1856); MS 248/364/22 (letter from F. R. M. Crozier to James Clark Ross, 31 Dec. 1844); MS 395 (George Back papers including most of his journals and diaries, correspondence with the Admiralty, Sir John Franklin, and other Arctic officers, and official certificates, all on loan from J. Pares). McCord Museum, McGill University, Montreal, George Back papers (two journals and some correspondence, not used in the preparation of this biography). Royal Geographical Society (London), Back papers (a large collection not used in the preparation of this biography).

George Back, Narrative of the Arctic land expedition to the mouth of the Great Fish River, and along the shores of the Arctic Ocean, in the years 1833, 1834, and 1835 (London, 1836); Narrative of an expedition in HMS Terror, undertaken with a view to geographical discovery on the Arctic shores, in the years 1836–7 (London, 1838). Les bourgeois de la Compagnie du Nord-Ouest; récits de voyages, lettres et rapports inédits relatifs au Nord-Ouest canadien, L.-F.-R. Masson, édit. (2v., Québec, 1889–90; New York, 1960), I, 130–50. John Franklin, Narrative of a journey to the shores of the polar sea, in the years 1819, 20, 21 and 22 . . . (London, 1823); Narrative of a second expedition to the shores of the polar sea, in the years 1825, 1826 and 1827 . . . (London, 1828). HBRS, I (Rich), 205–61, 313–14. Richard King, Narrative of a journey to the shores of the Arctic Ocean, in 1833, 1834, and 1835, under the command of Capt. Back (2v., London, 1836).

The author also had access to manuscripts in the possession of Mrs Cell (Hopton Hall, Wirksworth, Derbyshire, Eng.), letters from John Franklin to John Richardson, 1823–24.

BADDELEY, FREDERICK HENRY, soldier and geologist; b. in London, England, 4 Dec. 1794; d. at Havre des Pas, Island of Jersey, 4 May 1879.

Frederick Henry Baddeley was commissioned 2nd lieutenant in the Royal Engineers from the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, England, on 1 Jan. 1814. He served in Europe during the Napoleonic wars and was present at the capture of Paris in 1815. He was in the West Indies from 1817 to 1819, and in 1821 was posted to Quebec in Lower Canada. On 9 March 1822 he married Susan Green; the first six of their seven children were born at Quebec, and the last in Madras, India.

Baddeley was one of the original members of the Literary and Historical Society of Quebec in 1824 and served as its president in 1829. He read numerous papers before the society describing exploring expeditions he undertook in Canada and giving his observations on the geology of the country. In 1827 he reported to Colonel Elias Walker Durnford*, the commanding officer of the Royal Engineers at Quebec, on a possible "extensive formation of limestone" on the Rivière Saint-Maurice suitable for quarrying, and in that year was chosen a member of an exploring expedition in the area of the "King's Posts," lying north of Quebec and including the head waters of the Saguenay and Lac Saint-Jean. While Joseph Bouchette* led one party up the Rivière Saint-Maurice, Baddeley accompanied Andrew Stuart*, chief commissioner of the expedition, and Joseph Hamel to Tadoussac and up the Saguenay before exploring the shores of Lac Saint-Jean and then the area behind Baie-Saint-Paul. Baddeley's attention was focussed mainly on "mineralogical inquiries," but he also reported extensively on the area around Baie-Saint-Paul and its suitability for settlement.

In 1831 Baddeley explored the Îles de la Madeleine "for the purpose of reporting on the resources, localities, capabilities . . . ," as well as on the military significance of the area. Although he stayed only five days he presented an exhaustive paper on the islands to the Literary and Historical Society of Quebec. Two years later he again joined Hamel in exploring the interior of the Gaspé peninsula.

Baddeley was promoted captain on 25 June 1835, shortly after being chosen to accompany John Carthew on an expedition to explore the country north of the dividing line between the Home and Newcastle districts in Upper Canada, towards Lake Nipissing, and to report on the natural features of the area and its capacity to support settlement. On this venture into the Muskoka district, which he described as "slightly dangerous," Baddeley went primarily as a geologist, but his report is also of interest to naturalists and historians. He returned to Quebec but in 1837 he was posted to Kingston, Upper Canada. He was also appointed in that year a commissioner, along with John Macaulay* and John Solomon Cartwright*, to superintend a survey for a useful link by water between the Ottawa River and Lake Huron. He was troubled from the outset of the project; he resigned at one point because he felt that his other duties would not leave him sufficient time to carry out the functions of commissioner, but he later withdrew his resignation. He was unhappy too with the choice of David Thompson*, the first white man to descend the Columbia River, to lead one of the survey's three exploring parties, claiming that "there are rumours about that Mr. T. is not trustworthy as to reporting of facts" and that "he would please me better if he had a more humble opinion of his woodland lore."

Baddeley was transferred to Toronto in late 1837, and the aftermath of the rebellion of that year led him to inquire into the defences of the colony. For much of the next two years he reported on the protection afforded to such places as Cornwall, Kingston, and the southwestern peninsula. He was commanding royal engineer at Toronto when, in September 1839, he sailed for England and brought his Canadian career to an end.

Baddeley lived for some time in Glasgow before going to serve in Ceylon in 1842. He was posted in New South Wales from 1849 to 1851 and in New Zealand from 1853 to 1856. He was promoted major in 1846 and major-general in 1856 when he retired and returned to England. His last years were spent in Jersey. He had been a member of the British Association for the Advancement of Science and the Société géologique de France.

The geology of much of southeastern Canada was first studied extensively by British military officers. Baddeley, a well-trained and meticulous observer as well as an ambitious man, was one of the pioneers, and the value of his work was recognized by later geologists such as William Edmond Logan. Richard Henry Bonnycastle* considered him the "most active and best geologist then in Canada."

Henri Pilon

F. H. Baddeley was the author of the following papers in the Lit. and Hist. Soc. of Quebec Trans.: "Additional notes on the geognosy of Saint Paul's Bay," II (1830), 76–94; "An essay on the localities of metallic minerals in the Canadas, with some notices of their geological associations and situation . . . ," II (1830), 332–426; "A geological sketch of the most southeastern portion of Lower Canada," III (1833), 271–81; "Geology of a portion of the Labrador coast," I (1824–29), 71–79; "On the geognosy of a part of the Saguenay country," I (1824–29), 79–166; "On the Magdalen Islands, being the substance of four reports," III (1833), 128–90. He was also author of "Discovery of gold in Lower Canada" and "Waterline made from the rock of Quebec," American Journal of Science (New Haven, Conn.), XXVIII (1835), 111–14, and "On the geology and mineralogy of Canada," British Association for the Advancement of Science, Report, X (1840), Notices and abstracts . . . , 114–15.

PAC, MG 24, F53 (Sir William Henry Clinton collection); RG 1, L3^{L}, 27, 14767–984; RG 4, B48; RG 8, I, A1, 370, 441–47, 601, 612–14, 1406. PAO, Macaulay family papers, 1837; Misc. 1835, F. H. Baddeley, "Exploring report in Upper Canada in 1835 (north west of the Matchedash, in the direction of the French River)" (printed in Upper Canada, House of Assembly, Appendix to journal, 1836–37, app.37, "Report of Lieut. Baddeley, R.E. . . . ," pp.8–42). PRO, WO 25/3913. R. H. Bonnycastle, The Canadas in 1841 (2v., London, 1842), I, 58; II, 18–19, 149–50, 319. Lower Canada, House of Assembly, Journal, 1828–29, app.V, "Report of the commissioners for exploring the Saguenay." Muskoka and Haliburton (Murray). The centenary volume of the Literary and Historical Society of Quebec, 1824–1924, ed. Henry Ievers (Quebec, 1924), 18, 96, 104–5. Christie, History of Lower Canada, III, 202–5.

BAGG, STANLEY CLARK, notary, large landowner, justice of the peace, president of the Numismatic and Antiquarian Society of Montreal and of the English Workingmen's Benefit Society; b. 23 Dec. 1820 at Montreal, only son of Stanley Bagg*, an important businessman, and of Mary Ann Clark; d. 8 Aug. 1873 in his birth-place.

The Bagg family claimed to be of Norman descent. At the end of the 18th century Stanley Clark's grandfather emigrated from England to America. At his death he left large estates in Durham County, England, to his son Stanley. The latter then launched out into business and took part in the political life of Lower Canada; he was one of the principal figures in the Montreal West election of 1832 [see MONDELET].

Stanley Clark Bagg began his studies under the direction of a Church of England minister, and completed them at McGill University. He became a notary on 31 May 1842, and carried on his profession for 14 years; then, following the death of his father, gave it up to devote himself to managing his property. He was at that time the largest landowner on Montreal Island after the Sulpicians. He was to give the town the land necessary for the building of several streets and squares.

A die-hard Conservative, Bagg was a close friend of John Alexander Macdonald*. He refused to run for parliament but none the less worked for the party. During the insurrection of 1837 he had shown his loyalty to the crown by enlisting as a standard-bearer, and he took part in the battle of Saint-Eustache. The fact that he was chosen to fill the post of justice of the peace for the district of Montreal in 1859 is evidence of his capability, and of the respect in which he was held by the civil authorities. In the following year he took an active part in Montreal's reception of the Prince of Wales, on the occasion of the opening of Victoria Bridge [see HODGES]. In January 1865 a deputation of seven representatives, from each district of the town of Montreal, asked him to stand as a candidate for the mayoralty, but he refused, since he was more concerned with various philanthropic projects and with the cultural progress of his fellow-citizens.

Stanley Clark Bagg was interested primarily in numismatics and archaeology. Adélard-Joseph Boucher*, Joseph-Amable Manseau, and he met at the houses of one or the other to discuss their favourite occupation and to share their discoveries. From these small gatherings grew the idea of a society. The Numismatic Society of Montreal, already with 20 members, was in actual fact founded on 9 Dec. 1862. The object of the new association was to study numismatics and to set up both a collection of medals and coins and a library. In 1866 it became the Numismatic and Antiquarian Society of Montreal, giving an important place to the study of archaeology. In 1872 the society started a journal, entitled Canadian Antiquarian and Numismatic Journal, which was intended to make its principles and its activities more widely known. The society's main task was, however, to establish a museum of Canadian archaeology and numismatics in the building known as the Château de Ramezay, whose construction went back to the year 1705. Bagg was president of the society in 1866–67.

Being anxious to share his knowledge with his fellow-citizens, Bagg published numerous scientific articles in the local newspapers. The English and American press also published his research, which they considered to be of great value. Among his principal writings may be mentioned: Notes on coins . . . (1863), Coins and medals as aids to the study and verification of holy writ (1863), A chronological numismatic compendium of the twelve Caesars . . . (1864), Archæologia Americana (1864), Canadian archaeology (1864), and a lecture, The antiquities and legends of Durham . . . (1866). His insatiable liking for new discoveries, his spirit of initiative, and the need to exchange his knowledge with other scholars, led Bagg to join various local or international scientific associations, and to remain in contact with foreign researchers. He became a life member of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, the Natural History Society of Montreal, the Mechanics' Institute, and numismatic societies in London and Philadelphia. He was in addition a corresponding member of the Wisconsin State Historical Society.

Stanley Clark Bagg also took an interest in several philanthropic organizations. He was one of the founders of the English Workingmen's Benefit Society, and its first president. This benevolent society rendered inestimable service to hundreds of families who were forced to have recourse to it. A life member of the Young Men's Christian Association, founded in 1851 at Montreal, Bagg also accepted the responsibilities of the vice-presidency of the Montreal dispensary and the office of governor of the Protestant House of Industry and Refuge. Furthermore, he was the author of a number of hymns composed specially for Christmas, Good Friday, Easter, and Ascension Day.

In 1844 Stanley Clark Bagg had married Catharine, eldest daughter of Robert Mitcheson and Frances MacGregor, who was descended from the chief of the MacGregor clan and the old Scottish kings. They had one son, Robert Stanley*. Stanley Clark Bagg died on 8 Aug. 1873 at the family manor-house, Fairmount. His family was one of the oldest English families on Montreal Island, and one of those whose members were prominent in social, financial, religious, and intellectual circles. Stanley Clark Bagg was a worthy representative of what one might call the Anglo-Saxon "establishment" of Montreal. The names of Clark, Bagg, and Fairmount streets were chosen by the municipality of Montreal in his honour.

Pierre Landry

S. C. Bagg, The antiquities and legends of Durham, a lecture before the Numismatic and Antiquarian Society (Montreal, 1866); Archæologia Americana (Montreal, 1864); Canadian archaeology (Montreal, 1864); A chronological numismatic compendium of the twelve Caesars, and a summary of remarkable events from the birth of Julius Caesar, B.C. 100, to the death of Saint John the Evangelist, A.D. 100 (Montreal, 1864); Coins and medals as aids to the study and verification of holy writ (Montreal, 1863); Notes on coins: being the first paper read before the Numismatic Society of Montreal (Montreal, 1863).

AJM, Greffe de Stanley Clark Bagg, 1842–1856. Can. biog. dict., II, 43–45. Morgan, Bibliotheca Canadensis, 15. Atherton, Montreal, III, 406–10. Borthwick, Montreal, 42. Lareau, Hist. de la littérature canadienne, 352–53. Toponymie (Service d'urbanisme de la ville de Montréal, Bulletin d'information, no.4, [Montréal], 1966), 35. "In Memoriam, Stanley Clark Bagg, esq., J.P., F.N.S.," Canadian Antiquarian and Numismatic J., II, no.1 (1873), 73–78. Victor Morin, "Clubs et sociétés notoires d'autrefois," Cahiers des Dix, XIV (1949), 212–13. Léon Trépanier, "L'historique de nos noms de rues," La Patrie (Montréal), 22 mai 1949.

BAPTIST, GEORGE, logging contractor; b. 7 Jan. 1808 at Coldstream, a small town in Berwickshire, Scotland; d. 11 May 1875 at Trois-Rivières, Quebec.

Nothing specific is known about George Baptist's childhood and adolescence. In 1832 he emigrated to Canada, and first went to live near Lake Etchemin (Dorchester County, Quebec); he was employed in the sawmills of Sir John Caldwell* and acquired valuable experience for his future career. In 1834 he was at Pointe de Lévy, where he worked in the flour-mills. He apparently combined this occupation with the management of a similar mill on the Rivière Jacques-Cartier (Portneuf County). These activities did not in the end take him away from the logging business, since in 1846 he bought the sawmill on the Rivière Cachée, in the Saint-Maurice region; this mill had lain abandoned for two years following the death of its owner, the assemblyman Edward Greives*.

By the time George Baptist settled in the Saint-Maurice region, several inventories of its economic resources had already been made. In 1829, as a result of the preliminary inquiry by Joseph Bouchette* in 1828, the government of Lower Canada had entrusted to Lieutenant F. L. Ingall the mission "of exploring more thoroughly a certain part of the province between the Saint-Maurice and Ottawa Rivers that was still barren and uncultivated." Ingall stressed in his report that the rocky, sandy soil of the Saint-Maurice area was not suitable for agriculture; the forests, however, were rich in red and white pine, although spruce was the most common.

Ingall's team had noticed logs floating on the Rivière Bostonnais; already, in this period, men were cutting down trees on the upper Saint-Maurice. It is probable that the owners of the ironworks claimed exclusive rights for themselves, particularly on the Saint-Étienne fief. The fruitless petitions of Peter Patterson* (1831) and John Thompson (1836) to obtain cutting rights on these lands are suggestive in that respect. This situation forced less wealthy entrepreneurs to go higher up the river, and delayed the real exploitation of the enormous lumber potential of the Saint-Maurice basin. Furthermore, the Saint-Maurice appeared to be a "detestable timber route": its difficult course became unnavigable between Les Piles and Shawinigan, where it was interrupted by numerous falls.

Government action for the purpose of harnessing the Saint-Maurice became apparent only towards the end of the 1840s. During this period the Quebec economy was marked by a flow of capital into logging operations. The government, spurred on by the action of the contractors, ordered a systematic survey to be made of the Saint-Maurice region in 1847–48; in 1851 it started on the construction of slides and booms; finally, in 1852, the commission headed by Étienne Parent proposed a policy of making grants of crown lands. This clearing of the way made it possible for Trois-Rivières to emerge from the lethargy that had beset it since the end of its fur-trading era, and to share once more in economic growth, which was now symbolized by lumber camps, cribs, and sawmills.

It is in these changes in economic structure, which began to take shape at the dawn of the second half of the 19th century, that the origin of the formation of the "brotherhood of the Saint-Maurice barons" is to be found. The Gilmours, Halls, Studders, Norcrosses, Philippses, and Baptists were its principal representatives. Baptist was going to compete seriously with these logging entrepreneurs. Georges Gouin, one of the rare French Canadians operating in this sector on a commercial basis, had great difficulty in surviving; according to him the Baptist undertaking was the cause of his disappointments, since it controlled "almost all the Saint-Maurice, now that Norcross, Hall [George Benson HALL] and the others have gone bankrupt or have withdrawn."

In 1847 George Baptist built a mill at Les Grès. His employees came to live in progressively greater numbers in the neighbourhood of the establishment; this led to the formation of the parish of Saint-Étienne-des-Grès in 1859. Ten years later the notary Petrus Hubert*, when describing George Baptist's holdings (sometimes called the "domain of Les Grès"), enumerated a mill, houses, stables for horses, shops, sheds, and other outbuildings; the estate stretched the length of lots 42 to 47 inclusive, which were situated in the first range of the township of Saint-Maurice. Baptist also owned, in the same range and in the same township, lots 34, 35, and 36 on the Gabelle, plus the south-east half of lot 62. It was probably on these lots that he constructed a "dalle" which allowed his logs to bypass the falls on the Gabelle and continue their journey towards Trois-Rivières and Quebec in cribs. Pierre Dupin estimated that in 1852 the mill's production was "25,730 logs for which he [Dupin] paid $2,124.00, a little more than nine cents a log." Although this estimate did not take into account all the production costs, Baptist none the less had a comfortable profit margin.

George Baptist, like the bourgeois of this period, thought that profits must increase. For a year he had been the owner of part of the Île Saint-Christophe, and as early as 1854 he considered constructing a second mill at Trois-Rivières itself. This desire did not take concrete form until 1866, when he built a magnificent one on the Île de la Potherie. This modern mill, worked by steam and fitted with circular saws, contrasted with that at Les Grès; there, the energy produced by a paddle-wheel was transmitted to the alternating saws, which were mounted on crank-arms. Finally, the purchase of the steamboat Arthur completed the new equipment. The site of this mill was exceptional; not only was its builder the exclusive owner of the Île de la Potherie, which was situated at the mouth of the Saint-Maurice River, but he also owned two stretches of land on either side of the river. The site offered the advantage of reducing costs of transportation and maintenance, since boats took on their cargoes of lumber practically at the doors of the mill. This strategic position, added to a technical innovation, influenced the production of the mill and conferred on the Baptist firm a prime place among the "brotherhood of the barons."

The governing body is the cornerstone of an undertaking of this type. When he started in the Saint-Maurice region, Baptist collaborated with Thomas and John Gordon; soon the latter withdrew from the company. In 1853, at least, Baptist and Thomas Gordon were partners under the name of George Baptist and Company. For some time Baptist directed affairs alone, before becoming president, in 1869, of a new company. By the provisions of the latter, the father held half the shares of the firm of George Baptist and Sons; his two sons, Alexander* and John, owned a quarter each. Following Alexander's defection in 1875, a new company, George Baptist, Son and Company, was formed, and James Dean, George's son-in-law, joined it. In addition to the directors were the managers; the elder son, Alexander, was manager at the lumber camps, and his brother John at the mill at Les Grès. Finally foremen and workers are essential to the smooth running of an undertaking, at the mill and on the farms as well as in the lumber camps. John Skroeder, for instance, was a foreman who hired 30 individuals, on condition that they complied "with any order given to them on behalf of their Foreman or other persons acting for the said George Baptist." These indentured employees were to receive "eight dollars a month"; any absence from the place of work would result in the deduction of "one dollar a day" from the monthly pay. These men, whose task was not specified, were certainly paid for their work in the lumber camps.

Every autumn, Baptist hired teams of voyageurs for the job of tree-felling during the winter months. The farms at the Matawin and Rat rivers, which were at the rear of the Baptist empire, were specifically detailed to provide the lumber camps with supplies. The cuts carried out on his limits were the chief source of supply for his two mills. But in addition, every autumn, George or Alexander Baptist signed "logging contracts" with small lumbermen (these were a kind of sub-contractor), who undertook to provide in the spring, from their own timber limits, a cargo of logs cut to such and such a length, width, etc.

In 1869, perhaps for health reasons, George Baptist expressed the desire to give up the business gradually, and he allotted himself ten years before he finally retired. He died on 11 May 1875. The long obituary notice Le Constitutionnel devoted to him stressed that "For several years, Mr Baptist has been manufacturing about 25 to 30 million feet of lumber per year." This production was thought to result from the exploitation of vast stretches of territory in the Saint-Maurice region. "Mr Baptist," wrote the journalist, "possessed about 2,000 miles of the best territory in the Saint-Maurice area. In a period when every one believed that timber limits were worthless, he only had to choose; these limits, obtained for nothing or next to nothing, are worth today at least half a million."

These figures, which would require checking, nevertheless give an insight into Baptist's financial position. In 1869, he himself estimated his share in the company of George Baptist and Sons at $200,000; but Alexander, who held only a quarter of the shares, sold them in 1875 for the sum of $150,000. The amounts are no more than suggestive. Besides his capital equipment, George Baptist, Son and Company shares, and his properties on Rue Boulevard and Rue Bonaventure, George Baptist bequeathed to his heirs shares worth $34,550. It was divided up as follows: Bank of Montreal, 131 shares at $200 each; Montreal branch of the Ontario Bank, 125 shares at $40; Dominion Telegraph of Toronto, 5 shares at $50; Eastern Townships Bank, Sherbrooke, 62 shares at $50. This list, which shows how diversified his portfolio was, in addition to his stupendous capitalist organization, is symptomatic of the qualities of George Baptist the industrialist.

In 1873, shortly before Baptist's death, the mill at Les Grès was swept away when the Saint-Maurice flooded, but it was immediately rebuilt, and kept in operation until 1883. The Union Bag and Paper Company purchased it at the beginning of the 20th century, and in 1922 the Shawinigan Water and Power Company became its owner. As for the mill on the Île de la Potherie, it was sold to the Wayagamack Pulp and Paper Company by George Baptist's descendants.

The industrial empire created by Baptist in the Saint-Maurice region, the success he enjoyed, his sense of organization and spirit of competition made of him one of the outstanding examples of the bourgeois class of Trois-Rivières. To any definition one might attempt of this bourgeoisie, the extension of the Baptist family connections adds a further element. Indeed, of Baptist's marriage with Isabella Cockburn, solemnized at Pointe de Lévy in 1834, were born three boys, and five girls who all married businessmen. Phillis married a Quebec merchant, James Dean; Isabella, George Baillie Houliston, a lawyer of Trois-Rivières, a banker, and a broker; Margaret, William Charles Pentland, an accountant of Trois-Rivières; Jane, Robert Mackay*, a Montreal merchant. Finally, the most important union was that of Helen Oliver Baptist and Thomas McDougall, since in this way relations were established between two distinguished families of the Saint-Maurice region, one engaged in the lumber business, and the other in metallurgy.

Georges Massey

AJTR, Greffe de Petrus Hubert, timber contract between Duncan McDonald and George Baptist, 26 Sept. 1862; deed of partnership between George Baptist and his sons Alexander and John Baptist, 15 Nov. 1869; will of George Baptist, 17 Nov. 1869; will of Isabella Cockburn, wife of George Baptist, 17 Nov. 1869; summary statement and rendering of account by Isabella Cockburn, 6 Sept. 1875; Greffe de F.-L. Lottinville, bill of sale between Georges Badeaux and John Gilmour, 6 Oct. 1852; bill of sale between Georges Badeaux and Baptist and Gordon, 31 Dec. 1853; déclaration de Georges Badeaux à George Baptist, 14 déc. 1855; Registre d'état civil, St Andrews Presbyterian Church, 1846–75. ASTR, Papiers Mgr Albert Tessier, contrat d'engagement, 15 oct. 1858.

Le Constitutionnel (Trois-Rivières, Qué.), 19 mai 1875. Cyclopædia of Can. biog. (Rose, 1888), 771. Raoul Blanchard, Le centre du Canada français; province de Québec (Publ. de l'Institut scientifique franco-canadien, 3, Montréal, 1947). Pierre Dupin, Anciens chantiers du Saint-Maurice (Pages trifluviennes, sér. B, 7, Trois-Rivières, Qué., 1935). Storied Quebec (Wood et al.), V, 809–10. Sylvain [Auguste Panneton], Horizons mauriciens (Trois-Rivières, Qué., 1962); Par les chemins qui marchent (Trois-Rivières, Qué., 1965). Albert Tessier, Les forges Saint-Maurice, 1729–1883 (Coll. L'histoire régionale, 10, Trois-Rivières, Qué., 1952); Trois-Rivières, 1535–1935; quatre siècles d'histoire (2e éd., [Trois-Rivières, Qué.], 1935).

BARBER, GEORGE ANTHONY, educator, auditor, and sportsman; b. in 1802 at Hitchin, Hertfordshire, England; d. on 20 Oct. 1874, at Toronto.

Almost the only certain piece of evidence on George Anthony Barber's early life in England is an entry in the Hitchin baptismal register for 1803: "May 18th George Anthony, son of Anna Barber, illegitimate." If he attended Oxford briefly, as his obituaries state, he did not matriculate. Presumably he acquired some training as a teacher, perhaps at London, and he assisted the Reverend Thomas Phillips* for three years at a private school possibly at Whitchurch in Herefordshire, before coming to Canada in 1826 as assistant to Phillips at the Home District grammar school in York (Toronto). Barber married Lucinda Shortiss (b. c. 1811; d. 23 Jan. 1893) before 1829 and they had several children.

When Upper Canada College was formed in 1829, both Phillips and Barber joined the staff. Barber was the writing master and his duties included instruction in English and arithmetic. He was a popular teacher; the college records describe him as "a great character with much charm of manner but also a little pomposity." He also became collector of the college whose finances were interconnected with those of King's College (University of Toronto); he was therefore drawn into the scandal involving Colonel Joseph Wells* in 1839, was forced to put up £1,500 to cover shortages in the college accounts, resigned the collectorship, and was dismissed as writing master. The basic cause seems to have been poor accounting practices at both the college and the university; Barber admitted to "not having kept a set of books during any part of the time I held the office of college collector." The whole affair, however, which involved such prominent people as Bishop John Strachan* and Allan MacNab*, remains somewhat obscure.

Barber began three new careers at about this time. While still at Upper Canada College he had established a public auditing business which he continued for the rest of his life. After 1840 he was also auditor to the city of Toronto; in 1873 the junior auditor tried to oust him when he was ill and an uproar resulted. In addition, a group of anti-Sydenham [Thomson*] interests, who favoured the old Family Compact toryism, hired him by 1841 as editor of the Toronto Commercial Herald (later Toronto Herald and Herald). He became its proprietor and operated the paper until it ceased publication on 30 June 1848.

In 1844 Barber's third concurrent vocation began when he was appointed first superintendent of common (public) schools for Toronto. After a board of education was established for the entire city in 1847 he continued as superintendent and also became the board's secretary. Initially Barber faced an acute lack of funds and in both 1848 and 1849 the schools were closed for six months. With the establishment of an elected board in 1850 conditions improved, and eight schools were built in the mid-1850s. His term of office saw the beginning of the practice of saying regular prayers in schools in 1854 and the establishment of evening schools in 1855 and school libraries in 1857. Except for the calendar years 1852 and 1853, Barber held the superintendentship until 1858, when he resigned because he believed it was illogical to combine compulsory assessment with voluntary attendance. He felt that the cost of providing free schools on this basis was not justified by the low attendance. He continued as secretary of the board of education until his death in 1874 and, in 1859, prepared a 131-page Report of the past history, and present condition, of the common or public schools of the city of Toronto.

Barber had a great interest in sports; he was extremely knowledgeable in sporting history and devoted many of the Commercial Herald editorials to the subject. He was particularly interested in cricket. Soon after coming to Canada he organized the game among his pupils and later acted as coach of the Upper Canada College teams for many years. He helped establish the Toronto Cricket Club in 1832 and became well known as "the Father of Canadian Cricket." He was also a founder and first secretary of the St George's Society in 1835. In politics he was a Conservative, in religion an Anglican. He attended St Stephen-in-the-Fields in his latter years and was buried in St James' Cemetery.

FREDERICK H. ARMSTRONG

Hertfordshire County Record Office (Hertford, Eng.), Hitchin parish baptismal register, 18 May 1803. PAC, RG 5, A1, 94, pp.52157–62. Final report of the commissioners of inquiry into the affairs of King's College University, and Upper Canada College (Quebec, 1852), 360. Report of the past history, and present condition, of the common or public schools of the city of Toronto (Toronto, 1859). Toronto City Council, Appendix to minutes, 1873, nos.126, 161, 167, 208; Minutes of proceedings, 1874, 215, 224–25. Upper Canada, House of Assembly, Appendix to journal, 1839–40, 349–90. J. of Education for Ont., XXVIII (April 1875), 59. Mail (Toronto), 21, 24 Oct. 1874.

Early Toronto newspapers, 1793–1867: a catalogue of newspapers published in the town of York and city of Toronto from the beginning to confederation, ed. E. G. Firth (Toronto, 1961), 13. J. R. Robertson, Landmarks of Canada, a guide to the J. Ross Robertson Historical Collection in the Public Reference Library, Toronto, Canada (Toronto, 1917), 560. The roll of pupils of Upper Canada College, Toronto, January, 1830, to June, 1916, ed. A. H. Young (Kingston, Ont., 1917), 44, 96–97. Centennial story, the board of education for the city of Toronto 1850–1950, ed. H. M. Cochrane (Toronto, 1950), 16–24, 30–31, 38–40, 112. J. G. Hodgins, The establishment of schools and colleges in Ontario, 1792–1910 (3v., Toronto, 1910), I. Scadding, Toronto of old.

BARRY, JOHN ALEXANDER, merchant and politician; b. c. 1790 at Shelburne, N.S.; d. 1872 at La Have, N.S.

John Alexander Barry was the son of Mary Jessop and Robert Barry, an early loyalist who came to Shelburne in 1773. Barry's first wife, by whom he had one son and four daughters, was Mary, daughter of the Reverend William Black*, a noted Methodist minister. After her death in 1833, Barry was married twice more: to Eliza J. Mercier, by whom he is thought to have had one son, and to Sophia Pernette.

For a brief time in 1829, while serving as a member of the assembly for the township of Shelburne, Barry was a popular hero and the most talked-of Nova Scotian. After he had intimated that a fellow assemblyman, Colonel Joseph Freeman, had engaged in smuggling, Barry refused to submit to the assembly's orders to retract and pursued a course so impetuous and uncompromising that eventually he was expelled as a member and imprisoned by order of the assembly for the rest of the session. When the assembly reprimanded the editors of the Acadian Recorder and the Free Press of Halifax for affording Barry an opportunity to defend himself, Joseph Howe warned that "if Editors are brought for offences to the Bar of the House, Legislators may depend upon this – that they will be brought, individually and collectively, to a bitter expiation before the bar of the public."

Sympathy for Barry and the unpopularity of the assembly led to a number of assemblymen being "hooted and hissed along the streets, pelted with snow, mud, stones and other missiles, and assailed by every opprobrious expression that could be vented by a heedless and unthinking rabble." The assembly quickly reasserted its authority, but the "Barry riots" became part of the folklore of the province. Upon his release Barry did extensive research in the Journals of the British House of Commons and published 25 letters in the Acadian Recorder seeking to demonstrate that British precedents could justify neither his imprisonment nor his expulsion.

Having taken the Tory side in the celebrated "Brandy Dispute" of 1830 [see Collins], Barry failed in his subsequent attempts to be elected to the legislature. Thereafter he gained public attention only through his lectures, principally to Halifax audiences, on the customs, artifacts, and chiefs of the Micmac and other North American Indians. In this capacity he aroused none of the excitement of 1829.

J. Murray Beck

Acadian Recorder (Halifax), 1829–30. Novascotian (Halifax), 1829–30. J. M. Beck, "Privileges and powers of the Nova Scotia House of Assembly," Dal. Rev., XXXV (1955–56), 351–61. George Cox, "John Alexander Barry and his times," N.S. Hist. Soc. Coll., XXVIII (1949), 133–46.

BAUDRY. See Beaudry

BEAUBIEN, JOSEPH-OCTAVE, doctor and politician; b. 22 March 1824 at Nicolet, L.C., son of Louis Beaubien and Élizabeth Manseau; d. 7 Nov. 1877 at Montmagny.

The Beaubien family, like the Pomberts and La Bissonnières, descended from Jules Trottier, who was born in 1590 in the little town of Igé in Perche (France) and who emigrated to New France about 1650. Joseph-Octave Beaubien was educated at the college of Nicolet, then went for a year to Rochester, U.S.A., to study English. When he returned to Canada, he decided to take up medicine, and studied in turn under two distinguished doctors, William Marsden* and Jean-Étienne Landry. He qualified as a doctor in 1847 and went to live first at Sainte-Élisabeth, then at Montmagny, on the invitation of his uncle, the parish priest Jean-Louis Beaubien. On 24 July 1849, at Cap-Saint-Ignace, he married Catherine-Élisabeth-Aglaé Chenet, daughter of Antoine Chenet, notary and seigneur of Vincelotte.

Joseph-Octave Beaubien soon embarked on a fairly long political career. In 1857 he was elected a Conservative member of the assembly for Montmagny County, and having been re-elected in 1861 and 1863, he sat in the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Canada until confederation. In 1867 he was elected federal member of parliament for Montmagny County by acclamation, and sat in the House of Commons until defeated in 1872. From 15 July 1867 to 23 Feb. 1873 he formed part of the cabinet of Pierre-Joseph-Olivier Chauveau* in the province of Quebec, as commissioner for crown lands. In addition, on 2 Nov. 1867 he was appointed to the Legislative Council, where he represented the division of La Durantaye until 1877. As a minister, Joseph-Octave Beaubien introduced a number of bills, among them one concerning the sale and administration of public lands, and others amending the gold mines act, the law on surveys, and those on colonization. However, his administration was violently criticized in the house by the opposition. During the sessions of 1872 and 1873, mps Henri-Gustave Joly* de Lotbinière and Pierre-Alexis Tremblay endeavoured to prove that important concessions had been made to persons who were in no way involved in the timber trade, and called, in vain, for a commission of inquiry on this subject.

Joseph-Octave Beaubien had a veritable passion for agriculture. Having become co-owner of the seigneury of Vincelotte, he developed magnificent farms at Montmagny and Cap-Saint-Ignace; he was also a member of the agriculture council of the province of Quebec, which replaced the Board of Agriculture in 1868. He was lieutenant-colonel of the 61st Battalion of the Montmagny and l'Islet militia, and from February 1873 was one of the directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

He died at Montmagny on 7 Nov. 1877, leaving two children: a son who died without issue, and Caroline-Alix who married Jules-Joseph-Taschereau Frémont*, lawyer, professor of law at Université Laval, and MP for the county of Quebec in the House of Commons.

CLAUDE VACHON

AJTR, Registre d'état civil. Archives judiciaires de Montmagny (Qué.), Registre d'état civil. Quebec, Legislative Council, Journals, 1867–77. Le Courrier du Canada (Québec), 15 juill., 3 nov., 1867. Journal de Québec, 23 nov. 1872; 8 déc.–13 déc. 1873. La Minerve (Montréal), 20 juill., 3 nov. 1867; 8 nov. 1877. Le Nouveau Monde (Montréal), 8 nov. 1877. Le Pays (Montréal), 18 juill. 1867. Can. directory of parliament (Johnson), 27. Can. parl. comp., 1862; 1863; 1864; 1867; 1873; 1874. Desjardins, Guide parlementaire. Political appointments and judicial bench (N.-O. Coté). P.-G. Roy. La famille Boisseau (Lévis, Qué., 1907). Rumilly, Hist. de la prov. de Québec, I. "Mémorial nécrologique; l'hon. Joseph-Octave Beaubien," La Gazette des familles acadiennes et canadiennes (Québec), III (1876–77), 362–63.

BEAUDRY (Baudry), JOSEPH-UBALDE, jurist, codifier of laws, and author; b. 15 May 1816 at Montreal, son of Louis Beaudry (Baudry) and Félicité Dubreuil; d. 11 Jan. 1876 at Montreal.

Joseph-Ubalde Beaudry received his classical education at the college of Montreal, where he excelled in languages and the exact sciences. He even defended a thesis on the theories of Euclid. As a clerk – it was before the institution of the faculties of law – in the office of Côme-Séraphin Cherrier*, one of the great figures of the bar at that time, he received his lawyer's commission in March 1838. He practised for some time at Montreal, but it was not long before he entered judicial administration.

First a clerk of the Court of Requests at Saint-Hyacinthe, Beaudry then returned to Montreal, where he served on the city council for three years as a councillor, from 1847 to 1849, and as an alderman, in 1850. During this period of serious epidemics he advocated various measures for improving sanitation. In 1850 he became clerk of the Court of Appeal, and five years later added to this office that of clerk of the Seigneurial Court, presided over by Sir Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine*. This court concerned itself with changing the system of land tenure in Lower Canada. In 1859 Beaudry was appointed joint clerk of the commission for the codification of laws, which had been created in 1857. This measure, made necessary by the diversity of sources from which laws were derived, had been championed by George-Étienne CARTIER. Three commissioners and two secretaries were to classify and coordinate the laws in force, then to submit their work to the judges and the government [see René-Édouard CARON]. After being a secretary for more than six years, Joseph-Ubalde Beaudry succeeded Judge Augustin-Norbert Morin*, who died in 1865, as a commissioner. His part was a notable one, and he is considered one of the principal drafters of the first edition of the Code de procédure civile du Bas-Canada. . . . He was an assistant judge in the Superior Court in December 1868, and was promoted titular judge, with jurisdiction over the district of Montreal, 12 months later. He dispensed justice there for eight years.

Joseph-Ubalde Beaudry was one of the founders, in 1869, of the Revue légale, and one of the compilers of the Lower Canada Reports/Décisions des tribunaux du Bas-Canada. His major work is probably his Code des curés, marguilliers et paroissiens, published in 1870 and considered to be the first real treatise on parish law in Quebec. A founding member in 1859 of the Société Historique de Montréal, which did so much at that time to unearth and make public documents, still scattered, relating to the past of Canadian institutions, Joseph-Ubalde Beaudry was vice-president at the time of his death. He was also on the Catholic school commission of Montreal, and gave strong guidance to the Académie Commerciale Catholique of Montreal, better known later as the École du Plateau. Finally, he had been one of the founders, in 1852, of the Institut National, later reconstituted as the Institut Canadien-Français. This society began as a split from the Institut Canadien of some 135 members who were opposed to political discussions within the walls of the institute; it was chiefly literary [see CASSIDY]. Joseph-Ubalde Beaudry drew up its constitution.

Judge Beaudry was carried off by pneumonia after a few days illness. He died on 11 Jan. 1876; nearly 2,000 persons assembled at the parish church of Notre-Dame de Montréal for the impressive funeral. His colleagues of the court, including the chief justice of the province, Sir Antoine-Aimé Dorion*, the judges Charles-Elzéar MONDELET, Joseph-Amable Berthelot*, Samuel Cornwallis Monk*, Vincislas-Paul-Wilfrid DORION, and Robert Mackay*, accompanied him to his last resting place on the Côte-des-Neiges.

In 1841, at Montreal, Joseph-Ubalde Beaudry had married Caroline Beaudry. He left two sons, one, Pierre-Janvier, who was a lawyer, a prothonotary of Beauharnois, and deputy clerk of the privy council of Canada, and another, his namesake, who was a civil engineer.

JEAN-JACQUES LEFEBVRE

J.-U. Beaudry, Code des curés, marguilliers et paroissiens accompagné de notes historiques et critiques (Montréal, 1870).

AJM, Registre d'état civil. PAC, MG 30, D62 (Audet papers), 3, pp.611–12. La Minerve (Montréal), 12 janv. 1876. P.-G. Roy, Les juges de la province de Québec, 37. Lareau, Hist. de la littérature canadienne, 411–17.

BEAULIEU, FRANÇOIS, chief of the Yellowknife tribe, Arctic guide, and interpreter; b. 1771, son of Jacques Beaulieu and an Indian woman of the Montagnais tribe; d. in November 1872 at Salt River, North-West Territories.

François Beaulieu, a Métis, grew up among the Indians of the far northwest. According to John Franklin* he was raised by the Dogribs, but this may be an error as Beaulieu was later the bitter enemy of that tribe. He was one of the party that accompanied Alexander Mackenzie* overland to the Pacific in 1793. He first met the noted Arctic explorer, John Franklin, at Fort Wedderburn in 1820, and advised him that what is now the Dease Arm of Great Bear Lake, which Beaulieu knew well, afforded the best base for his projected journey to the mouth of the Coppermine River. Problems of supply compelled Franklin to reject this advice, which, had it been adopted, might well have averted the hardship and loss of life which were to attend his first "journey to the shores of the polar sea" [see George BACK].

On his second expedition (1825–27), by way of the Mackenzie River, Franklin employed Beaulieu as guide and interpreter, set up base at Fort Franklin on the west side of Great Bear Lake in the autumn of 1825, and the following summer sent Dr John Richardson* and the mate E. N. Kendall* down the Mackenzie to map the coast eastward to the mouth of the Coppermine by boat. Richardson completed this commission too late in the season to return the way he had come. He therefore travelled overland, as prearranged, to the Dease Arm of Great Bear Lake, where Beaulieu met him and took the whole party to Fort Franklin by boat. No writer, French or English, has properly stressed Beaulieu's share in the planning and execution of this trip, the most successful boat journey made by naval personnel in the Canadian Arctic.

As a chief of the Yellowknife tribe, Beaulieu "became the terror" of Dogribs, Slaveys, and Sekanis; he is said to have killed 12 of the last group with his own hand. He lived the life of a "sultan" with three wives and other casual relationships. In his later years Beaulieu settled on the Salt River, a tributary of the Slave, with his family and some Indian followers. There he developed a trade in salt obtained from the river and was granted a monopoly by the Hudson's Bay Company with which he enjoyed great prestige.

In 1848 he was baptized by Father Alexandre-Antonin Taché*, whereupon he dismissed (with adequate provision) two of his wives, and lived "ever faithful" with the third. He was nearly 80 when he made this act of renunciation. The energetic old man was no passive communicant: he was precise in religious observances, generous in aiding the church, and exerted himself "to open the eyes of those Indians who had been led astray by the Protestant minister." He was still active as a hunter at the age of 85 and lived to be just over 100.

A son, Étienne Beaulieu, was guide to the American traveller, Warburton Pike*, in 1889, and his descendants still live in the Great Slave Lake area.

LESLIE H. NEATBY

John Franklin, Narrative of a journey to the shores of the polar sea in the years 1819, 20, 21 and 22 . . . (London, 1823); Narrative of a second expedition to the shores of the polar sea in the years 1825, 1826 and 1827: including an account of the progress of a detachment to the eastward, by John Richardson (London, 1828). [Alexander Mackenzie], First man west, Alexander Mackenzie's journal of his voyage to the Pacific coast of Canada in 1793, ed. Walter Sheppe (Montreal, 1962). Morice, Dict. hist. Can. et Métis. Joseph Tassé, Les Canadiens de l'Ouest (2^e éd., 2v., Montréal, 1878). Giraud, Le Métis canadien. É.-F.-S.-J. Petitot, En route pour la mer glaciale (Paris, 1887). Guy Blanchet, "Exploring with Sousi and Black Basile," Beaver, outfit 295 (autumn 1964), 34–41.

BEAUMONT, WILLIAM RAWLINS, surgeon; b. 1803 in Marylebone, London, England; d. 12 Oct. 1875 in Toronto.

William Rawlins Beaumont received his medical education at St Bartholomew's Hospital in London where he served as dresser to the distinguished surgeon, John Abernethy, whose teaching established the modern medical school in this ancient hospital. There Beaumont was a fellow-student of James Paget. He continued his training in Europe, studying for ten months in Paris under the anatomist Jean Amussat, who stimulated his interest in mechanical instruments. Returning to London, Beaumont commenced practice and was appointed a surgeon to the Islington Dispensary. He qualified as a member of the Royal College of Surgeons of England in 1826 and became a fellow of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London in 1836 and of the Royal College of Surgeons in 1844. Beaumont's hopes of receiving a commission in the Army Medical Service had been disappointed, and he came instead to Canada in 1841. He was already a highly competent surgeon when he established himself in Toronto in that year.

A faculty of medicine was established at King's College (later the University of Toronto) in 1843, and Beaumont was appointed professor of surgery by the chancellor, Governor General Sir Charles Bagot*; he became a member of the college council in 1848. He was also an attending physician and surgeon to the Toronto General Hospital, and in 1845 he was appointed to the Medical Board, the body responsible for the examination and licensing of candidates for medical practice in Canada West. The University of Toronto conferred a doctor of medicine on Beaumont in 1850. He was dean of the faculty of medicine at the university when the legislature abolished it in 1853, but continued clinical teaching at the Toronto General Hospital and became its consulting physician and surgeon when Christopher Widmer* died in 1858. In 1870 and 1871 he lectured on ophthalmic surgery at the Toronto School of Medicine, and was appointed professor of surgery at the University of Trinity College in 1871. He retired in 1873 and was made professor emeritus at Trinity College.

Beaumont established an outstanding reputation in Toronto as a teacher and a surgeon. After Widmer's death he was probably the doyen of the surgeons of Toronto. Younger surgeons sought his support and he was closely associated in his practice with James BOVELL and Edward Mulberry HODDER. Beaumont's published articles illustrate the broad scope of his practice and discuss such varied subjects as aneurism, ophthalmic surgery, and urology. He had particular skill in designing surgical instruments. One of these, designed for the passing of continuous sutures in deep-seated parts, is said to have embodied the concept later applied in the original Singer sewing machine.

Beaumont lost the sight of his left eye in 1865, but continued to practise until he became totally blind in 1873. He died in his home in Toronto on 12 Oct. 1875. Sir William Osler* recalled him as one who "by examplifying [sic] those graces of life and refinement of heart which make up character" contributed to "the leaven which has raised our profession above the dead level of business."

W. G. COSBIE

W. R. Beaumont, "Cases of operations for cataract, chiefly at the Toronto General Hospital," Upper Canada Journal of Medical, Surgical, and Physical Science (Toronto), I (1851–52), 329–32, 361–65, 407–11, 510–15; [ ], "A description of a new instrument for closing the vesico-vaginal and recto-vaginal fistulae, and fissures of the soft palate . . . ," Medico-Chirurgical Transactions (Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London), XXI (1838), 29–32; "Lithotrity," Canada Lancet (Toronto), III (1870–71), 35; [ ], "Rough notes of a clinical lecture, delivered by Dr Beaumont, F.R.C.S., London, and one of the surgeons to the Toronto General Hospital, on a case of false aneurism. Reported from memory," Upper Canada Journal of Medical, Surgical, and Physical Science (Toronto), III (1853–54), 251–58.

MTCL, typescript by J. H. Richardson, "Reminiscences of the medical profession in Toronto," 5–7. University of Toronto Archives, Office of the Chief Accountant financial records (117, King's College Council minute book, III, 1842–48). Canada Lancet (Toronto), VIII (1875–76), 92–93.

Canniff, Medical profession in Upper Canada, 183–96, 199, 204–6, 214, 242–45. C. K. Clarke, A history of the Toronto General Hospital, including an account of the medal of the Loyal and Patriotic Society of 1812 (Toronto, 1913), 52, 62, 81, 103. William Osler, Aequanimitas, with other addresses to medical students, nurses and practitioners of medicine (London, 1904), 175–76, 369. G. W. Spragge, "The Trinity Medical School," Ont. Hist., LVIII (1966), 63–98.

BEAVEN, JAMES, Church of England clergyman, theologian, and author; b. 9 July 1801 at Westbury, Wiltshire, England, second son of Samuel and Mary Beaven; d. 8 Nov. 1875, at Niagara, Ont.

James Beaven entered St Edmund Hall, Oxford, on 4 Nov. 1820. He received a BA in 1824 and an MA in 1827, and a BD and a DD in 1842. He was ordained deacon in 1825 and priest in 1826. His longest ministry in England was spent at Leigh in Staffordshire, and he was vicar of Welford in Northamptonshire when he received the appointment of professor of divinity at King's College in Toronto.

Beaven arrived in Toronto in February 1843. During his years at King's he was resident professor for a time and also had charge of chapel services. With the new professor ripples of the High Church Tractarian movement came to Toronto. It was observed that Beaven preached in the college chapel in the surplice and intoned the service, two usages not widely followed at that time. The frequent references in his writings to the desirability of improving the architecture and furnishing of churches illustrate his attention to another aspect of the revived churchmanship of the mid-19th century. King's College was officially closed in 1849 and Beaven was appointed in 1851 to the chair of metaphysics and ethics, first in the University of Toronto and then in University College. He resigned in 1871, lived for a brief time at Port Whitby where he was incumbent of the local church, and then moved to Niagara where he died.

James Beaven was prominent in church affairs. The scattered records of his life indicate that his interests lay in his church work rather than in the university, particularly after the secularization of King's College. He aided the building of churches at King and Oak Ridges, both north of Toronto, in the 1850s. From 1850 to 1868 he ministered to a congregation at Berkeley, and later, concurrently, to another at Chester (both of which are now part of the city of Toronto), and he built the first St John's, Norway, and the first St Barnabas'. He served the Church Society and the diocesan synod as chairman of the book and tract committee and of the church music committee. As chairman of the committee on canons he produced an important report in 1858.

From 1862 to 1873 Beaven was precentor of synod, in charge of music at synod services. In 1867 he was made a canon of St James' Cathedral. He was prolocutor or chairman of the lower house of the first four provincial synods of Canada, meeting in Montreal. Beaven, who favoured retaining the close connection between the Church of England in Canada and the mother church in England, chaired in 1865 a committee of the provincial synod which produced a memorial addressed to the convocations of Canterbury and York urging the calling of a general council of the Anglican communion. This event took place in 1867 with the assembling of the first Lambeth Conference.

James Beaven was the author of at least 16 publications. Three were sermons, one of which, remarkable for its ecumenical spirit, was preached to the synod of the diocese in 1859. He was an accomplished classical scholar and produced in 1853 a book of selections from Cicero. His Account of the life and writings of St Irenaeus and Elements of natural theology were both substantial volumes. His best known work is, however, Recreations of a long vacation, describing a diocesan tour in 1845 on which he accompanied Bishop John Strachan* as far as Sault Ste Marie. Beaven travelled with the bishop on other shorter tours in 1847, 1848, and 1854 and wrote a description of the latter which appeared in the Church.

In 1826 James Beaven married Elizabeth Speed, eldest daughter of John Speed Frowd of Croscombe House, Somersetshire. They had four sons and three daughters, and one son, Robert*, became prime minister of British Columbia, 1882–83. Mrs Beaven wrote Private devotions and rules of conduct for young ladies in 1845. She died in Toronto in her 76th year, 14 Sept. 1871.

Differing estimates of James Beaven were made by his contemporaries. Ernest Hawkins*, secretary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, wrote in his journal, 24 Aug. 1849: "The worthy Dr. B[eaven] rather bored me with his slow prosaic manner, but he is, I am sure, a good and amiable and well principled man." Daniel Wilson*, president of the University of Toronto, in a moment of irritation, once described his colleague as "a stupid dry old stick that we would be well rid of." A former student, John Campbell*, remembered him as tall and angular, severe in aspect, but with integrity "written on every line of his unbending form." Among his clerical brothers he was given great respect for his learning, balanced judgement in times of ecclesiastical party strife, and long-continued and generous services to his church in many parts of the diocese.

T. R. MILLMAN

British Museum catalogue lists a number of James Beaven's publications. Others are: "Ask for the old paths"; a sermon preached at the opening of the new church of St. James, at Dundas, in Upper Canada, on Sunday, December 31st, 1843 (Cobourg, Ont., 1844); A brief catechism on confirmation, with prayers to be used before and after confirmation (Toronto, 1878); Elements of natural theology (London, 1850); Private devotions for schoolboys; together with some rules of conduct given by a father to his son on his going to school (Toronto, 1845); Recreations of a long vacation; or a visit to Indian missions in Upper Canada (London and Toronto, 1846); "That they all may be one": a sermon, preached before the synod of the diocese of Toronto, on the 7th of June, 1859 (Toronto, 1859).

St John the Baptist Church (Norway (Toronto)), notes by D. M. Hayne, 1949–50, for a parish history. University of Toronto Archives, Daniel Wilson, "Journal," typescript; Office of the Chief Accountant financial records (41, university quarterly accounts, Sept.–Dec. 1871); Office of the Chief Accountant financial records (117, King's College Council minute book, 1842–48). Church (Cobourg, later Toronto), especially 23 June 1842, 22 Sept. 1843, 17 Sept. 1847. Globe (Toronto), 14 Sept. 1871, 10 Nov. 1875. Church of England, Church Society of the Diocese of Toronto, Reports (Cobourg, Toronto), 1843–69; Provincial Synod, Journals of proceedings (Montreal, Quebec), 1861–68; Synod of the Diocese of Toronto, Journals (Toronto), 1853–76. Final report of the commissioners of inquiry into the affairs of King's College University, and Upper Canada College (Quebec, 1852). John Campbell, "The Reverend Professor James Beaven, D.D., M.A.," University of Toronto Monthly, III (Dec. 1902), 69–72.

BECKET, JOHN C., printer; b. 14 May 1810 at Kilwinning, Scotland; married, but his wife's name is not known; d. 5 Sept. 1879 in Montreal.

John C. Becket was trained as a printer. In 1831 he emigrated and followed his trade for some months in New York. In 1832 he came to Montreal, where he lived for the remainder of his life. In his Introduction of printing into Canada, Ægidius Fauteux* describes Becket and four contemporary printers as "ancestors of the profession" in Montreal, but not members of the true pioneering period, which closed by 1825. The importance of their craft in the growing metropolis (about 30,000 in 1832) is clear. Becket had an additional importance as an outstanding trainer of printers.

Until 1843 Becket was in business with a partner, Rollo CAMPBELL; thereafter, by himself. He did job-printing, for example the annual reports of the French Canadian Missionary Society and of the Montreal Sunday School Union. He printed a number of periodicals, such as the French Canadian Missionary Record, the Canada Miscellany, and the Canada Temperance Advocate. He conducted a stationery and book store as well. When John Dougall* gave up the editorship of the Advocate and established the Montreal Witness in 1846, Becket printed that paper also (at a later time the Witness took over its own printing). Dougall and Becket shared the same interest in furthering moral causes.

Becket was deeply concerned in religious issues and in various charitable enterprises, for example the Montreal Protestant House of Industry and Refuge, of which he was a governor. He was a lifelong member of Erskine Presbyterian Church (whose pastor was William TAYLOR) and served as elder and clerk of session. "A prominent teetotaller," he frequently lent his business premises for the meetings of temperance societies. He was interested also in national and fraternal organizations. A member of the St Andrew's Society from 1835, he became its president in 1866. He was a founder of the first Montreal lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and for many years was a senior officer. "[His] kindly disposition and many charities prevented his ever becoming rich."

JOHN IRWIN COOPER

St Andrew's Society of Montreal, Minutes, 1834–79. Erskine and American United Church (Montreal), Erskine Church records, Minutes of the Board of Trustees, 1833–79; Minutes of the session of the church, 1833–79. The Presbyterian Record for the Dominion of Canada (Montreal), IV (October 1879). Dom. ann. reg., 1879, 384–85. Ægidius Fauteux, The introduction of printing into Canada, a brief history (Montreal, 1930), 110–11.

BECKWITH, JOHN ADOLPHUS, engineer, businessman, civil servant, and politician; b.1 Dec. 1800 at Fredericton, N.B., one of six children of Nehemiah Beckwith and Julie-Louise Le Brun; d. 23 Nov. 1880 at Fredericton.

The son of a well-known early settler, John Adolphus Beckwith was educated at Fredericton grammar school and in Montreal and Quebec, and became a professional surveyor and engineer. He had one son and two daughters by his first wife Ann Jouett (Jewett) whom he married in 1822; he married his second wife, Marie Ann Berton of Saint John, in 1837 and had three more daughters.

Beckwith's career was long and active. He and his brother were in partnership in the lumber firm of J. A. and F. E. Beckwith, which was moderately successful until ruined in the depression of the 1830s. He served as deputy surveyor in the Crown Lands Office until 1840 when he became first clerk in the audit office, a position he held until 1860. In 1860 he became commissioner, or manager, of the New Brunswick and Nova Scotia Land Company – a speculative company, organized by Thomas Baillie* to sell colonial lands especially in York County, N.B. Beckwith held this position until his death, when his son Harry succeeded him, and was "more familiar with the business of the Crown Land department probably than anyone who has occupied a seat in the Provincial Government."

From his youth John Beckwith was interested in the militia, and rose to the rank of major in command of a battalion of the 1st York Battery (1860), but then resigned resentfully when Lemuel Allan WILMOT was promoted colonel over him. In 1846 Beckwith began an association with the York County Agricultural Society and remained a member until his death; he received much of the credit for its vitality. In the Orange order he was at one time the most worthy grand master for New Brunswick. As a sportsman Beckwith excelled in wrestling, boxing, and skating, and he was called "the father of cricket in New Brunswick."

Except for an unsuccessful attempt to enter the House of Assembly in the election of 1830, Beckwith, considered a "strong conservative," was not involved in politics for the first 60 years of his life. His entry into it was at the municipal level in Fredericton where he served frequently on the council and was twice mayor. In the confederation election of 1866 Beckwith was elected to the Legislative Assembly as a supporter of union, and when the provincial government was reorganized in 1867 he was named provincial secretary and registrar of the province by the government leader Andrew Rainsford Wetmore*. He held this position until 1871 when he was one of the members of the Executive Council eliminated in the realignment over the New Brunswick School Law. In 1874 he was appointed to the Legislative Council. Never an exciting man, nor an innovator, Beckwith passed his life as a dull, but competent, public servant, and in his later years was "a sort of an Encyclopaedia" on the old days of Fredericton.

C. M. WALLACE

Daily Sun (Saint John, N.B.), 24 Nov. 1880. New Brunswick Reporter (Fredericton, N.B.), 1867, 1870–71, 1880. Can. parl. comp., 1870; 1873; 1878; 1880. Cyclopædia of Can. biog. (Rose, 1888), 88. Dom. ann. reg., 1880–81, 392. Lawrence, Judges of New Brunswick (Stockton), 460–62. MacNutt, New Brunswick, 231–32, 305.

BELCHER, Sir EDWARD, naval surveyor and explorer; b. in Halifax, N.S., on 27 Feb. 1799, son of Andrew Belcher and Marianne Von Geyer; d. in London, England, on 18 March 1877.

Edward Belcher, a grandson of Jonathan Belcher*, chief justice of Nova Scotia, moved from Halifax to England with his family in November 1811. On 9 April 1812 he entered the Royal Navy as a first class volunteer, a rank which indicated that he was destined for an officer's career. He was promoted midshipman on 2 Dec. 1812 and lieutenant on 21 July 1818. During this period he served on a number of ships on the Atlantic coast of North America, in the West Indies, and on the African and Home stations. In September 1821 he was posted to the Salisbury, on the Halifax station. He had meanwhile been studying surveying and natural history, equipping himself to take part in the navy's extensive 19th-century surveys of the world's oceans which were to result in the famous Admiralty charts.

Belcher's first major assignment was as assistant surveyor on the Blossom commanded by Frederick William Beechey*, which sailed for Bering Strait by way of Cape Horn on 19 May 1825. The voyage had two purposes: to come to the relief of William Edward Parry* and John Franklin* should they reach the strait in their separate attempts to discover a northwest passage; and to conduct surveys of uncharted areas along the ship's route. Belcher returned to England in October 1828 for other duties, was raised to the rank of commander on 16 March 1829, and given his first ship, the Ætna, on 27 May 1830. With the vessel's return to England from surveying the West African coast on 19 Aug. 1831, Belcher and his officers laid a number of charges against one another, arising out of his alleged abusive treatment of the crew. Belcher was acquitted and sailed for Africa on 21 Dec. 1831. When the Ætna returned to England on 19 Aug. 1833, crew members again laid charges against Belcher. This time the Admiralty posted him in disgrace to the Lightning, surveying the Irish Sea. In 1836 the navy hydrographer, Francis Beaufort, who appears to have been Belcher's patron, persuaded the Admiralty to give Belcher another command, and he replaced the ailing Captain Beechey on the Sulphur which was to undertake surveys of the west coasts of North and South America. This voyage lasted for almost six years; Belcher did not return to England until 19 July 1842. In the interim he had undertaken surveys of the Americas and the South Pacific islands, and on the return voyage by way of China he participated valiantly in the battles at Canton which ended in the ceding of Hong Kong to Great Britain. For his performance he was made a companion of the Order of the Bath on 14 Oct. 1841 and subsequently knighted on 21 Jan. 1843. The crew of the Sulphur complained of ill-treatment but Belcher was again exonerated by a court of inquiry and placed in charge of another surveying vessel, the Samarang, which left England on 26 Jan. 1843. He conducted surveys in the South China Sea and returned to England on 31 Dec. 1846.

On 11 Sept. 1830 he had married Diana Jolliffe, stepdaughter of Captain Peter Heywood. After the Ætna returned in August 1831, they lived together again at Portsmouth until he left in December. Shortly before the end of his second tour in 1833 she informed him that she would not live with him again, claiming that he had twice infected her with venereal disease. Then began a protracted legal struggle which Belcher spitefully prolonged. Despite the bitterness of the separation, his wife was content to call herself Lady Belcher after Belcher was knighted a decade later.

Daring and able though he was, Belcher had earned a wide reputation for harshness in command. After 1846 the Admiralty chose not to give him another command until 1852 when he was put in charge of an expedition of five ships to search in the Canadian Arctic for the missing ships and men of Sir John Franklin who had not been heard from since 1845. Belcher split his forces, sending the Resolute under Henry KELLETT and its tender, Intrepid, west through Barrow Strait to Melville Island. The only real accomplishment of this western division was the rescue in 1852 of Robert MCCLURE and the men of the Investigator from their trap in Mercy Bay; in the summers of 1853 and 1854 ice conditions prevented much progress and Kellett's ships were not even capable of returning to Belcher's base on Beechey Island. Belcher's own ship Assistance and its tender Pioneer under Sherard OSBORN comprised the northern division, which in August 1852 went north through Wellington Channel. They did some survey work and made some discoveries but, like the western division, became enmeshed in heavy ice in 1853 and were unable to break free in 1854.

Belcher must take part of the blame for this outcome himself, for he refused to take the advice of skilled Arctic navigators such as Sherard Osborn and as a result blundered into the heaviest ice.

Finally, in the summer of 1854, Belcher ordered the abandonment of all the vessels, ignoring Kellett's strenuous objections. As a result the ships were deserted and the crews returned home on transport ships waiting at Beechey Island. On their return to England, Belcher was court-martialed for leaving his ships in the Arctic but he was acquitted when he was able to show that his orders gave him complete discretion. In spite of the acquittal, he continued to be criticized severely in England. The outcry against Belcher became even greater after Kellett's Resolute broke free from the ice and was salvaged in Baffin Bay by James Buddington, an American whaling captain. He towed her to New London, Conn., where she was bought by the United States Congress, refitted, and presented to Queen Victoria as a gift from the American people in December 1856.

In his retirement Belcher occupied himself with writing and scientific inquiry. Despite the numerous failures of his career and principally because of his advanced age and seniority, he became a rear-admiral on 11 Feb. 1861, was promoted vice-admiral on 2 April 1866, made a knight commander of the Order of the Bath on 13 March 1867, and finally raised to the rank of admiral on 20 Oct. 1872.

During his career, Belcher was one of the most controversial figures in the Royal Navy. As an officer he had many desirable attributes: scientific curiosity, technical competence, inventiveness, physical energy, and sometimes reckless bravery. However, he suffered from an irritable, quarrelsome, and hypercritical nature which made relations with superiors and subordinates alike extremely difficult. Although he was in many ways a capable officer, his record remains blighted by his ignominious failure as commander in chief of the Franklin search expedition, an appointment which has been described as "unfortunate" since Belcher's temperament did not enable him to function as the situation demanded.

Basil Stuart-Stubbs

University of British Columbia, Special Collections Division, Belcher papers. Edward Belcher, Horatio Howard Brenton: a naval novel (3v., London, 1856); The last of the Arctic voyages; being a narrative of the expedition in H.M.S. Assistance under the command of Captain Sir Edward Belcher, C.B., in search of Sir John Franklin, during the years 1852–53–54 (2v., London, 1855); Narrative of a voyage round the world, performed in Her Majesty's Ship Sulphur, during the years 1836–1842 . . . (2v., London, 1843); Narrative of the voyage of H.M.S. Samarang during the years 1843–46; employed surveying the islands of the Eastern Archipelago . . . (2v., London, 1848); A treatise on nautical surveying . . . (London, 1835).

F. W. Beechey, Narrative of a voyage to the Pacific and Beering's Strait to co-operate with the polar expeditions: performed in His Majesty's Ship Blossom . . . in the years 1825, 26, 27, 28 (2v., London, 1831). [McClure], Discovery of the north-west passage (Osborn). Joseph Phillimore, A report of the judgement delivered by Joseph Phillimore, in the cause of Belcher, the wife, against Belcher, the husband (London, 1835). The zoology of the voyage of H.M.S. Samarang during the years 1843–1846, ed. Arthur Adams (London, 1850). The zoology of the voyage of H.M.S. Sulphur, under the command of Captain Sir Edward Belcher, R.N., C.B., F.R.G.S., etc. during the years 1836–42, ed. R. B. Hinds (2v., London, 1843–44).Times (London), 3 Oct. 1831, 7 Oct. 1854, 20 March 1877.

DNB. O'Byrne, Naval Biog. Dict., 68–69. E. S. Dodge, Northwest by sea (New York, 1961), 304–8. A. G. L'Estrange, Lady Belcher and her friends (London, 1891). G. E. Fenety, Life and times of the Hon. Joseph Howe, (the great Nova Scotian and ex-lieut. governor); with brief references to some of his prominent contemporaries (Saint John, N.B., 1896). Harris, Church of Saint Paul, 187. M. A. Lewis, A social history of the navy, 1793–1815 (London, [1960]). Beamish Murdoch, A history of Nova-Scotia or Acadie (3v., Halifax, 1865–67), III, 313. G. S. Ritchie, The Admiralty chart: British naval hydrography in the nineteenth century (London, 1967), 221–37. Noel Wright, Quest for Franklin (London, 1959), 206–14. Rutherford Alcock, "Address to the Royal Geographical Society . . . : obituary," Royal Geographical Soc. J. (London), XLVII (1877), cxxxvi–cxlii. C. J. Townshend, "Jonathan Belcher, first chief justice of Nova Scotia," N.S. Hist. Soc. Coll., XVIII (1914), 25–57. W. H. Whitmore, "Notes on the Belcher family," New Eng. Hist. and Geneal. Register (Boston), XXVII (1873), 239–54.

BELCOURT. See Bellecourt

BELFORD, CHARLES, journalist and publisher; b. Cork, County Cork, Ireland, 25 April 1837 of Irish Protestant parents; m. in Toronto, Jennie Thomas, 11 Nov. 1864; d. Ottawa, 19 Dec. 1880.

Charles Belford came to Toronto with his two younger brothers, Alexander and Robert J., in 1857. Charles had been trained in Ireland as a draftsman but he turned to newspaper work in Toronto and went on the staff of the Leader, published by his great-uncle, James Beaty*. In 1867 he succeeded Charles Lindsey* as editor-in-chief of the newspaper, which ceased publication shortly before the end of 1871. Belford was a vigorous writer and in March 1872 he became editor of a more outspoken Conservative organ, the newly formed Toronto Mail. This was the Toronto mouthpiece of Sir John A. Macdonald*, whose fortunes were soon to be overshadowed by the Pacific scandal in 1873 but whose loyal supporter Belford nevertheless remained. In 1876, while continuing his editorial duties with the Mail, Belford entered into partnership with his two brothers to establish the publishing firm of Belford Brothers. Their stock-in-trade was the publication of cheap, pirated reprints of popular British and American authors, notably Mark Twain.

The first Canadian Copyright Act of 1872 had been disallowed, but the act of 1875 made it legal to reprint in Canada any American book not coming under the imperial copyright act of 1842, which protected editions published first in the British Isles, or not registered in the Department of Agriculture, Ottawa, within 30 days of publication in the United States. The Belfords' publishing venture was within the law. At the same time, however, it was in part a reprisal against American publishers who pirated British authors and harmed their Canadian counterparts by flooding the market with cheap reprints. Belford Brothers published unauthorized editions of American subscription books which did not conform to the Canadian act of 1875 and sold them to retail outlets by mail order at prices undercutting the American editions. Thus they turned the tables on American publishers who indignantly accused them of sharp practice. Other Canadian publishers soon followed the Belfords' lead.

Belford Brothers operated from 1876 to 1878, during which time the firm published, in addition to pirated reprints, a journal of literature and art, Belford's Monthly Magazine, and a few Canadian books. Among the authors published were Twain, W. D. Howells, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Anthony Trollope, May Agnes Fleming [EARLY], Jean Talon Lesperance*, and G. M. Grant*. Children's books, religious tracts, reference works, books of travel and adventure, biographies, and autobiographies appeared in rapid succession.

Charles Belford withdrew from the firm in 1878 and his brothers reorganized the business with a new partner, G. M. Rose*, as the Rose-Belford Publishing Company. Within a year there was another shake-up: Alexander and Robert Belford withdrew, and with James Clarke formed Belfords, Clarke, and Company with headquarters in Chicago where Alexander married a daughter of Walter McNally of the publishers, Rand McNally Company.

It was a physical breakdown that made it necessary for Charles to dissociate himself from his brothers' publishing activities and to give up, at the same time, his editorship of the Mail. An able organizer whose counsel was highly regarded by the Conservative party, he had worked to a state of exhaustion during the federal election campaign of 1878, and collapsed on the night of the Conservative victory. By autumn 1879 he was sufficiently recovered to accept an appointment as secretary to the Dominion Board of Appraisers and move with his family to Ottawa. He was still in frail health, however, and died the following year, survived by his wife, two sons, and four daughters.

H. P. GUNDY

Globe (Toronto), 22 Dec. 1880. Ottawa Citizen, 20, 22 Dec. 1880. Dom. ann. reg., 1880–81, 392–93. H. P. Gundy, Book publishing and publishers in Canada before 1900 (Toronto, 1965). Gordon Roper," Mark Twain and his Canadian publishers: a second look," Bibliographical Society of Canada Papers (Toronto), V (1966), 30–89.

BELL, HERBERT, merchant, farmer, shipbuilder, and politician; b. 30 Nov. 1818 in Middlebie Parish, county of Dumfries, Scotland; d. 15 Feb. 1876 at his home in Alberton, P.E.I.

After being educated in his native Scotland, Herbert Bell immigrated to Prince Edward Island in the 1840s. He settled at Alberton in western Prince County, where he established himself as a farmer, merchant, and shipbuilder. In 1849 he married Jane Bowness; she bore him no children but they adopted a daughter.

Bell entered politics in 1867 and was elected to the assembly for Prince County, First District. During the next three years, the new Liberal government, which he supported, had a succession of three leaders and was sharply divided by the land and school questions. On the latter issue, Bell, a Presbyterian, openly opposed public grants to Roman Catholic denominational schools; however, First Prince was two-thirds Roman Catholic in population, and Bell was defeated by a Catholic Liberal in the election of 18 July 1870. Later in the same year, he successfully contested a seat in the Legislative Council, where he reiterated his views on the school question. He became president of the upper house in 1874, and held that position until his death.

Bell was a strong advocate of "temperance" and served as a grand worthy patron of the Sons of Temperance for several years. As a merchant with considerable trading interests, he vigorously supported the idea of free trade between P.E.I. and the United States. On most other issues his views were quite conventional; he opposed leasehold tenure and confederation.

IAN ROSS ROBERTSON

Prince Edward Island, Supreme Court, Estates Division, will of Herbert Bell, 7 Feb. 1876. Prince Edward Island, House of Assembly, Debates and proceedings, 1867–70, especially 1868, 171; 1870, 64–65; Journals, 1867–70. Prince Edward Island, Legislative Council, Debates and proceedings, 1871–75, especially 1873, 80–82; 1874, 237–39; Journals, 1871–75. Examiner (Charlottetown), 21 Feb. 1876. Patriot (Charlottetown), 18 Feb. 1876. Can. parl. comp., 1874, 515. Robertson, "Religion, politics, and education in PEI," 195–96.

BELL, ROBERT, surveyor, journalist, and politician; b. in 1821, probably in Strabane, County Tyrone, Ireland, son of Robert Bell and Catherine Wallace; m. in 1849 Margaret Waugh Buckham by whom he had two daughters; d. 25 Feb. 1873, in Hull, Que.

Robert Bell's parents emigrated to New York when he was still young, and in 1832 the family settled on a farm near Kemptville in Upper Canada. He attended local schools and on 16 June 1843 qualified as a provincial land surveyor.

Bell moved to Bytown (Ottawa) and quickly established a sound reputation as a surveyor. He worked at first largely in the immediate Bytown area but in 1847 he undertook a survey of the Chalk River and its branches. In the same year he was chosen to head a party to survey a base line from the Madawaska River at Bark Lake to the northeastern limit of the Home District near the site of Bracebridge, while another party, under John James Haslett, continued the line eastwards to the Bathurst District. The government's object in ordering the surveys was to open the lands beyond the Midland, Victoria, and Colborne districts for settlement, and Bell was instructed "to project the best site for the road line." He set off on his difficult journey along what came to be known as Bell's Line in August 1847 and returned to Bytown in March 1848. He considered the "chief part" of the country he crossed, most of it in present-day Muskoka District and county of Haliburton, as "quite fit for settlement," but he acknowledged that "the greatest objection that at all exists in respect to the whole territory is the great abundance of Rocks."

Bell's last important survey again brought him into the area west of Bytown. In November 1850 he was asked to survey a line for a road from the Ottawa River in Horton Township to Opeongo Lake, a road which, it was hoped, would be continued to Georgian Bay near the mouth of the French River and would open up "the interior of the Ottawa and Huron country, benefitting equally the farmer and the lumberer." On this expedition, which took from January 1851 to April 1852, Bell found "many tracts of excellent land" and "remarkably well timbered" regions.

He retained an interest in surveying and often advised the assistant commissioner of crown lands, Andrew Russell, on the subject, but Bell's energies had shifted to journalism. In 1849 he purchased the Bytown Packet from Henry J. Friel* and John Gordon Bell, and in it he expounded his ideas for promoting the settlement of the waste lands between Bytown and Lake Huron and for advancing the interests of Bytown and the Ottawa lumber trade. In February 1851 the newspaper became known as the Ottawa Citizen.

Bell also undertook to promote the construction of a railway from Bytown to Prescott where it would connect with the railway at Ogdensburg, New York. Ottawa valley lumbermen would thus be provided with easier means of transport to the increasingly important American market. Bell was named secretary of the provisional committee of the Bytown and Prescott Railway (later the Ottawa and Prescott Railway) in 1850. When the railway was chartered in 1851 he was named its secretary, and he, more than anyone else, saw to its completion. He was later president of the line for many years.

After serving on the Bytown town council, Bell ran in Russell for the Legislative Assembly as a Reformer in 1854. He was defeated then and again in 1857, but he was successful in 1861. He spoke mainly on railways, acting as a spokesman of the Grand Trunk Railway, and on opening up the area west of Ottawa, and strongly supported Ottawa's claim for the seat of government. In 1866, however, he became the centre of a bitter controversy. Alexander Tilloch Galt* had promised to extend the educational privileges of the Protestant minority in Canada East. Although he was himself a Presbyterian, Bell brought in a bill to extend to the Roman Catholics of Canada West educational privileges equal to those obtained by Galt, "a proposition so fair," he thought, "that no man, whether Catholic or Protestant, would object to it." There were loud cries of outrage from Protestants in Canada West who saw Richard William Scott*'s bill of 1863 as the final compromise on the separate school question in Canada West. Egerton Ryerson*, the superintendent of education in Canada West, stated that the bill was "the most disingenuous, partial and execrable that can be conceived." Thomas SCATCHERD and George BROWN fought it in the assembly, and Hector Langevin*, who had introduced Galt's bill, privately considered it "the stupidest imaginable from a parliamentary point of view. . . ." When the French members from Canada East threatened to vote against Galt's bill unless Bell's was also passed and the members from Canada West threatened to do the same if Bell's was passed, both bills were withdrawn. Galt resigned from the ministry and the Protestants of Quebec entered confederation with a constitutional protection, added at the London conference in late 1866, "the precise terms of which had not the benefit of discussion and sanction of parliament."

Bell ran for the House of Commons for Ottawa City in 1867 but his wife was ailing and he was kept from the hustings and defeated. He had given up the editorship of the Citizen to I. B. Taylor in 1861 and had sold the newspaper to him in 1865, the same year that the Ottawa and Prescott Railway, of which he was still president, was foreclosed by the bondholders. Disheartened he retired. After his wife's death in 1868 he went to live with a daughter in Hull, "sunk altogether out of the ken of the world," and died there at the age of 52.

HENRI PILON

Ontario, Department of Lands and Forests, Surveys office, field note books, nos.86, 1895, 2202, 2203; Instructions to land surveyors, from 6 Nov. 1844 to 24 Oct. 1861, pp.93–96, 171–73; map no.020–24, B38. PAC, RG 31, A1, 1851, Ottawa City, West Ward, 270. PAO, RG 1, A-I-6, 22, 24–29; A-V, 9. Canada, Province of, Parliamentary debates, 1861–66. Muskoka and Haliburton (Murray). Packet (Bytown), 1849–51. R. W. Scott, Recollections of Bytown; some incidents in the history of Ottawa (Ottawa, [1910]), 3–9. Times (Ottawa), 26 Feb. 1873.

Can. parl. comp., 1864. Mitchell & Co's county of Carleton and Ottawa city directory, for 1864–5 (Toronto, 1864). "The Ottawa Citizen" directory of Ottawa . . . 1863 (Ottawa, n.d.). Ottawa city and counties of Carleton and Russell directory, 1866–7, comp. James Sutherland (Ottawa, 1866). H. R. Cummings, Early days in Haliburton (Toronto, 1963), 3–4, 7–13, 178–80. Andrée Désilets, Hector-Louis Langevin, un père de la confédération canadienne (1826–1906) (Les cahiers de l'Institut d'histoire, 14, Québec, 1969), 153–55, 226. J. L. Gourlay, History of the Ottawa valley, a collection of facts . . . events and reminiscences for over half a century (n.p., 1896), 124–26. C. B. Sissons, Church & state in Canadian education; [an historical study] (Toronto, 1959), 138–41. "Robert Bell," Ont. Land Surveyors Assoc., Annual Report (Toronto), no.40 (1925), 106–9. "William Bell," Ont. Land Surveyors Assoc., Annual Report (Toronto), no.38 (1923), 135–38.

BELLECOURT (Bellecours, Belcourt), GEORGE-ANTOINE, priest and missionary, b. 22 April 1803 in Saint-Antoine-de-la-Baie-du-Febvre (Baieville), L.C., son of Antoine Bellecourt and Josephte Lemire; d. 31 May 1874 at Shediac, N.B.

George-Antoine Bellecourt studied at the seminary of Nicolet, and was ordained into the Roman Catholic Church on 10 March 1827. After serving as assistant in various parishes, he was installed in Sainte-Martine, Châteauguay County, in 1830, where he became attached to the parish and its people. He begged to be excused when in 1831 Mgr Bernard-Claude Panet* asked him to go to remote Red River. He went, however, and at Saint-Boniface began his work by mastering Chippewa (Sauteux), a form of the Algonkian tongue, which he had previously studied at the mission of Lac-des-Deux-Montagnes. Knowledge of the language gave him an advantage over the other missionaries who had to rely on interpreters. In 1839 his little grammar, Principes de la langue des sauvages appelés Sauteux was published in Quebec; he prepared a Dictionnaire sauteux, later printed by Father Albert Lacombe* in 1874, and is said to have translated the catechism of the diocese of Quebec into Chippewa.

In 1832–33 Bellecourt began his mission to the Chippewas on the Assiniboine River, west of the Métis mission of Saint-François-Xavier, on land given by the Hudson's Bay Company. He strove to persuade the Chippewas to build a village there like the one established by the Anglican missionaries at St Peter's (near present-day Selkirk) on the lower Red River. He himself laboured as farmer, builder, and carpenter. By 1839 the mission village, Baie-Saint-Paul, with tiny fields along the river, was well established.

He then desired, however, to return to his native province, and Archbishop Joseph Signay* recalled him to work with the Indians at Lac Témiscamingue. But Bellecourt, apparently an emotional and impulsive man, soon returned to the west. In 1840 the tireless priest started missions at Wabassimong (White Dog) Falls on Winnipeg River, at Rainy Lake (Lac La Pluie), and at Duck Bay (Baie des Canards) on Lake Winnipegosis, but Baie-Saint-Paul and its people remained his chief care. Support for his work came from the Société de la Propagation de la Foi, the diocese of Quebec, and the bishop of Quebec.

In 1844 trouble began to develop in the Red River Settlement when an American at Pembina, Norman Wolfred Kittson*, attempted to challenge the legality of the HBC monopoly by trading furs with the Indians, and Bellecourt joined in the agitation to destroy the company's position. He had not been hostile to the company itself, indeed his assistance in troubles between the Métis and the company in 1834–35 had been sought and was remembered by the HBC, and it is improbable that a man of his character was interested in the fur trade. He was, however, warmly committed to the cause of the Métis. Bellecourt believed that the Métis title to their land should be recognized, that they should be allowed a voice in government, and that "free trade" in furs was their right as natives of the northwest. Contemporaries said that he approved the claims for the Métis against the company listed in Alexander Kennedy Isbister*'s pamphlet, A few words on the Hudson's Bay Company . . . , and that he supplied much of its argument. He was a leader at meetings held in February 1846 at the house of Andrew McDermot* in Red River and he drew up a petition in French, setting out the claims of settlers, Indians, and Métis. This petition, with 977 signatures, was dispatched to London, where it precipitated an extensive inquiry into the position of the HBC.

By participating in the agitation Bellecourt made himself a marked man and anathema to Governor George Simpson*. Simpson requested that the archbishop of Quebec, Mgr Signay, recall Bellecourt, but this action had already been taken. In the fall of 1847, after suffering the indignity of having his luggage searched for furs, Bellecourt went back to Canada. A petition was organized, however, requesting his return to Red River, and Bellecourt was anxious that his mission to the Indians and Métis should not be ended. Simpson learned that there was a possibility that Bellecourt might re-establish himself at Pembina, a base for the buffalo hunt and a Métis settlement on American soil, 60 miles south of Upper Fort Garry (Winnipeg), and he invited Bellecourt to come back to Red River, provided that he undertook "not to interfere in the politics of the country." Bellecourt refused. In 1848, however, he did begin a mission at Pembina, a refuge outside the control of the HBC. In a sense Bellecourt had gone into partnership with Kittson against the company.

Simpson's only recourse was to have the new governor of Assiniboia, Major William Bletterman Caldwell*, write in 1849 to the British chargé d'affaires at Washington protesting Bellecourt's counselling the Métis to resist the authorities in Red River. There was some justification for the protest. Not only was Bellecourt attempting to draw off the Métis from Red River and assisting Kittson in making Pembina a centre of the fur trade, but he was also counselling the Métis in their continuing struggle with the government of Assiniboia. It was in fact Bellecourt who advised Jean-Louis Riel* and other Métis leaders on their resistance to the trial of Pierre-Guillaume Sayer who had been accused of illegal trade by the company. He may also have advised them in their petition for representation on the Council of Assiniboia and for the removal of Adam Thom*, recorder of Rupert's Land. From his base in Pembina Bellecourt was thus able to participate in the controversies far more effectively than he had been allowed to do while residing in British territory.

The coming of free trade in 1849 made removal to Pembina unnecessary for the Métis, and the United States treaty of 1850 which arranged transfer of lands to Minnesota treated the Métis as whites, thus denying them a share in the Indian title. The great flood of 1852 overwhelmed Pembina as it did Red River, and the new cart brigades of the free trade went through to St Paul [see Joseph ROLETTE]. The mission did not flourish. In 1853 Kittson moved his headquarters to St Joseph (Walhalla, North Dakota) and in the same year Bellecourt took up residence there, on an escarpment to the west where a small Métis settlement began. But the Métis and the HBC had come to terms in the new era of free trade, and Bellecourt was once more a humble missionary. At St Joseph he served with his usual zeal, but difficulties developed both with his helpers and with his superiors, perhaps because of the habit of working alone which he had formed over the years.

Bellecourt left the northwest in 1859 on vacation and was not allowed to return. At the request of Bishop Bernard Donald MacDonald* of Charlottetown, he was sent to serve in the parish of Rustico among the Acadians of Prince Edward Island. There he tried to improve the material lot of his people, as he had done by introducing agriculture to the Chippewas. He inspired the founding of the Farmers' Bank of Rustico which was incorporated in 1864 and lasted until 1894. This was a genuine "people's bank": the directors and the first president, Jérôme Doiron, were all farmers; the first cashier, Marin Blanchard, was a school-teacher. The initial capital was set at £1,200. J. T. Croteau writes: "It was by far the smallest bank, measured by share capital, ever to operate in Canada, it was the first people's bank in Canada, and it was the precursor of the North American credit union movement through its influence upon the pioneer credit union organizer," Alphonse Desjardins* of Quebec. Bellecourt also established a school and a library. Through his friend, the historian François-Edmé Rameau* de Saint-Père, he received an annual gift of 1,000 francs from Napoleon III for the library. Bellecourt gave up his parochial duties in 1869, but two years later he was sent to Havre-aux-Maisons (Îles-de-la-Madeleine) where he served until his final illness.

Bellecourt's tenacity and courage in his work as a missionary are admirable. But his career perhaps exemplifies the difficulty of using someone trained to be a parish priest as a missionary. Bellecourt's fundamental error was that, like so many before him, he attempted to use agriculture and its sedentary life as a means to convert nomads. Father Lacombe may have been wiser in attempting to make the faith itself nomadic.

After a brief illness, Bellecourt died at a farm he had acquired near Shediac, and was buried at Memramcook.

W. L. Morton

[A complete list of Bellecourt's writings, both in English and in Algonkian, is found in B. B. Peel, A bibliography of the Prairie provinces to 1953 (Toronto, 1956). References to manuscript sources can be found in J. M. Reardon, George Anthony Belcourt, pioneer Catholic missionary to the northwest 1803–1874, his life and times (St Paul, Minn., 1955), 205–17, which is the most complete study of G.-A. Bellecourt's life to date. W.L.M.]

HBC Arch. A.11/95 (Caldwell to the British chargé d'affaires, Washington, 31 July 1849); D.4/35 (Simpson to Christie, 18 Dec. 1849); D.4/37, D.4/45 (Simpson to the archbishop of Quebec, 3 March 1848); D.5/20 (Christie to Simpson, 30 Nov. 1847); D.5/21 (Bellecourt to Simpson, 28 Jan. 1848); D.5/25 (Christie to Simpson, 29 May 1849). G.B., CO, Hudson's Bay Company. (Red River Settlement.) Return to an address of the Honourable the House of Commons, dated 9 February 1849 . . . ([London, 1849]). HBRS, XIX (Rich, Johnson, and Morton), xlix, lxxxviii-ix. A. K. Isbister, A few words on the Hudson's Bay Company with a statement of the grievances of the natives and the half-caste Indians, addressed to the British government through their delegates now in London (London, 1847). J.-H. Blanchard, The Acadians of Prince Edward Island, 1720–1964 (Ottawa, Ont., and Hull, Que., 1964). MacMillan, Catholic Church in PEI, 115–16, 264–65, 305–6. Morice, Hist. of the Catholic Church, I. J. T. Croteau, "The Farmers' Bank of Rustico: an early people's bank," Dal. Rev., XXXVI (1956–57), 144–55.

BELVÈZE, PAUL-HENRY DE, French sailor, commander of La Capricieuse, descended from an old family of Languedoc; b. 11 March 1801 at Montauban, son of Antoine-Jean-François de Belvèze and Marie-Josèphe-Jeanne Garrigues de Saint-Fauste; d. 8 Feb. 1875 in his mansion at Toulon.

A former pupil of the École Polytechnique, young Paul-Henry de Belvèze joined the navy in 1823 and was subsequently put in charge of various expeditions, notably to South America, Europe, and the Holy Land. In 1855, while he was cruising in the Gulf of St Lawrence as "commander of the French forces in the waters of Newfoundland," Napoleon III's government decided to entrust to him the mission of renewing relations with Canada, a mission which, in the terms of the official mandate, was to be above all "commercial, with no diplomatic character." This objective was exceeded: in Canada East where deeply moved spectators watched the return of the French colours, the sailor's passage was a triumph; towns such as Ottawa, Kingston, and Toronto, despite some reservations, felt obliged to extend a welcome to the French delegation, which was invariably correct and sometimes warm. The moment seemed well chosen: Great Britain had just abolished the former customs duties which hitherto had made trade between Canada and abroad impracticable. Moreover, relations between France and England had never been better; the French sovereigns had been the guests of Queen Victoria in 1850, and the latter, in that same year 1855, was to return their visit on the occasion of the universal exposition in Paris, at which Canada had an exhibit.

The mission's success must be attributed to a large extent also to the personality of the commander – a "very well educated, extremely capable" man, as one of his superiors had said of him in 1831. In 1848 he was judged to be "one of the captains best fitted to command." A true meridional, Belvèze had the natural gifts of a brilliant speaker, but in him spontaneity was held in check by a wisdom and tact worthy of a professional diplomat. A detailed report of his observations appeared later and was reproduced in the newspapers. The introduction to this report is to be found at the end of his Lettres choisies . . . , published in 1882 through the good offices of his widow.

The commander was retired in 1861 without obtaining the promotion to which he thought he was entitled. One of the practical results of his mission was the establishment, in 1859, of a consulate at Quebec, where France had been represented only by an agent named Edward Ryan.

Armand Yon

[C.-L.] de Beauvau-Craon, La survivance française au Canada; notes de voyage (Paris, 1914), viii. [P.-H. de Belvèze], Lettres choisies dans sa correspondance, 1824–1875, Hubert et Georges Rohault de Fleury, édit. (Bourges, France, 1882). Le Canadien (Québec), 10 juin–15 sept. 1855. Journal de Québec, 10 juin–15 sept. 1855. La Minerve (Montréal), 10 juin–15 sept. 1855. Ottawa Tribune, 3, 10, 17 Aug. 1855.

Henri Cangardel, "Voyage de La Capricieuse au Canada," La Revue maritime (Paris), nouv. sér., no.3 (juill. 1955), 865–83; "Voyage de « La Capricieuse » dans les eaux du Saint-Laurent en 1855," Communications et mémoires (Académie de Marine, Paris), nouv. sér., no.24 (juin 1947), 1–32. Jacques Gouin, "Un agent français « plus ou moins secret » à Ottawa en 1855: la visite du commandant Belvèze dans la future capitale du Canada," Asticou, no.2 (janv. 1969), 5–14. R. D. L. Kinsman, "The visit to Canada of 'La Capricieuse' and M. le Commandant de Belvèze in the summer of 1855 as seen through the French-languge press of Lower Canada," unpublished MA thesis, McGill University, 1959. Armand Yon, "Les Canadiens français jugés par les Français de France, 1830–1939," RHAF, XVIII (1964–65), 517–33; "L'Odyssée de la « Capricieuse », ou comment la France découvrit de nouveau le Canada en 1855," Le Canada français, 2e sér., XXIII (1935–36), 837–56.

BENNETT, GEORGE, convicted of the murder of George BROWN; hanged in Toronto, Ont., 23 July 1880.

George Bennett's early life is obscure. By his own account, written on the eve of execution, he was born of good Roman Catholic parents, but they died while he was young, leaving him prey to evil companions, infidelity, and alcohol. His is a fairly typical statement, though it accords with his later dissolute behaviour; however, it throws no light on the literate, if not literary, quality of the letters and verse he had written which were found on him at his arrest.

What is clear is that he had worked for the Toronto Globe between 1875 and 1880, and by the latter date was night engineer in the boiler room. By this time, moreover, he was in recurrent domestic – and police – trouble. He drank heavily; he was arrested for wife-beating and non-support. He felt himself friendless, except for "Dear Annie" McGovern to whom he wrote letters asserting that he had dragged her name "into the dirt" through his association with her. Several times he had been reprimanded by the chief engineer of the Globe, James Banks, for neglecting his work. Then on the night of 4 Feb. 1880 he was drunk on duty. Banks had to be called in to avert a dangerous accident to the boiler; on his report, Bennett was dismissed the next day. Bennett made attempts to gain reinstatement from Brown, proprietor of the influential Globe and leading Liberal party figure, who had authorized his dismissal. But the facts of drink and danger told too strongly against him. Over the next few weeks he drank and brooded on his wrongs, writing letters to himself projecting suicide or swearing vengeance and death to his enemies. On 25 March Bennett went to the Globe office again, this time with a fully loaded revolver in his pocket – telling his hotel-keeper he was "going to Leadville" from which there was no easy return. He had been drinking, but was apparently more agitated and obsessive than drunk.

He seemed to have no clear intent, but roamed the press and boiler rooms, at one time talking amicably to employees, at another threatening them. "You are an enemy of mine," he told Banks. About four-thirty in the afternoon he went to Brown's editorial office, to ask him to sign a statement that he had worked five years at the Globe; evidently he wanted a reference in the police courts for he was still out on bail. Brown refused to sign, telling him to see Banks or the Globe treasurer, who would have the facts. An argument ensued, then Bennett suddenly drew and cocked his gun. Brown grabbed for it, trying to deflect it. It fired in the brief scuffle. Hearing the noise, members of the editorial staff rushed down and easily secured the under-sized, and dazed, Bennett. Brown had suffered a flesh wound in the thigh. Bennett was taken into custody and on 27 March charged with shooting with intent to kill. He pleaded not guilty.

There was general expectation of Brown's recovery, but, as the weeks passed, the wound became inflamed and his condition gradually grew worse. Business problems, along with his worries and exertions over them, undoubtedly severely taxed Brown's strength; and medical knowledge then could not cope with the "blood poisoning" that set in. By late April he was weak and feverish, and gangrene was spreading. He lapsed into a coma, and died on 9 May. An inquest was immediately held. On 11 May it reached the verdict that Bennett had been responsible for Brown's death, "with malice aforethought."

In the shocked state of public feeling at the time, little other verdict might be expected. George Bennett was charged with murder. His trial opened on 23 June, and concluded in one day. His counsel, the able and eloquent Nicholas Flood Davin*, stressed that Brown's own exertions had rendered his wound fatal; that Bennett had been unbalanced by drinking and had never premeditated killing or even shooting him. But the weight of medical evidence was given on the other side, in testimony that the wound, inflicted by Bennett, had actually killed Brown, and the damning letters found on the prisoner at his arrest were taken as demonstrating premeditation (although one might wonder whether they had not pointed more at Banks than Brown). Bennett was swiftly found guilty and sentenced to death. At his execution one month later, Bennett said, as he had throughout, that he had never meant to shoot George Brown: "I was in liquor or I would not have done it."

J. M. S. CARELESS

[The best source for this article was found to be the Globe (Toronto) of 1880. Quotations are taken from its full reports of the police examination, inquest, trial, and execution of Bennett. The Globe's record of these transactions has been checked with the Mail (Toronto) and the Evening Telegram (Toronto); that check shows it to be factually presented as well as providing the fullest account. The judge's notes on Bennett's trial are at the SAB. See also Careless, Brown, II, 368–73. J.M.S.C.]

BENNETT, THOMAS, merchant, politician, and stipendiary magistrate; christened 15 Oct. 1788 in the parish of St James, Shaftesbury, Dorset, England, son of Thomas and Leah Bennett; d. 12 Feb. 1872 in Shaftesbury.

Thomas Bennett's first position was in the British Commissariat Department just before the end of the Napoleonic wars. A few years later, probably in the early 1820s, he came to St John's, Newfoundland, as a partner in the mercantile business that his brother, Charles Fox Bennett*, had just established. Charles Fox, the head of the firm, was the wealthier brother and an arch conservative. Thomas, perhaps more moderate in politics, also became a prominent member of the mercantile community in St John's. In 1831 he signed a petition asking for representative government. When the system was introduced the following year, he was elected to the House of Assembly as the first member for Twillingate and Fogo. In 1834 when John Bingley Garland, first speaker of the house, was appointed to the council, a sharp contest for the speakership took place between the Liberal Dr William Carson* and the Conservative Thomas Bennett. Bennett won. Although in 1836 he was again returned for Twillingate and Fogo, the whole election was invalidated, after which Bennett, like many of his party, chose not to stand for re-election.

He had been appointed a commissioner of lighthouses in 1834, and in 1837 was appointed to the Board of Control to regulate road-building. Before the introduction of the Amalgamated Legislature [see John KENT] in 1842, Governor Sir John Harvey* was careful to assure the services of both Bennett brothers, whom he described as "intelligent and highly reputed." An election had been called for December and Charles Fox had already announced his candidacy for St John's, when Harvey, reasoning that the more moderate Thomas would stand a better chance of winning a seat in Liberal Catholic St John's, promised Charles Fox a seat in the Legislative Council and urged Thomas to run in his stead. Once elected, Harvey would appoint him to the Executive Council as a representative from the assembly. Accordingly C. F. Bennett was appointed to the Legislative Council in January 1843 and Thomas, although defeated at the polls along with the other Conservative candidates, was appointed to the Executive Council in August 1843.

Bennett remained a member until the restoration of the usual form of representative government in 1848. Thereupon he retired from an active role in C. F. Bennett and Company and was appointed stipendiary magistrate at St John's. He continued to be a prominent figure in the city, with a residence known as Mount Dorset, was an active member of the Church of England, a director of the St John's Academy and of the St John's Hospital. He was appointed by the governor in 1859 to investigate election disturbances at Harbour Grace. Following a riot in St John's at the opening of the legislature in 1861, the Liberals blamed the two magistrates Peter W. Carter and Thomas Bennett for causing violence by calling out the troops to disperse the mob. In 1870, after his brother became prime minister, Bennett was pensioned off from the magistracy and retired to Dorsetshire.

ELIZABETH A. WELLS

Dorset County Record Office (Dorchester, Dorset, Eng.), records for the parish of St James, Shaftesbury. PANL, Newfoundland, Dept. of the Colonial Secretary, letter books, December 1832 – June 1835, September 1836 – June 1838. PRO, CO 194/83, 194/114. Newfoundland, House of Assembly, Journals, 1834, 87; 1871, app.9. Newfoundlander (St John's), 6 Oct., 15, 22 Dec. 1842; 14 May 1861. Newfoundland Patriot (St John's), 5 Oct. 1842; 30 Aug., 6 Sept. 1843. Public Ledger (St John's), 2 Dec. 1836, 20 June 1837, 15 Feb. 1872. Hutchinson's Newfoundland directory for 1864–65, comp. Thomas Hutchinson (St John's, 1864), 73, 338, 339.

BERCZY, WILLIAM BENT, painter, farmer, politician, and soldier; b. in London, England, 6 Jan. 1791, son of William Berczy* von Moll and Charlotte Allemand; d. at Sainte-Mélanie-d'Ailleboust, Que., 9 Dec. 1873.

William Berczy Jr, son of a pioneer Canadian painter and land developer, came to Upper Canada with his parents by way of Genesee County, New York, arriving at York (Toronto) in 1794. His father's complex business affairs required numerous family moves, with the result that William lived in York 1794–98 and 1802–4, in Montreal 1798–1802, and in Montreal and Quebec 1804–12. He served in the War of 1812. From 1818 to 1832 he resided intermittently at Sandwich, U.C., on a 2,400-acre tract awarded to him by the Upper Canadian government in some compensation for his father's losses on land settlement. On this property he was a pioneer cultivator of tobacco. After 1832 he lived at Sainte-Mélanie-d'Ailleboust, Joliette County, on the seigneury of his wife, Louise-Amélie Panet, a talented amateur artist, daughter of Pierre-Louis Panet*, whom he had married in 1819.

Berczy was an apprentice to his father in painting, and continued to paint for many years although probably never professionally. His water colours, the medium he seems to have favoured, deal with a variety of subjects usually from the life around him. They range from miniature portraits to camp scenes of the War of 1812; trompe l'œil studies of insects (in the "Album" collected by Jacques Viger*, Montreal Municipal Library); a painting, Huron Indians leaving residence near Amherstburg (in the National Gallery of Canada); and a landscape, with figures, of the Blessing of the Fields (also in the National Gallery of Canada). All are characterized by great delicacy and attention to detail, and they echo his father's instruction.

Berczy's varied activities are evidence of broad interests. In addition to cultivating tobacco, he was a ship owner and a contractor to the government for supplies for troops. From 1828 to 1834 he was member for Kent County in the Upper Canada House of Assembly and spent much time in Toronto. As a military man he progressed from cadet to captain of the Corps of Canadian Chasseurs during the War of 1812, and was present at the battle of Crysler's Farm in 1813. From 1845 to 1863 Berczy was active in the militia at Berthier, Que., rising from the rank of lieutenant-colonel to that of colonel commanding the 8th Military District (militia), Lower Canada. He died without issue.

JOHN ANDRE and J. RUSSELL HARPER

ANQ, Fonds Berczy (collection privée). Archives de l'Université de Montréal, Collection Baby, Correspondance générale. ASQ, Fonds Verreau, Ma Saberdache; Fonds Verreau, 19, liasse 2. Bibliothèque municipale de Montréal, Jacques Viger, Souvenirs canadiens. PAC, MG 23, I6 (Samuel Waldo papers). PAO, William von Moll Berczy papers. Canadian Illustrated News (Montreal), 21 Feb. 1874. John Andre, William Berczy, co-founder of Toronto; a sketch (Toronto, 1967). F. C. Hamil, The valley of the lower Thames, 1640–1850 (Toronto, 1951), 123, 125, 126, 222, 223, 224, 318.

BERNARD, ALDIS, dentist, mayor of Montreal; b. c. 1810; d. 3 July 1876 at San Jose, California, and buried 15 July at Montreal, Que.

Aldis Bernard, probably the son of loyalists, was born perhaps at Beebe Plain, in the Eastern Townships, as certain newspapers indicated at the time of his death; however, there is nothing to confirm this statement. After studying dentistry at Philadelphia, Bernard practised his profession in the southern states, where he married Mary Webb Meredith, who came from Maryland. He stayed for a year in the Niagara region, and then in 1841 took up residence at Montreal. Four years later his wife died, leaving him one child.

In 1847, Bernard tried unsuccessfully to get his profession included in the bill whose aim was to create the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Lower Canada. The fact that this profession was in ill repute among doctors perhaps explains why he failed in his attempt. In 1869, however, when the number of dentists in Quebec had increased, they united, backed by the prestige of this veteran practitioner, and formed the Dental Association of the Province of Quebec. Bernard was its president until his death.

He was a liberal in politics, and was elected municipal councillor by the property holders of the district of Montreal Centre for 1858 to 1861, then for 1866 to 1873. As chairman of the committees on public order and health, he proposed regulations allowing the creation of the City Passenger Railway Company of the City of Montreal, providing for the inspection of milk, and forbidding the sale of spirits on Sundays. In 1872, while he was chairman of the finance committee, he successfully negotiated the first city loan on the London market, after the treasurer of Montreal, who had been sent to England for the purpose, had failed in face of various difficulties. In 1868 he was appointed alderman by the municipal council, and in June 1873, after some 10 ballots, his colleagues elected him acting mayor to succeed Francis CASSIDY, who had died in office. The following year he was re-elected to this post by popular vote.

The municipal administration, under Mayor Bernard, laid out Mount Royal Park, rented Île Sainte-Hélène from the federal government for a park, acquired the former Protestant cemetery, which subsequently became Dufferin Park, and began the construction of the city hall. In 1875 Bernard did not stand for the mayoralty; he retired from public life, and went to California a few months before his death.

In 1852, in the parish of Notre-Dame, Bernard had married Sarah Couch. As Bernard's wife was Catholic and he was Protestant, she received dispensation from the reading of the bans. However, their seven children were baptized at the St James Methodist Church. Bernard was a member of the Grand (Orange) Lodge of Canada, in which he certainly held a high position; for proof one has only to look at the impressive list of officers of Canadian and American lodges who attended the demonstration in his honour at the time of his burial at Montreal.

LÉON LORTIE

AJM, Registre d'état civil (notes biographiques fournies par Jean-Jacques Lefebvre). AVM, Procès-verbaux du conseil municipal, 87, pp.209, 210–11; Procès-verbaux du conseil municipal, 92, pp.169–74; Procès-verbaux du comité des finances, année 1872, pp.365–66, 369–72, 381–83. Institut généalogique Drouin (Montréal), Aldis Bernard. Gazette (Montreal), 12 Dec. 1845; 6, 17 July 1876. L'Opinion publique (Montréal), 3 août 1876. Histoire de la Corporation de la Cité de Montréal, depuis son origine jusqu'à nos jours . . ., J.-C. Lamothe et al., édit. (Montréal, 1903), 213, 297, 299. "His worship, the mayor," Canadian Dental Assoc. J. (Toronto), XXXIII (1967), no.11, 30–40.

BERRY, JONATHAN, pioneer settler and sawyer; b. in England in 1787 and emigrated to New Brunswick in 1826; d. 26 Aug. 1878 at Berry's Mills, N.B.

Where Jonathan Berry first settled in New Brunswick is not known. His wife Mary (Tingley?) was born in New Brunswick; it would appear from the birth dates of their children that he married sometime after his arrival. By the year 1840 he was living on a small tract west of the tiny settlement now known as Lutes Mountain (near Moncton). In 1844 a survey, under the direction of Sir James Edward Alexander*, for a proposed military road in New Brunswick passed through this region. Although the road did not materialize, the mountain settlements began to prosper. Shipbuilding in the area was expanding rapidly and the railways were soon to come. Berry received title to 100 acres, a portion of which he had already cleared and on which he had built a house. On 9 Jan. 1846 he petitioned for 200 acres adjoining his land and received the grant on 4 Feb. 1847.

Sometime after 1851, Berry established a sawmill driven by water power; the venture proved successful and later a grist mill was added by his son Thomas Berry. The Berrys' customers were the other settlers in the area, all of whom were building wooden houses, the shipbuilders in Moncton, and, later, the railways. As always in pioneer days, it was not long before a settlement developed near these convenient mills, and, in deference to the man who had established them, the settlement took the name of Berry's Mills, which it retains to this day. In 1870 the tracks of the Intercolonial Railway were laid across Berry's property and Berry's Mills became a station on the new line.

When Jonathan Berry died in 1878, he left as a permanent epitaph the prosperous farming settlement which bears his name and which was established because of his pioneering skill and foresight.

C. ALEXANDER PINCOMBE

New Brunswick Crown Lands Office (Fredericton), Memorials and grants, 3721. PAC, MG 9, A12, 11, Census of the parishes of Botsford and Moncton, 1861. Hutchinson's New Brunswick directory for 1867–1868 (2nd ed., Saint John, N.B., [n.d.]), 559. C. A. Pincombe, "The history of Monckton Township (ca. 1700–1875)," unpublished MA thesis, University of New Brunswick, 1969, 150–51.

BERTHELET, ANTOINE-OLIVIER, businessman, MHA, and philanthropist; b. 25 May 1798 at Montreal, son of Pierre Berthelet*, a doctor who had become wealthy through trade, and Marguerite Viger; d. 25 Sept. 1872 in the same town.

Antoine-Olivier Berthelet was educated at the college of Montreal, where his fellow-students included Côme-Séraphin Cherrier*, John Donegani*, and Édouard-Raymond Fabre*. On his father's death in 1830, he launched out into business. He had foreseen that the town of Montreal would develop rapidly eastwards, and he bought up huge stretches of land which he sold again at a profit or made over as outright gifts to charitable institutions. As member of the assembly for Montreal East from 1832 to 1834, Berthelet realized that politics was not the field in which he could most usefully serve his compatriots. He did however lend his name and prestige to patriotic organizations. Thus he was one of the members of the Fils de la Liberté in 1837; however, he does not seem to have favoured recourse to arms. Berthelet likewise joined the Institut Canadien in Montreal, but he resigned after the intervention of Bishop Ignace Bourget*, who in 1858 condemned the institute and its liberalism. He belonged to a generation among whom by far the most widely held opinion was that Catholicism was one of the elements essential to French Canadian patriotism.

His great-grandson, the engineer Alfred Larocque, has demonstrated that during the last 25 years of his life Antoine-Olivier Berthelet lived in retirement from business and devoted himself entirely to charitable works. According to statistics prepared by Larocque, he gave more than $400,000, an incredible sum for the period, to charitable and educational institutions. In addition there were other acts of generosity of which the extent is not known. There was virtually no community in Montreal that did not benefit from his liberality: Sisters of Providence, Society of Jesus, Oblates of Mary Immaculate, Sisters of Mercy, Good Shepherd Nuns, Sisters of St Ann, Society of the Sacred Heart, Brothers of Charity, and so on. All these religious groups still exist today, and several owe their survival to the timely bounty of Antoine-Olivier Berthelet. In 1868, when Zouaves were being recruited to defend the papal states, he contributed personally as president of the committee, and from his own funds assumed the travel and maintenance costs for 20 soldiers of the pope.

The flourishing development of charitable works that marked Bishop Bourget's episcopate has been rightly admired, but it is fair to say that this success would have been neither so spectacular nor so durable if the bishop had not had the full collaboration of someone who might be called his minister of finance; a finance minister of a rare kind who did not seek to get the money from the pockets of others, but who taxed himself. Indeed, in his last years Antoine-Olivier Berthelet reduced his style of living in order to be able to give more.

In 1844, Cardinal Joseph Fransoni, prefect of the Propaganda, addressed a letter of thanks to him for his services to the church, and sent him a medal bearing the effigy of Gregory XVI; in 1864, Father Pierre Beck, general of the Society of Jesus, granted him the title of distinguished benefactor; and in 1869 he was named commander of the Order of Pius IX, in recognition of the outstanding part he had taken in the recruitment and organization of the Zouaves.

Antoine-Olivier Berthelet died on 25 Sept. 1872; his funeral took place at Notre-Dame, and attracted a large crowd. It was the collective farewell of all Montreal to a man who had only friends and who had given happiness to many. His body was placed in the church of Saint-Joseph, which he had built in Rue Cathédrale and which he had subsequently made over to the Grey Nuns. When this church was demolished in 1930 his remains were moved to the cemetery of the Grey Nuns' mother house.

On 30 Oct. 1822 Berthelet had married Marie-Angélique Chaboillez, by whom he had a daughter, Amélia, who married François-Alfred-Chartier Larocque. Of his second marriage with Charlotte, Louis Guy's daughter, there were no children.

Léon Pouliot

[At the time of Berthelet's death many biographical sketches were published by the newspapers. The most important is the one which appeared in Le Nouveau Monde (Montreal) between 27 Sept. and 8 Oct. 1872. L.P.]

ASJCF, 2286, 5; 3098; 3175, 15. F.-J. Audet, Les députés de Montréal, 107–12. Borthwick, Montreal, 49. L'Institut de la Providence; histoire des Filles de la Charité Servantes des Pauvres dites sœurs de la Providence (6v., Montréal, 1925–40), VI, 265–313. É.-Z. Massicotte, "Un philanthrope canadien-français, M. A.-O. Berthelet," BRH, XXII (1916), 183–85. Léon Trépanier, "Un philanthrope d'autrefois: Antoine-Olivier Berthelet," SCHÉC Rapport, 1961, 19–25.

BETHUNE, ALEXANDER NEIL, Church of England clergyman and bishop; b. 28 Aug. 1800 at Williamstown, Charlottenburg Township, U.C., son of the Reverend John Bethune*, a loyalist, and Véronique Waddin; m. Jane Eliza, daughter of James Crooks*, and they had ten children, including Robert Henry, a founder and, for more than 20 years, cashier of the Dominion Bank, and Charles James Stewart*, who became headmaster of Trinity College School, Port Hope; d. 3 Feb. 1879 at Toronto, Ont.

A clergyman of the Church of Scotland, John Bethune emigrated to the Carolinas to be chaplain of a regiment of the Royal Militia. Captured soon after the outbreak of the American War of Independence, he made his way to Halifax and then lived for a number of years in Montreal, where he established its first Presbyterian church, the St Gabriel Street Church. In 1787 he moved to Charlottenburg; there Alexander Neil, the eighth of his nine children, was born. Other children were James Gray*, Angus*, and John Bethune.

From 1810 to 1812 Alexander Neil was a student at the grammar school run by the Reverend John Strachan* at Cornwall, Upper Canada. It was probably owing to Strachan's influence as well as that of Bethune's mother, who had a Reformed Church background, that both John and Alexander Neil entered the ministry of the Church of England. Alexander Neil's movements from 1812 to 1819 are not known for certain; he may have continued his schooling under his older brother John, incumbent in Elizabethtown and Augusta Townships from 1814 and then at Montreal from 1818, for in the autumn of 1819 Alexander Neil wrote from Montreal that he had determined to go to York (Toronto) "to place himself under the care and direction of Dr. Strachan, as a Student of Divinity, and to connect with this pursuit, such assistance in the Grammar School as a youth of nineteen could be expected to render."

From 1819 to 1823 Bethune remained at York as a student of divinity supported by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. He also assisted Strachan at St James' Church as an usher. On 24 Aug. 1823 Bethune was made a deacon by Bishop Jacob Mountain* in Quebec City. The following year, on 26 September, he was ordained a priest by Bishop Mountain. He had charge of the parish of The Forty (Grimsby), where he had served his diaconate, and was also responsible for an out-station at Twelve Mile Creek (St Catharines). In 1827 Bethune became the incumbent of the parish of Cobourg; he was later its rector and served there until 1867. In 1831 he made the first of a number of trips to England on behalf of the Church of England in the colony, on this occasion as secretary to Bishop Charles James Stewart* of Quebec, in support of the University of King's College at York and the Church of England's rights to the clergy reserves in Upper Canada, questions on which his views resembled closely those of Strachan.

While at Cobourg, Bethune also became first editor of the Church, a weekly newspaper that commenced publication 6 May 1837. He retained this position until 1841 when he resigned it to a layman, John Kent*, but in 1843 he once again became editor, commenting that "the excitement . . . amidst the clash and din of party strife, was too much for [Kent]." The decision to found a newspaper to represent "Church" opinion in the province came from the need to rally church support for its stand on the clergy reserves. Bethune, a man of not inconsiderable learning, had made a careful study of the whole question, and Strachan, chairman of the newspaper's committee, found in Bethune a man whom he could trust and in whom he could confide. Indeed Strachan directed much of the editorial policy.

At the beginning the newspaper had the respect of all sides of church opinion, for then, Bethune recalled, party spirit within the church was hardly known. But opposition was not long in developing: in 1841 Featherstone Lake Osler* noted that the Church, "Though not advocating the errors of the Oxford heresy, continually excuses them and sets forth the Church instead of Xt [Christ] set forth by the Church. The Editor . . . like the Bishop with whom he is an especial favourite is ultra high Church." In the next 30 years, during which more than half a million Irish poured into Canada West, the Church of England acquired a pronounced evangelical, low church flavour. To men of this persuasion, Bethune was a high churchman. There were two influences on Bethune in this regard. In reaction partly to the Methodists, he saw the Church of England as "the acknowledged bulwark of the Protestant faith, against Papal despotism and superstition, and the safe-guard of Gospel truth and order against the heretical and disorganizing principles of many modern dissenters." The other influence was Strachan, who had little respect for low churchmen. In the eyes of the Methodists and the steadily growing number of evangelicals within the church, Bethune came to be identified with the Anglo-Catholic movement which arose during the period of his editorship. His desire to be moderate and fair in assessing its leaders only exacerbated these feelings. When he wrote a balanced editorial on Henry Newman, who had gone over to the Roman Catholic Church, even Strachan admonished him.

The chief opponent of the Church was the Methodist newspaper, the Christian Guardian, edited by Egerton Ryerson*, which stoutly resisted the exclusive claims of the Church of England in the colony to the clergy reserves. Ryerson reflected the opinion of the Methodists and other bodies dissenting from the eligible established churches in objecting to government support of religious groups, on the grounds that it favoured some to the disadvantage of others and that the revenue would be better spent in such fields as public education and roads. He spoke against the bill of 1840 which proposed that the land be sold after existing obligations were honoured and the proceeds distributed to the various churches, but eventually resigned himself to the measure. Strachan, on the other hand, opposed the bill because it deprived "the national church of nearly three-fourths of her acknowledged property," and declared that "it attempts to destroy all distinction between truth and falsehood . . . its anti-Christian tendencies lead directly to infidelity, and will reflect disgrace on the Legislature, I give it my unqualified opposition." As for Bethune, he wrote in the Church: "we shall feel it a duty to inculcate obedience to it as the law of the land, and to render it as beneficial as possible for the object intended. It is with all well-disposed persons a subject for congratulation that a topic of grievance has thus been removed."

Though Bethune had regarded the lands and revenues of the clergy reserves not merely as the unquestioned gift of a sovereign to his church in the colonies, but also as the only safeguard against the dissidence of many competing religious bodies, he was not built to relish the noise of battle and was visibly relieved at what he thought was a final settlement of such a vexatious issue. Bethune was a man of peace, one who wanted stability and who in the interests of quiescence would attach his loyalty to the settlement. He gladly followed the lead of Strachan, but would have been content to settle for less than his master.

When the diocese of Toronto was carved out of that of Quebec in 1839, Strachan became its first bishop and he appointed Bethune as one of his chaplains. In October 1841 Strachan asked his chaplains, Bethune, Henry James Grasett*, and Henry Scadding*, to draw up a plan for training divinity students pending the establishment of a regular college. The plan was submitted, and on 27 November Strachan announced the appointment of Bethune, though he did not have a degree, as professor of theology. The Diocesan Theological Institution opened in Cobourg in January 1842 with 15 students but was attended by indifferent success. There were complaints about both the quality of the students and their training; for the first three years Bethune was both principal and staff, and this together with the many other demands on his time helps to explain the low academic standards. But the greatest problem Bethune encountered had to do with churchmanship. As the decade wore on there appeared increasing opposition to the school on the part of the low churchmen, particularly in the western part of the province. Its opponents referred to it as a "hot bed of Tractarianism," an accusation Strachan in particular resented as false and malicious. This difficult and often stormy part of Bethune's ministry was brought to an end when the school was merged with the University of Trinity College, opened in Toronto in 1852.

Strachan had appointed Bethune his ecclesiastical commissary for the archdeaconry of York in 1845 with the title of "the Reverend Official." Though burdened with responsibilities, Strachan had felt unable to relinquish the post of archdeacon of York for financial reasons, and this arrangement permitted him to devote his time to his duties as bishop. Then, in 1847, the bishop collated Bethune into the archdeaconry of York upon his own resignation from that position. Bethune gave up the editorship of the Church and became the chief administrative assistant of Bishop Strachan while remaining principal of the college. He made regular visitations of the parishes, checking church buildings and rectories, reviewing parish registers, advising on pastoral problems, and making reports to the bishop. From 1847 to 1850 he visited about 127 churches and mission stations, in an area that extended westward through the province from Oshawa. The archdeaconry was a post Bethune filled with diligence, and it immersed him in the day-to-day problems of the diocese.

Strachan prevailed upon King's College, Aberdeen, of which both he and Bethune's father were graduates, to confer upon his archdeacon the degree of doctor of divinity in 1847, and ten years later Trinity College conferred upon him the honorary degree of Doctor of Canon Law. In the spring of 1852 Bethune went to England at Strachan's bidding to raise financial support for Trinity College, founded after Strachan's former creation, the University of King's College, had been secularized into the University of Toronto. Bethune was also his church's spokesman in England during the final battle over the clergy reserves. He met with limited success in both tasks. He was unable to shake the determination of the Lord Aberdeen ministry to comply with the demand from the administration of Francis Hincks* in Canada that an imperial act be passed enabling the provincial legislature to make a final settlement on the clergy reserves. Nor did he receive the response to his appeal for funds which he had expected: he often felt "baffled and disappointed," but considered that "fully £5,000 [would] be realized in all."

In July 1857 the first subdivision of the diocese of Toronto took place when the diocese of Huron was carved out of its southwestern portion. Bethune entered the first of his three episcopal elections and lost to Benjamin Cronyn, the Irish rector of London. When the diocese of Ontario was created from the eastern portion of the diocese of Toronto in 1862, Bethune was again a candidate but withdrew before the certain success of another Irishman, the 36-year-old rector of Brockville, John Travers Lewis*. In both elections, Bethune lost to local candidates with strong popular support. In addition, however, the growing strength in numbers and influence of the evangelical, low church wing was an obstacle to Bethune; he was regarded by many of its sympathizers as a high churchman, and by some as a Tractarian. Moreover, the opposition to Strachan, fostered by his dislike of low churchmen and by his driving personality, spilled over onto Bethune, popularly regarded as the bishop's favourite.

On 21 Sept. 1866, however, Bethune came into his own when Strachan at 88 requested a coadjutor to assist him. The synod elected Bethune on the ninth ballot, but only after Provost George Whitaker* of Trinity College, who had consistently led in the voting, asked after the eighth ballot that his name be withdrawn. Bethune had ranked third in both clerical and lay voting, taking about one-quarter of the clerical votes but one-fifth of the lay vote, trailing Whitaker and Thomas Brock Fuller*. The only other serious contender was Grasett, now rector of St James' Cathedral in Toronto. Bethune took the title of bishop of Niagara and was consecrated by Strachan in St James' Cathedral, 25 Jan. 1867.

Later in 1867 Bethune represented the diocese of Toronto in place of the failing Strachan at the first Lambeth Conference, in England. He returned to Toronto just before Strachan's funeral on 5 November. Bethune had succeeded his mentor on 1 Nov. 1867, and adopted as his signature "A. N. Toronto." He resigned both the rectory of Cobourg and the archdeaconry of York. He continued as bishop of Toronto until his death in 1879.

Bethune's tenure as second bishop of Toronto commenced with a memorial from his clergy expressing their "dutiful submission; of sincere regard for your person and office; and of our purpose, by God's help, to do all we can to render your Episcopate a blessing to yourself and to the Diocese." Events, however, proved the contrary. An articulate, powerful, low church laity fought the reverberations in Canada of the Oxford movement and Tractarian influence. There was a controversy over vestments with William Arthur Johnson, the most advanced of the Tractarians in the diocese. On the other hand, Grasett was asked to answer charges of "depraving the doctrine and discipline of the Church" by setting up a rival Church of England Evangelical Association in 1868 which drained off support of missionary efforts of the official Church Society. The low churchmen in 1873 created the Church Association to maintain Reformation principles, founded a rival newspaper, the Evangelical Churchman, in 1876, and established the Protestant Episcopal Divinity School (later Wycliffe College) in 1877 as a rival seminary to Trinity College for training divinity students. Finally, in 1878 the low church party thwarted Bethune's attempt to gain the assistance of a coadjutor bishop when the laity prevented the election of Whitaker. Bethune dismissed the synod, resigned to go to the end alone. He protested, in vain, against the rival associations, but they were symptomatic of the deep divisions within the diocese.

During his episcopate the Church of England in Ontario continued to grow with the expanding population. In 1869 the question of a division of the diocese of Toronto was raised once more. The proposal was a fourfold split, with the diocese of Toronto retaining the counties of Peel, York, Halton, Ontario, and Wellington, and the remainder being divided into three districts: Northern (Simcoe County and Algoma District west to the diocese of Rupert's Land), Western (to include the counties of Welland, Lincoln, Haldimand, and Wentworth), and Eastern (Peterborough, Northumberland, Durham, and Victoria counties). There the proposal rested until 1872 when Bethune announced that the SPG was prepared to help endow the proposed diocese of Algoma, on condition that in Canada a sum of at least £4,000 was raised for the same purpose before the end of 1875. In November 1872, Bethune, who had accepted the SPG's offer, attended an informal meeting with the other bishops in Ottawa where it was decided to raise a new bishop's salary immediately by assessment. The following month an election for Algoma was held but the bishop-elect declined the post. Nothing was done until the Toronto synod met in June 1873 and authorized the provincial synod to proceed to the election of a bishop for "the Northern and Missionary Diocese of Algoma." Bishop Bethune was empowered to appoint a clergyman to supervise the work until an election was held. Frederick Dawson Fauquier*, who had studied under Bethune at Cobourg, was consecrated first bishop of Algoma in October 1873. In 1875 the diocese of Niagara was also created out of the western district, and Fuller became its first bishop.

Alexander Neil Bethune was pre-eminently a gentle and mild individual, and a contrast to Strachan, the first bishop. The Reverend John Langtry* commented: "no two men could be more unlike than they. Bishop Strachan was a man of war from his youth. . . . The ideal of Bishop Bethune's life, whether consciously or not, was that of one who was trying above all things to live peaceably with all men. He was a man of high intellectual gifts, and of extensive reading, of gentle and refined disposition, but of a reserved and unemotional character. . . . Bishop Bethune seldom or never got angry. He was distressed by the waywardness and rough tempers of others; but as the result of it all, he lived an unruffled life."

Bethune, without Strachan's fearless abilities as a strategist, inherited in no small measure the opposition which Strachan's methods and policies had stirred up. It was his misfortune to be bishop at the height of the storm, and his episcopate might have appeared more successful under other circumstances.

Bethune did not show the antipathy Strachan did toward low churchmen, but he did feel them to be deficient in a sense of beauty in worship and in obligation to maintain church order and discipline. He was a "high" churchman in the sense that he maintained a high estimate of the church, its ministry, and its sacraments. He had a high (and somewhat exclusive) interpretation of the church and would never allow the doctrine of justification by faith, on which the evangelicals laid so much stress, to be divorced from Christ's body the church. He was particularly distressed when the visible expression of the church's unity in the diocese was rent by the creation of rival organizations to official bodies.

Bethune was an example to all in his industry, his integrity, his loving manner, and his impartiality. He possessed conviction, but was an intensely humble man. His love of beauty and correctness in worship was interpreted by many in those unsettled times simply as a sign of "high church," and his humility was taken by many for weakness. His message was largely lost on his generation.

ARTHUR N. THOMPSON

A. N. Bethune, The clergy reserve question in Canada (London, 1853); Memoir of the Right Reverend John Strachan, D.D., LL.D. . . . first bishop of Toronto (Toronto, 1870); Sermons, on the liturgy of the Church of England; with introductory discourses on public worship and forms of prayer (York, 1829).

PAO, A. N. Bethune papers; John Strachan letter books, 1827–39, 1854–62; John Strachan papers. Trinity College Archives (Toronto), Bethune papers. A. B. Jameson, Winter studies and summer rambles in Canada, ed. J. J. Talman and E. M. Murray (Toronto, 1943). Susanna Moodie, Roughing it in the bush or forest life in Canada (Toronto, 1913). [Ryerson], Story of my life (Hodgins). Henry Scadding, The first bishop of Toronto; a review and a study (Toronto, 1868); Toronto of old. Henry Scadding and J. C. Dent, Toronto: past and present: historical and descriptive; a memorial volume for the semi-centennial of 1884

(Toronto, 1884). John Strachan, A letter to the Rev. A. N. Bethune, rector of Cobourg, on the management of grammar schools ([York], 1829).

Church (Cobourg; Toronto; Hamilton), 6 May 1837 to 1856. Church Chronicle (Toronto), 1863–70. Church of England, Synod of the Diocese of Toronto, Journal . . . adjourned meeting of the fourteenth session (Toronto), 1866; Proceedings (Toronto), 1853–64; Journals (Toronto), 1865–79. Cobourg Star, 1831, 1837–50, 1851, 1861. Dominion Churchman (Toronto), 1875–79. Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, Reports (London), 1819–60.

W. P. Bull, From Strachan to Owen: how the Church of England was planted and tended in British North America (Toronto, [1937]). J. G. Harkness, Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry: a history, 1784–1945 (Oshawa, Ont., 1946). History of the separation of church and state in Canada, ed. E. B. Stimson (Toronto, 1887). A history of the University of Trinity College, Toronto, 1852–1952, ed. T. A. Reed (Toronto, 1952). The jubilee volume of Wycliffe College (Toronto, 1927). T. R. Millman, The life of the Right Reverend, the Honourable Charles James Stewart, D.D., Oxon., second Anglican bishop of Quebec (London, Ont., 1953). O. R. Rowley, The Anglican episcopate of Canada and Newfoundland (London and Milwaukee, Wis., 1928). Trinity, 1852–1952 (Toronto, 1952). R. J. Powell, "The coming of the loyalists," Annals of the Forty (Grimsby, Ont.), I (1950). A. H. Young, "The Bethunes," Ont. Hist., XXVII (1931), 553–74.

BETHUNE, JOHN, Anglican clergyman, dean of the diocese of Montreal, acting principal of McGill University; b. 5 Jan. 1791 at Charlottenburg (Williamstown), U.C.; d. 22 Aug. 1872 in Montreal, Que.

John Bethune, brother of Alexander Neil Bethune, was the third son of Véronique Waddin and the Reverend John Bethune*, a minister of the Church of Scotland. During the American Revolution, the elder Bethune served as chaplain in the 84th Regiment (Royal Highland Emigrants). Upon its demobilization he took up residence in Montreal, and in March 1786 organized that city's earliest Presbyterian congregation (later First Presbyterian Church of Montreal). In 1787 he moved to the Scots and American royalist settlement in Glengarry, west of Lake St Francis.

John Bethune the younger was schooled by the Reverend John Strachan* at Kingston and Cornwall, and later taught under him. Having been received into the Church of England, he studied for holy orders under Strachan's direction. He was the first product of the Church of England's "Experiment in Home Education," the training of Canadians for the ministry. He served the Cornwall Anglicans as a layreader between 1812 and 1814, when he was ordained in Quebec's Holy Trinity cathedral by Bishop Jacob Mountain*. He was then posted to the mission of the townships of Augusta and Elizabethtown, the latter of which contained the substantial settlement of Brockville, and was "adopted" by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. An active missionary, he served his own district and itinerated widely beyond it among the Rideau River settlements. At the same time, he taught in the Eastern District grammar school, Cornwall. At this stage of his career Bethune appears as the protégé of Strachan, like the master "rather sanguine and partial in views" on the status of the Church of England.

In 1818 Bethune was posted to Montreal as minister of Christ Church and first rector of the Anglican parish of Montreal, which the provincial government had set up that year, its boundaries to be coterminous with those of the Roman Catholic parish of Notre-Dame. The parishes included all of the city of Montreal and its suburbs. As rector, Bethune made his presence felt. The new Christ Church, begun on Notre-Dame Street in 1805, was completed and freed of debt. It was consecrated in 1830 by Bishop Charles James Stewart*. Bethune multiplied agencies depending on Christ Church, many of which, though operated by that church, performed services open to all Montrealers. He organized a Sunday school, which also supplied secular instruction for adults. Aided by the National School Society, in 1819 he established a monitorial school (one in which the senior pupils taught the younger). The Pastoral Aid Society collected money to provide religious ministrations in outlying parts of Montreal. The Committee of Managers for the Poor was reorganized to cope with destitution. Poverty had been greatly aggravated by the termination of the War of 1812–14 and the Napoleonic wars in 1815, bringing a dislocation of the economy and adding large numbers of immigrants. The magnitude of the problem drove Bethune into active cooperation with interdenominational groups: the Montreal Dispensary, the Ladies Benevolent Society, and the Montreal General Hospital (1822). In 1828 Bethune acted as editor of the Montreal Anglican newspaper, the Christian Sentinel and Anglo-Canadian Churchman's Magazine. He was among the founders of the Montreal St George's Society and the German Society; the latter claimed his interest through his mother, who was of Swiss descent.

In November 1835 Bethune was appointed principal pro tem. of McGill University. He pressed at once for the erection of suitable buildings and for the teaching of disciplines other than medicine, the only faculty with which the college had opened in 1829. (Medicine at that time occupied quarters in the lower town.) Bethune's proposals involved him with the Royal Institution for the Advancement of Learning. This was the body that held in trust the property left by James McGill* in 1813 to endow a university or college. It named the governors of the college, principal, and staff, all subject to the approval of the secretary of state for the colonies. Though over 20 years had passed since McGill's death, and six since the college had opened, much of the money was still held up in litigation, and the governors of the college were still not free of the supervision of the Royal Institution. In spite of the battle with the Royal Institution for funds, the governors, led by Bethune, succeeded in getting plans approved and building under way. By September 1843 the central section of the arts building and the principal's residence were completed. Teaching, chiefly in classical languages and mathematics, began with three students, two of them nephews of the principal, who acted as professor of divinity as well. These achievements were suitably recognized in the same year by the awarding to Bethune of an honorary DD by McGill University. He had received a similar award from Columbia University in 1837.

Ironically, the president of the Royal Institution was Bethune's own bishop, George Jehoshaphat Mountain*. He not only shared the Royal Institution's alarm at the unauthorized, mounting debts of the governors, but he distrusted Bethune's claim to exclusive Anglican control over McGill. This claim to exclusiveness also alienated non-Anglicans and encouraged rival institutions, the Canada Baptist College and the High School of Montreal. Within McGill, friction developed between Bethune and the vice-principal, the Reverend Francis James Lundy*. Lundy was dismissed, but Bethune's own position was in jeopardy. On 3 April 1846 he too was dismissed by the secretary of state for the colonies, William Ewart Gladstone, acting in large measure on the advice of Bishop Mountain.

Interacting with Bethune's McGill principalship was a phase of his masonic life. He was a prominent member of the senior lodge in Montreal, Saint Paul's, and deputy grand master of the Provincial Grand Lodge of Montreal and William Henry (Sorel) from 1824 to 1846. Lundy was also a member of Saint Paul's (by affiliation), and when the feud between the two men developed, Saint Paul's Lodge appears to have tried to mediate. It was unsuccessful, the lodge itself tending to divide. The controversy may have had some bearing on the determination to establish an autonomous grand lodge for Canada. The Provincial Grand Lodge, which was subordinate to the United Grand Lodge of England, was not competent to deal with all questions referred to it. The Grand Lodge of Canada was set up in 1850.

The erection in July 1850 of the diocese of Montreal brought Bethune fresh responsibilities. He became rector of Christ Church Cathedral, and, in 1854, dean, the first in Canada to receive that dignity. He fully supported Bishop Francis Fulford* in the building of the second Christ Church Cathedral, 1856–59, and was his commissary during the bishop's frequent absences. He presided over the special synod 1868–69 that chose Fulford's successor, Ashton Oxenden*. Bethune's ministry in Montreal extended over 54 years and ended only with his death.

He was predeceased by his wife, Elizabeth Hallowell, whom he had married on 28 Aug. 1816. The couple had 11 children, five of whom survived infancy. The eldest son, Strachan Bethune* QC, was chancellor of the diocese of Montreal, 1868–1910.

JOHN IRWIN COOPER

McCord Museum (McGill University, Montreal), Masonic collection, letters and memoranda. McGill University Archives, Minutes of the board of the Royal Institution for the Advancement of Learning, 1835–46; Principal's records, accession nos.447–94. Masonic Memorial Temple (Montreal), Grand Lodge of Quebec, "Masonic membership in Quebec, 1760–1960," comp. A. J. B. Milborne. Montreal Diocesan Archives (Anglican Church of Canada), Francis Fulford papers. Church of England, Church Society of the Diocese of Montreal, Annual Reports (Montreal), 1850–58; Church Society of the Diocese of Quebec, Annual Reports (Quebec), 1842–50; Synod of the Diocese of Montreal, Proceedings (Montreal), 1859–73. History and by-laws of Saint Paul's Lodge, no.374... (Montreal, 1876), 183.

F. D. Adams, A history of Christ Church Cathedral, Montreal (Montreal, 1941), 64–65. Newton Bosworth, Hochelaga depicta; or, a new picture of Montreal, embracing the early history and present state of the city and island of Montreal . . . (1st ed., Montreal, 1839), 124–27, 185–86. Campbell, Hist. of Scotch Presbyterian Church, 21–31. J. I. Cooper, The blessed communion; the origins and history of the diocese of Montreal, 1760–1960 (Montreal, 1960), 83–85. J. H. Graham, Outlines of the history of freemasonry in the province of Quebec (Montreal, 1892), 193. J. G. Hodgins, The establishment of schools and colleges in Ontario, 1792–1910 (3v., Toronto, 1910), II, 199, 200, 202, 204. T. R. Millman, Jacob Mountain, 147; The life of the Right Reverend, the Honourable Charles James Stewart, D.D., Oxon., second Anglican bishop of Quebec (London, Ont., 1953), 69, 80, 92, 190; "The Very Reverend John Bethune, D.D., LL.D.," McGill News (Montreal), XXIV, no.4 (1942–43), 16–18, 57. A. H. Young, "The Bethunes," Ont. Hist., XXVII (1931), 553–74.

BÉTOURNAY, LOUIS, lawyer and judge;

b. Saint-Lambert, Chambly County, L.C., 13 Nov. 1825; d. Saint-Boniface, Man., 30 Oct. 1879.

Louis Bétournay was the son of Pierre Bétournay (who died before his birth) and Archange Vincent, and fifth-generation descendant of Adrien Bétourné, dit La Violette, soldier of the Carignan-Salières regiment, and Marie Deshaies. Educated at the college of Montreal, Bétournay subsequently studied law with the future judge Joseph-Ubalde BEAUDRY. He was called to the bar in February 1849 and practised law in Saint-Lambert and later in Montreal in a legal firm with George-Étienne CARTIER and François-Pierre Pominville. He served on the Montreal city council from 1870 to November 1872. Created a QC in 1872, he was appointed, on 31 October of that year, through the influence of his law partner, Cartier, puisne judge of the Court of Queen's Bench in the newly formed province of Manitoba, the first French Canadian to be appointed to a superior court west of Lake Superior. Leaving Montreal on 10 December, in company with Captain, the Viscount Louis Frasse de Plainval, chief of the Manitoba constabulary, he reached Fort Garry (Winnipeg) ten days later.

Bétournay's duties were not limited to those of a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench, but included those of a county court judge and police magistrate as well. He was a member of the court which ordered Ambroise-Dydime Lépine*, Louis Riel*'s principal lieutenant, to stand trial in 1873 for the execution of Thomas Scott* during the Red River troubles. In accordance with the bilingual character of Manitoba at this time, Bétournay addressed the jury in French, and his colleague on the bench, James Charles MCKEAGNEY, spoke in English. As a result of his role in the Lépine trial, Bétournay gained the ill will of many of the French-speaking inhabitants of the province. In consequence, little mention was made of his activities in the local French-language newspaper, Le Métis.

Louis Bétournay was an urbane gentleman, who had a fine library. He was fond of horses, even though on several occasions he suffered injury while riding or driving. He possessed a strong sense of duty, and despite the fact that he suffered from dropsy in his later years, did not neglect his judicial responsibilities. He finally succumbed to his affliction at the age of 54.

On 3 March 1859 Bétournay had married Marie Mercil (Mercille) of Saint-Lambert. There were ten children by the marriage, the eldest of whom was 16 at the time of the father's death. Madame Bétournay survived her husband by 43 years, dying in Saint-Boniface in 1922.

GEORGE F. G. STANLEY

Archives de l'archevêché de Saint-Boniface (Man.), Correspondance de l'archevêché. Le Métis (Saint-Boniface), 21 déc., 28 déc. 1872; 3 nov., 11 nov. 1879. La Minerve (Montréal), 3 nov. 1879. Ottawa Daily Free Press, 4 Nov. 1879. Dom. ann. reg., 1879, 386. Stanley, Louis Riel, 193, 194, 210. J.-J. Lefebvre, "Louis Bétournay (1825–1879), premier juge canadien-français d'une Cour supérieure dans l'Ouest canadien," BRH, LVIII (1952) 29–31. E. K. Williams, "Aspects of the legal history of Manitoba," HSSM, Papers, 3rd ser., no.4 ([1948]), 59–60.

BETTRIDGE (Betteridge), WILLIAM CRADDOCK, soldier and Church of England clergyman; b. Warwickshire, England, 30 Aug. 1791; d. Strathroy, Ont., 21 Nov. 1879.

William Craddock Bettridge joined the 81st foot as an ensign, 7 April 1813, and saw service in the Low Countries; he was town adjutant of Brussels during the battle of Waterloo. He became a lieutenant, 31 Aug. 1815, and was retired on half-pay, 25 Feb. 1816. After the war he travelled in Europe and was, by his own account, a student at the University of Jena (where he matriculated on 24 Oct. 1817), a soldier in the employ of Ferdinand I, king of the Two Sicilies, and an aide to General Sir Richard Church.

When Bettridge returned to England, he was made deacon by the archbishop of York, 18 July 1824, and was appointed assistant curate of Ecclesfield, near Sheffield, Yorkshire, where he had married Mary Hounsfield in 1823. He was admitted to St John's College, Cambridge, on 15 June 1824 without coming into residence and was ordained 18 Dec. 1825, the day he went to his second curacy at Elvington, near York. From 1828 to 1833 he was in charge of the newly opened St Paul's Church, Southampton. He was accepted in 1834 as a missionary for Upper Canada by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel and went out that spring with Admiral Henry Vansittart* and the other military and naval personnel who were founding the town of Woodstock. In 1836 he became rector of the parish and remained so until his death in 1879.

Determining to go home on private business in 1837, Bettridge accepted the additional duty of forming a deputation, along with Benjamin CRONYN, from the church of Upper Canada to the English people. He arrived in Liverpool 18 March 1837 and for the next 17 months toured England and preached the cause of the Canadian church. His A brief history of the church in Upper Canada, published in 1838, is less a history than a compilation of the deputation's letters and appeals. While in England he paid the fees of £40 and proceeded to the degree of Bachelor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge in 1837.

The SPG and the newly formed Upper Canada Clergy Society both attested to the interest Bettridge was able to arouse in England. Collections in excess of £3,000 were received. Six months after his return to Canada, however, Bettridge reported that the sums raised were more than swallowed by his expenses. John Strachan*, just appointed bishop of Toronto, set up a commission of inquiry headed by George Okill Stuart*, archdeacon of Kingston, and weighted by the inclusion of William Henry Draper, attorney general of Canada West. Bettridge appeared before the commission in Toronto on and after 10 June 1840, and admitted the irregularity of his accounts, but "he had sufficient else to do, and . . . account keeping was and is his antipathy." The commission found that he had made no distinction between church expenses and his own and that he could give no proper account of a sum in excess of £1,000.

The commission's findings were reported to William Howley, archbishop of Canterbury, who stated that Bettridge "[had] not acted in such a manner as to bring himself under the cognisance of the Ecclesiastical or Civil Law." Bettridge was not, therefore, disciplined, except by Strachan who refused to include the parish in his visitation for one year. After that, Bettridge made his peace with his bishop, and remained the respected rector of Woodstock. Bishop Cronyn appointed him rural dean in the diocese of Huron after its creation, and canon of St Paul's Cathedral, London. He was an able clergyman, "very rubrical," and of robust health. He retired in 1874 and died in Strathroy in 1879 at the home of his son, Dr William Bettridge.

J. L. H. Henderson

W. C. Bettridge, A brief history of the church in Upper Canada . . . (London, 1838).

PAO, John Strachan papers, "Bettridge case," 10–18 June 1840, papers in connection with the commission appointed to enquire into and report upon charges against the Rev. Wm. Bettridge of Woodstock. Dom. ann. reg., 1879, 386–87. [John Morris], Old St. Paul's Church, 100th anniversary, 1834–1934 ([Woodstock, Ont., 1934]).

BIDWELL, MARSHALL SPRING, lawyer and politician; b. 16 Feb. 1799 in Stockbridge, Mass., son of Barnabas Bidwell* and Mary Gray; m. Clara Willcox of Bath, near Kingston, U.C., and they had four children; d. 24 Oct. 1872 in New York City, N.Y.

Marshall Spring's father, Barnabas Bidwell, who had been attorney general of Massachusetts, a member of Congress, and an ardent Jeffersonian, was forced to leave his home state in 1810 after he had been accused of malversation of funds. The family settled in Upper Canada at Bath just before the War of 1812. The young Bidwell was educated in the local schools and at home by his father who laid the foundation of his profound legal learning. When he was about 17 Marshall Spring was articled as a student to Daniel Washburn and Daniel Hagerman, barristers and attorneys-at-law in Kingston, where the Bidwell family soon moved, and in 1821 he was called to the bar. From the beginning he had outstanding and continuous success as a courtroom lawyer.

Marshall Spring Bidwell and his father first came into public prominence in Upper Canada in the early 1820s in connection with the "alien question": whether Americans who had come into the colony in the previous quarter century must undergo a complicated naturalization procedure before they could enjoy political and civil rights as British subjects. In 1821 the House of Assembly voted to expel Barnabas from the seat he had won a few weeks earlier, on the grounds that the charges earlier made against him in Massachusetts rendered him unfit to hold his seat. A law was subsequently passed obviously intended to exclude the elder Bidwell from membership. Thereupon Marshall Spring offered himself as a candidate at the ensuing by-election, but the returning officer declared him ineligible to be a candidate. Again in 1823 the matter came before the assembly, which now declared that the younger Bidwell was eligible for membership so far as allegiance was concerned. In a second by-election in 1823, however, he was again excluded by the returning officer, and again the assembly declared the election void. Finally, in the general elections of 1824, the returning officer allowed votes to be counted for him; he was elected and took his seat, despite a ruling by the British law officers that he as well as his father was not qualified for membership. He represented Lennox and Addington until defeated in 1836.

The assembly of 1824, for the first time in Upper Canada's history, contained a majority of members highly critical of the executive branch of government – that is, of the group soon to be known as the "Family Compact" – and determined to seek reform through new legislation. At the outset, the young Bidwell, still in his mid-twenties, took front rank as a leader of the assembly, working closely with his colleague from Lennox and Addington, Peter Perry*, and with Dr John Rolph*. Bidwell in the years 1825–28 moved the adoption of bills on such subjects as allowing benefit of defence counsel for persons tried for felony, providing for more equal distribution of the property of persons dying intestate, the abolition of imprisonment for debt and of punishment by whipping and the pillory, wider control by the assembly over the revenue and the post office, and the broadening of the law governing the solemnization of marriage. He also supported bills for the sale of the clergy reserves, with the proceeds to be used for erecting schools, and for the regulation of juries. These bills passed the assembly session after session but were as regularly thrown out by the Legislative Council. Bidwell also played a leading role in the protracted alien controversy, which resulted, in 1828, in the passage of a naturalization act acceptable to the American-born element in the province.

Party feelings and alignments were further inflamed and sharpened in 1827 by the Reverend John Strachan*'s "Ecclesiastical Chart," which inflated the strength of the Church of England in the province and accused Methodist clergymen of being agents of Americanization, and by the university charter, secured in England by Strachan, which reserved seats on the council of King's College to Anglicans. In response, the assembly set up a select committee, chaired by Marshall Spring Bidwell, to look into the danger of "ecclesiastical domination." Its report of 1828 is probably an accurate reflection of Bidwell's political outlook. It stated that the people of Upper Canada had a "strong aversion" to an established church and to "artificial distinctions between men of the same rank," that they demanded an educational system free of distinction based on "religious profession or belief," and that the university should not be "a school of politics or of sectarian views." On 28 May 1828 Bidwell wrote to his fellow Reformer, William Warren Baldwin*, that the affairs of the province were in a state of crisis because the government held "power, unaccompanied by any real responsibility, any practical accountability" and that "power, under such circumstances, will always be abused and its possessors corrupted." On the following 8 September, he assured Baldwin: "I shall be happy to consult with yourself and Mr. Rolph on the measures to be adopted to relieve the province from the evils which a family compact have brought upon it. . . . The whole system and spirit of the present administration need to be done away with." He also wrote on 7 Jan. 1829 to John Neilson*, the Quebec newspaperman and moderate Reformer, that changes would come about, not by making appeals to the British government, but by the people of Canada acting "with union and concert and tak[ing] such ground only as can be maintained by reason and truth."

In the elections of 1828 the Upper Canadian Reformers strengthened their majority in the assembly and proceeded to elect Bidwell speaker. At this time, before the advent of cabinet or responsible government, the speaker was not an impartial presiding officer; instead, he was an active, partisan politician. Bidwell's election, like that of Louis-Joseph PAPINEAU as speaker of the Lower Canadian assembly, marks him as the leader of his party. As speaker, however, he did not make motions or vote, and it is not possible to identify him directly with the work of the short parliament of 1829–30. It can be assumed, however, that he was a strong supporter of such bills as those to abolish imprisonment for debt, to sell the clergy reserves, and to broaden the law governing solemnization of marriage, as well as of numerous resolutions sharply critical of Lieutenant Governor Sir John Colborne* and the executive government.

In the 1830 elections enough seats changed hands to place the Reformers in a minority, and Bidwell resumed his role as Reform floor leader. Although outnumbered, he and his followers were often able to carry their measures, such as the intestate estates bill, through the house. A Tory newspaper explained the situation as follows: "Mr. Bidwell, notwithstanding the inferiority of his party both in talent and numbers, has acquired an influence in the present House, beyond any other member in it. . . . The ministerial party . . . have no acknowledged leader – no mutual understanding – and no common or uniform system of action . . . while the party of which Mr. Bidwell is the head . . . is a well-drilled and compact little body – always at their post, and always ready to follow their leader." Nevertheless, the Reformers were often outvoted, particularly in the matter of the several expulsions of William Lyon Mackenzie*, when Bidwell argued that "the utmost latitude [should be] given to the freedom of the Press" in a province where the executive had such "great influence." At the time of the last expulsion he accused the conservative majority of "making Mr. Mackenzie a man of the greatest importance in the eyes of the freeholders, who look on him as a martyr in the cause of their civil rights. In doing this what a spectacle you make of this House! You are injuring its character, preventing those enquiries to which its attention ought to be directed, conducting the most important matters in the most careless and hasty manner, and trifling with the important duties you were sent to fulfil." Bidwell's greatest coup in this parliament was his moving, early in 1834, an address to the king protesting against the British government's disallowance of banking bills passed by the legislature of Upper Canada; the address, which Mackenzie called "The Latest Declaration of Independence," passed with only one negative vote.

In the elections of 1834 the Reformers were again victorious and again Bidwell was elected speaker, despite Christopher Hagerman*'s charge that he was "a disloyal man . . . politically connected with persons desirous of separating this Province from the Mother country." As in the 1820s the assembly passed the usual bills on the reform programme, and added to them one to legalize voting by ballot, all of them being again thrown out by the Legislative Council. But as the province moved in to the boom years of the mid-1830s there were signs of a growing split between the Reform majority led by Bidwell and Perry and a small group of agrarian radicals, led by Mackenzie. The majority supported bills to build canals and to charter banks and insurance companies which Mackenzie vehemently opposed. After Mackenzie had brought in his bulky and indiscriminate Seventh report on grievances in 1835, Perry sought to dissociate himself from it, and it is probable that he was also speaking for Bidwell. The year before, at a political meeting, Perry had said that "no two persons disapproved more at times of Mr. Mackenzie's occasional violence, than Mr. Bidwell and himself."

At the beginning of 1836 the provincial political scene was quickened by the arrival of a new lieutenant governor, Sir Francis Bond HEAD, sent out by the Colonial Office to deal with the grievances listed in Mackenzie's Seventh report. Inexperienced in politics, of a volatile temperament, and totally ignorant of Upper Canada, Head was astounded when, in a personal interview, he was informed by Bidwell that the people had grievances not mentioned in Mackenzie's 553-page Report. From that time forward Head was suspicious of Bidwell, not understanding the growing rift between the latter and Mackenzie and the different approaches to reform of the two men.

Finding it necessary to enlarge the Executive Council, Head, in February 1836, appointed three new members: J. H. Dunn* and two well-known Reformers, Robert Baldwin* and John Rolph. Reform hopes were soon dashed, however, when in less than a month the entire Executive Council resigned on the ground that they were not being adequately consulted by the lieutenant governor. There then followed a bitter quarrel between Head and the Reform-dominated assembly. The latter adopted addresses to the king and to the British House of Commons, each signed by Mr Speaker Bidwell and each denouncing the lieutenant governor as despotic and deceitful. The assembly then voted to stop the supplies and shortly afterward Bidwell entered on the Journals of the house a letter from Mr Speaker Papineau, asserting that "The state of society all over continental America requires that the forms of its Government should approximate nearer to that selected . . . by the wise statesmen of the neighbouring Union." For his part, Head dissolved the legislature and plunged the province into one of the hottest election campaigns in its history. He was convinced that he "was sentenced to contend on the soil of America with Democracy," and that the leader of his "republican" opponents was Marshall Spring Bidwell.

The Reformers were routed in the 1836 elections, and among those not returned was Bidwell. In addition to the general swing against his party, there were probably some personal reasons for the speaker's defeat in Lennox and Addington. He had recently moved to Toronto as a better site for his growing law practice, and Canadian voters have often resisted non-resident candidacies. And Bidwell apparently did not campaign very hard in a heated political atmosphere that was not to his liking. At any rate he wrote to Robert Baldwin that "twelve years hard labour have exhausted my hopes, my strength . . . and I was unwilling to incur expence or trouble." Also, like other Reformers, Bidwell attributed his downfall to unfair tactics used by the other side. He now resolved to retire from politics, and he played no part in the events of the next year and a half culminating in the rebellion of December 1837.

While he was in political retirement, Bidwell, unknown to himself, was a central figure in a clash between Head and the Colonial Office that eventually led to the governor's resignation. In a dispatch of 5 April 1837, Head refused to restore George RIDOUT to offices from which he had been dismissed, and he also refused to appoint Bidwell to a judgeship. He stated that Bidwell's "legal acquirements are . . . superior to at least one of the individuals whom I have elevated. His moral character is irreproachable. . . . But, anxious as I am to give talent its due, yet I cannot but feel that the welfare and honour of this province depend on his Majesty never promoting a disloyal man." On 14 July Lord Glenelg insisted that Bidwell be offered the next vacancy on the Court of King's Bench, and on 10 September Head "determined to take upon myself the serious responsibility of positively refusing to place Mr. Bidwell on the Bench, or to restore Mr. George Ridout to the Judgeship from which I have removed him." On 24 November Glenelg informed Head that his resignation had been accepted. The colonial secretary regarded Head's disobedience in the Ridout affair as the more serious, but clearly Bidwell had, unwittingly, played a part in the recall of the lieutenant governor.

But Head was to have his revenge. Before

Glenelg's dispatch reached Toronto, Mackenzie's attempt at armed rebellion had been made and easily put down. Among the items left by the rebels as they scattered was a flag bearing the inscription "BIDWELL, AND THE GLORIOUS MINORITY! 1837, AND A GOOD BEGINNING." This was, in fact, an election banner dating back to 1831, with the date altered. A day or two later Head confronted Bidwell with the flag, stated that he could not guarantee him security of person or property in the existing excited state of feeling, and that he would give him a letter of protection if he would leave the province. Bidwell, later described by Egerton Ryerson* as having a "retiring, timid and even nervous" temperament, denied that he had had any part in the rebellion but nevertheless agreed to the governor's proposal that he leave Upper Canada forever. On 9 Dec. 1837 he crossed Lake Ontario to New York State. He carried with him a hastily written note from his old antagonist Christopher Hagerman which stated: "I have known you long and in some respects intimately and my respect for your private character as a neighbour and a friend arising from a knowledge of your amiable disposition in those relations of life which do not involve political controversy has impressed me so strong with feelings of friendship and esteem that I cannot now part with you perhaps forever without emotion."

This personal note did not prevent Hagerman, some weeks later, from stating in the Toronto Patriot that Bidwell had left Upper Canada after Head had offered him a choice between having letters addressed to him in the Toronto post office opened and read or having them returned to him unopened and leaving the province. The accusation brought Ryerson, the province's most powerful controversialist, into the lists on Bidwell's behalf. Ryerson had been Bidwell's political opponent from 1833 to 1836, but he was now convinced that the former speaker had "been banished for his talents and opinions," not his actions, and that whenever a people allowed their rulers to attach "pains and penalties . . . to opinions . . . that very moment they sign the death warrant of their own liberties, and become slaves." Ryerson's condemnation of Head has become the verdict of history.

Although most of the leading exiles of 1837 eventually returned to live in Canada, Bidwell never did. On at least two occasions in the 1840s attempts were made to secure his return but they came to nothing. He kept in touch with many Canadians and his later New York associates always regarded him as an authority on Canadian affairs. In 1872, shortly before his death, he paid a brief visit to Toronto, sharing a pew one Sunday morning with Ryerson.

Not long after he left the province Bidwell had two final contacts with its governors. In March 1838, when he was in Albany applying for admission to the New York bar, he accidentally met Sir George Arthur*, Head's successor, who had stopped to pay his respects to Governor William L. Marcy before continuing to Toronto. His finding Bidwell in the governor's residence immediately convinced Arthur that the former speaker must be an untrustworthy character, while his conversation with Arthur convinced Bidwell "that there will be no liberality under him." Shortly afterward, as he was passing through New York City on his return to England, Head invited Bidwell to call on him. At first their conversation was politely formal, but when Head informed him of the exchanges with Lord Glenelg about a judgeship, the usually mild Bidwell exclaimed that his banishment had been "exceedingly arbitrary, unjust and cruel." He probably now believed that Head had forced him to leave in order to score a point against the Colonial Office.

When Bidwell left Upper Canada more than two-thirds of his career still lay before him. At first he was despondent and pessimistic, writing to friends that he was too old "to get into business . . . in a strange land" where he had never practised his profession. Nevertheless, he was soon admitted to practise by both the state Supreme Court and the Court of Chancery, and after moving to New York City he was taken into partnership in George W. Strong's law firm. After Strong's death Bidwell continued as its senior figure in partnership with Strong's son, George Templeton, later joined by the latter's cousin, Charles Edward. The firm of Strong, Bidwell and Strong became one of the most eminent in the metropolis, and Bidwell was soon known as one of the most learned lawyers practising before the American courts, with an unrivalled knowledge of the law of real estate. In his diary, George Templeton Strong states that "we all leaned on him, too much for our own good. Instead of studying up a question, I usually went to Bidwell and received from him an off-hand abstract of all the cases bearing on it and of all the considerations on either side. He loved law as a pure science." Another associate remarked that Bidwell had "often said that he found far more entertainment in tracing some legal principle back through the Reports of the seventeenth century, than in perusing the most attractive work of fiction." He lectured frequently at the Columbia Law School, and in 1858 Yale University conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Laws.

According to William M. Evarts, Bidwell decided that "the circumstances which withdrew him" from Upper Canada must cause him "to abstain from any participation in active political affairs" in the United States. G. T. Strong also noted at Bidwell's death that it was "strange that this family, after so many years in New York, should have formed no positive friendships or alliances, especially considering poor, dear old Bidwell's warm-heartedness, geniality and strong social instincts. . . . I suppose poor Bidwell's Puritanic convictions led him to look on 'calls', tea parties, and all the little two-penny machinery of 'social' life as of the nature of evil, in spite of his own natural impulses." Throughout his life Bidwell was a devout Presbyterian and a temperance advocate, and in his New York years a faithful supporter of the American Bible Society and of other religious and charitable organizations and institutions.

Of his career in Upper Canada, Bidwell himself wrote the best evaluation in a letter dated 29 April 1838: "All my offence consisted in a faithful, honest, disinterested attempt by constitutional means, in the discharge of public duties, to improve the conditions and support the rights of the people of Upper Canada. If my views had prevailed, there would have been no rebellion."

G. M. Craig

MTCL, Baldwin papers. PAC, MG 24, B1 (Neilson family papers). PAO, Marshall S. Bidwell papers. Arthur papers (Sanderson). Head, Narrative. In memoriam, Marshall Spring Bidwell (New York, 1872). [A. E. Ryerson], Sir F. B. Head and Mr. Bidwell: the causes and circumstances of Mr. Bidwell's banishment . . . by a United Empire Loyalist (Kingston, U.C., 1838). The seventh report from the select committee of the House of Assembly of Upper Canada on grievances . . . (Toronto, 1835). [G. T. Strong], The diary of George Templeton Strong, ed. Allan Nevins and M. H. Thomas (4v., New York, 1952). Upper Canada, House of Assembly, Journals, 1821–36.

J. G. Brown, "Marshall Spring Bidwell and the reform movements in Upper Canada, 1822–1837," unpublished MA thesis, Queen's University, 1934. Canadian portraits; C.B.C. broadcasts, ed. R. G. Riddell (Toronto, 1940). Craig, Upper Canada. Dent, Upper Canadian rebellion. Sister Dominic (Genevieve Slawuta), "Marshal [sic] Spring Bidwell, a Reform leader in Upper Canada," unpublished MA thesis, University of Ottawa, [1968]. Aileen Dunham, Political unrest in Upper Canada, 1815–1836 (London, 1927). Sissons, Ryerson. W. R. Riddell, "The Bidwell elections: a political episode in Upper Canada a century ago," Ont. Hist., XXI (1924), 236–44. C. B. Sissons, "The case of Bidwell; correspondence connected with the "withdrawal" of Marshall Spring Bidwell from Canada," CHR, XXVII (1946), 368–82.

BILLINGS, ELKANAH, lawyer, journalist, official paleontologist of the Geological Survey of Canada, and member of the Natural History Society of Montreal; b. 5 May 1820 at Gloucester, U.C., son of Bradish Billings and Lamira Dow; d. 14 June 1876 at Montreal, Que.

The Billings family was Saxon by name and English by origin. It moved from New England into Canadian territory at the end of the 18th century, after the War of American Independence. Elkanah Billings was therefore the first of the line to be born in Canada. His maternal ancestors came from Wales; they had lived in the United States before establishing themselves in Canada with the loyalists.

Elkanah Billings was born on his father's farm at Gloucester. At the gates of Ottawa, an urban centre named Billings' Bridge recalls the site of the Billings' family home. The second son of a family of nine children, but coming from a well-to-do and socially privileged environment, Billings received an extensive education. He first attended the schools at Gloucester and Bytown (Ottawa), then, after a break of four years, the St Lawrence Academy, at Potsdam, New York State. In 1839 he registered as a student at the Law Society of Upper Canada, and in the autumn of 1844 was allowed to practise law. On 31 July of the following year he married Helen Walker Wilson, the sister of a Toronto colleague.

The young lawyer carried on his profession, alone or in partnership with Robert Hervey, at Bytown until 1849, then at Renfrew. He returned to Bytown on 10 June 1852 and opened a new office. But he soon abandoned law and found his real vocation in geology and its auxiliary, paleontology. In the autumn of 1852 he apparently became editor of the Ottawa Citizen, a position he may have occupied until 1855. While he was publishing in the columns of the Citizen articles of a popular scientific nature relating to geology, and acquiring a basic knowledge of physics, trigonometry, and zoology, Billings was studying the fossils preserved in the rock formations along the banks of the Rideau River. At the same time he was collecting the Crinoidea, Cystoidea, and Asteroidea of which he was later to offer a rich collection to the museum of the Geological Survey of Canada.

On 7 Jan. 1854 Billings made his official début in the scientific world: he was appointed a member of the Canadian Institute of Toronto. In the same year he published his first paleontological study in the institute's journal: "On some new genera and species of Cystidea from the Trenton limestone." In 1855, for the universal exposition in Paris, he wrote an essay entitled Reddit ubi cererem tellus inarata quotannis, which won him a prize of $100. February 1856 was witness to an epoch-making event in the life of Billings and in the history of scientific research in Canada. The young paleontologist launched the first number of a monthly review, the Canadian Naturalist and Geologist, in which for 20 years he was to publish his scientific studies. He immediately won the admiration and support of experts, and particularly of Sir William Edmond LOGAN, the director of the Geological Survey of Canada. The latter applied to the Canadian government for the services of Billings, who on 1 Aug. 1856 became the official paleontologist for the surveys, with residence at Montreal. Except for a few months which he devoted to a study trip in England and Paris between February and June 1858, Billings spent the rest of his life studying and describing the fossils preserved in the museum of the survey. He communicated to researchers the results of his intelligent and persistent labour, namely 93 articles in the Naturalist, the official reports of the Geological Survey of Canada, and studies published by the Canadian Journal . . ., the American Journal of Science and Arts of New Haven, and the Geological Magazine of London.

At the time when Billings joined the Geological Survey of Canada in 1856, to become its first paleontologist, paleontology was a recent branch of knowledge. To appreciate his contribution to science, two things must be remembered: Georges Cuvier and Jean-Baptiste de Lamarck [Monet] had died 25 years earlier, and it was only three years later, in 1859, that Charles Darwin published On the origin of species by means of natural selection . . ., a work that was to revolutionize the contemporary scientific world. Billings was therefore a pioneer. He was not alone, however; other names were already adding lustre to the paleontology of invertebrates: Joachim Barrande, James Hall, Jacob Green, Carl Eduard von Eichwald, James de Carle Sowerby, Constantine Samuel Rafinesque, and Roderick Impey Murchison, to mention only a few.

Billings had grasped immediately the importance of biology and geology for satisfactory work in paleontology. Moreover, he was a born naturalist, as is evidenced by his numerous monographs, particularly those describing recent animals, such as the bear, wolf, stag, otter, carcajou, caribou, lynx, beaver, and a number of birds. All these works appeared between 1855 and 1857. During the same years Billings also published numerous articles describing the fossils of Trenton (Ordovician), Potsdam (Cambrian), and Niagara (Silurian). He himself collected many of these fossils, including those of Trenton from the regions of Ottawa and Montreal, those of Niagara in the southwest of Ontario, and those of Potsdam from the border region near Montreal and the state of Vermont.

When one looks at Billings' work, one is astonished at its extent. He has to his credit more than 200 articles, totalling some 3,000 pages. Among his important works must be cited some 500 pages of paleontology, which are contained in the famous Report of the Geological Survey presented by Logan in 1863 and known under the title of Geology of Canada, and his writings on the Paleozoic and Silurian fossils. It was the fossils of the Paleozoic age that he described in particular. To the description of the Silurian of Anticosti Island, which appeared about 25 years after Murchison's authoritative work on the Silurian of Great Britain, and which W. H. Twenhofel was to utilize much later for his classic work on Anticosti Island, must be added those of the Silurian of Port-Daniel (Gaspé Peninsula, Quebec) and of Arisaig (Nova Scotia), and of the Devonian of Gaspé. If Billings described above all the fossils of the Paleozoic period and particularly those of the east of Canada, it was because Logan had first established its geology. However, Billings was not prevented from describing the corals of the Canadian west, or from touching on the Mesozoic period of British Columbia, and the Tertiary, even the Quaternary eras, when he described the mammoth and the mastodon. But in the case of the Paleozoic period he described fossils belonging to all zoological groups: brachiopods, cephalopods, pelecypods, gasteropods, trilobites, annelids, Bryozoa, echinoderms, Porifera, and Cœlenterata. He created hundreds of new species and dozens of new genera, consequently modern treatises on paleontology, particularly those of North America, quote him abundantly.

Billings always described new species and new genera in a concise and exact manner. Knowing what written material was available, he made all the necessary comparisons with the species already described and known, according to modern rules of the subject, but he also knew how to stress any truly distinctive feature. In dealing with the group of the echinoderms, when he described a whole new fauna of Crinoidea, Cystoidea, and Blastoidea, he perhaps best displayed his qualities as an observer and a scrupulously careful analyst. On occasion, he knew how to defend his opinions. When Addison E. Verrill and W. H. Niles, in a statement to the Boston Natural History Society, asserted that Billings had seen a family relationship between the genus Pasceolus, which he had created, and the Sphæronites, he replied: "Mr. Niles is quite mistaken in supposing that I ever believed in the Ascidian affinities of the Sphaeronitidae. I was the first to point out the occurrence of that family in the palæozoic rocks of America. I discovered and described the genera Comarocystites, Amygdalocystites and Malocystites. In all that I have written on the subject I cannot find a single remark from which it could be supposed that I ever entertained such an idea."

He was conscious of very modern problems in paleontology, such as one related to systematics. "I think . . . the number of species is becoming so great that, sooner or later, Conocephalites will be broken up into a number of genera." He was already giving thought, therefore, to the tendencies of what are called, in the jargon of the science, the "lumpers" and the "splitters." Finally, he concerned himself with stratigraphic correlations and synchronism, for example when he compared the Silurian of Anticosti Island with that of Great Britain, or the calcareous rocks of Pointe de Lévy with the groups of Potsdam (Cambrian), Chazy, and Black River.

Elkanah Billings died on 14 June 1876 at Montreal, after suffering for three years from a severe illness, Bright's disease. His name was known to the scientific world: he had been a member of the Geological Society of London since 1858, and had been awarded medals by the International Exhibition of London in 1862 and by the Natural History Society of Montreal and the universal exposition in Paris in 1867. The journal Billings had founded, which he had kept supplied with his scientific studies for 20 years, survived him. An achievement that his critical eye, his researcher's mind, and his love of science and of the soil of Canada had rendered imposing and durable continued to perpetuate his memory.

In his report for 1876–77, the director of the Geological Survey of Canada, Alfred Richard Cecil Selwyn*, underlined Billings' disappearance thus: ". . . the country has . . . been deprived of the services of one who had for more than twenty years ably and efficiently fulfilled the duties of this important branch [paleontology] of the Geological Survey."

ANDRÉE DÉSILETS and YVON PAGEAU

A complete list of Billings' writings while he was a member of the Geological Survey of Canada will be found in D. B. Dowling, General index to the reports of progress, 1863 to 1884 (Geological Survey of Canada, Ottawa, 1900). However, his most important works are the following: Elkanah Billings, Catalogues of the Silurian fossils of the Island of Anticosti, with descriptions of some new genera and species (Geological Survey of Canada, Montreal, London, New York, and Paris, 1866); Palaeozoic fossils (2v., Montreal, 1865–74). Canadian Naturalist (Toronto and Montreal), 1856–76. [Logan et al.], Geology of Canada.

Canada, Geological Survey, Report of progress for 1876–77 (Montreal, 1878). Gazette (Montreal), 15 June 1876. Le Jeune, Dictionnaire, I, 185. R. I. Murchison, The Silurian system, founded on geological researches in the counties of Salop, Hereford, Radnor, Montgomery, Caermarthen, Brecon, Pembroke, Monmouth, Gloucester, Worcester, and Stafford; with descriptions of the coalfields and overlying formations (2v., London, 1839). W. H. Twenhofel, Geology of Anticosti Island (Geological Survey of Canada Memoir, 154, Ottawa, 1927). H. M. Ami, "Brief biographical sketch of Elkanah Billings," American Geologist (Minneapolis), XXVII (1901), 265–81. J. F. Whiteaves, "Obituary notice of Elkanah Billings, F.G.S., paleontologist to the Geological Survey of Canada," Canadian Naturalist and Quarterly Journal of Science (Montreal), new ser., VIII (1878), 251–61.

BINNEY, STEPHEN, merchant, politician, shipbuilder, businessman; b.24 March 1805 at Halifax, N.S., seventh child of Hibbert Newton Binney and Lucy Creighton; m. on 15 Oct. 1828 Emily Pryor, daughter of a Halifax merchant, and had a large family; d. 17 Jan. 1872 at Moncton, N.B.

Stephen Binney's father was collector of impost and excise at Halifax, and Stephen soon became a well-known figure in the business life of the city. When the first civic elections were held on 15 May 1841, Binney was elected a councillor; the councillors subsequently chose him as the city's mayor. Offended by the minor role assigned to him at a reception in September 1841 for a French prince, Binney clashed with the lieutenant governor, Lord Falkland [Lucius Bentinck Cary*]. The resulting clamour had not died down when a new crisis arose. The citizens of Halifax heard the news of the birth of a son to Queen Victoria early in December 1841. Binney immediately proposed that, since he planned to visit England on private business, he, as mayor, should lay at the foot of the throne a congratulatory address from the council and citizens. This should have been presented through the lieutenant governor, but the council, after consulting Falkland, allowed Binney to carry the address to England. Binney sailed on 3 Jan. 1842; in March his leave of absence expired and another councillor, Edward Kenny*, was appointed to complete his term.

When Binney returned to North America and decided to leave Halifax is not known, but on 20 Nov. 1843 he purchased for £600 half an acre of land with a wharf and shipyard in Lewisville, one mile northeast of "The Bend" (now Moncton), where his home, luxurious for the day, still stands. As well as being active in shipbuilding, Binney owned a wholesale business in lumber, flour, and feed. He was largely responsible for the establishment of St George's Anglican parish, of which he and Bliss Botsford*, a noted lawyer and politician, became first wardens in 1852. Binney also took an active interest in railways; he, Edward Barron CHANDLER, and Amos Edwin Botsford* were delegates at the Portland railway convention in 1850, and Binney backed those who wanted the Intercolonial Railway to pass through Moncton.

Stephen Binney, scion of a prominent Nova Scotia family, was unsuccessful as the first mayor of Halifax, but later made a valuable contribution to the religious, cultural, and mercantile life of his adopted community.

C. ALEXANDER PINCOMBE

St Paul's Church (Halifax, N.S.), Baptismal register, 1791–1816. Westmorland County Registry Office (Dorchester, N.B.), libro V, 297. Canada, Sessional papers, III (1870), PT.5, no.13, app.C, 27–28. Moncton Daily Times (special edition for the diamond jubilee of confederation), 15 June 1937, 12–13, 20, 39. W. C. Borrett, East coast port and other tales told under the old town clock (Halifax, 1944), 81–88. C. A. Pincombe, "The history of Monckton Township (ca. 1700–1875)," unpublished MA thesis, University of New Brunswick, 1969, 157, 161, 167. S. T. Spicer, Masters of sail: the era of square-rigged vessels in the Maritime provinces (Toronto, 1968), 97. F. E. Crowell, "Binney family," Yarmouth Herald, 25 July 1933.

BIRD, CURTIS JAMES, doctor and legislator; baptized 1 Feb. 1838, in St John's parish, Man.; d. in London, England, 13 June 1876.

Curtis James Bird was the son of James Curtis Bird*, former chief factor of the Hudson's Bay Company, and his second wife, Mary Lowman, a widowed teacher at the Red River Academy (Winnipeg), and was born at his father's estate (present-day Birds Hill). Curtis James was educated at St John's College (Winnipeg) and later studied medicine at Guy's Hospital, London. He returned to the Red River to practise medicine and in 1862 married Frances, a daughter of Donald Ross* who had been a chief trader in the HBC. By Frances, Dr Bird had four children. After her death, he married his sister-in-law, Annabella Ross McDermot, the widow of Charles Edward McDermot, and they had two children.

Following the death of Dr John Bunn* on 31 May 1861, Dr Bird served as coroner of the District of Assiniboia; at the meeting of the Council of Assiniboia, 8 and 11 April 1862, he received formal appointment as coroner. He held this position successively under the Council of Assiniboia, Louis Riel*'s provisional government, and the province of Manitoba. At one point during the period of the provisional government, concerned over the loss of life among the poor in the Red River Settlement, he proposed a crude medicare programme whereby two publicly supported surgeries would be established in the settlement.

Dr Bird's political career began with his appointment to the Council of Assiniboia, 23 Jan. 1868. He served on the council until its dissolution at the outbreak of the Red River disturbances in the fall of 1868. During the disturbances he was elected twice to represent the people of St Paul's parish. In the fall of 1869 he was chosen to meet with representatives of the other communities to decide whether or not a provisional government should be formed; in January 1870 he was a delegate at the meeting that decided that a "list of rights" should be presented to the government of Canada. In the convention that met from 25 Jan. to 11 Feb. 1870, Dr Bird was selected to serve on a committee of six to draft such a list.

After the creation of the province of Manitoba in 1870, Dr Bird continued to be interested in politics. He was nominated for the federal constituency of Lisgar in opposition to Dr John Christian Schultz*; he was also nominated for the provincial constituency of Baie de Saint-Paul. Following his victory in the provincial election of 30 Dec. 1870, Dr Bird withdrew from the federal campaign. He was re-elected in the same constituency in 1874 and remained a member of the Legislative Assembly of Manitoba until his death.

On 5 Feb. 1873, Dr Bird was elected speaker of the assembly and held this position until 1874. While he was speaker, a bill to incorporate the city of Winnipeg was introduced into the assembly [see Francis Evans CORNISH]. To this bill the Legislative Council attached amendments which impinged upon the provincial government's taxing powers; Dr Bird, as speaker, declared the bill out of order. Since a new bill could not be presented in that session of the legislature, the proponents of the bill were infuriated by Dr Bird's action. Early in the morning of 7 March, Dr Bird was lured from his house on the pretext that a patient needed immediate medical attention. While driving in his cutter to the patient's home, Dr Bird was attacked, dragged from his cutter, and soaked with heated oil. Though the government of Manitoba promptly offered a reward of $1,000 for information leading to the arrest of the offenders, they were never discovered.

In the spring of 1876 Dr Bird was in poor health; in the hope that a visit among old friends in England would improve it, he travelled to England. Instead of improving, his health worsened and he died in London on 13 June.

W. D. SMITH

PAM, Church of England registers, St John's Church (Winnipeg), baptisms, 1828–79, no.1077. Begg and Nursey, Ten years in Winnipeg, 19–20, 22, 41, 47, 49, 79–80. Begg's Red River journal (Morton). Canadian North-West (Oliver), I, 71, 485, 582. Hargrave, Red River. Manitoba Free Press (Winnipeg). Manitoban (Winnipeg). Nor'Wester (Winnipeg). R. B. Mitchell, Medicine in Manitoba; the story of its beginnings ([Winnipeg, 1955]), 47–48, 49, 54, 68–69, 107.

BIRRELL, JOHN, merchant and entrepreneur; b. 6 April 1815, at Lerwick, Shetland Islands, son of Ralph Birrell and Eliza Thompson; d. 12 Feb. 1875, at London, Ont.

John Birrell was raised at Lerwick and at Oban, Argyllshire, where his father was stationed as collector of excise. He was trained in business and worked as a clerk in Glasgow until about 1835 when he emigrated to Montreal. He then moved to Hamilton, where he worked for Isaac Buchanan and Company, and finally settled in London around 1840. There he formed a partnership, Angus and Birrell, which lasted three years. In 1845 Birrell established a new partnership with Adam Hope* – Hope, Birrell and Company – which operated stores selling hardware, groceries, and dry goods. In 1851 this partnership was amicably dissolved, Birrell taking the dry goods as John Birrell and Company. In spite of a fire in 1863, he developed a flourishing wholesale dry goods business with his own extensive warehouses. Stock was imported from England, France, Germany, and the United States, partly through the firm of Isaac Buchanan*, and sold over a territory that included Sarnia, Goderich, Stratford, and St Thomas. He also acquired John McMechan's boot and shoe store. In 1876 his business was valued at between $100,000 and $150,000. He was described as "a man who watched his business very carefully and pushed ahead, his trade expanding as the country settled up."

Birrell was prominent in the transformation of London into a railway and financial centre. He was a director of the London and Port Stanley Railway and later became president of the London, Huron, and Bruce Railway (1871–75), playing a leading part in its financing and construction, although he did not live to see the line completed. In addition, Birrell was an incorporator of the Board of Trade in 1857, a member of its council (1857–62), and a director of the Isolated Risk Insurance Company. In 1862 he became vice-president of the new London Permanent Building Society, which in 1865 amalgamated with the Huron and Erie Savings and Loan Society (now the Huron and Erie Mortgage Corporation). In 1864 Birrell chaired the inaugural meeting of the Huron and Erie, was elected a director, and served as president from 1871 until his death.

In politics Birrell was a Conservative and, though he refused to run for election himself, was president of the local organization from at least 1873. A Presbyterian, he was an active member of St Andrew's Church, sat on various boards, and donated liberally to the building fund. Birrell's suburban residence, "Beechwood" (built in 1854 and still standing in 1971), was one of the first estates in Westminster Township (South London). He was a popular figure in the city and an obituary stated that "he probably had not an enemy."

Before he left Hamilton, Birrell married Maria Louisa Sunley (1822–91), a native of England; they had ten children. A son, George Sunley Birrell (1842–1926), was a leading businessman in London, an alderman, and a president of the Board of Trade. Under his management the value of the family firm increased to between $200,000 and $300,000 by 1888. In 1891 he sold out, moved to New York City, and became a real estate agent. A daughter Elizabeth married Charles Smith Hyman*, son of Ellis Walton HYMAN.

FREDERICK H. ARMSTRONG

Middlesex County Registry Office (London, Ont.), Register of partnerships, Liber A (1870–85), no.14. PAC, RG 30, 401–2. Bradstreet's reports of the Dominion of Canada, February 1, 1876 (New York, 1876), 243, 247. London Advertiser, 12, 13, 15 Feb. 1875. London Free Press, 12, 13, 16 Feb. 1875; 16 Feb. 1891. Can. biog. dict., I, 270–72. Cyclopædia of Can. biog. (Rose, 1886), 521–22. [Archie Bremner], City of London, Ontario, Canada; the pioneer period and the London of today (2nd ed., London, Ont., 1900), 92, 104, 108–9, 129. C. T. Campbell, Pioneer days in London: some account of men and things in London before it became a city (London, Ont., 1921), 93–94. History of the county of Middlesex, 371, 378, 387.

BLACK, HENRY, judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court, MHA; b. 18 Dec. 1798 at Quebec, of the marriage of James and Margaret Black; d. 16 Aug. 1873 at Cacouna, Que.

After studying at the school of Dr Daniel Wilkie* at Quebec, Henry Black became a law student, and was called to the bar on 20 March 1820. He practised his profession at Quebec in partnership with Andrew Stuart*. On 28 Sept. 1836 he was appointed judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court to replace Judge James Kerr*, who had been dismissed as a result of accusations levelled against him by the House of Assembly. Black was president of this tribunal for 37 years, and he acquired a fine reputation for impartiality, honesty, and exquisite kindness. On 18 April 1840 he had been appointed to the Special Council, while retaining his post as a judge, and he was confirmed in his duties at the Vice-Admiralty Court on 10 Feb. 1841.

On 29 March of the same year, Henry Black was elected member of the assembly for the city of Quebec, thanks to the substantial support given by public servants. On the occasion of the famous motion made by John Neilson* on 23 June 1841 condemning the Union, and throughout the whole of the first Union parliament, he consistently voted with the Tories. He supported the constitutional option proposed by governor Charles Theophilus Metcalfe* on 2 Dec. 1843, when a vote was taken following the resignation of the executive councillors who were supporters of ministerial responsibility [see DRAPER].

Even though he had the support of the newspaper Le Canadien, Black decided not to resubmit his name as a candidate in the general elections of 1844. Furthermore, during the 30 years or so that followed he seems to have limited his activity almost exclusively to his tribunal. Learned in maritime law, he enjoyed undisputed authority. He was named a CB, and Harvard University conferred on him an honorary degree of doctor of laws. After his death, which occurred with an attack of erysipelas at Cacouna, where he had gone to take the baths, L'Événement of Quebec paid him this tribute: "He was a man of profound learning, and on no subject was his erudition found wanting. The oldest lawyers consulted him, and his advice was law. He showed great kindness and interest in his dealings with young people who had recourse to his superior knowledge."

JACQUES MONET

Le Canadien (Québec), 18 août 1873. L'Événement (Québec), 16 août 1873. La Minerve (Montréal), 20 août 1873. P.-G. Roy, Fils de Québec, III, 96–97; Les juges de la province de Québec, 57. Cornell, Alignment of political groups. Monet, Last cannon shot. I. M. Abella, "The "Sydenham Election" of 1841," CHR, XLVII (1966), 326–43. F.-J. Audet, "Membres du Conseil spécial," BRH, VII (1901), 82–83.

BLACK, JOHN, recorder of Rupert's Land; b. 11 March 1817 at Edinburgh or St Andrews, county of Fife, Scotland; d. 3 Feb. 1879 at St Andrews, Man.

Little is known of John Black's childhood and youth; reserved by nature, he was silent about his early years, even with close friends. After completing his elementary education, he was employed for seven years in the office of an Edinburgh solicitor. He came to Red River in 1839, having been appointed clerk to the General Quarterly Court of Assiniboia. His duties as deputy to Adam Thom*, the recorder of Rupert's Land, were soon superseded by his active employment in the offices of the Hudson's Bay Company. In 1845 he married Margaret, daughter of Alexander CHRISTIE, governor of Assiniboia, and three years later the company appointed him chief trader.

According to Governor Eden Colvile*, one of Christie's successors, Black was not too popular, except with the religious authorities – Black was almost a minister himself, the governor commented – and he was not a remarkable businessman either. All the same, in 1850 Black was appointed chief accountant of the Upper Red River district, with residence at Fort Garry (Winnipeg). The appointment did not prevent the governor from charging him with being as stupid as an owl. Black was given to arrogance, and people were put off by it. Colvile, however, gradually changed his opinion, and noted that Black was becoming less unpopular; nevertheless, having appointed him unwillingly, he continued to seek a replacement for him. On 21 July 1852 Black lost his post as chief accountant.

The following winter Black and his family visited Scotland. They came back to Red River in the spring. In 1854, after his wife's death, Black decided to leave the company. He returned to Scotland, stayed there for some time, then went to Australia, where he made a career for himself in the public service. He went back to England, and in the spring of 1861 was appointed president of the General Quarterly Court of Assiniboia. He was assuming what had previously been the office of recorder: its title had been changed solely to facilitate the appointment of Black, who had never been a member of the bar although he possessed a certain legal training. On 4 June 1862 the new president was introduced to the Council of Assiniboia.

During the eight years that he presided over the tribunal at Assiniboia, Black proved to be a conscientious judge, and rarely received anything but praise. He was well prepared for his role, and had a thorough knowledge of the people of Red River and their habits. He displayed untiring patience as he listened to illiterate plaintiffs. He was upright and understanding, but was none the less uncompromising. To the consequences of his decisions, and to the ways in which they were applied, he gave scant heed. Yet at a period when the company's authority was declining, it was desirable that the judge, an employee of the company, should take the new circumstances into account, for the company could no longer enforce unpopular sentences. In the summer of 1868 Black decided to resign; the company, foreseeing the end of its reign at Red River, asked Black to remain in office for another year. It was not until March 1870 that he left the colony.

Meanwhile, Black witnessed the Métis' sharp opposition to the plan to annex the west to Canada. He even played a part in the affair. As acting governor – William Mactavish* was seriously ill at the time – Black presided over the Council of Assiniboia on 23 Oct. 1869, when Louis Riel* appeared before it to explain why a group of Métis had prevented William McDougall*, the lieutenant governor appointed by the Canadian government, from entering Red River. The letters relating to this matter that were signed by Mactavish were drafted by Black. They clearly reflected the latter's moderate attitude.

Indifferent to the events taking place, Black continued to live several miles from the seat of government and the centre of affairs. He was, however, secretary of the public meeting held on 19 Jan. 1870 to which Donald Alexander Smith*, the Canadian government's representative, reported. From 25 January to 10 February of the same year he also presided over the convention during which a list of rights of the people of Rupert's Land was drawn up. Black represented the parish of St Andrews, and said little throughout the whole convention except on 4 and 5 February, when, in a tone that showed his slight respect for the assembly and its deliberations, he spoke at considerable length against the immediate creation of a province. He saw the necessity of replacing the company's paternalistic government by a representative one, but he advocated for the first years of the annexation an appointed and not an elected council. On 11 February the provisional government set up by the convention appointed Black one of three delegates (the two others were Alfred Henry SCOTT and Noël-Joseph Ritchot*) to the Canadian government at Ottawa; he was to be the spokesman for the English-speaking element. He accepted at the request of Bishop Alexandre-Antonin Taché*. The three delegates took with them the final version of the list of rights for the people of Rupert's Land.

Black arrived in the capital after the other two, and was lodged in the Russell House; in the next room was D. A. Smith, to whom the Canadian government had entrusted the task of winning Black over. It was to no avail, since throughout the discussions Black maintained the same opinion as at the convention, and accepted only tacitly the positions taken and the conditions laid down by the Canadian representatives. On 27 April 1870 discussion was begun on the question of lands, and Black agreed that Canada should keep control; to him the notion that the settlers of Red River should claim them as theirs was absurd. Subsequently, he considered that the compensatory offer of 150,000 acres made by the Canadian representatives to the Métis was reasonable, whereas the other two members of the delegation aimed at getting three million, and ultimately received a million and a half.

When the talks were finished, Black contemplated returning immediately to London. He was offered the position of lieutenant governor or of recorder of Manitoba, but he declined, and in the summer of 1870 took up residence in Scotland for good.

A conscientious judge, Black had been "a man of very great integrity, in whom the entire settlement had absolute confidence." However, according to D. A. Smith, his lack of firmness, courage, and boldness during the events of 1869–70 undermined the efforts of those who were endeavouring to reduce the issue involving the Métis to less significant proportions.

LIONEL DORGE

Archives paroissiales de Saint-Norbert (Man.), Journal tenu par le Rév. Mons. N.-J. Ritchot, ptre. HBC Arch. A.6/27, 31 March 1848; A.6/37, 17 April 1862; A.12/45, 11 Aug., 11 Nov. 1868; 23, 24 March 1869. Correspondence relative to the recent disturbances in the Red River Settlement (London, 1870). Hargrave, Red River. HBRS, XVI (Rich and Johnson), 241, 244, 245, 248; XIX (Rich, Johnson, and Morton), 154, 192, 195, 197, 200, 203, 216. [Mactavish], Letters of Letitia Hargrave (MacLeod), 208. Manitoba; birth of a province (Morton), 9–11, 21–23, 30, 34, 42–50, 77, 140–43, 209. F. E. Bartlett, "William Mactavish, the last governor of Assiniboia," unpublished MA thesis, University of Manitoba, 1964. Roy St George Stubbs, Four recorders of Rupert's Land; a brief survey of the Hudson's Bay Company courts of Rupert's Land (Winnipeg, 1967), 135–85. A.-H. de Trémaudan, Histoire de la nation métisse dans l'Ouest canadien ([Montréal, 1935]), 221.

BLANCHARD, HIRAM, lawyer and politician, son of Jonathan Blanchard and Sarah Goggins, b. in West River, N.S., 17 Jan. 1820, brother of Jotham Blanchard* founder and editor of the Colonial Patriot; m. in 1842 Eliza Cantrell of Guysborough, and had one son, who died young, and four daughters; d. in Halifax, 17 Dec. 1874.

Descendant of a New England family, Hiram Blanchard received his education at Pictou Academy, studied law with William Frederick DesBarres* in Guysborough, and was admitted to the bar as attorney in November 1841 and as a barrister in April 1843. Soon after his admission to the bar he opened a law office at Port Hood, and he practised on the Cape Breton circuit and also in the courts of Antigonish and Guysborough counties. In a short time he won a lucrative business and also achieved a high reputation; he was respected by judges, other barristers, and juries for his candour and fairness, his clear presentation of facts, and his skill in examining witnesses.

In 1860 he moved to Halifax and formed a partnership with Jonathan McCully, then solicitor general and railway commissioner in Joseph Howe's Reform government. In many courtroom encounters his opponent was James MacDonald*, later federal minister of justice and chief justice of Nova Scotia. An observer of their legal jousting, Charles James Townshend*, also a chief justice, wrote, ". . . it was delightful and instructive to listen to [their] forensic battle. Both were men of high and honourable character, incapable of any unworthy schemes to win their cases." After McCully was appointed to the bench in 1870, Nicholas H. Meagher became Blanchard's partner.

Blanchard refused to become a political candidate until just before William Young* left politics in 1860 to become chief justice of Nova Scotia. The election of 1859 was influenced by quarrels between Protestants and Roman Catholics, but Blanchard, a Presbyterian from Catholic Inverness County, was elected as a Reformer upon his promise of "equal rights to all, proscription of none, favouritism to none." He was re-elected in 1863 and 1867, and in the assembly showed particular concern over the treatment of the insane and the deaf. Although he supported Charles Tupper*'s free school act, Blanchard opposed his idea that the schools be directed by a council of public instruction made up of members of the Executive Council [see Thomas Louis Connolly].

Blanchard became a supporter of confederation, and was sworn in as attorney general of the province and leader of the government on 4 July 1867 in succession to Tupper after Nova Scotia became part of Canada. In the provincial election of September 1867, the question of Nova Scotia's entry into confederation was the dominant issue and the government was swept from office. In the new assembly only Blanchard and Henry Gesner Pineo, representing Cumberland County, supported confederation, and the Blanchard government was replaced on 7 Nov. 1867. The following year Blanchard's personal re-election in Inverness was declared invalid because he had been appointed legal adviser for the federal government in Nova Scotia; he suffered defeat from the anti-confederates in the subsequent by-election. Elected again in 1871, he served as leader of the opposition from 1871 to 1874. On his death the Liberal Morning Chronicle described him as a lawyer of "high reputation . . . a useful legislator, well-informed in public matters and an industrious worker."

William B. Hamilton

[There are scattered references to Blanchard in PAC, MG 24, B29 (Howe papers), 8; MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), 115, pp.130–38; 116, pp.325–31; MG 26, F (Tupper papers), 1. Thomas Miller, Historical and genealogical record of the first settlers of Colchester County (Halifax, 1873), 254–58 contains a complete genealogy of the Blanchard family. A short biographical sketch may be found in John Doull, "Four attorney-generals," N.S. Hist. Soc. Coll., XXVII (1947), 2–4. See also: J. M. Cameron, Political Pictonians; the men of the Legislative Council, Senate, House of Commons, House of Assembly, 1767–1967 (Ottawa, [1967]). J. W. Longley, Sir Charles Tupper (Toronto, 1926). C. J. Townshend, "The Honourable James McDonald," N.S. Hist. Soc. Coll., XX (1921), 139–53. The Morning Chronicle (Halifax), 1859–74, records many of Blanchard's assembly speeches. His obituary notice is to be found in the issue of 18 Dec. 1874. w.b.h.]

BLISS, HENRY, author, lawyer, and provincial agent for New Brunswick and Nova Scotia; b. 1797 at Saint John, N.B., youngest son of Jonathan Bliss*, chief justice of New Brunswick, and Mary Worthington; d. 31 July 1873 at London, England.

Henry Bliss, with his brother William Blowers Bliss, was educated at King's College, Windsor, Nova Scotia, where he received a ba in 1816. In 1819, after legal training in Saint John, his father appointed him clerk of the pleas for the Supreme Court of New Brunswick. After his father's death in 1822, he was dismissed from this office by the lieutenant governor, George Stracy Smyth*, who appointed his aide-de-camp, Captain George Shore*, to the position. A bitter dispute over patronage ensued; Bliss travelled to England where he won the support of the colonial secretary, Lord Henry Bathurst. Bathurst in 1824 ordered that Bliss be reinstated; the latter, however, did not return to New Brunswick to take up the position, but was admitted to the English bar and later became a queen's counsel. In 1826 he resigned as clerk of the pleas.

In 1824, Bliss and John Bainbridge, a London merchant, had been appointed joint agents for the province of New Brunswick in London at a salary of £200 a year. Bainbridge died in 1836, but Bliss continued to represent the province and, for a number of years, also served as agent for Nova Scotia. The agent's task was to support legislation favourable to the colony, to oppose unfavourable legislation, and to try to see that the views of the provincial assembly were known at the Colonial Office. By 1846 the work of the provincial agent had declined in importance, and Bliss requested that his salary be discontinued but that he be allowed to continue to represent the province. He corresponded with the provincial government for several more years and there is no record of his appointment ever having been cancelled.

Bliss published a number of pamphlets on colonial questions, which caused considerable discussion in English and colonial journals. The most important of these were: On colonial intercourse (1830), in which he argued that new trade agreements with the United States were not in the best interests of Britain and the colonies, and On the timber trade (1831) and Letter to Sir Henry Parnell . . . on the new colonial trade bill (1831), in which he attacked free trade and the proposal to remove the preference given to colonial timber in British markets. The pamphlets of Bliss and the attitudes of others such as Sir Howard Douglas*, who resigned as lieutenant governor of New Brunswick in 1831 because of the proposed changes in colonial trade regulations, may have influenced the decision of the British parliament to reject the bill of 1832 proposing changes in the regulation of the timber trade. However, Bliss and Douglas were fighting a losing battle as the British government continued to move toward free trade. In The colonial system . . . (1833) Bliss stated that through the loss of protective markets "the seeds of disunion" had been sown and would eventually explode and "scatter through the world the fragments of the mighty, the rich, and prosperous Empire of Great Britain."

Another pamphlet presented Considerations of the claims and conduct of the United States respecting their north eastern boundary . . . (1826). In An essay on the re-construction of her majesty's government in Canada (1839), he pointed out the dangers of a union of British North America modelled on American principles of federalism and set forth measures he felt necessary to secure satisfactory union. He apparently approved of confederation when the issue arose in 1864.

In his later years Bliss published a number of works (including three under the pseudonym of Nicholas Thirning Moile) which were based on history and written in verse form: State trials (1838); Cicero; a drama (1846); Philip the second; a tragedy (1849); Ideas seldom thought of, for extending knowledge (1851); A history of the lives of the most heroic martyrs . . . (1853); Robespierre; a tragedy (1854); and, Thecla; a drama (1866). There is no evidence that his plays were ever produced.

In his own time Bliss was said to have been one of the best known colonial writers in England. He was a spokesman for shipowners and merchants involved in the colonial trade.

W. A. Spray

Some of Henry Bliss' pamphlets include: The colonial system, statistics of the trade, industry, and resources of Canada and the other plantations in British America (London, 1833); Considerations of the claims and conduct of the United States respecting their north eastern boundary, and the value of the British colonies in North America (London, 1826); An essay on the re-construction of her majesty's government in Canada (London, 1839); Letter to Sir Henry Parnell, Bart., M.P., on the new colonial trade bill (London, 1831); On colonial intercourse (London, 1830); On the timber trade (London, 1831). For a listing of his dramatic works see: Allardyce Nicoll, A history of English drama, 1660–1900 (6v., Cambridge, 1952–59), IV, V.

N.B. Museum, Fairweather papers, copy of will of Henry Bliss, July 1873; Hazen coll., Chipman papers, Bliss to Chipman, 27 May 1823; Scrapbook 38, extract from Saint John Daily Sun, 26 April 1892. PRO, CO 188/29, ff.85–86; CO 189/12, ff.95–96, 113–16, 118–22, 181–83, 260–61. New Brunswick, House of Assembly, Journals, 1824, 51–52; 1846, 10–11. W. G. MacFarlane, New Brunswick bibliography; the books and writers of the province (Saint John, N.B., 1895), 11–12. Wallace, Macmillan dictionary, 64. Hannay, History of New Brunswick, I, 436–37. K. E. Knorr, British colonial theories, 1570–1850 (1st ed., Toronto, 1944; 2nd ed., London and New York, 1963), 326, 327, 329–30, 331, 341. J. W. Lawrence, Footprints; or, incidents in early history of New Brunswick (Saint John, N.B., 1895), 75, 103; Judges of New Brunswick (Stockton), 413–14.

BLISS, WILLIAM BLOWERS, barrister and judge; b. 24 Aug. 1795 at Saint John, N.B., son of Massachusetts loyalists Jonathan Bliss*, attorney general of New Brunswick, 1785–1809, chief justice, 1809–22, and Mary Worthington; brother of Henry; d. 16 March 1874 at his residence, Fort Massey, Halifax, N.S.

As a loyalist William Blowers Bliss was part of the group which ruled the colony of Nova Scotia and had tremendous social prestige. After graduating from King's Collegiate School, he received a BA in 1813 and an MA in 1816, both from King's College where he was recognized as a classical scholar and poet. Thomas Chandler Haliburton*, creator of "Sam Slick," was among his classmates. Bliss was admitted to the bar of Nova Scotia on 9 April 1818, then went to England where he spent several years at Westminster Hall and at the Inner Temple under Sir William Wightman, afterwards an eminent English judge. On 24 Aug. 1823 at St Paul's Church, Halifax, he married Sarah Ann Anderson, adopted daughter of Sampson Salter Blowers*, a Harvard classmate of Jonathan Bliss and chief justice of Nova Scotia from 1797 to 1833. Bliss had seven children; his three sons moved to England and three of his daughters married eminent men of the Atlantic provinces: the eldest, Elizabeth Ann, was married to William Odell* of New Brunswick, Mary to Bishop Hibbert Binney*, and Louisa to Bishop James B. Kelly* of Newfoundland.

In 1830 Bliss was elected to the Nova Scotia assembly for Hants County. In keeping with his family tradition and social position he was a Tory, but he expressed independent opinions by supporting the demand for the separation of the executive and legislative functions in the council and by backing a group of Halifax businessmen seeking a charter for the Bank of Nova Scotia in 1832. He was elected to the first board of directors of the bank on 10 May 1832 and remained in that capacity until 1835. Other directors of the bank included his brother, Lewis Bliss, Mather Byles ALMON, James Boyle Uniacke*, James William JOHNSTON, William Murdoch, and William Lawson*, the first president.

When S. S. Blowers resigned the office of chief justice in 1833, he strongly recommended that his son-in-law and protégé be appointed to the bench of the Supreme Court, but there were other candidates with more seniority. However, upon the death of Richard John Uniacke* II, Bliss was appointed by royal mandamus of Queen Victoria a puisne judge of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia on 15 May 1834, at an annual salary of £540 and fees. Mr Justice Bliss was strict in upholding the dignity of the court and was respected for his industry, his legal knowledge, and the logical expression of his opinions. He had been appointed when it was customary for puisne judges to rise by seniority to be chief justice, but was disappointed in this expectation because responsible government made this position a prize of the political party in power. In 1860 the Liberal government by-passed Judge Bliss when their leader, William Young*, left politics; he became chief justice. Ill health forced Bliss to resign from the court in January 1869. Sir Charles Hastings Doyle*, lieutenant governor of Nova Scotia, requested that Queen Victoria confer "the honour of Knighthood or some other marks of Her Royal favour on her old Servant on his retirement from the Bench," but this request was never granted. A portrait of Mr Justice Bliss hangs in Halifax County Court House.

Bliss acted as one of the governors of King's College at Windsor from 1848 to 1853, and as one of the trustees of the Halifax grammar school from 1847 to 1868. He was president of a short-lived historical society formed at Halifax in 1863. A devoted member of the Church of England, he served for several years as a member of the vestry of St Paul's Church in Halifax and later attended St Luke's Cathedral when his son-in-law Bishop Binney moved his episcopal chair there in 1864. He was one of the first contributors to All Saints' Cathedral in Halifax.

When Judge Bliss died in 1874, he left an estate valued at $536,725. Authors have assumed that he inherited Judge Blowers' fortune, but it was left to Bliss' wife, Sarah. It is known that Bliss inherited about $20,000 in 1818 from his American grandfather, Colonel John Worthington; he also received a bequest from his father. Bliss seems to have been shrewd enough to invest his capital in bank and railway stocks rather than in shipping. Certainly his position on the board of the Bank of Nova Scotia and his social contacts with the Halifax business élite provided him with useful financial information which enabled him to make astute and lucrative investments.

PHYLLIS R. BLAKELEY

Halifax County Court of Probate, will of S. S. Blowers, 1842; will of W. B. Bliss, 1874. PANS, Anderson family papers; Bliss family papers. PRO, CO 217/114, 97–99, 125–26; 217/155, 43, 55. Morning Chronicle (Halifax), 17, 20 March 1874. R. V. Harris, Catalogue of portraits of the judges of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia and other portraits, Law Courts, Halifax, N.S. ([Halifax], n.d.), 45–47, 59. F. E. Crowell, "Bliss family," Yarmouth Herald, 9 Aug. 1932. J. W. Lawrence, The first courts and early judges of New Brunswick (Saint John, N.B., 1875), 17–19. C. J. Townshend, "Memoir of the life of the Honourable William Blowers Bliss, with portrait," N.S. Hist. Soc. Coll., XVII (1913), 23–46.

BOOKER, ALFRED, merchant, auctioneer, and militia officer; b. in 1824 in Nottingham, England, son of the Reverend Alfred Booker, a Regular Baptist clergyman; d. 27 Sept. 1871 in Montreal, Que.

The Booker family had been in Hamilton, Canada West, for eight years when, in 1850, Alfred Booker Jr established a business which he conducted until 1867. At his sale rooms he auctioned real estate, horses, dry goods, and the stock of merchants going out of business. He became wealthy and was a respected member of the freemasons (being a founder of St John's Lodge of the Irish registry in 1852), of the St George's Society, and of the Regular Baptist Church.

On 16 May 1851 Booker was commissioned ensign in the 1st Wentworth militia. He transferred as 2nd captain to the 1st Hamilton Independent Artillery company in 1853; he claimed to have helped outfit this company. In 1855 he was gazetted captain of the Volunteer Militia Battery of Artillery of Hamilton, which he organized.

He was promoted major in 1857 to command the volunteer (or active) militia artillery and rifle companies of Hamilton, and lieutenant colonel in 1858 to command the volunteer force in Hamilton. On 15 June 1861, shortly after the outbreak of the Civil War in the United States, Booker was appointed a staff officer to provide information on local conditions to imperial troops.

In 1862 formation of the 13th Battalion (later the Royal Hamilton Light Infantry) was authorized and the command was given to Isaac Buchanan*. Booker took it over in 1865 in preference to another officer, James Atchison Skinner, while retaining over-all command of the active force in Hamilton. In the same year he commanded several volunteer companies on the Niagara frontier following the St Alban's raid by a group of Southerners in October. He had been examined by a board of three imperial officers in 1864 and received the first 1st class certificate of military qualification ever granted by the Department of Militia Affairs. His strenuous voluntary services brought some rewards: he was wont to refer to "the special approval and personal commendation" of the Prince of Wales in 1860 and to his presentation to Queen Victoria in 1864.

The event with which Booker's name is chiefly connected is the battle of Ridgeway fought on 2 June 1866 between Canadian volunteers under his command and the Irish Republican Army under John O'Neill. On 1 June, when news of a Fenian invasion was received by British military officials, Booker was instructed to call out the 13th Battalion and take it to Port Colborne. He picked up two additional volunteer companies (the York and Caledonia) en route, and found the 2nd Battalion of Toronto already there when he arrived late the same day. Because he was senior to the 2nd Battalion's temporary commander, John Stoughton Dennis*, Booker took command of the whole force.

The volunteers under Booker were to act in conjunction with imperial troops commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel George J. Peacocke; both were under the orders of Major General George Napier. Peacocke was to meet Booker in Port Colborne but the place was changed to Stevensville. Booker, however, had better knowledge of the whereabouts of the Fenians than Peacocke, and he suggested that he take his column to Fort Erie and attack them at Frenchman Creek; the scheme was vetoed by Peacocke.

Booker considered that to "keep my appointment at Stevensville was my obvious duty," and accepted Napier's expectation that the Fenians would not attack until the two columns had arrived there. Booker's force reached Ridgeway by train and began the march to Stevensville. His troops – young, inexperienced, and ill trained – consisted of 480 men in the 2nd Battalion under Charles Todd Gilmor, 265 in the 13th under J. A. Skinner (in temporary command as Booker had taken command of the whole column), and about 50 in each of the York Company and the Caledonia Company. Gilmor's advance guard, however, met the Fenians under O'Neill about midway between Stevensville and Ridgeway, and became heavily engaged. Booker then learned that Peacocke had been delayed at Chippawa; there was now no hope that the imperial troops would hear the fighting and come to Booker's aid. According to Gilmor, "the situation of the Volunteers was thereby rendered most critical, as it seemed improbable we would hold our position for the two hours we were thus left unsupported." Neither side had artillery or cavalry.

Booker drove back the Fenians, but when he ordered parts of Skinner's 13th to replace the companies under Gilmor which were low in ammunition, O'Neill counterattacked. "A scene of confusion ensued" and Booker's force was routed. Booker was unable to regroup his men at Ridgeway, and retired to Port Colborne, while O'Neill, wishing to return to the U.S.A., and unable to take advantage of his military success, moved to Fort Erie. In all, nine of Booker's men were killed in action. Peacocke's column, which had artillery, was never engaged. Subsequently it was hinted that Peacocke should be court-martialed, but Sir John Michel* (commander of the forces) let it be known that the volunteers' weapons were such that "at present the unfortunate Canadians fight at a disadvantage" and that if the Canadian government had authorized money for a dozen mounted volunteers Peacocke's force would have been warned in time to destroy the Fenians.

The British military placed responsibility on the Canadian government, but a court of inquiry demanded by Booker and presided over by George Taylor Denison II failed to assign blame at the same time indicating Booker's personal courage. The officers of the 13th, however, showed no intention of letting matters lie. Skinner and others hired a former protégé of Isaac Buchanan, Alexander Somerville*, to write a malicious account of the battle. Somerville later admitted that the officers were "hostile to Colonel Booker and blind to fair play" and that the book was "doing the work of Col. Booker's personal enemies."

Booker's resignation on 30 July 1866 from command of the 13th Battalion was followed by permission to retire from the militia in 1867; he retained his rank, a virtual vindication of his actions by the Canadian government. The reasons for the defeat were, however, too deeply entwined with imperial and Canadian attitudes to defence to allow Booker's comeback in the volunteer movement. In 1867 he left Hamilton and reopened his shop in Montreal, where he died four years later, survived by a son.

GEO. MAINER

PAC, MG 27, I, D4 (Cartier papers), 4, p.1792; RG 7, G10, 2; RG 8, I, A1, 185; D5, 1672; RG 9, I, C1, 265–67, 270; C8, 6, 8; II, A1, 2, f.145; 6, f.501; 36, f.3923. Canada Gazette (Ottawa), 23 June 1866. Evening Times (Hamilton), 1864–66. Gazette (Montreal), 28 Sept. 1871. Montreal Herald, 5, 7 Nov. 1870. G. T. Denison III, History of the Fenian raid on Fort Erie; with an account of the battle of Ridgeway (Toronto, 1866). Alexander Somerville, Narrative of the Fenian invasion of Canada (Hamilton, C.W., 1866). Hutchinson's Hamilton directory for 1862–63 ... (Hamilton, C.W., 1862).

E. A. Cruikshank, The origin and official history of the Thirteenth Battalion of infantry, and a description of the work of the early militia of the Niagara peninsula in the War of 1812 and the rebellion of 1837 (Hamilton, Ont., 1899). J. A. Macdonald, Troublous times in Canada; a history of the Fenian raids of 1866 and 1870 (Toronto, 1910). J. R. Robertson, The history of freemasonry in Canada from its introduction in 1749 ... (2v., Toronto, 1899), II. E. A. Cruikshank, "The Fenian raid of 1866," Welland County Hist. Soc., Papers and Records (Welland, Ont.), II (1926), 9–49. F. M. Quealey, "The Fenian invasion of Canada West, June 1st and 2nd, 1866," Ont. Hist., LIII (1961), 37–66.

BOUCHER-BELLEVILLE, JEAN-BAPTISTE, called Jean-Philippe, teacher, newspaper owner and editor, Patriote, civil servant, and linguist; b. 8 Sept. 1800 at Quebec, son of Pierre Boucher-Belleville and Louise Belleau; d. 1874 at Saint-Michel-de-Napierville, Quebec.

Boucher-Belleville, who signed himself "J.-Philippe," received a classical education at the college of Montreal from 1814 to 1825, and was first a teacher with Siméon Marchessault* at Saint-Charles-sur-Richelieu. In 1831 he published at Montreal Les Principes de la langue française, en deux parties, suivis des règles de la versification française, which ran into several editions, and in 1832, Les Principes de la langue latine, en deux parties, suivis des règles de la versification latine. He then tried journalism, and wrote numerous articles in the Montreal newspapers on subjects related to religion, politics, and agriculture.

In 1835 or 1836 Boucher-Belleville became the owner and editor of L'Écho du Pays (Saint-Charles-sur-Richelieu), a political weekly favouring the Patriote party that had been started by Pierre-Dominique Debartzch* in 1833 and first edited by the lawyer Alfred-Xavier Rambau*. The paper devoted numerous articles to primary education and to the debates in the House of Assembly and the Legislative Council. Boucher-Belleville published the last issue in June 1836. He then launched another periodical, Le Glaneur, which lasted only a short time (December 1836 to September 1837). This was a newspaper concerned with literature, agriculture, and industry, which endeavoured to carry on the work of L'Écho du Pays, although stressing agriculture. Boucher-Belleville attributed the slump in agriculture in Lower Canada to the unenterprising methods of the French Canadians. Under the pen-name of "Jean-Paul Laboureur" he published articles on modern agricultural techniques, types of ploughing, the utilization of potash, and the function of crop rotation. He even adapted to agriculture a work by Dr Jean-Baptiste MEILLEUR, Cours abrégé de leçons de chymie ..., published at Montreal in 1833, and gave extracts of it in his journal.

During the 1830s Boucher-Belleville corresponded fairly regularly with Ludger Duvernay*. In a letter dated 11 April 1834 he stated "that there is nothing to be expected of priests, . . . they are a privileged caste like the ministerial tribe." On 4 April 1835 he opposed sending Louis-Joseph PAPINEAU to England to defend the requests of the House of Assembly, because no one, he thought, could replace him at home.

Boucher-Belleville was caught up in the turmoil created by the disturbances of 1837–38. On 22 Nov. 1837 Papineau presided over the meeting at Saint-Charles, where he arranged for officers to be chosen for the defence of the country: Boucher-Belleville was appointed quartermaster. On 7 December, after the defeat, he was taken prisoner. On 28 Feb. 1838 he wrote from Laprairie to Duvernay to tell him that he had come out of prison penniless, and that no one in the Richelieu valley had been willing to help him.

On 15 Jan. 1839 appeared the first number of L'Aurore des Canadas (Montreal), a political, literary, and commercial newspaper started by François Cinq-Mars; Boucher-Belleville was its first editor, probably until 1845. The paper endeavoured to find a basis of agreement between the French Canadians and their governors, to stress understanding between the two races, and to defend the Catholic clergy. This last aim scandalized Dr Antoine-Pierre-Louis Consigny, who wrote to Duvernay, saying that Boucher-Belleville "has never been the unquestioning friend of priests, and yet he is now coming to their defence!" Indeed, in a letter to Ludger Duvernay dated 3 Aug. 1841, Boucher-Belleville declared: ". . . religion is necessary for the mass of the people, . . . the priests acted badly in 1837, but . . . they have realized their error, in short . . . the clergy are powerful."

Around 1850 Jean-Philippe Boucher-Belleville was the secretary of the Department of Education at Montreal. Dr Jean-Baptiste Meilleur made it clear, in his Mémorial de l'éducation du Bas-Canada, that from 1846 on he was allowed a secretary and a clerk whose chief occupation was to keep the accounts, analyse the various documents, classify them, and index them; one of the two clerks was a copyist in the education office. We do not know how long Boucher-Belleville held this position. It was no doubt in this period that he published his Dictionnaire des barbarismes et des solécismes . . . (1855).

In 1835, at Terrebonne, Jean-Philippe Boucher-Belleville had married Marguerite Porlier, daughter of Jacques Porlier, a voyageur; he had one daughter, who died with her mother in 1841. Boucher-Belleville was the nephew of Jean-Baptiste Boucher-Belleville*, the parish priest of Laprairie from 1792 to 1839. The latter published a collection of canticles and a Manuel abrégé de controverse.

At the end of his life Boucher-Belleville was the owner of a farm at Saint-Michel-de-Napierville; he died there in 1874, at 74 years of age.

Louis-Philippe Audet

J.-P. Boucher-Belleville, Dictionnaire des barbarismes et des solécismes les plus ordinaires en ce pays, avec le mot propre ou leur signification (Montréal, 1855); Les principes de la langue française, en deux parties, suivis des règles de la versification française (Montréal, 1831); Les principes de la langue latine, en deux parties, suivis des règles de la versification latine (Montréal, 1832).

"Papiers Duvernay conservés aux archives de la province de Québec," APQ Rapport, 1926–27, 145ff. "Les Patriotes de 1837–1838 d'après les documents J.-J. Girouard," P.-A. Linteau, édit., RHAF, XXI (1967–68), 281–311. L'Aurore des Canadas (Montréal), 15 janv. 1839–1845. L'Écho du Pays (Saint-Charles-sur-Richelieu, Qué.), 1835–36. Le Glaneur (Saint-Charles-sur-Richelieu, Qué.), déc. 1836–sept. 1837. Beaulieu et Hamelin, Journaux du Québec. Morgan, Bibliotheca Canadensis, 41. Joseph Tassé, Les Canadiens de l'Ouest (2e éd., 2v., Montréal, 1878), I, 137. Gérard Filteau, Histoire des Patriotes (3v., Montréal, 1938–39), III, 33–34. J.-B. Meilleur, Mémorial de l'éducation du Bas-Canada (2e éd., Québec, 1876), 354. L.-P. Audet, "Jean-Baptiste Meilleur était-il un candidat valable au poste de surintendant de l'Éducation pour le Bas-Canada en 1842?" Cahiers des Dix, XXXI (1966), 179.

BOUCHER DE LA BRUÈRE, PIERRE-CLAUDE, doctor and public servant; baptized 28 Sept. 1808 at Boucherville, eldest son of Colonel René Boucher de La Bruère and Marie-Julie Weilbrenner; d. 19 May 1871 at Saint-Hyacinthe, Que.

Almost nothing is known about Pierre-Claude Boucher de La Bruère's youth. On 11 March 1829 he was licensed to practise medicine. On 3 Oct. 1836, at Boucherville, he married Marie-Hippolyte de La Broquerie. He carried on his profession at Saint-Hyacinthe, where he lived for some years prior to the disturbances of 1837, and where he was to end his life.

The troubled period that Lower Canada went through during the decade after 1830 was certainly the fullest one in his life. In 1838, suspected of being in sympathy with the Patriotes, he was arrested and taken to prison. Two years earlier nobody would have believed such an event possible. He was the parish organist, he loved sketching and the theatre, and he spent his leisure time talking with the teacher-priests and students of the college of Saint-Hyacinthe, who spoke highly of his sensibility and sense of humour. Before the resolutions of Lord John Russell, in the spring of 1837, La Bruère scarcely ever took part in the demonstrations that brought together the Patriotes of Saint-Hyacinthe and the surrounding districts. He was none the less greatly exercised over the turn of events.

As a citizen of Saint-Hyacinthe he found himself at the centre of the storm that burst upon Lower Canada. As a doctor, he shared with too many confrères a clientele whose incomes were low. As a friend of the college of Saint-Hyacinthe, where five members of the Papineau family and two sons of Wolfred Nelson* were studying, he exchanged and shared with young teachers his hopes and fears as to the nation's future. No doubt it was recalled to him that his grandfather had fought at Châteauguay, and that heroes' blood flowed in his veins.

During the pre-revolutionary period, from April to November 1837, Boucher de La Bruère's restraint progressively gave place to impatience and exasperation. He was to be found at the different charivaris inflicted upon the opponents of the Patriotes, he took part in the planting of the fir-tree in May before the church at Saint-Hyacinthe, in honour of Louis-Joseph Papineau, and he walked through the streets of the municipality dressed in homespun. In October 1837 he was present at the assembly of the six counties. He is said to have taken up arms in November, although we do not know the exact role he played in the events at Saint-Charles and Saint-Denis.

A year later, when renewed restlessness occurred in connection with the secret association of Frères-Chasseurs [see Nelson], Boucher de La Bruère was apprehended and taken to prison in Montreal. His arrest is no doubt explained by the fact that on 2 November of the preceding year he had met Édouard-Élisée Malhiot, one of the Patriote leaders who had arrived from the United States. Furthermore, he was suspected of assisting the Patriotes by using the funds of the Banque Canadienne, which he had established at Saint-Hyacinthe in 1835–36, in partnership with one of his brothers-in-law, Charles-Adrien Pacaud, who was himself a supporter of the Patriotes. This bank was to cease operation in 1839. On 29 Dec. 1838 La Bruère was released without trial.

After the rebellion it seems that the doctor reverted to a more moderate line of political thinking, one that was, indeed, more in conformity with his temperament. On 15 Sept. 1847 he was appointed major of the 5th battalion of the Saint-Hyacinthe militia. In 1849 he took a vigorous stand against the agitation for annexation to the United States. After that we know nothing further about his political ideas and activities.

On 22 Dec. 1862 he was appointed by the government to the post of inspector of crown land offices, and on 29 Oct. 1867 to that of director of colonization in Lower Canada. In 1869 he accepted in addition the office of inspector of prisons [see Terence Joseph O'Neill]. Despite his duties he nevertheless continued to concern himself with the life and future of his region. In 1853 he had been president of the Saint-Jean Baptiste society of his municipality. He took part in the organization of the Société de Colonisation de Saint-Hyacinthe, which directed a number of families towards Compton County.

La Bruère died at Saint-Hyacinthe, and was mourned by his wife and only son, Pierre-René-Joseph-Hippolyte*, who later became a member of the Legislative Council and superintendent of public instruction.

Yves Roby

"Inventaire des documents relatifs aux événements de 1837 et 1838, conservés aux archives de la province de Québec," APQ Rapport, 1925–26. C.-P. Choquette, Histoire de la ville de Saint-Hyacinthe (Saint-Hyacinthe, Qué., 1930). Fauteux, Patriotes, 123–24.

BOUCHETTE, ROBERT-SHORE-MILNES, lawyer, cartographer, Patriote, and civil servant; b. 12 March 1805 at Quebec, L.C., fourth son of Joseph Bouchette*, surveyor general of Lower Canada, and of Marie-Louise-Adélaïde Chaboillez; d. 4 June 1879 at Quebec.

At his baptism Robert-Shore-Milnes Bouchette received the names of his godfather, Sir Robert Shore Milnes*, the lieutenant governor at the time. He studied under the Reverend Daniel Wilkie*, and began to read law as a clerk in the office of Andrew Stuart*, a friend of his father. Although specializing in maritime law, he had a predilection for the study of Italian, history, the humanities, and mathematics: "a relaxation," he wrote in his Mémoires. Tempted by his "natural liking for drawing and cartography," and by his "desire to travel," he temporarily broke off his studies in December 1823 to go to New York as assistant to Lieutenant Henry Piers of the Royal Staff Corps and copy maps of the common border of the United States and Canada. On 15 March 1826, when he was barely 21 years of age, he was admitted to practise law.

Robert Bouchette devoted himself "with ardour" to his new profession until 1828; the following year he was attached to the surveyors' office, and helped his father to publish his geographical and cartographical work. He went to London and worked at drafting the maps and putting together the topographical and historical description of Canada; the result was two publications by Joseph Bouchette, which appeared in 1831. Thanks to the official position occupied by his father in Canada, Robert Bouchette was able to associate with the English nobility and bourgeoisie, and through this association to meet many important personages of the time. At Dover, when he was returning from a trip to France and Italy, he met Mary Ann Gardner, whom he married on 6 March 1834. On 27 July, a few months after they arrived in Canada, the young Englishwoman died, a victim of the Asiatic cholera epidemic.

This sudden bereavement, added to the political situation, was a decisive turning-point in Bouchette's life. He came round "without hesitation to the side of the Liberals, although," he said, "it was very painful for me to break off from my family and many of my personal friends, who sympathized with the party that had adopted, quite wrongly, the title of constitutional." Robert Bouchette stood as parliamentary candidate for Saguenay County in February 1836, but his opponent, Charles Drolet, also a Liberal, gained the victory, thanks to Louis-Joseph Papineau's influence. The defeated candidate subsequently took an active part in the meetings held in the Quebec region to protest Lord John Russell's resolutions. On 17 June 1837 he founded at Quebec a bilingual newspaper, Le Libéral/The Liberal, the editing of the English part of which he entrusted to his friend Charles Hunter*.

As Bouchette came within the provisions of warrants for arrest issued against chairmen of the Patriote committees, the Quebec editor was arrested, then let out on bail shortly afterwards. He quickly left Quebec and headed for the Richelieu valley, finally reaching Swanton in Vermont. On 6 Dec. 1837, as an officer under the command of Édouard-Élisée MALHIOT, Robert Bouchette led the advance-guard of the little band that encountered the enemy at Moore's Corner (Saint-Armand-Station) [see Philip Henry MOORE]. He was wounded, and put in prison at Montreal, and on 28 June 1838 was condemned to exile in the Bermudas with seven other Patriotes, from whom Durham [Lambton*] had extracted the semblance of a confession of guilt. Bouchette left Quebec on 4 July on board the frigate Vestal, and arrived in the Bermudas on the 28th, after a crossing that gave him time, in collaboration with Wolfred Nelson*, to write an account of the Canadiens' grievances. After the abrogation of Durham's ordinance, Bouchette left his place of exile and headed for the American coast. In 1839 he was called to the bar in Vermont, and in the same year married Caroline-Anne Berthelot.

He returned to Canada in 1845, after the nolle prosequi of 1843, and three years later was appointed court clerk of the attorney general for Canada East; in March 1851 he was named to the post of collector of customs. In addition to looking after the organization of this department, Robert Bouchette was a member of several government commissions, including those responsible for studying the results of the treaty of reciprocity with the United States (1860), the organization of the civil service (1862), Canada's participation in the universal exposition of 1867 in Paris – Joseph-Charles Taché* and he were Canada's official representatives there – and the repercussions of the new civil service law (1868).

Having become a widower for the second time on 28 Jan. 1858, Robert Bouchette married again on 11 June 1861; his third wife was Clara Lindsay, by whom he had, among other children, Robert-Errol*. He withdrew from the civil service in 1875, and died at Quebec. He was buried at Saint-Colomb-de-Sillery.

In the forefront of the Patriote movement, for which he bore arms and wielded the pen with spirit and enthusiasm, Robert Bouchette caused a scandal by breaking with the environment of his family and its bureaucratic allegiance. This same enthusiasm was apparent when he was collector of customs: he built up this department and defended its organization by presenting a personal report different from that of the commission responsible for studying the repercussions of the new civil service law. This zeal did not prevent him from entertaining some aesthetic pretensions when he turned to drawing and cartography, and when he enlivened his prison cell at Montreal, decorating it with his guitar and with drawings from his portfolios.

YVES TESSIER

PAC, MG 24, D8/1 (Wright papers), 4503, 4504, 12139–42, 12334–36, 12391, 12392, 12420, 12421, 12570, 12571, 13611, 13612, 16379–82, 17276; MG 29, G27 (Morgan papers), 3, pp.937–44; Map Division, various manuscript maps copied by Robert-Shore-Milnes Bouchette. [R.-S.-M. Bouchette], Mémoires de Robert-S.-M. Bouchette, 1805–1840; recueillis par son fils Errol Bouchette et annotés par A.-D. Decelles (Montréal, [1903]); R.-S.-M. Bouchette "Weights and measures," Lit. and Hist. Soc. of Quebec, Trans., new ser., I (1863), 1–33. R.-S.-M. Bouchette and Wolfred Nelson, "Brief sketch of Canadian affairs," Canadian Antiquarian and Numismatic J. (Montreal), 3rd ser., XIII (1916), 21–29. "Inventaire des documents relatifs aux événements de 1837 et 1838, conservés aux archives de la province de Québec," APQ Rapport, 1925–26, 188–89, 272–73, 283, 327. "Papiers Duvernay conservés aux archives de la province de Québec," APQ Rapport, 1926–27, 147–252. Canada, Sessional Papers, II (1869), PT.5, no.19, 39–40. Standard dict. of Can. biog. (Roberts and Tunnell), I, 62–63. Fauteux, Patriotes, 126–28. P.-G. Roy, La famille Taschereau (Lévis, Qué., 1901), 35–36. "Robert-Shore-Milnes Bouchette," BRH, XXXII (1926), 563.

BOULTON, D'ARCY, lawyer, politician, and Orangeman; b. 29 March 1825, at Perth, U.C., grandson of D'Arcy Boulton*, and son of James Boulton and Susan Beman, half-sister of Sir John Beverley Robinson*; m. in 1856 Louisa Charlotte Corbett; d. at Toronto, Ont., 16 Feb. 1875.

Educated at Upper Canada College in Toronto, D'Arcy Boulton then studied for the legal profession. He was admitted to the bar in 1847 and became a member of the law firm of Boulton, Lount, Boys, and Stewart of Barrie. He soon laid the foundation for a career as a Conservative politician and Orangeman; to offset the influence of Reform newspapers in the Barrie area, he formed in 1857, with D'Alton McCarthy Sr and others, a company to establish a newspaper called the Spirit of the Age. Designed to defend Orange and Conservative interests in Barrie, the newspaper lasted about five years.

Boulton ran unsuccessfully for the Simcoe North seat in the Canadian assembly in 1861, and was again defeated in the dominion elections of 1867 in Grey North and of 1872 in Muskoka. In 1873 he entered the Ontario legislature as the member for Simcoe South in a by-election following Thomas Roberts FERGUSON's resignation, and he retained the seat in the elections of 1875. But Boulton's real career was within the Orange Order, which he seems to have joined in the 1850s. He rose through private and district lodges to become deputy grand master of British North America in 1864 and provincial grand master of Ontario West in 1870. At the Imperial Grand Council of Orangemen held in Glasgow, Scotland, in 1873, he represented the Orangemen of the province of Ontario; he was unanimously chosen president at Glasgow of the Triennial Orange Conference of the British Empire, the highest office in the Loyal Orange Association. Boulton was also prominent in the Grand Black Lodge Chapter of Canada West, a more exclusive order of Orangeism, whose members were required to pass through a variety of degrees before initiation. As grand master of the chapter in western Ontario, he was active in promoting amalgamation with the chapter for eastern Canada in 1874 to form the Grand Black Chapter of British America. He was named its first grand master.

D'Arcy Boulton died at the age of 50, ending a promising political career as a Liberal Conservative: his influence within the Orange movement would probably have assured him of a prominent place in provincial and, perhaps, national politics. In his lifetime, however, he remained a minor political figure, and his correspondence with John A. Macdonald* deals largely with legal matters and patronage. He was described as a tactful man and seems to have had few enemies. His funeral, held at the Anglican St James' Cathedral, was the largest in Toronto up to that time, an indication of his popularity but also of the efficiency of the Orange organization in securing the attendance of its members.

HEREWARD SENIOR

PAC, MG 26, A (Macdonald papers). Globe (Toronto), 17, 20, 25 Oct. 1856; 19 Feb. 1875. Leader (Toronto), 19 Feb. 1875. Mail (Toronto), 19 Feb. 1875. Lovell's Canadian dominion directory for 1871 . . . (Montreal, [1871]). Hunter, Hist. of Simcoe County.

BOULTON, WILLIAM HENRY, lawyer, politician, and Orangeman; b. 19 April 1812 at York (Toronto), U.C., eldest son of D'Arcy Boulton Jr and Sarah Ann Robinson; m. Harriette Elizabeth Dixon who, in 1875, married Professor Goldwin Smith*; d. 15 Feb. 1874, at Toronto, Ont.

Grandson of Chief Justice D'Arcy Boulton*, as was his cousin D'Arcy BOULTON, and nephew of Sir John Beverley Robinson*, George Strange Boulton*, and Henry John Boulton*, William Henry Boulton belonged to the third generation of what was popularly known as the "Family Compact." He became an attorney at the age of 23 and began practising law in the partnership Gamble and Boulton. Matthew Crooks Cameron* articled with the firm and Boulton later entered into a partnership with him. In 1840 Boulton was treasurer of the annual Toronto races, one of the most important sporting events in the city, and in the next few years he emerged as an important figure in politics, making use of his considerable family influence and acquiring popular support through association with the rising power of the Orange movement.

Boulton was first elected alderman for St Patrick's ward on the Toronto City Council in 1838. He retained his seat until 1843, was re-elected in 1844 and 1852, and re-entered the council as alderman for St Andrew's ward in 1858. From 1845 until 1847 and again in 1858 he was selected by the council to serve as mayor of Toronto. He resigned as mayor on 8 Nov. 1858, after a quarrel with the chief of police. Boulton contested the election in January 1859, the first in which the electors voted directly for the mayor, but was defeated by Reform lawyer Adam Wilson* who was supported by George BROWN's Municipal Reform Association.

Boulton lent dignity to the office of mayor by his family prestige and by his impressive residence known as the "Grange" where he entertained the governor general, Lord Elgin [Bruce*], during his tour of Canada West in 1847. As mayor he was himself a colourful figure with varied interests. Once, when councillors debated whether his salary should be £400 or £450, Boulton, on being informed that there were back streets in town that could not be paved for want of funds, told the council to "leave the money in the chamberlain's hands for the benefit of the community." Perhaps it was this apparent indifference to money that surprised and pleased his electors and it may explain the financial difficulties he experienced in 1851 when his property qualifications for nomination were questioned. One of Boulton's major interests while mayor was the Provincial Agricultural Association. He played a leading role in the decision of the city council to vote $20,000 towards a permanent exhibition building for agricultural and industrial arts. This building, known as the Crystal Palace, was opened in 1858 and annual exhibitions were held there until 1866.

Boulton's career as a representative for Toronto in the Legislative Assembly began in 1844 when he was pressed to stand for the Tories along with Henry Sherwood*. The Tory British Canadian stated, "Mr Boulton . . . is just the man of firmness and resolution that the times call for . . . he is shrewd, prompt, and persevering." The two Toronto seats were being contested by one Reformer, John Henry Dunn*, and two other Tories. Boulton's support came largely from the working classes (Brown complained in the Globe that the "Labourers were under the influence of the Corporation and the Family Compact"), and he was to continue to hold this support throughout his parliamentary career.

When Boulton entered the assembly in 1844, he joined the Conservative ranks under William Henry DRAPER, whose administration he was later to describe as the "weakest government that ever held power." The major issue facing the assembly was the Reformers' bill making King's College secular, and on it Boulton was firm; coming from a strong Church of England family, he tried consistently to protect what he considered the rights and privileges of the church. In 1845 Draper attempted to settle the university question, and Boulton, as one of Bishop John Strachan*'s spokesmen in the assembly, opposed his bill and moved a six-month delay; the motion eventually carried. Again in 1849 when Robert Baldwin*'s university bill, which removed all denominational distinctions, was being debated, Boulton led the opposition; however, the act was passed. King's College was completely secularized, but Queen's and Victoria, both sectarian colleges, refused to be affiliated with it. In 1851 Boulton unsuccessfully proposed a university plan of his own. It was comparable to one proposed earlier by Sherwood and had Strachan's approval. The University of Toronto would adopt the University of London's system; that is, it would become the examining board for denominational colleges. A new institution, University College, was to retain the endowment of King's College and the teaching functions.

One of Boulton's first acts in the assembly had been to present a petition asking that the portion of the clergy reserves set apart for the Church of England be given up to it. In 1845 he spoke out against an amendment by Baldwin which would prevent Church of England clergymen from voting by providing that a clergyman would have to prove that he possessed a 40 shilling freehold. Boulton declared that it was a "stab at the Church and he was surprised to find Mr. Baldwin, who was a member of the Church, among its bitterest enemies."

In his defence of the church, Boulton was acting on principle or, at least, following a family tradition, but on other issues he appears to have accepted the role of demagogue in his bid for popular support. Having retained his seat in the Conservative debacle of 1847–48, when he warned electors that their interests would be sacrificed to the "Tobacco-smoking, Dram Drinking, Garlick Eating Frenchmen," Boulton surprised his Conservative colleagues in 1850 by proposing amendments to the constitution to develop more fully the "elective system" and in particular to make the Legislative Council elective. Answering objections that his proposals were "revolutionary and republican," Boulton replied, "Our institutions are republican . . . so are those of Great Britain." His Toronto colleague, Henry Sherwood, strongly condemned Boulton's proposals and said they were not the sentiments of his Toronto constituents, but Boulton campaigned in 1851 on the need for "radical changes in the working of the Government," and won his seat, although with a reduced majority.

Boulton was able to boast in that year that "he owed his election to . . . the bone and sinew of the country, the mechanics, the artisans and labourers," and to the Orange association. In fact, much of Boulton's popular support came from Toronto Orangemen who were grateful to him for his efforts in having the act of 1843 restricting party processions repealed. They wanted Boulton as their candidate along with Henry Sherwood during the 1851 elections, which saw two other Conservatives and two Reformers in the contest. At the stormy nomination meeting, a "knot of young lads, the roughest and most noisy of our population," according to the Globe, shouted down not only Reformers Frederick Chase Capreol* and Terence Joseph O'NEILL, but also Orangeman Samuel Thompson* who persisted in running even after an Orange delegation asked him to retire from the contest. Boulton was elected, along with George Percival RIDOUT, but his election was declared invalid in March 1853.

In his role as an Orangeman, Boulton had risen from the mastership of a Toronto lodge to become deputy grand master of British North America in 1854. During the schism in the Orange movement from 1853 to 1856, Boulton supported the more Protestant and vocal wing of Orangeism led by George Benjamin* in opposition to Ogle Robert GOWAN.

After his expulsion from the assembly, Boulton left Canada to travel in England and on the Continent. He again made a bid for his former Toronto seat in the 1857 election but was defeated by George Brown. This set-back, coupled with his resignation as mayor in 1858 and his subsequent defeat in the mayoralty contest in 1859, led to his retirement from politics. He continued practising law in Toronto.

Boulton was a son of the Family Compact with a sympathy for tradition, but he had at the same time an instinct for popular politics. He early grasped the political importance of the Orange movement, and he was never disturbed by the views or methods of Orangemen. His defence of clergy reserves was consistent with his traditionalism and his advocacy of elective institutions consistent with his "popularism." Understandably, he was disliked and feared by Reformers such as Baldwin and Brown who disapproved of his essentially popular and non-intellectual approach to politics. But he had an affable personality; he was able to enjoy both a dinner in the officers' mess of the garrison after a day's race over "Boulton's Course" and electioneering on a platform that was flanked by "Boulton's Brigades" who applauded his promises to vote for "rep by pop" and to defend Protestantism.

HEREWARD SENIOR

Evening Telegram (Toronto), 12 July 1910. Globe (Toronto), 8, 15 Oct., 10 Dec. 1844; 14 Jan., 11 Feb., 11 March 1845; 27 June, 6 July 1850; 24 June, 20 Nov., 2, 9, 11, 18, 23, 25 Dec. 1851; 15 Dec. 1857; 13 July, 9 Nov. 1858. The hand-book of Toronto; containing its climate, geology, natural history, educational institutions, courts of law, municipal arrangements . . ., [comp. G. P. Ure] (Toronto, 1858), 175. Loyal Orange Association of British North America, Grand Lodge, Annual Report, 1854, 5–7. Mail and Empire (Toronto), 4 Nov. 1936. Montreal Gazette, 20 June 1840. J. R. Robertson, Old Toronto: a selection of excerpts from Landmarks of Toronto, ed. E. C. Kyte (Toronto, 1954), 59–60, 69. Scadding, Toronto of old.

Chadwick, Ontarian families, I, 58; II, 57. Dent, Canadian portrait gallery, III, 101. Wallace, Macmillan dictionary, 73. Careless, Brown, I, 245–46, 291; Union of the Canadas, 118. Creighton, Macdonald, young politician, 109–10, 161–62. Landmarks of Toronto (Robertson), II, 630, 754–55, 1089; VI, 191–92. Moir, Church and state in Canada West, 96, 110, 113.

BOURBOURG, CHARLES-ÉTIENNE BRASSEUR DE. See BRASSEUR

BOURGEAUX (Bourgeau), EUGÈNE, botanical collector; b. 20 April 1813 at Brizon, France (department of Hautes-Alpes), son of Jacques Bourgeaux and Françoise Missilier; d. in February 1877 in Paris.

Nothing precise is known about Eugène Bourgeaux's youth, except that he acquired a liking for botany while tending his father's herds. He seems to have received little education, to judge by his correspondence. Nicolas-Charles Seringe and Alex Jordan, of Lyons, taught him the rudiments of the science of botany. In 1843 Bourgeaux went to Paris where Philip Barker Webb employed him to assist in the conservation of his herbarium. For this purpose, in 1845 and 1846 Bourgeaux travelled over all the Canary Islands. In the following year the Association Botanique Française d'Exploration appointed Bourgeaux a botanical collector. In this capacity he travelled until 1856, for the association or for other scientists, throughout Spain, the south of France, the Canary Islands, and Algeria.

In 1857, at the request of Sir William Jackson Hooker, who had known him in the French botanical association and who considered him "the prince of botanical collectors," Bourgeaux took part as a collector in the expedition led by John Palliser*. This expedition, financed by the British government, was to explore British territory between latitudes 45° and 50°N and longitudes 100° and 115°W, with a view to assessing the possibilities of settling the region. Thus its members were expected to provide impartial and complete scientific information on the topography, routes, soil, and climate of the prairies. Bourgeaux was engaged by John Ball, under-secretary of state for the colonies, and was to receive £150 per season. On 16 May 1857, together with Palliser and two other members of the expedition, he sailed for New York, and on 10 June the explorers set off on their first stage, to Fort William (Thunder Bay, Ont.).

"My botanical illusions have diminished a lot since arriving in these vast regions," he wrote to Hooker in typically misspelt French. "The forests and prairies are magnificent, and so is the vegetation, but one of my first observations is that the same plants occupy a large geographical territory, and the number of species is not related to the vastness of the country." This discovery in no way prevented Bourgeaux from gathering specimens in the vicinity of Lake Superior, Red River, and Lake Winnipeg, in the valley of the Saskatchewan River, around Carlton House (near Prince Albert, Sask.) and Edmonton, then in the Rockies. After that, according to his correspondence with Hooker, he followed the Bow River from old Fort Kananaskis to the head-waters – Bow Lakes, to the northeast of the present Yoho Park (British Columbia). In the Rockies he collected several examples of about 229 species. All the plants and seeds had to be carefully dried so that they would not mildew, and Palliser helped him in this task.

The leader of the expedition admired the collector's tenacity and courage. James Hector*, one of the members of the team, emphasized that Bourgeaux was everybody's friend: he was jovial, and quick to assist anybody who sought his aid. In particular he helped Thomas Wright Blakiston, who was responsible for astronomical and meteorological readings. Bourgeaux, who knew no English, was popular with the Métis because of his language and personal qualities, and he became a friend of Father Albert Lacombe*. It was with regret that the expedition parted company with Bourgeaux in the spring of 1859. He had to leave them to discharge a previous commitment.

He went to the Royal Botanic Gardens at Kew in London, and there for some weeks he sorted his specimens. These were subsequently identified and classified by the Royal Botanic Gardens. He had collected altogether about 1,200 species, in 10–12 duplicates. Unfortunately his habitat notes were not retranscribed for each specimen. All that was done was to print a label: "Palliser's Brit. N. Am. Expl. Expedition. Saskatchewan. Coll. E. Bourgeau 1858–59." Yet the majority of the specimens did not come from Saskatchewan. Consequently Bourgeaux's North American collections can scarcely be utilized. This is a pity, the more because all the plants classified by Bourgeaux up to then were remarkable for the quality of the labels. However, the carices he had gathered on the prairies have been identified by the famous Francis Boott, and some are quoted in his classic work Illustrations of the Genus Carex.

This great North American expedition did not exhaust Bourgeaux. He had barely finished his task of classifying in London when Edmond Boissier, the Swiss botanist, commissioned him to explore Lycia so that he could complete his documentation on Asia Minor, whose flora he was engaged in describing. Bourgeaux devoted the year 1860 to this task, then he explored the county of Nice, and the following year Boissier sent him back to Asia Minor to explore the Pontic Alps (Turkey). On his return, Bourgeaux continued his botanical excursions, this time in Spain (1863–64). In 1865, on the proposal of the Muséum National d'Histoire Naturelle in Paris, Bourgeaux was attached to the scientific mission that was to explore Mexico in the wake of the French armies. There he spent the years 1865 and 1866. Asa Gray and Sereno Watson were often to speak in their publications of certain of Bourgeaux's Mexican collections. Some herbarium specimens indicate that Bourgeaux was on the Island of Rhodes in 1870, but his activities after his return from Mexico in 1867 until his death cannot be reconstructed.

In 1877 Édouard André paid tribute to Bourgeaux: "[He] was one of the most remarkable collectors of dry plants in this period. He embarked upon journeys that took in France, Spain, Asia Minor, the Canaries, the Rocky Mountains, and finally Mexico, which he explored as part of the French scientific commission, and the results of these have enriched all the herbariums in Europe. M. Bourgeau, who had been named knight of the Légion d'Honneur after the last campaign, was occupied with the sorting of his collections at the Muséum d'Histoire Naturelle when death overtook him last February."

All in all, Eugène Bourgeaux classified for botanists more than 15,000 species, which were identified by authorities of his day such as Boissier, Webb, Cosson, Boott, and Hooker. Ernest Cosson dedicated to him a genus of compositae, the Bourgaea; in botanical literature occur, among others, Astragalus bourgovii Gray, Statice bourgiaei Webb, and Saxifraga bourgaeana Boissier and Reut. His contribution to the botanical exploration of western North America is noted by the Rosa bourgeauiana [François] Crépin, and his name deserves an honourable place in Canadian history among the great explorers of the last century.

The practical knowledge that Bourgeaux acquired of the Canadian prairies enabled him to draw the attention of the British government "to the eventual advantages of setting up agricultural centres in the vast plains of Rupert's Land, and particularly in Saskatchewan in the vicinity of Fort Carlton. [For] this region is much more suitable for the [large-scale] farming done in temperate climates (wheat, rye, barley, oats, Indian corn, etc.) than one would be inclined to believe." In his opinion, the prairies would, moreover, be ideal for stock-breeding, and would provide all the materials necessary for the establishment of a settlement. Through its produce, the latter would ensure "the subsistence of the Indians, whose sources of food, provided exclusively by hunting, tend to diminish daily." The only real difficulty the settlers would encounter would be "the immense distance to be covered in lands at present devoid of roads and almost uninhabited."

Although the Savoyard Bourgeaux signed no written work, he was such a keen and prolific collector, in so many diverse countries, that he is remembered in the history of botanical exploration. A mountain peak in the Banff area bears his name.

MARCEL RAYMOND

Palliser papers (Spry). Édouard André, "Nécrologie," L'illustration horticole (Ghent), XXIV (1877), 71–72. Ernest Cosson, "Notice sur les voyages et collections botaniques de M. Eugène Bourgeau," Bulletin de la Société botanique de France, XIII (1866), l-lvii. W. J. Hooker, "Statice bourgiaei, Bourgeau's Statice, Tab-5153," Curtis's Botanical Magazine (London), LXXXV (1859). Marcel Raymond, "Bourgeau en Amérique du Nord," Les botanistes français en Amérique du Nord avant 1850 (Colloques internationaux du Centre national de la recherche scientifique, LXIII, Paris, 1957), 189–92.

BOURNEUF, FRANÇOIS-LAMBERT, sailor, school-teacher, farmer, merchant, shipbuilder, and politician; b. 20 Oct. 1787 at Rénéville, France (department of Manche), son of François Bourneuf and Michelle Énolle; d. 16 May 1871 at Grosses Coques, St Mary's Bay, N.S.

In 1808, after three years' service in the French imperial navy, François-Lambert Bourneuf signed on with the frigate Furieuse, trading to the French West Indies. During a voyage in 1809 he was taken prisoner by the English, and brought to Halifax. He managed to escape in 1812, after two attempts. Bourneuf then became a school-teacher at Pombcoup (Pubnico), N.S. He later went to St Mary's Bay, where on 20 May 1813, before Father Jean-Mandé Sigogne*, he took the oath of allegiance to the British crown. He taught for another year and then turned his attention to farming. In November 1815 he was again at sea as second in command on a schooner. Two years later he bought his own schooner and began to sail the trading route between Saint John, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia. By 1830 Bourneuf was also doing well as a shipbuilder; from 1830 to 1855 he built some 30 vessels.

In the Nova Scotia elections of 1843 Bourneuf entered politics as a reform candidate and was elected MLA for Digby County, N.S.; his mandate was renewed in the elections of 1847, 1851, and 1855. In the same period he was appointed a member of the first schools commission for Clare (Church Point), N.S.; his name also appears among the first magistrates of that county.

In November 1855 the firm of Allison and Spur of Saint John, N.B., with which Bourneuf did business and for which he built ships, was forced by a series of bankruptcy actions to close its doors. The closure reduced Bourneuf's firm to bankruptcy – an experience from which neither Bourneuf nor his business ever recovered.

In 1859 at the end of his fourth term as MLA for Digby, Bourneuf retired from both provincial and municipal politics. He then began to write his memoirs, which he never completed.

In 1818 François-Lambert Bourneuf had married Marie Doucet, by whom he had ten children.

GÉRALD G. OUELLET

Archives acadiennes, Université de Moncton, Fonds de Placide Gaudet, 43–24; Mémoire de François-Lambert Bourneuf. Beck, Government of Nova Scotia. Alphonse Deveau, La ville française (Québec, 1968), 189, 202, 245–66. I. W. Wilson, A geography and history of the county of Digby, Nova Scotia (Halifax, 1900), 319–30. "François Lambert Bourneuf," Le Petit Courrier (West Pubnico, N.S.), 18 mars – 10 juin 1948. "Francois Lambert Bourneuf," L'Évangéline (Moncton, N.B.), 10 déc. 1891 – 2 juin 1892. J. W. Comeau, "François Lambert Bourneuf," N.S. Hist. Soc. Coll., XXVII (1947), 147–72.

BOVELL, JAMES, physician, Church of England clergyman, theologian, and educator; b. 28 Oct. 1817, in Barbados, West Indies, eldest son of John Bovell, a wealthy banker, and Sarah Applewaite; m. at age 18 Julia Howard App-Griffith of Barbados who survived him by 11 years; of their six children, two died in infancy; d. 15 Jan. 1880, at Charlestown, Nevis, West Indies.

James Bovell received private schooling in Barbados, before going to England at age 17 for further education. He decided to study medicine, and in November 1834 entered Guy's Hospital, London, where he was Sir Astley Cooper's dresser, and was taught by Richard Bright, Thomas Addison, and other distinguished physicians. He later studied pathology at Edinburgh and Glasgow while awaiting admittance into the Royal College of Physicians of London as an extra-licentiate in 1839. He then worked for a few years under Robert Graves and William Stokes in Dublin, until stricken with typhus fever. When he recovered, he returned to Barbados and took up practice in Bridgetown. Bovell has been credited with medical degrees from London, Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Dublin universities, but official records do not confirm these additional qualifications.

In 1848 Bovell emigrated to Canada and began practising in Toronto, where he became one of the most prominent physicians. His broad training and questing spirit engaged him in such ventures as the treatment of cholera victims with milk transfusions, the practice of clinical microscopy, and the study of comparative pathology. In 1851 he was co-founder and editor of the Upper Canada Journal of Medical, Surgical and Physical Science (Toronto), and his personal contributions to medical journals totalled nearly 30 papers, on topics ranging from the anatomy of the leech to a uterine tumour as a complication of parturition. His writings often displayed both a reforming zeal and keen observation. He connected the unhealthiness of Barbados with "innumerable swarms of insects" (1848); and advocated health committees for Toronto that should order "the removal of all nuisances and filth," since "cholera delights in filth and moisture." Later, in A plea for inebriate asylums, he deplored the general indifference towards drunkenness, which led "the unfortunate victim to look on his state rather as a weak fault or excusable failing than a great sin, and so perpetuat[ed] a degrading vice to his utter destruction and eternal ruin."

Bovell was a dedicated educationist and was one of the original councillors of the Canadian Institute in 1852. He, along with Edward Mulberry Hodder and four other colleagues, helped to organize the medical faculty of the new Trinity College in November 1850. He was dean from 1851 until 1856, when the faculty resigned and the school was dissolved following disputes with the council, headed by John Strachan*, bishop of Toronto. Friction arose initially because the faculty, whose services were freely given, resented the council's restrictions on expenditures and its exercise of authority over such matters as the advertisements for medical courses inserted in the press by the dean. The final break came after the faculty opened direct negotiations with the government to forestall a threatened reinstitution of the former King's College medical school. When Bovell's conciliatory efforts failed, he joined the Toronto School of Medicine as lecturer in physiology and pathology. In 1864 he also became lecturer in physiology to the Upper Canada Veterinary School (later the Ontario Veterinary College), established in 1862 by Andrew Smith*.

From 1857 until he left Canada in 1870, Bovell was at various times designated professor of physiology, of physiology and chemistry, and of natural theology in the faculty of arts at Trinity College. For several years he was also lay secretary to the diocesan and provincial synods. He was deeply religious and published about a dozen devotional or exegetical works presenting High Church beliefs. His physiology lectures to third-year arts students were based on his Outlines of natural theology, which illustrated divine goodness and wisdom through natural objects and phenomena and sought to reconcile recent geological discoveries with the Book of Genesis. Rejecting the doctrines of Sir Charles Lyell and Charles Darwin, he espoused the high sacramental teachings of John Keble and Edward Bouverie Pusey, leaders of the Tractarian movement at Oxford. In 1860, his views on the real presence of Christ in the Eucharist were denounced as "Romish" by the bishop of Huron, Benjamin Cronyn, whose evangelical convictions had involved him in open conflict with Trinity College authorities. To Bovell's distress, a commentary on his privately circulated denial of this allegation appeared in the Globe newspaper on 15 Nov. 1860. When the corporation of Trinity College (of which he was a member) disavowed and repudiated his doctrinal statements in absentia, he resigned his cherished chair, but Bishop Strachan persuaded him to retain it.

James Bovell strongly influenced William Osler*. In 1866, when Osler, at 17, was head prefect at Trinity College School, the founder and warden of the school, William Arthur Johnson, was Bovell's close friend and fellow-microscopist, and Bovell was himself medical superintendent and a governor of the school. Osler accompanied the two men on specimen-hunting expeditions, from which stemmed his deep interest in microscopy. When Osler decided upon a medical career, he became Bovell's unofficial apprentice, and between 1868 and 1870 frequented his house, attended his lectures, browsed in his library, and shared his hobbies, from natural history to the classics. Many years later, when Sir William Osler was Regius professor of medicine at Oxford, he publicly acknowledged owing his start in the profession to James Bovell. On a previous occasion, paying a "tribute of filial affection" to his old teacher, Osler summed him up in these words: "Only men of a certain metal rise superior to their surroundings, and while Dr. Bovell had that all-important combination of boundless ambition with energy and industry, he had that fatal quality of diffuseness, in which even genius is strangled."

When Bovell revisited the West Indies in 1870, he was persuaded to take holy orders by Bishop W. W. Jackson of Antigua, who ordained him in 1871, and he decided to remain in the West Indies. After serving as curate, then rector, at the united parishes of St George's and St John's, Nevis, he moved to Charlestown in 1873, where he took charge of the less demanding combined parishes of St Thomas' and St Paul's. In 1875 his health began to fail and he died five years later following a stroke.

Claude E. Dolman

Selected writings by James Bovell are: "Apparatus for the exhibition of vapour," Upper Canada Journal of Medical, Surgical and Physical Science (Toronto), I (1851–52), 59–60; "Clinical remarks on two cases of tumour of the uterus complicating parturition," British American Journal of Medical and Physical Science (Montreal), V (1849–50), 1–5, 29–32; Constitution and canons of the Synod of the Diocese of Toronto, with explanatory notes and comments (Toronto, 1858); Defence of doctrinal statements, addressed to the right rev. the lord bishop of Toronto, the right rev. the lord bishop of Huron, and the Corporation of Trinity College, with the hope that the explanations now given may remove erroneous impressions, and satisfy the church at large that I am loyal and true to her (Toronto, 1860); Letters, addressed to the Rev. Mr. Fletcher and others, framers of a series of resolutions on "ritual" (Toronto, 1867); "Note on the preservation of some infusoria with a view to the display of their cilia," Canadian Journal, new ser., VIII (1863), 341–42; "Notes on some points in the anatomy of the leech," Canadian Journal, new ser., I (1856), 27–33; "Observations on the climate of Barbadoes and its influence on disease: together with remarks on angioleucitis or Barbadoes leg," British American Journal of Medical and Physical Science (Montreal), IV (1848–49), 113–16, 141–45, 169–72, 197–201, 225–28, 261–66; "On the transfusion of milk, as practised in cholera, at the cholera sheds, Toronto, July, 1854," Canadian Journal, III (1854–55), 188–92; "On the white globules of the blood in disease," Upper Canada Journal of Medical, Surgical and Physical Science (Toronto), II (1852–53), 48–50, 65–69, 128–37, 150–56, 182–89, 210–14; Outlines of natural theology for the Canadian student, selected and arranged from the most authentic sources (Toronto, 1859); Passing thoughts on man's relation to God and on God's relation to man (Toronto, 1862); A plea for inebriate asylums; commended to the consideration of the legislators of the province of Canada (Toronto, 1862); Preparation for the Christian sacrifice, or holy communion (Toronto, 1859); The world at the advent of Jesus Christ (Toronto, 1868).

Bishop of Antigua's Lodge, Bishop's diary, visitation of Nevis, 1872. PAO, Strachan letter books, 1854–62, John Strachan to James Bovell, 29 Nov. 1860. St. George's, St. John's, St Paul's, and St Thomas' Churches (Nevis, W.I.), Baptism, marriage, and burial registers. Globe (Toronto), 15, 17 Nov. 1860. [William Osler], "James Bovell, M.D.," Canadian Journal of Medical Science (Toronto), V (April 1880), 114–15. University of Trinity College (Toronto), Calendars, 1853–70. Standard dict. of Can. biog. (Roberts and Tunnell), II, 40–42.

Canniff, Medical profession in Upper Canada, 257–58. Harvey Cushing, The life of Sir William Osler (2v. Oxford, 1925). A history of the University of Trinity College, Toronto, 1852–1952, ed. T. A. Reed (Toronto, 1952). C. E. Dolman, "The Reverend James Bovell, M.D., 1817–1880," in Pioneers of Canadian science, ed. G. F. G. Stanley (Royal Society of Canada "Studia Varia" series, IX, Toronto, 1966), 81–100, 136–46. N. B. Gwyn, "Details connected with the evolution of medical education in Toronto," University of Toronto Medical Journal, VIII (1930), 224–29; "The early life of Sir William Osler," International Association of Medical Museums, Bulletin IX, and Journal of Technical Methods (Montreal, 1926), 109–49. A. J. Johnson, "The founder of the medical faculty, Dr. James Bovell," Trinity University Review (Toronto), XV (1902), 104–6.

BOYD, JOHN, teacher, publisher, and pharmacist; b. at South River, Sydney County, N.S., to John Boyd and Mary MacDonald in 1823; m. Ann MacDonald and had one son and three daughters; d. in Boston, Mass., on 28 Dec. 1880.

John Boyd, who apparently had little formal education, became a school-teacher in Pictou County in 1848. He prepared a Gaelic-English speller to which he added a short history of the "45" in Gaelic. This history was also printed by the Pictou Eastern Chronicle. Returning to Sydney County in 1849, he designed a primitive press which was built by Angus MacGillivray, a local carpenter. In 1850 he taught school at Broad Cove, at the same time continuing his interest in printing. In January 1851 he began a journal, An Cuairtear og Gaelach, which contained material that was mostly copied from Tormad MacLeod's Cuairtear, published in Scotland.

In June 1852 Boyd began the Antigonish Casket, a small Catholic newspaper, which appeared weekly. Two of its four pages had material written in Gaelic. The use of Gaelic was probably due less to a sense of ethnic pride than to the fact that many of the potential readers were Highland Scots. The Gaelic content was gradually reduced and by 1857 it had virtually disappeared from the paper. When he began his paper, readers "like the visit of angels," were few and far between. To keep the paper alive, Boyd turned to job printing, opened the first Catholic book-store east of Halifax, and, although he had no training, also operated a pharmacy. The lack of proper communication and transportation facilities posed a continuous difficulty in bringing in supplies for his enterprises and in obtaining information for the paper. In July 1852 a telegraph office was opened in Antigonish, but this was expensive, and a twice-weekly coach service, begun in 1841, was unreliable. To develop circulation for his paper on Cape Breton Island, which was particularly deficient in communication facilities, Boyd sent out agents who toured the island selling books, pills, and the Casket. By 1858 the paper was sold by four agents in the peninsula, 13 on Cape Breton, and three in Prince Edward Island. No figures on actual sales have survived but circulation never matched his expectations.

In content the Casket brought its readers a wide mixture of current events, theology, poetry, and literature, much of it written especially for the paper. Its editorials, principally by Dr William Currie, supported the Liberal party and unsuccessfully favoured such local reforms as the adoption of municipal institutions. The growing quarrel between the Catholics, particularly the Irish, and the Liberal government posed a difficult problem for the Casket. The paper, either because of devotion to reform principles or because of a lack of affinity with the Irish of Halifax, tried to continue supporting the Liberal government of William Young* despite Joseph HOWE's attacks on the Catholics. Its tactics merely brought a series of bitter attacks from the Halifax Catholic. Boyd capitulated and the Casket gradually became a staunch supporter of the Conservative party.

Boyd was always ambitious to play a prominent part in the colony's affairs and, in January 1861, moved his newspaper office to Halifax. This venture failed and Boyd returned to Antigonish; in July 1861 he sold the Casket to his half-brother, Angus Boyd, and devoted himself to his book- and drug-store. In September 1862, after suffering further business reverses, he moved to Boston. Angus Boyd later stated that John Boyd was "the author of several ingenious inventions" and he may have been the John Boyd who had an American patent on a combination cane-umbrella. But Boyd, through his optimism and vision, had undoubtedly helped to build a newspaper which served its readers well.

K. G. PRYKE

Casket (Antigonish, N.S.), 1852–61 (broken run), 1943. D. J. Rankin, A history of the county of Antigonish, Nova Scotia (Toronto, 1929). D. G. Whidden, The history of the town of Antigonish (Wolfville, N.S., 1934), 113–15. D. M. Sinclair, "Gaelic newspapers and prose writings in Nova Scotia," N.S. Hist. Soc. Coll., XXVI (1945), 105–14.

BRASSARD, LOUIS-MOÏSE, secular priest, bursar of the seminary of Nicolet, and parish priest; b. 25 Oct. 1800 at Nicolet, L.C., son of Jean-Baptiste Brassard and Marie-Josephte Manseau; d. 21 June 1877 at Longueuil, Que.

Louis-Moïse, grand-nephew of Louis-Marie Brassard*, the founder of the school that became the seminary of Nicolet, came from a family that provided many priests and nuns. He was a pupil at the seminary of Nicolet from 1811 to 1820, and was ordained priest at Quebec on 4 Jan. 1824. Having been assistant priest at Les Cèdres, in Soulanges County, parish priest of Saint-Timothée de Beauharnois, Saint-Polycarpe, and Sainte-Elizabeth de Joliette, he returned to the seminary of Nicolet as bursar for the period 1836 to 1840. In particular he sought to find ways of improving cultivation on the farms. The chronic deficit of the institution led him to doubt his ability for this kind of work, and he asked his bishop for permission to return to the care of a parish.

As parish priest of Saint-Antoine de Longueuil from 1840 to 1855, he displayed great activity, particularly in the field of education. He had a boys' secondary school built, on which work was almost finished when he left the parish. He founded the convent of Longueuil. His costly ventures drained the treasury of the parish council, and he did not succeed in having a new church built.

His dealings with the sisters of the Holy Names of Jesus and Mary are famous. After vainly trying to obtain the services of the nuns of the Congregation of Notre-Dame for his future school, Brassard, through the intermediary of the Oblate Pierre-Antoine-Adrien Telmon, had asked for some of the sisters of the Holy Names of Jesus and Mary. In 1846 he prevailed upon the parish council of Longueuil to build a spacious house and to put it at the disposal of the sisters. Soon the parish council was trying to dictate to the sisters' school. For his part, the Canadian priest considered that the nuns were too receptive to the directives given by the French Oblates, their spiritual advisers. He even threatened to withdraw his material assistance from the sisters. In 1849 the Oblates left Longueuil, and shortly afterwards Brassard assumed the spiritual direction of the community. Historians have not failed to stress that the difficult relations between the parish priest, the sisters, and the Oblates began when Charles-Paschal-Télesphore Chiniquy*, who had left the noviciate of the Oblates in November 1847, took refuge with Brassard; the parish priest had been Chiniquy's friend and protector since the latter's brief stay at the seminary of Nicolet.

In 1857, after residing two years in Europe, Brassard was appointed parish priest at Saint-Roch-de-l'Achigan. He built a convent there, which he entrusted to the sisters of the Holy Names of Jesus and Mary, and a college, intended for the Clercs de Saint-Viateur. He was also interested in encouraging settlement on the land. In September 1862, with this end in view, he explored the valleys of L'Assomption and La Mataouin (Matawin), together with the parish priests Théophile-Stanislas Provost* and Thomas-Léandre Brassard, his brother.

In 1874 L.-M. Brassard retired to Longueuil, and for some time lived in the residence of the sisters of the Holy Names of Jesus and Mary. He died at Longueuil at the age of 77. His body rests in the cemetery of the sisters.

PIERRE SAVARD

Allaire, Dictionnaire. Carrière, Histoire des O.M.I., I, 133–41, 303–20; V, 41–82. J.-A.-I. Douville, Histoire du collège-séminaire de Nicolet, 1803–1903, avec les listes complètes des directeurs, professeurs et élèves de l'institution (2v., Montréal, 1903), I, 250. Stanislas Drapeau, Études sur les développements de la colonisation du Bas-Canada depuis dix ans, de 1851 à 1861 (Québec, 1863), 425–31. Fidelis [J.-H. Prétot], Mère Marie-Rose, fondatrice de la congrégation des SS. Noms de Jésus et de Marie au Canada (Montréal, 1895). Alexandre Jodoin et J.-L. Vincent, Histoire de Longueuil et de la famille de Longueuil (Montréal, 1889), 410–12. Paroisse de Saint-Roch de l'Achigan, Annuaire de Ville-Marie (Montréal, 1871), 57–80. Marcel Trudel, Chiniquy (2^{e} éd., [Trois-Rivières, Qué.], 1955).

BRASSEUR DE BOURBOURG, CHARLES-ÉTIENNE, secular priest, historian, specialist in American studies; b. 8 Sept. 1814; d. 8 Jan. 1874 at Nice, France.

Charles-Étienne Brasseur was born at Bourbourg, a small town, Flemish in appearance, 18 kilometres from Dunkirk. He studied philosophy and theology first at Ghent, Belgium, then at Rome, where he was ordained priest in 1845.

While still a student, Brasseur gave indications that he was destined to be a writer. In 1837 he contributed to the journal Le Monde (Paris), directed by Félicité-Robert de La Mennais; then, under the pseudonym of Ravensberg, he published historical accounts, such as Jérusalem, tableau de l'histoire et des vicissitudes de cette ville célèbre . . ., or novels inspired by primitive Christianity, such as Le Sérapéon. . . . A contributor to L'Univers (Paris) pointed out, in the issue dated 8 Aug. 1839, that the latter contained "unfortunate reminiscences" of Chateaubriand's Martyrs; this kind of criticism, with its allegation of plagiarism, was to be levelled on many subsequent occasions against Brasseur de Bourbourg's works.

These first publications had however won him a flattering reputation at Rome, where the Canadian Abbé Léon Gingras made his acquaintance in 1844. To his friend Abbé Charles-Félix Cazeau*, vicar general of Quebec, Gingras wrote of his enthusiasm for the "famous writer," and of the desire he had soon come to feel, that Brasseur should be brought to Quebec: "It is to Quebec," he wrote on 28 Oct. 1844, "that he must be attached by all possible means." A month later, on 23 November, Gingras returned to the charge: "Once more, my dear Cazeau, move heaven and earth to ensure that such a splendid bird does not escape us and fly to Montreal, where it would be so highly thought of." Finally, on the reiterated invitation of one of the superiors of the seminary, Abbé Brasseur arrived at Quebec in the autumn of 1845, after a brief stay at Boston. The directors requested him to undertake a course in ecclesiastical history, which, according to Abbé Jean-Baptiste-Antoine Ferland*, he did not continue beyond the eighth lesson.

Enjoying a period of enforced leisure, Abbé Brasseur busied himself with historical researches in the archdiocesan archives at Quebec. At the beginning of 1846 he published an Esquisse biographique sur Mgr de Laval. . . . The French abbé antagonized the priests of the seminary by the publication of this pamphlet, and in the spring he left Quebec to return to Boston, where for some months he served as a priest to the great satisfaction of the bishop, John Bernard Fitzpatrick, who conferred upon him the title of vicar general of his diocese when he left for Mexico the following summer.

Brasseur returned to Europe in 1851, and concerned himself particularly with the writing of an Histoire du Canada. . . . The work was dedicated "to His Excellency Jean-Bernard Fitzpatrick, bishop of Boston," who had taken the author under his protection "when climate and circumstances had caused him to cross over from Quebec into his diocese." Instead of a mere imprimatur, Abbé Brasseur had received from his hierarchical superior, Bishop Pierre-Louis Parisis, ultramontane bishop of Arras and a friend of Louis Veuillot, a warm letter stating that his book offered "a description of the highest interest" of the work of the missionaries who had spread the gospel in Canada, of the courage and wisdom of the first governors who had been sent by France to found and organize that distant colony, and finally of the vicissitudes which that country, having become Christian and French, had undergone during three centuries. To stress further the merits of the work, if that were possible, the bishop added that "the historian had had at his disposal precious documents, which no writer before him had been in a position to examine," a circumstance which gave "to his accounts a character of truth" that was "the first and principal interest of the history."

As soon as the first copies of this work reached Quebec, curiosity was rapidly followed by indignation, for in the words of Henri d'Arles [Beaudé*] "our history was subjected to a veritable act of sabotage." Abbé Ferland, who had recently been attached to the archbishopric of Quebec, set to work to point out the gross mistakes of every kind with which this strange historian, in an apparently gratuitous fashion, had embroidered his pages: errors of date, names misinterpreted, geographical absurdities, texts truncated or misquoted, faulty translations, obvious plagiarisms. Ferland's work first appeared in the Journal de Québec on 22, 25, and 29 Jan. and 1 Feb. 1853, then as a pamphlet under the title Observations sur un ouvrage intitulé Histoire du Canada, etc., par M. l'abbé Brasseur de Bourbourg.

Pierre-Flavien Turgeon*, the archbishop of Quebec, after sending a copy of Ferland's opuscule to Bishop Parisis and another to Louis Veuillot, asked the editor in chief of L'Univers, in a letter dated 18 Feb. 1853, to be good enough "to insert a few lines" in his journal, "to avenge the Church in Canada for the insults it had received from an unjust detractor." Thanks to the good offices of Henry de Courcy, the New York correspondent of L'Univers, Abbé Ferland's brochure, in an improved form, was republished in Paris by Charles Douniol, publisher of the liberal Catholic review Le Correspondant. Bishop Parisis, by a letter published in L'Univers on 3 March 1854, withdrew the approval he had given to Abbé Brasseur's work.

But among the French public as a whole, the author of this history of Canada so hotly debated in Catholic circles had none the less established the basis of his reputation as a specialist in American studies. After 1852 he returned four times to America, on one occasion as chaplain of the French legation at Mexico City, on another as ecclesiastical administrator for the Indians of Rabinal, Guatemala, and finally as a French government envoy charged with scientific missions. He studied on the spot the primitive Mexican civilizations, collected important material on the geography, antiquities, and ethnology of Mexico and Central America, edited numerous curious texts such as the Manuscrit Troano . . ., and published works which, like the Lettres . . ., but especially the Histoire des nations . . ., assured him of a fine reputation as a scholar of America. In 1869, in an article in the Revue des questions historiques, Henry de Charencey placed Brasseur de Bourbourg "in the first rank among the learned men who have most contributed to reviving among us a liking for American studies." But later specialists were not slow to expose the unsound elements in this literary production. The contrary would have been surprising, for if Abbé Brasseur, according to the author of the biographical notice devoted to him in La Grande Encyclopédie, worked with "extreme fervour," "he often showed, in his hastily drafted works, a lack of the prudence and sagacity" that would have ensured for his writings less fragile foundations.

Brasseur de Bourbourg died on 8 Jan. 1874 in Nice at 59 years of age.

PHILIPPE SYLVAIN

[The different travel accounts sent by Abbé Brasseur de Bourbourg to the minister of education and religion from Mexico, Central America, and Spain are found in Archives Nationales (Paris), F^{17}, 2942. Biographical details are found in Brasseur de Bourbourg, Histoire des nations civilisées . . ., and it provides the main biographical source for Justin Winsor, Narrative and critical history of America (8v., Boston, 1884–89), I, 170–72; The Catholic encyclopedia; Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastique (16v. parus, Paris, 1912–); La grande encyclopédie (31v., Paris, [n.d.]). P.S.]

Bibliotheque Nationale (Paris), Z. Renan, 7829. C.-É. Brasseur de Bourbourg, Esquisse biographique sur Mgr de Laval, premier évêque de Québec (Québec, 1864); Histoire des nations civilisées du Mexique et de l'Amérique Centrale, durant les siècles antérieurs à Christophe Colomb . . . (4v., Paris, 1857–59); Histoire du Canada, de son Église et de ses missions depuis la découverte de l'Amérique jusqu'à nos jours, écrite sur des documents inédits compulsés dans les archives de l'archevêché et de la ville de Québec, etc. (2v., Paris, 1852); Lettres pour servir d'introduction à l'histoire primitive des nations civilisées de l'Amérique . . . (Mexico, 1851); Manuscrit Troano, étude sur le système graphique et la langue des Mayas (2v., Paris, 1869–70); Le Sérapéon, épisode de l'histoire du IV^{e} siècle (Paris, 1839); Sommaire des voyages scientifiques et des travaux de géographie, d'histoire, d'archéologie et de philologie américaines (Saint-Cloud, France, 1862). Étienne de Ravensberg [C.-É. Brasseur de Bourbourg], Jérusalem, tableau de l'histoire et des vicissitudes de cette ville célèbre depuis son origine la plus reculée jusqu'à nos jours (Lille, France, 1843).

Journal de Québec, 22 janv., 25 janv., 29 janv., 1er févr. 1853. Le Monde (Paris), 1837. L'Univers (Paris), 8 août 1839, 18 fév. 1853, 3 mars 1854. J.-B.-A. Ferland, Observations sur un ouvrage intitulé Histoire du Canada par l'abbé Brasseur de Bourbourg ... (Paris, 1854). Robert [Philippe] Sylvain, La vie et l'œuvre de Henry de Courcy, premier historien de l'Église catholique aux États-Unis (Québec, 1955), 189–224. Henri de Charency, "L'histoire et la civilisation du Mexique d'après les travaux de M. l'abbé Brasseur de Bourbourg," Revue des questions historiques (Paris), VII (1869), 283.

BRAUNEIS, JEAN-CHRYSOSTOME, musician; b. Quebec, 26 Jan. 1814; son of Jean-Chrysostome Brauneis and Christine Hudson; m. Jeanet Johnson by whom he had several children; d. Montreal, Que., 11 Aug. 1871.

Jean-Chrysostome Brauneis' father was a German-born bandmaster and music teacher who gave his son his first music lessons. Probably the first Canadian to go abroad to further his musical education, young Brauneis studied in Europe from 1830 to 1833. Upon his return he was offered the position of organist at Montreal's Notre-Dame Church and occupied it until 1844. He reapplied for this post unsuccessfully in 1849. He was also organist at St James Cathedral until fire destroyed the building in 1857. He held various teaching positions, for 30 years at the Institut des Sœurs de la Congrégation Notre-Dame and for shorter periods at the residential school of the sisters of the Sacred Heart at Sault-au-Récollet and at the École Normale Jacques-Cartier in Montreal.

In 1837 Brauneis founded the Société de Musique, which apparently was short-lived. Five years later he established courses in vocal music – sacred, drawing room, and operatic – for students aged 15 to 25 (males and females separated) and a mixed class for children from 10 to 15. Brauneis' skill in handling beginners made the course a success and an expansion was soon planned. An advertisement which appeared in La Minerve on 3 Nov. 1842 reveals Brauneis' vocal method as the standard German one which he learned from a distinguished European artist; he claimed perfect knowledge of French, English, German, and Italian and singled out Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, and Handel as the masters represented in his collection of music. Brauneis' love of the great classics also pervaded his work as organist and piano teacher. His colleague Gustave Smith, who first met him in 1856, has credited Brauneis with introducing the piano study pieces of Czerny, Cramer, and Clementi to Montreal and with turning out well-trained pupils who were good sight-readers.

Like any other pioneer musician, Brauneis had to be versatile, both to obtain a living and to make up for the lack of specialists. At one time or another he advertised as an instrument importer and piano tuner and teacher of theory, harp, guitar, and violin. He was also a composer. A mass, dedicated to the Reverend Joseph-Vincent Quiblier*, was reviewed at length in La Minerve of 16 July 1835. Brauneis' first work to be heard in Montreal, at Notre-Dame Church on 12 July, it was praised for the skill of its part-writing and many other virtues. The singers were accompanied by five instruments although the work was scored for a larger orchestra. Three of his compositions have been traced: the Marche de la St. Jean Baptiste, published in Montreal in 1848, dedicated to the members of the Société Saint-Jean-Baptiste of Montreal; The Montreal Bazaar Polka, published not later than 1848; and Monklands Polka, published in Philadelphia, New York, and Montreal in 1849.

When a youth Brauneis is said to have considered a medical career, an ambition fulfilled by one of his grandsons, Louis de Lotbinière* Harwood. But as a musician he has left his name in the history of the arts in Canada. Gustave Smith described Brauneis as a man with "a stern appearance and a bantering manner"; the obituary in La Minerve (14 Aug. 1871) stresses his unselfish devotion to his pupils, his honest and humble personality, and his industriousness.

HELMUT KALLMANN

AJM, Registre d'état civil. AJQ, Registre d'état civil, Paroisse Notre-Dame. Le Canadien (Québec), 10 avril 1837. L'Encyclopédie canadienne (Montréal), janv. 1843. La Minerve (Montréal), 18 nov. 1833; 14 mai, 16 juill. 1835; 3 nov. 1842; 3 août 1843; 25 mai 1844; 26 sept. 1864; 14 août 1871. Helmut Kallmann, A history of music in Canada, 1534–1914 (Toronto and London, 1960), 84–85, 188. O.-M.-H. Lapalice, "Les organistes et maîtres de musique à Notre-Dame de Montréal," BRH, XXV (1919), 243–49. É.-Z. Massicotte, "Les deux musiciens Braunies," BRH, XLI (1935), 641–43. Gustave Smith, "Du mouvement musical en Canada," L'Album musical (Montréal), févr. 1882.

BRAY, ÉMILE-FRÉDÉRIC DE (sometimes spelled Debray), French naval officer and participant in the Franklin search; b. 9 March 1829 in Paris, France, first of three children of Achille-Hector-Camille de Bray, landscape painter, and of Théophile-Marie-Louise Borrel; d. 19 March 1879 at Brest, France.

On completing his education at the École Navale in 1846, Émile-Frédéric de Bray embarked on the corvette La Galathée for a three-year voyage to the Pacific. He then served two years in France and Italy, and on 2 April 1851 was promoted sub-lieutenant in the navy. At this time French interest in the search for the missing ships and men of Sir John Franklin* was heightened by the participation of the French naval officer Joseph-René Bellot* in William Kennedy*'s 1851–52 expedition, and de Bray felt encouraged to volunteer for the search expedition commanded by Sir Edward BELCHER. The British Admiralty accepted his services and appointed him to HMS Resolute (Capt. Henry KELLETT) which sailed from London on 21 April 1852 and wintered at Dealy Island. De Bray commanded several sledge expeditions during his two years in the Arctic: in the autumn of 1852 he set up a depot at Cape Providence, Melville Island, and between 4 April and 18 May 1853 he surveyed the northwest coast of Melville Island while leading a party auxiliary to Francis Leopold M'Clintock*'s sledge expedition to Prince Patrick Island. On 8 May 1854 he left Resolute, which was shortly to be abandoned, and led a party of invalids to North Star anchored at Beechey Island. Four months later he departed for England on board Phoenix.

De Bray was a popular and energetic member of the expedition, and Kellett, M'Clintock, and Belcher praised him warmly for his services. He is the only Frenchman to receive the Arctic Medal. France rewarded him with nomination to knight of the Légion d'Honneur, back dated to 12 Aug. 1854, and promoted him lieutenant-commander on 5 Oct. 1855.

On his return to France, de Bray served in the Baltic. After his marriage on 20 May 1856 to Loetitia-Constance-Marie Le Bléis, he was stationed at Saint-Pierre and Miquelon and in Iceland. On 22 May 1869 he was promoted commander in the navy, and on 23 Jan. 1871 was made an officer of the Légion d'Honneur for his role in the defence of Paris in 1870 during which he had commanded a marine battalion and an army brigade. He spent the remainder of his career on shore service in France.

De Bray's early death at 50, only 6 months after retirement, was attributed in part to his prolonged service in cold regions, which, it was remarked, had worn down his energy and enthusiasm. He survived his wife by six years and left four children; two others had died in infancy. Unlike Bellot, who died a hero's death, de Bray never won widespread recognition for his role as a representative of France in the Franklin search, and his journal of the expedition has not been published. However, his friend Jules Verne made extensive use of de Bray's knowledge of Arctic regions in Voyages et aventures du capitaine Hatteras: les Anglais au pôle nord – le désert de glace (Paris 1867), a novel inspired by the Franklin search.

CLIVE A. HOLLAND

SPRI, MS 864/1 (Émile-Frédéric de Bray, "Journal de bord de l'enseigne de vaisseau Émile-Frédéric de Bray à bord de la frégate anglaise 'La resolue'. Expédition polaire de 1852–1853 envoyée à la recherche de Sir John Franklin," typewritten copy of the original, which has not been found); MS 864/2–4 (George de Bray, "Notice sur la participation de l'enseigne de vaisseau de Bray à l'expédition britannique de 1852–1854 envoyée à la recherche des navires de Sir John Franklin perdus dans les mers polaires," typewritten notes, La Rochelle, 1926; copies of documentary and genealogical material relating to Émile de Bray). G.B., Adm., Further papers relative to the recent Arctic expeditions in search of Sir John Franklin and the crews of H.M.S. "Erebus" and "Terror" (London, 1855). G. F. M'Dougall, The eventful voyage of H.M. discovery ship "Resolute" to the arctic regions in search of Sir John Franklin and the missing crews of H.M. discovery ships "Erebus" and "Terror", 1852, 1853, 1854 . . . (London, 1857).

Jules Rouch, "Deux officiers de marine français Joseph Bellot et Émile de Bray, à bord de navires de S.M. Britannique dans les mers polaires (1852–1854)," France–Grande Bretagne: Bulletin des relations franco-britanniques (Paris), no.194 (mars 1945), 1–12; "Émile de Bray," La Géographie (Paris), LXIX (1938), 257–63; "Le journal inédit d'Émile de Bray, explorateur polaire français," Bulletin de la Section de géographie (Paris), LIX (1944, pub. in 1951), 61–69.

BRENAN, DANIEL, land surveyor, merchant, banker, and politician, b. 1796 at Ballinakill, Queen's County (now Leinster Province), Ireland; d. 1 March 1876 in Charlottetown, P.E.I.

Daniel Brenan received his education in Ireland and at the age of 27 immigrated to Prince Edward Island. He immediately began work as a land surveyor, and a few years later became a merchant in Charlottetown. By the end of the 1820s he was one of the leading importers on the Island and was able to branch out into other fields – the carrying trade, real estate, insurance, and banking. Nonetheless, his main concern was his retail business; he built new brick stores in 1845 and 1866.

Brenan was a Roman Catholic, and as such was relieved of his civil disabilities by Catholic emancipation on the Island in 1830. Within a few months, he successfully contested an assembly seat for Kings County, and he was re-elected in 1834. In the assembly Brenan acted as a staunch Tory, and declared that the radical Escheators were "ignorant and designing men who choose to impose on the credulity of the country people." After the session of 1835, he resigned, having accepted the position of commissioner for ascertaining the boundary lines of counties and townships. His vacated seat was won by an Escheator, John Macintosh*.

Although he did not hold a seat in either branch of the legislature, Brenan was called to the Executive Council in 1849 by the lieutenant governor, Sir Donald Campbell*, who adamantly opposed responsible government. Brenan retained his seat on the council until the Reformers came to power two years later. Despite the sharp rise of religious tensions in the Island politics of the 1850s, 1860s, and 1870s, Brenan remained within the predominantly Protestant Conservative party, one of the few Roman Catholics to do so.

Daniel Brenan was one of the Island's best-known citizens throughout most of his life. When the Irish-Scottish relief fund was established in 1847, he was named treasurer. He was a prominent Roman Catholic layman, a successful businessman, and a frequent public lecturer at the Mechanics' Institute and the Catholic Young Men's Literary Institute. When he died in 1876, leaving a widow, Margaret, but no children, he bequeathed much of his estate to various Roman Catholic institutions.

IAN ROSS ROBERTSON

PAPEI, Prince Edward Island, Executive Council, Minutes, 16 Feb. 1849. Prince Edward Island, Supreme Court, Estates Division, will of Daniel Brenan, 20 Sept. 1872. Prince Edward Island, House of Assembly, Journals, 1831–35. Daniel Brenan, Remarks on education, with suggestions for the improvement of the present system (Charlottetown, 1856), copy in PAPEI. Island Argus (Charlottetown), 7 March 1876. Patriot (Charlottetown), 3 March 1876. Prince Edward Island Register (Charlottetown), 29 May 1824. Royal Gazette (Charlottetown), 28 Sept., 12, 19 Oct. 1830; 7 Feb. 1832.

BRIDGLAND, JAMES WILLIAM, surveyor and civil servant; b. 9 April 1817 at or near York (now Toronto), U.C., second son of James W. Bridgland and Eleanor Beaton; d. 22 Oct. 1880, at Toronto, Ont.

James William Bridgland's parents came to York from Kent County in England in 1816. For some years the family remained in York, the father having obtained the position of keeper of the Court of King's Bench, and young James attended Thomas Appleton's common school. In 1828 the family purchased property at Downsview (now in Metropolitan Toronto), where the sons and daughters grew up. Young James decided to become a land surveyor, and in 1842 attended the summer term at Victoria College, Cobourg. He was apprenticed to John Stoughton Dennis* and qualified as a provincial land surveyor on 6 May 1844.

Soon after he commenced to practise, James Bridgland was employed by the Crown Lands Department in making surveys in Canada West, and he became a member of the staff of the Crown Lands Office on 22 Jan. 1856. His more important surveys were in the townships of Mornington (1848), Kincardine (1850), and Carden (1852); along the Muskoka River (1852) and Indian River (1853); on Rama Island (1860); and in the Huron and Ottawa territory (1861–62). His reports frequently have a distinct literary flavour. To describe land near the Muskoka River, he wrote, "would only be to repeat the tedious monotony, of rocky barrens, swamps, marshes, and burnt regions; destitute of good water, good timber, in short of every-thing, necessary to make settlement desirable, or life supportable; regions where even the foraging partridge, and the provident squirrel, seem from their scarcity – scarcely able to exist." These reports were eminently sensible and won the approval of his superiors, as did no doubt his attitude towards employees who attempted to gain an increase in pay. To one of his subordinates he wrote: "The Strike you speak of should have been the immediate occasion for you to have discharged every man . . . , I will not sanction a farthing of increase in wages."

After 1860 Bridgland's duties lay chiefly in the field of colonization roads, roads built by the government to attract settlers to the Georgian Bay–Ottawa area. His duties led him also to the mining districts and Indian lands north of Lake Superior. In 1864, when the superintendent of colonization roads in Canada West, David Gibson*, died, that office was discontinued but the duties were transferred to Bridgland. After confederation Bridgland continued to perform the duties connected with the oversight of colonization roads in Ontario – duties he could be relied on to perform with diligence and economy.

Bridgland married 16-year-old Maria Dennis, sister of John, in 1849. After her death in 1857 he married Martha Anne Jones. There was one daughter from his first marriage, and there were four children from the second.

George W. Spragge

Ontario, Department of Lands and Forests, Surveys Office, instructions to land surveyors, 1848; reports of surveys, 1848–62. PAC, RG 1, E1, 88, pp.504–5 (copy at PAO in State and Landbooks of Upper Canada and Canada, Z, pp.504–5). PAO, RG 14, A, ser. V(b), 5 (J. W. Bridgland, memoranda, statements, and letters, 1862–67). Christian Guardian (Toronto), 23 Oct. 1844; 28 Oct., 9 Dec. 1857; 13 Jan. 1858; 27 Oct. 1880. Colonial Advocate (York), 20 Sept. 1827. Muskoka and Haliburton (Murray). W. P. Bull, From Oxford to Ontario: a history of the Downsview community (Toronto, [1941]), 72. "James W. Bridgland," Ont. Land Surveyors Assoc., Annual Report (Toronto), no.42 (1927), 94–96. G. W. Spragge, "Colonization roads in Canada West, 1850–1867," Ont. Hist., XLIX (1957), 1–17.

BROWN, GEORGE, journalist and politician; b. at Alloa, Clackmannan, Scotland, 29 Nov. 1818; d. at Toronto, Ont., 9 May 1880.

George Brown was the elder son in the family of six children of Peter Brown* and Marianne, daughter of George Mackenzie, gentleman, of Stornoway on the Isle of Lewis. Peter ran a prosperous wholesale business in Edinburgh, but he also spent periods at Alloa up the Firth of Forth helping to direct a local glassworks. Thus George Brown's life began in the placid little Forthside port though the family returned to Edinburgh before he was eight. He attended Edinburgh's celebrated High School and its Southern Academy, and he was always proud to link himself with Scotland's national capital. After leaving school with prizes and honours, he joined his father's business, and began to settle into a life in well-to-do Edinburgh commercial society.

George was very close to his father. Peter Brown was a convinced Whig-Liberal and evangelical Presbyterian, an ardent believer in civil and religious liberty, progress, the economic liberalism of Adam Smith, and the destruction of Tory aristocratic privilege. Moreover, he set a strong political example by actively sharing in the struggle for borough reform in Edinburgh and the larger campaign that won the parliamentary reform bill of 1832. In 1836, however, Peter was involved, as collector of assessments in Edinburgh, in a loss of nearly £2,800 of municipal funds, which had somehow mixed with his private accounts. There was no charge against him and his guarantors made good the loss, but he strove urgently to redeem the money and his name. With the onset of the depression of 1837 he saw nothing else to do but try a new start in America. And so, on 30 April 1837, George Brown, aged 18, set out from Liverpool with his father for New York.

Within weeks of landing there in June, they had opened a small dry goods shop, in which George was the only assistant. It thrived sufficiently that they could send for the family the next year. The business apparently continued to do moderately well, but Peter Brown was turning to other interests. In the next few years he became a contributor to the New York Albion, the weekly paper of the British emigrant community. Once more his son would acquire from him both a fervent abolitionism and a rooted preference for the British parliamentary system over the American republican model. Yet more than that, Peter Brown published his views in a book early in 1842, The fame and glory of England vindicated . . . (New York and London), and the ready reception of this work, at least by British emigrants in the United States and in neighbouring English Canada, stirred its author to turn fully to journalism. Again assisted by his willing son, he began the British Chronicle in New York on 30 June 1842, a little weekly more political and less literary in content than the Albion.

The new paper soon started noting Canadian affairs, as circulation spread in that quarter. It commented on the course of the union that had been set up in 1841 between the former provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, and approved the plan of responsible government which was backed by the existing Liberal or Reform leaders there, Robert Baldwin*, Francis Hincks*, and Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine*. George Brown, moreover, began to travel up to Canada in the service of his father's paper. His role was growing, as he finished his apprenticeship in journalism. In March 1843, when he was still only 24, he was denominated in the Chronicle as "Publisher," his father as "Editor." That spring he spent some time in Canadian centres such as Toronto, Kingston, and Montreal, talking with politicians and editors and acquiring considerable knowledge of the prospects of the country.

Meanwhile, Peter Brown had thoroughly committed the British Chronicle on an issue that had recently come to a head in Scotland. There the evangelical element in the established Church of Scotland had decided to withdraw from the state Presbyterian church altogether, in the cause of religious freedom as they saw it. Thus occurred the "Great Disruption" of May 1843, and the birth of the Free Church of Scotland. Inevitably Peter Brown's sympathies were with the new Free Kirk. Indeed, there was considerable support for the movement throughout Scottish communities in America. Moreover, it grew evident that the conflict within Presbyterianism could also erupt in Canada because of colonial Scottish feelings for one or the other party in the homeland.

In this circumstance, Free Kirk sympathizers in Canada looked to the British Chronicle, which spoke so warmly for their side. In the summer of 1843 a group of leading Free Church supporters in the Toronto area signed an invitation and put up a bond to persuade Peter Brown to move his paper to Canada. This invitation they passed through the Reverend William Rintoul* to George Brown on his travels through Toronto. He was already interested in a move himself, partly because of friendly contacts he had made with leading Canadian Reformers, partly because he felt that British Canada would be far more congenial than the American republic and that in its youth and sparse development it offered much better possibilities for getting ahead than crowded New York. He put these arguments forcefully to his father and won his consent. On 22 July the British Chronicle made a last appearance, announcing that its editor would henceforth publish a weekly paper in Toronto named the Banner, expressing a Presbyterian interest and upholding "Reform principles" on all great public issues.

On 18 August the first issue of the Browns' Toronto Banner came out. The editorial columns – which dominated the little four-page papers of the day – were divided between the "Religious Department" and the "Secular Department," the provinces of Peter and George Brown respectively. The first department at once took up the Free Church cause; the second was slower to commit itself. But before the end of 1843, the resignation of the chief Liberal ministers, Baldwin, La Fontaine, and Hincks, from the government of Sir Charles Metcalfe* provided a major public issue on which George Brown soon began to speak out in the name of Reform principles.

It appeared to him that Governor Metcalfe's insistence on controlling the power of patronage himself, the question on which his Liberal ministers had resigned, was a repudiation of the principle of responsible government. Metcalfe's dismissal of the Reform-dominated assembly that December fully decided him. He made the Banner the forceful champion of the Reform leaders as the political crisis continued.

But that paper, with its own sectarian cause to pursue, could only be a part-time champion at best. And George Brown's own interests were becoming wholly centred in politics. Recognizing his journalistic powers, moreover, a group of prominent Toronto Reformers approached him to found a new party paper; four of them offered to provide £250 starting capital. The sum meant more then – but also indicates how relatively simple it was to equip a small colonial weekly newspaper. Though they would continue the Banner, the Browns decided to establish the Toronto Globe. It first appeared on 5 March 1844, and it was really George Brown's from the start. He above all was to make it the most powerful newspaper in British America.

He did so through his strong and stirring editorials, by pushing always for the latest and most detailed news reports (so that the Globe would be read, reluctantly, even by political enemies), and by seeking constantly to increase circulation through providing ever better press facilities. He introduced the new Hoe rotary press to Upper Canada before his paper was even three months old, and the greater production this permitted enabled the Globe to set up a book and job printing office also. In 1845 he established the Western Globe, to serve Reformers in the rising southwestern regions of the province, with its own sub-office in London to which material from the Toronto edition was regularly conveyed by road. The Toronto Globe itself advanced from weekly to semi-weekly; by 1849 it had triweekly issues, reflecting its expanding circulation, and a weekly edition specifically intended for the countryside was added. It was a further sign of the success of Brown's "forward policy" that the Globe in October 1853 became a daily, printed by a steam press. By that time Brown's paper had already become a province-wide institution, and soon could claim – with few to deny it – the largest circulation in all British North America.

As the Globe's external influence expanded, it naturally grew internally as well. It had begun in the 1840s with a staff composed of George and Peter Brown, a printer, and a boy apprentice or two: one of them, according to tradition, George's young brother, Gordon*. In the 1850s the paper acquired a whole staff of printers (with union aims expressed in strikes in 1853 and 1854), pressroom and engine hands, reporters, and parliamentary correspondents; and the day had passed when George Brown would write the bulk of the editorials himself. He still kept a tight control over business affairs and the main lines of editorial policy, so that the popular presumption that he and the Globe were synonymous was not entirely wrong. But regular editorial management passed to his brother Gordon, named sub-editor in 1850 at the age of 22 – Peter Brown having then retired at 66, after closing down the Banner in 1848.

In short, within a few years of establishing his newspaper, George Brown had moved it from the day of personal journalism to the era of big newspaper business in Canada. He made himself a leading Toronto businessman in the process and also shaped a formidable political power. But though he was to enter politics himself, his strongest concern would always remain with the Globe, just as it did at its beginning, in March 1844.

He gave his first significant political speech in that very month on 25 March, to the Reform Association of Canada, at a meeting held in Toronto to protest Sir Charles Metcalfe's attempt to carry on government with but a trio of ministers, W. H. DRAPER, Dominick Daly*, and Denis-Benjamin Viger*, who had not yet managed to fill up the other ministerial offices. The young Globe editor's ringing denunciation of such an un-British and illiberal practice roused warm response. From that time onward, his fervent, powerful oratory was often called upon at party gatherings and public meetings. Meanwhile, he vigorously engaged the Globe in the Reformers' battle against Metcalfe and the Tory-Conservative forces that were rallying to the governor general's side. There was, indeed, a growing reaction in English-speaking Canada against what seemed excessively partisan Reform insistence on removing the governor's power over patronage. Hence, in the elections held that autumn, pro-Metcalfe forces carried Canada West (popularly still called Upper Canada), though the victory of La Fontaine's Liberals in Canada East, the largely French-speaking Lower Canadian section, meant that the new Conservative ministry had only a bare majority over all.

Many Canadian electors had apparently not fully understood the requirements of responsible government exercised through party rule. In the next few years of Tory-Conservative administration George Brown worked diligently to enlighten the public, and thus to strengthen the Reform party under Baldwin and Hincks in Upper Canada. By 1847, when the weak Tory-Conservative ministry failed to improve its position through a reconstruction, the chance for a resurgence of Reform seemed at hand: especially when Britain now accepted the full principle of responsible rule for Canada and sent a new governor general, Lord Elgin [Bruce*], instructed to put that principle decisively into effect.

In the elections of 1847–48 the Globe trumpeted the Liberal cause once more. But further, its editor personally entered into the contest in the western county of Oxford, where Baldwin asked him to conduct a campaign for Hincks who was away in Britain. This was Brown's first full-fledged election campaign, even though he was not a candidate himself. Undoubtedly his enthusiasm and untiring efforts in speaking across the riding did a good deal to win the seat for Hincks – though it also left a heritage of jealousy between two strong-minded men. The Reformers swept into power in both sections of Canada, and in March 1848 the La Fontaine–Baldwin government took office as a wholly Reform cabinet embodying the principle of responsible rule.

This new administration, developing a broad programme of reforms, had a task for the editor of the chief party journal in the west. He was named secretary of a commission of inquiry to investigate alleged abuses in the provincial penitentiary at Kingston. The commission began hearings there in June and proceeded through the rest of 1848 as Brown worked zealously in a role which his energy and ability made markedly influential. This exhaustive inquiry produced voluminous evidence of brutality and maladministration, and the existing warden, Henry Smith*, was removed from office. The commission's report, which Brown drafted as secretary early in 1849, passed withering judgement on "most frightful oppression – revolting inhumanity." It also projected major forward steps in Canadian penology; for example, in recommending the separation of hardened criminals, first offenders, and juveniles, in making provisions for rehabilitation and aftercare, and in urging the appointment of permanent, salaried prison inspectors.

Otherwise, in 1849, Brown's role was still essentially that of Globe editor. But his paper was now the official organ for the government in Upper Canada and he stood high in party circles. Accordingly, he was closely identified that spring with the La Fontaine–Baldwin ministry in supporting their contentious rebellion losses bill against angry Tory protests, which included an attack on his own home in Toronto. Later in that year of depression and turmoil he worked still more ardently to combat the movement for annexation to the United States that focussed on the Montreal Annexation Manifesto of October, but had lesser repercussions in Upper Canada as well. Through the Globe Brown strongly backed Baldwin's efforts to dissociate the Upper Canadian Reform party from annexationism, particularly in a by-election in December 1849 when the Reform candidate, Peter Perry*, an old radical, displayed unfortunate annexationist leanings.

Despite pressure from the party leadership and the party organ, however, Perry was elected without having fully disavowed annexation, at least as a future possibility. Yet his victory was more indicative of local left-wing Reform discontent with central party direction than of any real support for annexationism, now fast disappearing. In fact, Perry's success spurred radical elements, soon termed "Clear Grits" in the Globe, to shape a new movement by early 1850, which sought to push the party onward to "advanced" reforms in the belief that the leaders and their more moderate supporters had grown altogether too content with office. They demanded cheap and simple government close to the people and, above all, a fully democratic constitution on the American elective model. George Brown's own commitment to the Baldwin ministry and his distrust of American written constitutions and egalitarian democracy made him a determined foe of Clear Grit radical proposals. His journal urged the superiority of British responsible cabinet government, so recently won for Canada. But the Clear Grits held local conventions, adopted a thoroughgoing democratic platform, and established a new organ of their own in Toronto, the North American, edited by William McDougall*, a clever young radical lawyer.

Furthermore, the Grits took up another reform cause with wide popular appeal in Upper Canada: the secularization of the clergy reserves set up by imperial statute at the founding of the province in 1791 to support a Protestant clergy. The Anglicans still received the major share of the funds from the sale of reserve lands, but this situation was sharply questioned, both by those who sought a more equitable division and by those who wanted the reserves abolished altogether as an improper endowment of churches by the state.

George Brown himself naturally agreed with the latter stand. For him the state should know no church, and churches should be voluntarily sustained by their adherents. On this "voluntary principle" he was in accord with the Clear Grits and various evangelical Protestant bodies as well as his own Free Kirk supporters. But he rejected the Clear Grits politically for their constitutional views, and relied on the declared intentions of the Baldwin government to settle the reserves – deeming the radicals' demand a mere attempt to make political capital for themselves. The parliamentary session of 1850 gave him doubts, however. Resolutions were passed asking for an imperial act to authorize the Canadian legislature to deal with the reserves themselves. Yet James Price*, the minister who moved them, did so only as a private member, and La Fontaine and the French Canadian Reformers he led were plainly reluctant to tamper with a religious endowment. As Roman Catholics accepting ties of church and state, they approved of state support for religion – the antithesis of Brown's own position.

Another measure of the session further aroused his concern about Catholic influence on government policy. This, the Upper Canada school act introduced by Hincks, enlarged provisions for separate denominational schools in the western system of public education, so that Catholic schools, specifically, could more readily be organized to receive state support. Brown saw this enlargement as an alarming inroad into the maintenance of one non-sectarian public system. His Globe called it "the entering wedge." Then, as he and other voluntaryists were becoming increasingly exercised over "state church" influences on public affairs, the papal aggression question burst in England in the fall of 1850.

The root of the issue was a papal brief recreating a Roman Catholic hierarchy in England for the first time since the Reformation. The brief was at least unwise in declaring this realm of Anglicanism, Puritanism, and Methodism to be now returned to an "orbit" around Rome. There was strong response from Protestants, already reacting to the resurgent ultramontane and anti-liberal zeal of the papacy under Pius IX. Brown's Globe was only one of numerous liberal or voluntaryist-minded journals in Canada that commented severely on these papal and Catholic presumptions, but its power and vehemence involved it in a bitter exchange of doctrinal arguments and name-calling with the local Catholic press. Inevitably, by the spring of 1851, Brown had emerged as either a potent voluntaryist champion or an arch anti-Catholic in a country deeply divided by religious passions.

Meanwhile he had decided to try for parliament himself, to strengthen the cause there of non-sectarian public education and the separation of church and state. He stood in a by-election for Haldimand County in April 1851. His chief opponent was William Lyon Mackenzie*, now back, amnestied, from his long American exile and a rather obstreperous ally of the Grit radicals. The power of Mackenzie's name among western Grit farmers, the half-hearted support which the Reform leaders gave their own somewhat troublesome candidate, Brown, and, in particular, a powerful Catholic appeal to Irish Reformers to reject the sworn enemy of their faith, all combined to give the victory to Mackenzie. Brown's growing breach with the ministry widened and his concern over Catholic influence in politics was only reinforced.

Then in parliament that June Baldwin resigned from office when Clear Grit objections to his reconstruction of the Court of Chancery produced a temporary Upper Canadian majority against him. His chief lieutenant, Francis Hincks, became the western head of the government – a man to whom Brown had never been as loyal as he had been to Baldwin, and whose motives he distrusted as more concerned with keeping office to promote the new era of railways than with upholding true liberal and voluntaryist principles. Early in July, the Globe editor brought his paper out against the ministry, on a path of independent Reform: the "one course for the opponents of priestcraft and state churchism." His judgement that a Hincks government would prove an unprincipled office-holding combination seemed to be borne out when it speedily came to terms with the Grits. McDougall's North American now became a government paper, and two Clear Grits, Malcolm Cameron and John Rolph*, entered the cabinet. The Grits still hoped to impel the ministry on to radical reform, but Brown was right in predicting that they would be swamped in the combination by the more conservative-minded forces of the railway builders following Hincks and the French Canadians now led by Augustin Morin* as successor to La Fontaine.

The new Hincks–Morin Liberal government successfully appealed to the country in the autumn of 1851. Brown ran as an independent Reformer in the southwestern county of Kent. This time he was elected easily, thanks to the strength of voluntaryism there and effective work by prominent local Reformers, one of whom, Alexander Mackenzie*, was to become his closest supporter. The elections were over by early January 1852, but parliament did not meet till August. The provincial offices first had to be transferred from Toronto to Quebec; it was a sign of the sectional division in the Canadian union that the seat of government had to shift between the former capitals of Upper and Lower Canada, no one permanent seat having yet been found.

Sectionalism had been embedded in the very constitution of the union, since the two Canadas had been given equal representation in its parliament. Underlying this political division, however, was the deeper division between two cultural communities: that of Upper Canada, English-speaking and mainly Protestant; that of Lower Canada, largely French-speaking and Roman Catholic. The distinction could only be sharpened by the different aims of zealous western voluntaryism, striving to end state support and recognition of religion, and equally zealous French Canadian Catholicism, seeking to establish new religious corporations for educational and welfare purposes or to back demands from the Upper Canadian Catholic minority for further separate school rights. Sectional strains mounted when the reserves question and ecclesiastical corporations bills came up, and when a new separate school measure for the west was carried through by Lower Canadian votes. It was charged that a "French domination" was imposing its will on Upper Canada. George Brown was in the forefront of debate, clearly representing a broader constituency in the west than just his own riding of Kent.

As parliament went on into 1853, he made himself still more prominent in Upper Canada by moving a resolution in March for representation by population. This would give the western section a preponderance of parliamentary seats for its population had now outstripped the east's. French Canadians naturally feared being swamped by a western, English ascendancy, and held to the bulwark of equal sectional representation. In any case, Brown's motion did not win many adherents as yet in English Canada, which was more divided politically between Reform and Tory parties than the more compact, ethnically united French Canadian minority. The idea of "rep by pop," not originally Brown's, would become strongly associated with him, and would increasingly gain western support as sectional strife continued in the union.

Indeed by 1854 it threatened to break up the Reform party and topple the Hincks–Morin government. In June the failure of that government to settle the reserves – though they now had imperial authorization to act – was a major factor in creating a sudden combination of dissentient groups that defeated Hincks in parliament and led to elections that summer. Brown was handily returned for Lambton, a constituency newly divided off from Kent. Out of the party turmoil he hoped to shape a new alignment to advance voluntaryism and secularize the reserves, composed of non-radical Reformers and moderate Conservatives, many of whom were now ready to support secularization.

The governing coalition that emerged when parliament met in September dashed Brown's hopes. It combined Hincks' former following of moderate Liberals and the French Canadian group still under Morin with the Tory-Conservative forces led by Sir Allan MacNab*. In this new MacNab–Morin regime, Tories and Conservatives would accept the need to abolish the reserves; and they and the followers of Hincks could foster railway development in the alliance, which upheld the French Canadians' cultural interests. In short, this Liberal-Conservative coalition represented a fresh attempt to bridge sectional divisions, leaving in opposition George Brown and some western voluntaryists, the Clear Grit radical wing, and the smaller, largely French Canadian eastern radical faction, termed the Rouges, under Antoine-Aimé Dorion*.

Among these fragments of Reform there was no recognized opposition leader, but Brown increasingly took a prominent role, thanks to his parliamentary prowess and the strength of the Globe. When the government's promised measure to abolish the reserves came up in October 1854, he and his former Clear Grit foes could vote together in criticizing loopholes in the bill, though they accepted its main tenor. Brown could also at least cooperate with the Lower Canadian Rouges in attacking alleged governmental waste and corruption in railway schemes, especially in regard to the costly Grand Trunk then building the main line across the province. In fact, he also might reach common ground with Rouges on many "state church" issues, since they had inherited the French Canadian strain of anti-clericalism. Nevertheless, any Liberal opposition front could only be a loose working alliance of sectional elements at best, and Brown's prime effort was to form a coherent Reform party within the western half of the union.

He achieved a good deal of progress during 1855. The Globe made overtures to the Clear Grits, urging the need for Reform unity. Leading Grit radicals were ready to sink their differences with Brown and put by their hopes of sweeping elective constitutional reforms in the more urgent need to fight revived Conservative power and the dangers of "French Catholic domination." It was an important sign, therefore, when Brown bought out the Grit North American in February and its editor, McDougall, joined the Globe staff. Then in May a new bill for Upper Canadian separate schools brought still more important developments. The act of 1855 introduced by Étienne Taché* was suddenly put through parliament in its last days at Quebec, when many Upper Canadian members had left for home. It was passed, moreover, by an eastern majority over the votes of those westerners still on hand, including Brown. This event seemed hard proof of Lower Canadian domination of the union, and of the Liberal-Conservative ministry's connivance in that domination.

In the indignation that swept Upper Canada many Grit adherents called for dissolution of the union. But Brown, the Toronto businessman, was perhaps more conscious of the commercial values of the Canadian union than embattled western farmers. He and the Globe argued for representation by population instead: to remake rather than destroy the union, assure justice for Upper Canada but maintain the unity of the St Lawrence transport system and the broad economic development that would be lost by separation. They waged a campaign for rep by pop through Upper Canada in the summer of 1855. By autumn Grittism had been largely won to it, and Brown had supplied a powerful policy on which to focus the reunification of Upper Canadian Reform.

He made further gains the next year. In parliament in the spring of 1856, the Liberal-Conservative regime, facing sectional discords and internal divisions itself, lost some of its Liberal supporters to the Reform forces in opposition. The ministry was reconstructed in May, when MacNab was replaced by the far more able John A. Macdonald* as western leader – and still only narrowly avoided defeat in the assembly. During heated debates earlier in the session Brown and Macdonald had had a sharply significant personal encounter. Macdonald, who had always supported the cause of an old family friend, Henry Smith, the ex-warden of the Kingston penitentiary, was carried away in anger to accuse Brown as secretary of the 1848–49 commission of having falsified evidence and suborned witnesses. The committee of inquiry, which the latter immediately requested, heard a mass of testimony that palpably exonerated Brown; but it produced only a non-committal verdict, being politically weighted against him. A proud and sensitive man, he was left with the grave charges unretracted, which put more than political barriers between him and his great Conservative rival.

In August 1856, Brown began a new campaign through the Globe, calling for the annexation to Canada of the vast British territories beyond the Great Lakes, still the preserve of the fur-trading Hudson's Bay Company. He had long been interested in the potentialities of the North-West. Now they were attracting widespread attention in Upper Canada, both from land-hungry farmers seeking new frontiers to settle and from Toronto businessmen hoping to direct new flows of trade to their fast rising metropolis. Brown and his brother Gordon were closely identified themselves with Toronto efforts to open communications with the North-West. And northwestern expansion was another powerful policy for a resurgent Upper Canadian Reform party, on which commercial and agrarian interests could unite. The time seemed ripe to cement party unity, when in December 1856 the emerging Toronto business and professional leadership group (with George Brown at its core) issued a call for a Reform convention to gather in the city.

The convention held on 8 Jan. 1857 brought together 150 Brownites, Clear Grits, and Liberals who had formerly followed Hincks. It readily adopted a platform that marked successful Reform reunion and included representation by population, annexation of the North-West, national non-sectarian education, and free trade. It was Brown's platform; he dominated the proceedings and his friends the central party structure. He had remade the party in a Brownite image. Its opponents still might dub it "Clear Grit" – and "Grits" the Brownite Liberals would long be termed. But the old Clear Grit radicalism of American elective democracy had really been submerged within Victorian British parliamentary Liberalism.

The reorganized party faced its test when elections were announced in November by the government, now led by Macdonald and his powerful French Canadian ally, George-Étienne Cartier. Brownite Reform forces won a clear majority in Upper Canada, and Brown himself was triumphantly returned for both Toronto and North Oxford, but in Lower Canada the Rouges under Dorion were decisively defeated by Cartier's large Bleu Conservative contingent. Hence the Macdonald–Cartier regime was able to continue in office when the new parliament opened at Toronto in February 1858. But Brown pressed hard on the ministry's weakness in Upper Canada; by midsummer it was in trouble, meeting dissension in its ranks and minor defeats in the house. Accordingly, the Macdonald–Cartier cabinet decided to resign when a vote of 28 July rejected the choice of Ottawa as future permanent capital, a choice with which the cabinet was identified.

The governor general, Sir Edmund Head*, called on Brown as the leading figure in the opposition to form a new government. The danger for Brown was obvious, since his side had no real majority in the house. Yet if he refused, he would virtually endorse the constant Conservative charge that he was a "governmental impossibility." He worked closely with Dorion, and succeeded in constructing an able cabinet, dedicated to establishing representation by population, but with constitutional guarantees for French Canada. As might be expected, this Brown-Dorion ministry was nevertheless defeated when it met parliament on 2 August; but Brown had then hoped to go to the country and win a new general election. Head refused his request, on the ground that elections had been held so recently. Brown could only resign, as he did on 4 August.

His "Short Administration" would become a standard item of political comic relief thereafter. Still, one can scarcely see that he had a better course. Furthermore, his Conservative foes revealed their own insecurity on resuming office in the narrowly divided house. They were sworn into one set of posts, then promptly switched them for another, which let them take advantage of a legal technicality and avoid having to withdraw from parliament to undergo by-elections, as the Brown-Dorion ministers had had to do. This "Double Shuffle" both added salt to Brown's wounds and reinforced his belief that, under the existing sectionally divided union, government had become hopelessly unprincipled and venal. The failure of the courts to condemn the double shuffle in December 1858 [see Draper] further increased his bitterness, and a bad-tempered parliamentary session at Quebec in the spring of 1859 left him in a deeply despondent mood. The fact was that, for all his abundant physical energy, he was exhausted after two years of unrelenting political effort. In this state he let the Globe play with radical notions of dissolution of the union and written, American-style-constitutions – chiefly through the agency of an able Globe editorial writer, George Sheppard*, with strong American constitutional preferences of his own.

During the summer of 1859, Brown largely recovered his spirits and his hold over his journal. In fact, he launched the Globe on a new campaign, for a federal union to settle the ills of the two parts of divided Canada, so that each could govern its own sectional interests, under one general government based on representation by population for matters of common concern. In September he laid plans for a new Upper Canada Reform convention to reinvigorate his disheartened party. Plainly, he meant to bring it to adopt federation: a constitutional remedy which could appeal to both sections of Canada, if rep by pop alone could not, and one – as he made clear – which would be a step toward "a great confederation" of all British America and the incorporation of the North-West as well. He and his Toronto leadership group worked carefully to arrange the key convention committees to ensure that any dissolutionist radical opinions would be outweighed at the grand party gathering.

The convention of 570 delegates met in St Lawrence Hall, Toronto, on 9 Nov. 1859. Again Brown's presence, and engineering, dominated its affairs. Sheppard spoke powerfully for "simple dissolution," reflecting a widespread agrarian Grit suspicion of political complexity. Then William McDougall offered a usefully vague compromise term, "some joint authority," for the federal power to link two sectional governments; Brown made an eloquent appeal to national aspirations in urging federal union. Federation effectively gained the day. Thereafter the Globe boomed it exultantly across the west as chosen party policy.

Brown intended to move the convention programme early in the legislative session of 1860. But soon dissent appeared within his own parliamentary ranks, arising from moderate elements this time. Notably exemplified in John Sandfield MACDONALD, they held that it was still possible to gain power in the existing union by winning more support in Lower Canada from ministerialists who were tired of extravagant, Grand Trunk–influenced government, and that a proposal for sweeping constitutional change would simply frighten them away. Brown, however, argued that an attempt at still another coalition merely for office would settle nothing. He won his point, but only by threatening to resign as party leader. When he finally did bring forward the convention policy, it was about 30 April and late in the session, and backing for it was visibly uncertain. It was easily defeated. Nevertheless Brown had recorded a party stand on federalism of much future consequence.

Meanwhile his health was suffering. He had evidently not fully recovered from his earlier strains – and these were financial as well as political, going back to the depression that had begun in 1857. By that date Brown had become an entrepreneur with sizeable investments in Upper Canada, quite apart from maintaining his large newspaper business. In the early 1850s he had acquired extensive lands in Lambton County, and when the new Great Western Railway was built across them in 1855 the village of Bothwell had risen on his estate. The "Laird of Bothwell" sold farm and town lots, built roads and mills, cut lumber, and operated a cabinet factory. But this was in boom time, in a country that virtually ran on credit. When the depression of 1857 brought swift contraction, Brown was soon in difficulties, with Bothwell mortgaged, and funds again committed to Globe improvements in advance of circulation and advertising revenues.

He struggled through several bad years, surviving without a serious loss of property. But the struggles – and his creditors – were particularly demanding in 1860. As a result, his health collapsed completely in the winter of 1861, and he was sent to bed for more than two months. He thus missed the parliamentary session of 1861, and was still weak in June when a general election was called. Brown did his best; but he was beaten in his Toronto seat and was out of parliament for the first time in ten years. At any rate, business conditions were at last improving because of rising American demands for lumber and other Canadian products, stemming from the onset of the Civil War that year. But more than that, oil fields were being developed in the vicinity of Bothwell; by the fall of 1861 it stood to become a boom town. Brown held on to his own estate and bought more land. His financial prospects now looked excellent. Meanwhile his Globe was warmly supporting the northern cause in the Civil War – Brown's strong abolitionism made him a firm opponent of the slave-owning South – and no less warmly attacking the Grand Trunk railway influence and eastern power behind the Cartier-Macdonald regime in Canada.

In 1862, with his health still uncertain, he decided to take a long recuperative holiday in Great Britain. He landed in Liverpool on 23 July, his first return in 25 years. After a month in London, he moved on to Edinburgh, and there saw such old friends as William and Thomas Nelson, of the Nelson publishing family, who had been his school mates at the High School. Above all, he met their sister, Anne Nelson, lively, intelligent, and cultivated. He fell deeply in love at 43, and on 27 November, he and Anne were married at Abden House, the Nelson home.

They returned to Canada in late December, to receive a tumultuous mass welcome in Toronto. But soon, despite George Brown's whole-hearted affection for his new domestic life, he felt the pull of unfinished political business. With his health fully restored and his horizons undoubtedly broadened by viewing colonial sectional politics from the centre of empire, he decided on another try: a man no less vigorous and resolute than before, but somehow more detached and judicious – perhaps the mellowing result of marriage.

Brown easily won a by-election in South Oxford in March 1863. He found himself in a parliament both altered and much the same. A moderate Liberal government under Sandfield Macdonald had replaced a crumbling Conservative regime in 1862, but Sandfield's ministry was just one more attempt to keep the existing union running without dealing with underlying sectional and constitutional problems. Sandfield, in fact, had pinned his faith to the double majority principle, whereby neither section of the union would be governed against the will of its own parliamentary majority. But that principle had foundered shortly before Brown rejoined parliament at Quebec in April, when another separate school bill had been passed for Upper Canada without having received western majority support. The discredited government was thereupon recast to give it a firmer Reform character, Brown playing a prominent part as he reasserted his old influence in his party even though he preferred to stay outside the ministry. Dorion and his Rouge friends replaced moderate eastern Liberals in the cabinet; associates of Brown, such as Oliver Mowat*, entered its western half. This new Macdonald–Dorion ministry then went to the polls in July 1863. The Reformers won in Upper Canada emphatically (as Brown again did in South Oxford), but Cartier's Conservatives equally swept the east. The two sides were practically in balance. Deadlock was approaching.

The fruitless power struggles in parliament that autumn showed that no real change had been made in the political situation. Brown, however, acting as a private member, disclosed a significantly new approach. He announced his intention to move for a select committee to inquire impartially into the sectional problems of Canada and report on the best means of remedying them. It was a constructive proposal, carefully worded to be non-partisan. But his motion did not come to a vote until the spring session of 1864, as the house battled on through more bitter, barren factional contests. The Sandfield Macdonald ministry, unable to govern, gave up in March. The Conservative cabinet that replaced it, under John A. Macdonald and Sir Étienne Taché, had no greater chance of achievement, or even survival. Brown's single-minded aim was to settle the constitutional impasse and retire from the burden of parliament to the warm family world he longed for – his first child, Margaret, had been born that January. Finally, on 19 May 1864, his motion passed. He became chairman of a select committee drawn from leading members of all parties; he put it industriously to work. And on 14 June it reported to parliament "a strong feeling" in favour of "a federative system."

This was only a general statement in a brief progress report. Yet it supplied the essential basis for a way out when, on the very day of that report, the Macdonald–Taché government collapsed. Brown moved decisively to use this latest crisis: he let the Conservative leaders know that he would support theirs or any other ministry if they would act to solve the constitutional problem. They were ready to respond. On 17 June, John A. Macdonald and Alexander Tilloch Galt*, a leading proponent of British North American federation, met with Brown in his room at the St Louis Hotel. Cartier later joined the discussions. It was soon decided that the only solution lay "in the federative principle suggested by the report of Mr. Brown's committee," and that an approach should first be made to the Atlantic provinces to seek a general British American federal union. Brown had looked ultimately toward this larger goal, but he had deemed earlier Conservative advocacy of it to be premature and mainly used as a red herring to evade action on Canada's own internal constitutional problem. But since the Conservatives had now agreed to federate the Canadian union, he could only see a great gain if the other colonies could also be included. He agreed, though reluctantly, to enter the government with two Reform supporters. The new coalition to seek a confederation would thus have overwhelming strength in the house, backed both by the Brownite Grit western majority and Cartier's Bleu eastern majority. Deadlock was over. George Brown had initiated the breakthrough, and the movement to a whole new union.

On 22 June 1864 the "Great Coalition" was announced to a wildly jubilant house. Brown joined Macdonald and Cartier and their colleagues in the cabinet as president of the council, along with Mowat and McDougall as his Reform associates; all under Taché as prime minister. During the summer this strong new government developed the outlines of a federal scheme to lay before representatives of the Maritime provinces at a meeting in Charlottetown in September. Among the eight Canadian cabinet members who went to the Charlottetown conference, Brown took an important role, on 5 September presenting to it the constitutional structure proposed for federal union. After the conference unanimously endorsed confederation in principle, he went on to meetings at Halifax and Saint John.

In October came the larger Quebec conference to work out detailed terms for confederation. Again Brown took a leading part in this critically important gathering – being, after all, the strongest representative there of the most powerful provincial interest, that of the future Ontario. Yet his own interest was not just sectional, but national. For example, it was he who moved the essential resolution stipulating central and provincial governments for the union, with provision for the admission of the North-West, British Columbia, and Vancouver Island. He took a stand against an elected senate in the new federal parliament, as he had previously against the elective upper house introduced in the province of Canada, because of the problem of basing British responsible government on the confidence of two representative bodies, particularly if they were of different party complexion. And he wanted simple, non-political new provincial authorities, since they were to be left only "insignificant" matters to deal with. Brown believed that the establishing of representation by population in the central government (another resolution which he moved) would give Upper Canada its due voice in important national matters, and that the provincial regimes would take the divisive, but essentially local, sectional issues out of high politics. It was a clouded vision, but at least a well-meaning one for this "sectional" politician become a confederation statesman.

After the conference closed, Brown was one of the spokesmen who first presented the actual plan for confederation embodied in the 72 Quebec resolutions to the Canadian people, in his case, through a major speech in Toronto on 3 November. Later that month he set out for England. He had been chosen to open discussions with the imperial government on the project of union, and also to discuss the transfer of the North-West from the HBC to this grand new design. During December he went into these questions with British government and opposition leaders in London, as well as the question of British North American defence, made urgent by strained relations with the United States arising out of the Civil War, now hastening towards a northern victory. He returned early in 1865, sure of imperial approval for the confederation project, hopeful of progress on the transfer of the North-West, but worried by apparent British readiness to see the still weak colonies "shift for themselves" in the face of American danger.

The Canadian parliament met again in February, to debate the Quebec conference scheme and to give the approval to be expected from the government's big majority. Still, the confederation debates of 1865 were no mere rubber stamp; they expressed doubts and penetrating criticism, national hopes and powerful arguments for union. In the latter regard, Brown's own speech of 8 February was perhaps his greatest, and one of the strongest in support of confederation. Before the vote was taken, however, the plan had met reverses in the Maritimes, where the pro-confederation government of Samuel Leonard Tilley* had lost an election in New Brunswick in March, and the Charles Tupper* regime had not even dared to introduce the Quebec scheme in the Nova Scotian assembly.

Another Canadian mission was accordingly sent to England to discuss the future of confederation, this time composed of Brown, Macdonald, Cartier, and Galt. After busy meetings and much social life in London in May and June, they succeeded handsomely, gaining imperial assurance of cooperation in forwarding the project and of the defence of Canada in event of war, though now that the Civil War had ended any American military threat seemed fast receding. The British government also promised aid in negotiating a new trade agreement with the United States, since the existing reciprocity treaty was to end the following year. While in Britain, Brown was fully involved in the working out of these vital concerns of the confederation movement. The remaining essential was winning back the Maritimes. After the mission returned he played a part here also.

In September 1865 he and Galt represented Canada at the Confederate Trade Council in Quebec, a smaller meeting of the provinces to consider their commercial future now that their reciprocity agreement with the United States was to be terminated. The common approach to trade the council sought, and the Maritime contacts Brown made, stood him in good stead afterwards when the Canadian government sent him to the Maritimes to try the climate anew on confederation. He marked a hopeful trend in New Brunswick, and dealt with Tilley and Lieutenant Governor Arthur Hamilton Gordon* on ways to advance it. On his return in mid-November, however, he found the Canadian government had decided on a policy of their own for seeking reciprocity with the United States, by joint legislative action rather than by treaty, and this he firmly opposed.

Brown had long upheld reciprocity, as an economic liberal seeking to remove, not raise, the barriers of tariffs, and as an Upper Canadian who had seen his own section benefit from it. But he did believe its price might come too high. Legislative reciprocity, virtually open to change at the will of an American congressional lobby, would, he thought, place Canadian prosperity at the mercy of American dictation. He fought the proposal through tense cabinet discussions, yet failed to convince his colleagues. At length, on 19 December, he resigned. There is no doubt that the issue was crucial to Brown, though it is also true, of course, that strains had long been rising in the cabinet between two strong chieftains and old opponents, Macdonald and himself. Moreover Brown was still uneasy in a coalition, however great its purpose, and felt he was unduly committed in an old game of power-building and office-dealing. Hence he was emotionally ready to resign over an issue as important as reciprocity. There was meaning in the telegram he sent his wife: "I am a free man once more."

In any case, confederation now was well in train. Brown continued wholeheartedly to support it, in the Globe and at the next session of parliament in 1866. He had the satisfaction of seeing New Brunswick elect Tilley's pro-confederates in the spring, and Nova Scotia reopen the quest for union – not to mention, meanwhile, the failure of the legislative reciprocity approach to a scarcely interested United States. Towards the close of the year the final confederation conference met in London to draft the imperial bill, still fundamentally embodying the Quebec resolutions Brown had helped to formulate. It was passed as the British North America Act in March 1867.

By this time Brown was deep in party politics again, renewing contact with former Rouge friends such as Dorion and Luther HOLTON, who had opposed the confederation ministry, and striving to strengthen Reform party lines in Upper Canada, eroded by the years of coalition. Brown felt that any need for coalition would end with the inception of confederation and that party politics should reassert themselves in the new federal Canadian state. On the other hand, Macdonald Conservatives and some Liberals held that the new era should be instituted by a broad, non-partisan administration. Pressed by friends to take the lead for Reform again, challenged by the coalitionist stand, Brown overcame his sincere desire to be done with parliamentary life, and, as before, made one more try.

There was another large, excited Reform convention in Toronto in June 1867 to reaffirm party unity. There Brown virtually read from the party William McDougall and William Howland*, the two leading Liberals who still sat firmly in the coalition cabinet, Mowat having long since withdrawn to a judicial post. But the elections for the new union legislatures, held later in the summer, soon proved that the Reform convention had by no means overcome the wide popular appeal of the "patriotic" no-party cry. In August, Brown was beaten himself in South Ontario, a far from safe seat. By September it was clear that sufficient Reformers had joined with the Conservatives to give a majority in Ontario to the new federal regime of Sir John A. Macdonald and to a similar coalition government for the province led by Sandfield Macdonald. Brown himself was offered safer seats; but his feelings against parliamentary life had only been confirmed. In October 1867 he left Canada for an extended family holiday in Scotland: out of politics before he had turned 49.

In the next few years he gave himself largely to his growing family, now including two more children, Catherine Edith and George Mackenzie, to the Globe, his first love, and to his considerable business interests. He had sold his Bothwell properties to an oil syndicate in 1865 for $275,000, making him decidedly wealthy. But in 1866 he had bought a brand new estate at Bow Park near Brantford, where he began to develop a large herd of prime shorthorn cattle. Bow Park grew from a family country home to a cattle breeding enterprise that took much of his time. Nevertheless, he did not seek to escape from politics, only from public life. His journal was as potent a Reform organ as ever. Its owner, and former party leader, was regularly consulted by the Grit inner circle, whether in the provincial capital, Toronto, or the federal at Ottawa. Furthermore, he had a particularly close connection with Alexander Mackenzie, leader of the federal Liberal opposition in all but name, who had once been his election agent in early days in Kent and Lambton and later his trusted lieutenant in the old Canadian assembly.

Through the Globe he worked to bring about the end of Sandfield Macdonald's "Patent Combination" in Ontario. In the spring of 1871 the second Ontario election gave the Reformers the balance of power in the provincial house, possibly helped by the fact that Brown in his paper had made peace with Roman Catholic voters, declaring that divisive sectarian issues had now been "banished." Sandfield held on in office till December, but then a Liberal government under Edward Blake* replaced him. The next year, when Blake decided to move to the federal sphere, Brown helped persuade an old friend, Oliver Mowat, to leave the judicial bench and head the ministry, thus opening the long Mowat era in Ontario government in October 1872.

Meanwhile Brown had had his troubles as Globe proprietor, having faced a major printing strike by the Toronto typographical union from March to June of 1872. The strike ended in mutual concessions, but not before Brown and other "master printers" had had 18 printers arrested for intimidation, though they were released on bail and never brought to trial. The next year there was the very different excitement of the "Pacific Scandal." Here the Globe was on the side of the angels, as it denounced the corrupt payment of election funds to the chief Conservative ministers by Sir Hugh Allan*, who had been granted the Canadian Pacific Railway charter. The Macdonald federal government fell; the Liberals under Mackenzie won a sweeping election victory early in 1874. The Mackenzie government then asked Brown to undertake a mission to the United States to seek a new reciprocity treaty.

He readily accepted the task of negotiating for the kind of reciprocity he supported. Moreover there seemed to be some hope that the Americans would now agree to a treaty, in order to avoid having to pay a cash settlement for access to the Canadian Atlantic fisheries. Brown arrived in Washington in February, officially to serve as joint commissioner with the British minister in Washington, Sir Edward Thornton, but really to carry the weight of the work himself. For several months he fenced and bargained with the American secretary of state, the affable but wily Hamilton Fish. An extensive treaty gradually was drafted, providing for reciprocal free admission of many manufactures as well as natural products. On 18 June the draft treaty was finally sent to Congress for approval. Fish had so delayed, however, that there was not time for it to be considered before the adjournment four days later. The Senate simply set it aside; there was little chance it would be revived since any American interest by now had waned. In fact, for Brown's draft treaty of 1874 one well may use the dictum, the operation was successful but the patient died.

He played a declining part in political affairs after his Washington mission though he never entirely left them. He had been appointed a senator in 1874 but did not take his seat in Ottawa until the next year. Indeed, his attendance at the Senate was generally sporadic, and not a major return to politics. Still, Brown maintained his link with Mackenzie and the very core of stout Victorian Grittism. In this respect, he supported Mackenzie in 1874–75 against the passing discontents of the able Edward Blake, and the young Canada First idealists who temporarily gathered to him, finding Mackenzie's rule too stale and uninspired. Blake was to be won back, but Brown and the Globe also joined battle with the redoubtable Goldwin Smith*, the sharp-tongued intellectual publicist who for a time was allied with the short-lived Canada First group. Indeed, there began a long feud with Smith, largely because of his presumption that Canada was doomed to partisan excesses and colonial inferiority until it breathed the pure air of independence, which to him seemed to mean annexation to the United States.

From 1875, however, Brown was spending his time increasingly on affairs at his Bow Park estate. There his neighbour's son, Alexander Graham Bell*, offered him and his brother Gordon a share in the rights to the "sound telegraphy" system Bell had invented if they would advance $600 and patent the device in England. Both agreed to advance the money, and George Brown undertook to apply for a British patent for Bell in a forthcoming visit to Britain. But when the senator arrived in London in February 1876, the technical advice he received there discouraged him as to the value of Bell's invention. He did not proceed, the agreement lapsed, and Brown did not become part-owner of a future Bell empire. He was more concerned with his plan to launch a joint-stock company in Britain to build Bow Park into a major pedigreed cattle-raising venture. Already well known to leading British stockbreeders and aristocratic fanciers alike, he succeeded in raising close to $400,000 of capital, and returned to Canada in May to obtain his charter.

Under these new auspices Bow Park grew much larger, and it became a show-place for agriculturalists visiting Canada. Yet by 1877 the country was deep in a world depression, and the market for pedigreed stock was not growing as anticipated. Brown's enterprise was already heading into difficulties when the next year he turned his attention back to politics, to support the Liberal cause in the federal election of September 1878. He spoke through southern Ontario against the Conservative call for a "National Policy" of tariff protection. But after the National Policy, and the depression, swept Macdonald back into office, Brown returned to the mounting financial troubles of Bow Park.

In 1879 the British stockholders of his company sent over an expert manager, John Clay, to try to save the situation. By early December Clay's work of reorganizing was beginning to bring an improvement, when a fire destroyed most of the estate's main buildings. Then on Christmas day another blaze, almost certainly of incendiary origin, burned out the stables. George Brown's pioneering venture into pedigreed stock raising in Canada seemed ruined. Moreover, early in 1880 he was facing problems at the Globe, where he had again invested heavily in improvements to produce a new multi-page machine-folded edition; delays in installation had held back its appearance.

On 25 March 1880, at the Globe, a former worker in the engine room, George BENNETT, discharged by his foreman for intemperance, came into Brown's office to seek a certificate that he had served five years. Brown tried to send the man, whom he did not know, to see the foreman. There was an argument; Bennett, who had been drinking, suddenly pointed a gun. As Brown grasped for it, it fired, inflicting a flesh wound in his thigh. His assailant was quickly secured. Brown's injury was pronounced slight, and he left thankfully for Lambton Lodge, his Toronto home. But while he stayed at home, calling meetings there on Globe business and worrying incessantly over the losses at Bow Park, the wound, far from healing, grew inflamed. During April his financial outlook brightened, as a good cattle sale was made in Chicago and the new Globe edition came out. But by this time his leg was badly infected and he had too greatly taxed his strength. Gradually he gave way to fever and delirium, then coma. Early on 9 May he died at Lambton Lodge, at the age of 61.

His life was saddened at the end by a sense of failure. Yet actually Bow Park recovered under new direction, and the Globe assuredly continued to flourish. Above all, there remained Brown's achievements in journalism, the Liberal party, and Canadian confederation itself. Lord Monck*, governor general in the confederation years, termed him "the man whose conduct in 1864 had rendered the project of union feasible." A man, also, who refused the lieutenant governorship of Ontario in 1875 and a knighthood in 1879, he preferred always to remain George Brown of the Globe – which was distinction enough in itself.

J. M. S. CARELESS

[This piece is essentially derived from my biography, Brown of The Globe. Little new research material on Brown has turned up since the writing of this biography. The main primary source was, and is, the Brown papers in the PAC. Some secondary works of value have certainly appeared since Brown of The Globe was written. They offer useful related and background information, though they do not deal centrally with Brown or alter my interpretation of him in any significant way. A selection of such works is given below, along with some older volumes. But with respect to the latter, Brown of The Globe, of course, utilized many more, and again provides the fullest references to them. J.M.S.C.]

Alexander Mackenzie, The life and speeches of Hon. George Brown (Toronto, 1882). Careless, Union of the Canadas. Charles Clarke, Sixty years in Upper Canada, with autobiographical recollections (Toronto, 1908). Creighton, Macdonald, young politician; Macdonald, old chieftain; Road to confederation. Dent, Last forty years. John Lewis, George Brown (Toronto, 1906). Morton, Critical years. Waite, Life and times of confederation. James Young, Public men and public life in Canada, being recollections of parliament and the press, and embracing a succinct account of the stirring events which led to the confederation of British North America into the Dominion of Canada (Toronto, 1902).

BROWN, ROBERT CHRISTOPHER LUNDIN, Church of England clergyman, missionary, and author; b.c. 1831 in England, son of the Reverend Robert Brown; d. a bachelor either at Patras, Greece, in the spring of 1876 or in London on 16 April 1876.

Robert Christopher Lundin Brown received his MA from the University of Edinburgh in 1854 and was ordained into the Church of England in 1858. During the next two years he served as curate of St Mark, North Audley St, London, and published several English translations of German theological works. In 1860 the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel sent Brown to British Columbia as a missionary. He visited Barkerville in the Cariboo and became the first missionary in the Lillooet district. He was thus the first incumbent at St Mary's Church, Lillooet, the third Anglican church on the mainland of British Columbia, which had been founded in 1861 and consecrated in 1862. In addition to his work at St Mary's, Brown made several missionary visits to the Cariboo goldfields. According to his own account, he was rather given to lecturing the miners on their sinfulness: "A sermon was preached . . . on the prevailing vice, concubinage with native females . . . . Once the preacher [Brown referring to himself] was interrupted by someone instancing Solomon as having many wives, and yet didn't the Bible say he was a man after God's own heart? . . . The Sunday following that sermon not a soul came to service." One of Brown's letters on the shortage of women among the Cariboo miners had a part in bringing about the foundation of the Columbian Emigration Society (supported by the SPG and other missionary groups) which sent bride ships to Victoria in 1862 and 1863. Brown also did some missionary work among the Indians, making himself understood through translators.

In March 1864 the Reverend Mr Brown was not well; he did not preach at St Mary's again and left there in 1865. Upon his return to England, Brown held two posts briefly and then was appointed vicar of Lineal-cum-Colmere, Salop (1869–74), and of Rhodes near Manchester (1874–75). In May 1875 he emigrated to Cape Town, South Africa. Sometime in the remaining 11 months of his life Brown became English chaplain at Patras, Greece.

Brown is best known in Canada for his prize essay entitled British Columbia, published by the newly established press of the Royal Engineers at New Westminster in 1863. Designed to encourage immigration, it is a valuable, if rather enthusiastic and occasionally misleading, account of the resources and life of the mainland colony. In 1870 Brown published in London a pamphlet called British Columbia: the Indians and settlers at Lillooet: appeal for missionaries. One of its most interesting anecdotes tells of the Lillooet chief Shiheileedza and his daughter Kanadqua. The chief with half of his tribe was killed in a war with California miners, probably about 1850; his daughter was sold by an uncle to a miner, but under the influence of Christianity broke free of her concubinage. Brown published in 1873, also in London, Klatsassan, and other reminiscences of missionary life in British Columbia. Klattsasine* was the Chilcotin chief who in 1864 led a rising against the attempt initiated by Alfred WADDINGTON to build a road from the coast across his tribe's territory, and the book gives a valuable contemporary account of an event on which first-hand evidence is scarce. Brown's writing is equally interesting in its revelation of the motives and limitations of a British cleric among Indians and miners. Other publications by Brown include religious writings and translations.

V. G. HOPWOOD

R. C. L. Brown, British Columbia, an essay (New Westminster, B.C., 1863); British Columbia: the Indians and settlers at Lillooet: appeal for missionaries (London, 1870); Klatsassan, and other reminiscences of missionary life in British Columbia (London, 1873); "Lillooet mission," Mission Life (London), 1870, 561–69; "The Thompson River Indians," Mission Life (London), 1872, 95–107, 153–55, 227–29.

PABC, R. C. L. Brown correspondence, 1862–63; St Mary's Church (Lillooet, B.C.), Register (original in possession of the government agent at Lillooet, B.C.; copy also at University of British Columbia); Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, "Papers relating to the Diocese of Columbia, 1858–1868," typescripts in 3 vols. "British Columbia prize essay," Daily British Colonist (Victoria), 10 Sept. 1863. "The prize essay on British Columbia," Daily British Colonist (Victoria), 25 Sept. 1863. "The British Columbia essay," Daily British Colonist (Victoria), 29 Jan. 1864. "Farewell address," Daily British Colonist (Victoria), 18 April 1865. "People's magazine," Daily British Colonist and Victoria Chronicle, 21 July 1872. Columbia Mission, Annual Reports (London), 1860–66. Boase, Modern English biography, I, 438. The clerical directory, a biographical and statistical book of reference for facts relating to the clergy and the church (London, 1858). Crockford's clerical directory for 1860 (London, 1860). M. L. Murray, St. Mary's of Lillooet ([Lillooet, B.C., 1935]). F. A. Peake, The Anglican Church in British Columbia (Vancouver, B.C., 1959).

[The author also received information in a letter from C. A. Johnson, "Summymead," Welshampton, Ellesmere, Shropshire, Eng., 27 Aug. 1969. V.G.H.]

BROWNE, FRANCES (Stewart), pioneer; b. in Dublin, Ireland, 24 May 1794, daughter of Francis Browne and Anna Maria Noble; m. Thomas Alexander Stewart; d. 24 Feb. 1872, near Peterborough, Ont.

Francis Browne, the son of a Church of England clergyman, was himself dean of Elphin, Roscommon County, when he died in 1796. His wife was paralysed at about the same time and Frances was then adopted by a great-uncle. In 1800 she went to live with another great-uncle, Dr Daniel Augustus Beaufort, rector of Collon in Louth County, and was privately educated by the rector's daughter. Although they were never published, Frances' father had written books and Dr Beaufort, one of the founders of the Royal Irish Academy, was a man of literary tastes.

On 17 Dec. 1816 Frances married Thomas Alexander Stewart of Wilmont, County Antrim. In the six years in which the Stewarts lived in Ireland three of their 11 children were born. After the failure of the manufacturing firm in which Thomas Stewart and Robert Reid, who had married Stewart's sister, were junior partners, the two men decided to emigrate to Upper Canada with what small capital they had. In August 1822 they arrived at York (Toronto), welcomed by the former adjutant-general, Colonel C. L. L. Foster*, who was connected by marriage with Frances Stewart. Receiving large grants of land (1,200 acres for the Stewarts), the two families set out for Douro Township in Peterborough County.

The Stewarts' house, Auburn, was built on the Otonabee River, a short distance northeast of the present town of Peterborough. The Reids were their only neighbours until 1825, when they welcomed Peter Robinson*'s Irish immigrants and gladly released their claim to control of settlement in the whole township. The story of the Stewarts is typical of those of middle-class families, who, with limited capital, migrated to Upper Canada in the 1820s and 1830s in the hope of improving their economic positions, and who faced – in this case with goodwill – rather more problems than they had anticipated. Like many of her contemporaries, Mrs Stewart described for her friends at home the life on a pioneer farm, a life completely different from theirs. Some of her letters were later published under the characteristic title of Our forest home; although unskilfully edited, the book is one of the best in the long list of accounts by immigrants and travellers.

True to her ancestry and to her environment in Ireland, Frances Stewart was deeply religious and of cultivated tastes. The first trait enabled her to face hardships and sorrows with resignation if not equanimity. In the early years her life in Canada was a lonely one, with all too little chance, as she remarked, of rest for mind and body, and her husband, a justice of the peace and a member of the Legislative Council, died young in 1847. She received books from friends in Ireland and treasured a piano which had survived a fall through the ice.

In her later years Frances Stewart spent some time in another family house, Goodwood, but always returned to her own Auburn, though leaving the management of the farm to a son. In the 1860s the property, because of mismanagement, failed as a strong economic base for a large family. Mentally undefeated, Frances Stewart continued to write her engaging letters and to follow the lives of children and grandchildren until her death in 1872.

G. DE T. GLAZEBROOK

[Frances Stewart], Our forest home, being extracts from the correspondence of the late Frances Stewart, ed. E. S. Dunlop (Toronto, 1889; 2nd ed., Montreal, 1902). Valley of the Trent (Guillet). G. H. Needler, Otonabee pioneers, the story of the Stewarts, the Stricklands, the Traills and the Moodies (Toronto, 1953).

BRUNET, LOUIS-OVIDE, priest, botanist; b. 10 March 1826 at Quebec, son of Jean-Olivier Brunet, merchant, and Cécile Lagueux; d. 2 Oct. 1876 at Quebec.

In 1835 Louis-Ovide Brunet entered grade VIII at the Petit Séminaire of Quebec; Octave CRÉMAZIE was one of his fellow-pupils. Abbé Edward John HORAN, the future bishop of Kingston (Ontario), introduced him to natural history. Brunet spent part of his holidays with his uncle, the notary Louis-Édouard Glackmeyer*, an ardent collector of plants, who was assembling a herbarium. Brunet entered the seminary in 1844, and was ordained priest on 10 Oct. 1848; after being a missionary for two years at Grosse Île, he was a curate from 1848 to 1851 and again in 1853 and 1854, and was parish priest of Saint-Lambert-de-Lévis from 1854 to 1858.

When in 1856 Abbé Horan was appointed principal of the École Normale Laval at Quebec, his post of professor at the seminary and at the young Université Laval became vacant. In considering a replacement, the names of Abbé Léon Provancher* and Louis-Ovide Brunet came up; they had not as yet published anything, but were actively engaged in botanical pursuits and each was preparing a description of Canadian flora. Brunet was chosen. From 1858 to 1861 he devoted himself at the seminary to the teaching of botany, at the same time giving a course in dogma to the theology students. In 1862, the mineralogist Thomas Sterry Hunt* having left the Université Laval for McGill, Brunet succeeded him in the chair of natural history, which he occupied from 1863 to 1871. He was appointed titular professor in 1865.

Meanwhile, according to Georg August Pritzel, Brunet had published a short paper on Canadian woods (1857), and a first study (1861) on the voyage of the botanist André Michaux* in the direction of Hudson Bay in 1792. The latter's diary being at that time unpublished – it was not published until 1888 – Brunet worked with fragmentary notes, whose deficiencies no doubt explain errors of interpretation in his text.

His botanical excursions at Petit Cap (Montmorency County), near Cap Tourmente, enabled him to meet Abbé Léon Provancher, at that time parish priest of Saint-Joachim. In 1861 they made botanical expeditions to various places: Petit Cap, Île d'Orléans, Saguenay, and Lac Saint-Jean. Between them there soon developed a stubborn enmity, of which their correspondence and writings preserve traces: it reached the point of Brunet's refusing to contribute to the Naturaliste canadien, which was owned by Provancher. In 1860 the professor of the Université Laval had gone to Niagara on his first journey in Upper Canada. The following year, alone, or with T. S. Hunt or Abbé Jean-Baptiste-Antoine Ferland*, he gathered more specimens at Quebec, Montreal, Saint-Hyacinthe, Drummondville, in Lotbinière County and along the Rivière Sainte-Anne.

A plan was put forward at this time to set up a botanical garden at Quebec under the auspices of the seminary, with the collaboration of the municipality and the government. To prepare himself for the task of future director of this undertaking, Brunet travelled in Europe for a year

(1861–62), associating with botanists of repute, visiting Regent's Park in London, the Jardin des Plantes in Paris, the botanical gardens of Liverpool, Kew, Montpellier, Florence, Pisa, Rome, Brussels, Louvain, Bonn, Düsseldorf, Utrecht, Amsterdam, Leyden, Rotterdam, and a Danish nursery.

At the Sorbonne, Brunet attended the lectures of Pierre-Étienne-Simon Duchartre, and at the Jardin des Plantes those of Adolphe-Théodore Brongniart and of Joseph Decaisne. With the latter he visited the gardens of Nantes and Angers, and again Kew Gardens. At the Muséum National d'Histoire Naturelle, where he worked freely, in the company of some remarkable scientists, he undertook a study of the Canadian plants of Michaux, which were preserved in the herbarium of that institution, and of the Canadian species mentioned in the Canadensium plantarum . . . historia, by Jacques-Philippe Cornut. The identification of these species was assuredly a valuable help to Abbé Joseph-Clovis Kemner* Laflamme, his pupil and then his successor, when the latter presented a communication on this work to the Royal Society of Canada.

Once back in Quebec, Brunet resumed his teaching and research. He went to Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Washington in 1864, and Anticosti Island and the Strait of Belle-Isle in mid-summer 1865. And according to his travel diaries, he was on botanical expeditions in 1866 at Ottawa, London, Belleville, Hamilton, Brockville, Chatham, and Newbury in Canada West, and at Montreal, Trois-Rivières, Rimouski, and Rivière-du-Loup in Canada East.

Before his return from Europe, Brunet had already begun to prepare a study on the flora of Canada. The notes he amassed from 1860 to 1866 cover 582 pages, and have remained unpublished, no doubt because in 1862 Léon Provancher published his Flore canadienne. In a letter to Asa Gray, Brunet deemed the publication of his rival's work to be too hasty. Other manuscripts of Brunet would be worthy of publication if they were accompanied by the commentaries of a sagacious botanist. The only work on flora that Brunet published, Éléments de botanique et de physiologie végétale . . . (1870), deserved a better fate. But Provancher's Flore, and the Sulpician Jean Moyen's Cours élémentaire de botanique . . . published in 1871 at Montreal, stole the market from him. Brunet's work comprises numerous accounts of what he had observed, lists of popular names, and the description of five botanical entities new to the science. Several vegetable species will recall to botanists the active life of this man that was too early cut off, in particular the Crataegus brunetiana Charles Sprague Sargent and the Astragalus brunetianus (Merritt Lyndon Fernald) Jacques Rousseau*.

Apart from his courses, his publications, the founding in 1862 and the organization of the herbarium of the Université Laval, Brunet prepared collections of Canadian woods for exhibitions in Dublin (1865) and Paris (1867). The plan for a botanical garden at Quebec absorbed part of his energies from 1861 to 1870. In the latter year he thought of creating a school of forestry, in reality simply an arboretum, for want of a more elaborate undertaking. This project, like that of the botanical garden, did not come to fruition: the seminary struck it off its programme in 1879.

In 1870 the government of Quebec invited the Université Laval to give a course in applied sciences and offered to subsidize it. Entrusted to Louis-Ovide Brunet and Dr François-Alexandre-Hubert La Rue*, the course began, but after a few lessons the rector of the university, fearing that politics would push its way in, terminated the project.

At the age of 44, a sick man, disappointed by repeated failure to achieve success, Louis-Ovide Brunet retired to the home of his mother and sister, where he lived until his death. Self-taught, like all scientists in Quebec before 1920, Louis-Ovide Brunet none the less proved to be the best French Canadian botanist of the last century. His contemporaries, who lacked the necessary training to judge him, were not capable of seeing in him the scientist who might have brought great lustre to his milieu. Working with minute care and unobtrusively, he was not one of those who seek to be first at all costs in the field of publishing. Furthermore, as Brunet did not receive the necessary encouragement, the major part of his work, and the most interesting, remains unpublished.

JACQUES ROUSSEAU

[L.-O. Brunet, Catalogue des plantes canadiennes contenues dans l'herbier de l'université Laval et recueillies pendant les années 1858–1865 (Québec, 1865) (The complete catalogue was to contain more than 200 pages and several plates; however, only the first section was published. The four plates cited by Brunet do not appear in the copies which were consulted; were they ever published?); Catalogue des végétaux ligneux du Canada pour servir à l'intelligence des collections de bois économiques envoyées à l'exposition universelle de Paris, 1867 (Québec, 1867); Éléments de botanique et de physiologie végétale, suivis d'une petite flore simple et facile pour aider à découvrir les noms des plantes les plus communes au Canada (Québec, 1870); Énumération des genres de plantes de la flore du Canada précédée des tableaux analytiques des familles . . . (Québec, 1864); Histoire des Picea qui se rencontrent dans les limites du Canada (Québec, 1866); [ ], "Journal de voyage en Europe de l'abbé Ovide Brunet en 1861–1862," Arthur Maheux, édit., Le Canada français (Québec), 2e sér., XXVI (1938–39), 591–99, 681–90, 783–90, 886–92, 983–87; [ ], Manière de préparer les plantes et autres objets de musée (n.p., n.d.); "Michaux and his journey in Canada," The Canadian Naturalist and Geologist (Montreal), new ser., I (1864), 325–37; "Notes sur les plantes recueillies en 1858, par M. l'abbé Ferland sur les côtes du Labrador, baignées par les eaux du Saint-Laurent," La littérature canadienne de 1850 à 1860 (2v., Québec, 1863), I, 367–74; Notice sur le musée botanique de l'université Laval . . . (Québec, 1867); Notice sur les plantes de Michaux et sur son voyage au Canada et à la baie d'Hudson, d'après son journal manuscrit et autres documents (Québec, 1863); "On the Canadian species of the genus Picea," Canadian Naturalist and Geologist (Montreal), new ser., III (1868), 102–10; Voyage d'André Michaux en Canada, depuis le lac Champlain jusqu'à la baie d'Hudson (Québec, 1861). J.R.]

Frère Marie-Victorin [Conrad Kirouac], Flore laurentienne (1re éd., Montréal, 1935), 15, 308, 356. Jacques Rousseau, Les Astragalus du Québec et leurs alliés immédiats (Contributions du laboratoire de botanique de l'Université de Montréal, 24, New York, Montréal, Leipzig, 1933). Arthur Maheux, "Louis-Ovide Brunet, botaniste, 1826–1876," Le Naturaliste canadien (Québec), LXXXVII (1960), 5–22, 53–57, 120–48, 149–64, 228–36, 253–68, 277–86; LXXXVIII (1961), 78–83, 149–60, 324–36; LXXXIX (1962), 265–78. Jacques Rousseau, "Les entités botaniques nouvelles créées par Brunet," Le Naturaliste canadien (Québec), LVII (1930), 132–35; "Provancher et la publication des Éléments de botanique de Brunet (accompagné d'une lettre inédite)," Le Naturaliste canadien (Québec), LVII (1930), 196–202; "Un travail de l'abbé Brunet," Le Naturaliste canadien (Québec), LVIII (1931), 69; "Un travail oublié de l'abbé Ovide Brunet," Le Naturaliste canadien (Québec), LXVII (1940), 200; "Le voyage d'Asa Gray à Québec en 1858 (lettres inédites)," Le Naturaliste canadien (Québec), LVII (1930), 202–4. Jacques Rousseau et Bernard Boivin, "La contribution à la science de la Flore canadienne de Provancher," Le Naturaliste canadien (Québec), 95 (1968), 1499–530.

BRUYÈRE (Bruguier), ÉLISABETH, founder and first superior of the Sisters of Charity of Bytown (Ottawa); b. 19 March 1818 at L'Assomption, L.C..; d. 5 April 1876 at Ottawa, Ont.

Élisabeth's father, Charles Bruguier, was the eldest son of Jean-Baptiste Bruguier, who came originally from Pont-Saint-Esprit in Provence and arrived in Canada in 1756; Charles Bruguier's second wife was Sophie Mercier. Élisabeth's baptismal certificate gives the name Bruguier, but the spelling was later changed to Bruyère. From 1830, six years after her father's death, Élisabeth received a religious, intellectual, and domestic training of the highest quality under the protection of a cousin, Abbé Charles-François Caron, the parish priest of Saint-Esprit (Montcalm County). In 1834 she taught at the local school; she continued teaching at Saint-Vincent-de-Paul (Laval) when her benefactor was transferred there in 1836.

Élisabeth was easily moved by the sufferings of others, and in 1839 entered the order of the Sisters of Charity of the Hôpital Général of Montreal, commonly called the Grey Nuns. She professed in 1841 and was placed in charge of a ward of 40 orphan girls, whom she strove to train according to the principles she had received.

In the autumn of 1844 the community was invited by Patrick Phelan*, coadjutor to the bishop of Kingston, to establish itself at Bytown (Ottawa), an important centre of the timber industry, where the Catholics had no schools, hospitals, or relief organization for the needy. In the face of so many needs the community agreed to cooperate, and entrusted responsibility for the undertaking to Mother Marguerite-Dorothée Beaubien*. She became ill, and Sister Élisabeth Bruyère, despite her youth, was asked to succeed her.

On 12 Feb. 1845 Ignace Bourget*, bishop of Montreal, gave Sister Élisabeth Bruyère and her three companions a letter of authorization allowing them to set up one or several communities in Bishop Phelan's diocese, provided that they conformed in every respect to the rule followed by the mother house, the Hôpital Général of Montreal. For his part Bishop Phelan welcomed them officially to his diocese, and by a canonical order issued on 11 April 1845 he instituted the community of the Sisters of Charity of Bytown. The community was to be entirely autonomous except for the act of fidelity to the rule of the mother house. When the latter adopted a new rule in 1851, which prohibited the running of boarding-schools and fee-charging schools, Joseph-Bruno GUIGUES, who had been bishop of Bytown since 1848, was unable to agree to it; paid teaching had already been authorized at Bytown, and the poverty of the diocese did not make it possible to give financial support to another exclusively teaching community. In 1854 the Montreal house recognized the complete independence of the Ottawa community, which obtained its own rule in 1856.

The founders of the community had reached Bytown by 20 Feb. 1845, ready to assist the parish priest, Adrien Telmon; within three months they had established their chief projects. On 3 March one of the first so-called "bilingual" schools in Upper Canada was inaugurated. On 10 May a small seven-bed hospital opened its doors. In June an organization to care for the poor and the sick was set up. A noviciate began to take shape in the summer with the admission of four aspirants, three of them from Bytown.

The typhus epidemic of the years 1847 and 1848 was for the young institute its initiation to heroism. With none but themselves to tend more than 600 patients sent to them by Dr Edward VAN CORTLANDT, the sisters saved some 475. In addition they were entrusted with the care of about 15 infant orphans. The epidemic overcome, they returned to their labours. In 1850 a capacious stone house replaced the cramped dwelling of the early days. This building housed the nuns, the orphans, the aged, and a girls' boarding-school which subsequently became the convent of Notre-Dame-du-Sacré-Cœur. A hospital was also equipped, and a school erected at Bishop Guigues' expense.

Apart from the founding of a boarding-school and a parish school at St Andrews West, near Cornwall, in 1848, the community did not go beyond the confines of Bytown until 1857, when it opened a school at Buffalo, New York. Under Mother Bruyère's direction, the community also concerned itself with missions; in 1866 sisters were sent to the Timiskaming district (Canada West), to assist the Oblates of Mary Immaculate among the Algonkins and the Crees in the region that is now northern Quebec and Ontario.

Mother Élisabeth Bruyère directed the community until her death, on 5 April 1876. During her long administration the community had opened some 25 houses in Ontario, Quebec, and New York State; all were under the direct control of the mother house at Ottawa. The majority were intended for teaching, and some concerned themselves with orphans, Indians, the aged, and the sick. It was an impressive achievement on the part of Mother Élisabeth Bruyère, who from the very beginning sought to make of her trainees workers who were deeply religious, zealous, and competent.

SOEUR PAUL-ÉMILE (Louise Guay)

Archives des Sœurs Grises de la Croix d'Ottawa, Annales de l'Institut, I (1845–1875), II (1875-1886); Correspondance Bruyère, communauté, affaires, famille; Correspondance relative à la fondation de l'Institut, dossiers Bourget, Phelan, Telmon, McMullen; Louis Richard, "Notes généalogiques de la famille Bruguier-Bruyère, en France et au Canada"; Registre de l'admission et de la décharge des malades de l'Hôpital Général d'Ottawa, 1845–1866, pp.12–99; Statistiques générales de l'Institut. Sœur Paul-Émile [Louise Guay], Mère Élisabeth Bruyère et son œuvre (Ottawa, 1945); "Mère Élisabeth Bruyère, fille de l'Église et femme d'œuvres," SCHÉC Rapport, 1962, 51–58. Stanislas Drapeau, "Simple coup d'œil sur la communauté des Sœurs de la Charité d'Ottawa," Album des familles (Ottawa, 1880), 398–401.

BUDD, HENRY, HBC clerk, farmer, teacher, and first Indian Anglican minister; b.c. 1812 of an unknown Indian and a Métis woman; d. 2 April 1875 at The Pas, North-West Territories (Man.).

On 15 Oct. 1819 the Hudson's Bay Company appointed John West* as its first Church of England chaplain in Rupert's Land. West also made arrangements with the Church Missionary Society to do what he could for the education of Métis and Indians at the company's posts and he took George Harbidge, a trained schoolmaster, with him to Rupert's Land. They arrived at York Factory in August, and when they left they took the young son of Chief Withewacapo with them. At Norway House West secured an orphan boy for education. This was Henry Budd whom West baptized with the chief's son on 21 July 1822; West's register has an entry, "Henry Budd an Indian boy about ten years of age taught in the Missionary School and now capable of reading the New Testament and repeating the Church of England Catechism correctly."

John West returned to England in 1823 but Harbidge stayed on to teach in the Church Missionary Society school at Red River. Henry Budd remained there for a number of years and was highly respected by his teacher as "amiable" and "thoughtful." Budd left the school about 1827 to become a clerk for the HBC. It seems that he went to the Columbia River area, a region of open warfare and violence in the fur trade. On 2 Feb. 1836 he married Betsy, apparently a daughter of Chief Factor John Work*. Since his contract with the HBC was completed, Budd and his wife returned to Red River and bought farm land near St Andrews. In 1837 he was persuaded by David Thomas Jones* and William Cockran* to teach at the Upper Church (St John's) parish school.

Budd showed ability, and in 1840 Cockran and John Smithurst* asked him to go to the Cumberland House District to begin a new school and mission for the Indians. On 22 June he set out for this place, his wife and mother with him. Cochran and Smithurst had made the request on their own responsibility "because everything had been prepared," they thought, between the HBC and the Church Missionary Society for assistance at this mission. But a difference of opinion developed between the company and the society. Hence after a short time at Cumberland House, Henry Budd moved down the Saskatchewan River to W'pas-skwayaw (The Pas) and built there a house in which he taught and held services. In June 1842, Smithurst went to The Pas for the baptismals of 39 adults, 27 infants, and 22 schoolchildren, the result of Budd's work, and was pleased with the tidiness and productivity of the mission.

Bishop David Anderson* made his first visit to The Pas in 1850, and referred to the establishment as the Devon Mission. Henry Budd had then been assisting the Reverend James Hunter* as catechist, schoolmaster, and in the study of Cree for six years; he also had been given what he thought the undignified task of selecting timber for the parsonage and church. The bishop took Henry and Henry junior back to the Red River, and coached the father in theology. On 22 December Henry Budd was ordained as a deacon in St Andrews Church; he was the first Indian in North America to be admitted to the ministry of the Church of England. When he had been ordained a priest in the new Christ Church, The Pas, on 10 June 1853, he was sent to Nepowewin (Nipawin, Sask.) and appears to have remained in charge there until 1867, when he returned to minister at The Pas. He was also expected to oversee the church's missionary endeavours at Nepowewin, Cumberland House, and Carlton House where there were catechists as well. He remained at The Pas until his unexpected death; he was buried in the old churchyard there and a monument of granite marks his grave.

Henry Budd is said to have been a big man of fine appearance; he was an eloquent preacher in Cree, and his letters to the society are in fine script and excellent English. He was much loved by his own people, one of whom remarked at the time of Budd's death that he had only then known what it was to lose a father although his real father had died several years before. Henry Budd, however, had qualities not usually ascribed to his race: he was methodical and thrifty, his mission stations were models of neatness, his gardens, livestock, and management a constant object lesson to his people. His work has endured through the years.

T. C. B. Boon

Church Missionary Society Archives (London), Henry Budd papers, correspondence, 1822–73; Henry Budd papers, journal, 1850–75. Hargrave, Red River, 103–26. John West, The substance of a journal during a residence at the Red River colony . . . British North America; and frequent excursions among the North-West American Indians, in the years 1820, 1821, 1822, 1823 (London, 1824), 16. Boon, Anglican Church, 6, 15, 45, 49–50, 66, 83, 99, 102. W. B. Heeney, John West and his Red River mission (Toronto, 1920). M. E. J., Dayspring in the far west, sketches of mission-work in north-west America (London, 1875). Robert Machray, Life of Robert Machray, D.D., LL.D., D.C.L., archbishop of Rupert's Land, primate of all Canada . . . (London, 1909). [J. A.] Mackay, "Henry Budd," Leaders of the Canadian Church, ed. W. B. Heeney (2nd ser., Toronto, 1920), 65–72. Sarah Tucker, The rainbow in the north; a short account of the first establishment of Christianity in Rupert's Land by the Church Missionary Society (London, 1851).

BUELL, ANDREW NORTON, lawyer, businessman, politician, journalist, and office-holder; b. 20 April 1798 at Elizabethtown (Brockville), U.C., the second son of William Buell*, loyalist and founder of Elizabethtown, and Martha Naughton; d. 9 Nov. 1880 at Toronto, Ont.

Andrew Norton Buell was educated at Pointe-Claire, Lower Canada (where he acquired a fluency in French), and at Brockville, Upper Canada. In 1816 he became a student-at-law and clerk in the office of David Jones of Brockville. He was admitted to the bar of Upper Canada on 6 Nov. 1821 as a barrister and attorney-at-law, and solicitor in chancery.

Beginning in 1821 Buell undertook an active career in journalism and politics on behalf of the Reform cause. He was instrumental in the founding of the Reform-oriented Brockville Recorder, and contributed the introductory address which appeared in the first number in 1821. Two years later he negotiated the purchase of the Recorder by his elder brother William*, who remained its editor and publisher for 28 years. Andrew Norton contributed innumerable editorials, communications, and addresses to its pages.

Buell was prominent locally in temperance societies and in the militia, but in politics he concentrated most of his efforts on behalf of his brother William who was elected to the Upper Canadian House of Assembly in 1828, 1830, and 1836. Local tradition has it that A. N. Buell was the first politician to organize a regular Reform political convention in Upper Canada as a means of securing the election of sympathetic candidates. During the 1825–37 period he carried on an active correspondence with other leading Reformers, such as Marshall Spring Bidwell, William Lyon Mackenzie*, and Robert Baldwin*. He was also instrumental in drawing up several bills which brought about local reforms; one was a law allowing polls to be held at four locations in Leeds, supplanting the single poll which could be dominated by the Orange and Tory supporters of Ogle Robert Gowan and Robert Sympson Jameson*. Both were unseated in 1835 as a result of their supporters' violence in the election of 1834.

Because of his political activity, Buell neglected both his business interests and his law practice to such an extent that in 1836 he was forced to undertake canal building contracts in New York State in hopes of recouping his fortunes. Thus he was living there when the Upper Canadian rebellion occurred in December 1837. Buell returned to

Brockville in 1840 and was charged with treason by Gowan, his political enemy of long standing. He was able to clear himself only by obtaining numerous affidavits to his innocence. Equally distressing to Buell, the canal contracts had proven unprofitable with the result that he was forced to sell most of his patrimony to settle his debts, and finally had to apply for a government position to support his family.

Robert Baldwin, recognizing Buell's efforts on behalf of the Reform cause, appointed him registrar of Johnstown District (Leeds and Grenville counties) in 1842, a position he held until 1849. In 1849 he was offered two judgeships by Baldwin, but was forced to decline because of deafness. Instead, he was made clerk of the crown and pleas in the Court of Common Pleas, and registrar of the Court of Chancery at Toronto. In 1850 he became master in chancery, a position that he filled with distinction for 20 years. In 1870 he became accountant-general in chancery, from which position he retired in 1878 to his farm at Brockville. He died at Toronto two years later.

Buell was twice married, to Calcina Richards of Brockville, then to Ann Eliza Thorp. There were four daughters and two sons from his first marriage and no issue from his second.

Leo A. Johnson

MTCL, Baldwin papers, especially vols. 36, 64, 68, 73, 78. PAO, Harry D. Blanchard papers; A. N. Buell papers; Cartwright family papers; Frederick John French collection; Sir James R. Gowan and Ogle R. Gowan papers; Solomon Jones papers; Mackenzie-Lindsey collection; James Reynolds papers; Frederick Peter Smith collection. Ruth McKenzie, Leeds and Grenville: their first two hundred years (Toronto and Montreal, 1967), 65, 68, 120–21, 153. G. R. I. MacPherson, "The code of Brockville's Buells," unpublished MA thesis, University of Western Ontario, 1966.

BULLOCK, WILLIAM, naval officer, Church of England clergyman, and hymn-writer; b. 12 Jan. 1797 at Prittlewell, Essex, Eng.; d. 7 March 1874 at Halifax, N.S., and was buried in Camp Hill Cemetery.

William Bullock was educated at Bluecoat School in London. He entered the navy as a midshipman on the Mutine 15 Dec. 1815, and served at the bombardment of Algiers under Lord Exmouth [Edward Pellew] in 1816. Later, he joined the Snap as sailing-master's mate and assistant surveyor. The ship did extensive hydrographic surveys around the coasts of Newfoundland, where Bullock was disturbed by the apparent neglect of the spiritual needs of the people. On 4 Nov. 1821 he was officially discharged from the navy for reasons of health, and immediately offered to serve in Newfoundland as a missionary for the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. Bullock was ordained deacon on 31 March 1822 by George Henry Law, bishop of Chester, and raised to the priesthood two weeks later by George Pelham, bishop of Lincoln. He was appointed missionary at Trinity Bay, Newfoundland, in 1822. In 1823 he married Mary Clinch, daughter of John Clinch*, the former missionary at Trinity; they had ten children. Bullock was extremely popular with the people of his extensive mission, serving them as pastor, doctor, and magistrate until 1840.

After a brief period in St John's, he left for the mission of Digby, N.S., in the summer of 1841. Here he set to work with his usual energy and zeal, building four new churches and establishing several preaching stations. The latter were usually points at some distance from the main mission where the missionary occasionally held services. To hold the congregation together, he appointed some worthy layman, frequently the schoolmaster, to read prayers on the Sabbath. These centres often obtained the services of a regular minister and built churches of their own. Four preaching stations, Sandy Cove, Briar Island, South Range, and Roseway, which Bullock established, later built churches.

Bullock went to Halifax in 1847 for temporary duty, and in June of that year Bishop John Inglis* appointed him curate of St Paul's Cathedral; he also assisted in the work of supplying outlying missions. In 1848 he was placed in charge of St Luke's Chapel of Ease in addition to his work at St Paul's. When St Luke's became a separate parish in 1858, he was appointed its first rector, and under his leadership St Luke's became a very active church. On the death of Bishop Inglis in 1851, Hibbert Binney* had been appointed to the bishopric. In 1864, on Binney's urging, letters patent from Queen Victoria made St Luke's the cathedral church of the diocese of Nova Scotia. And since Bullock sincerely believed in the catholicity and mission of the Anglican Church, views totally in accord with the beliefs of the new bishop, Bullock's appointment as first dean of the new cathedral was not unexpected. He was assisted at St Luke's by George McCawley, president of King's College. During much of his life Bullock was obsessed with the fear that he would leave his wife and children destitute, but his appointment to St Luke's removed this problem.

In 1854 William Bullock published a collection of 166 hymns, Songs of the church, which he dedicated to the SPG. The best-known of these, "We love the place, O God," composed for the opening of a new church in Trinity Bay, was later inserted in the official hymnbook of the Church of England. He frequently contributed devotional poems to the Church Times and sent birthday and anniversary greetings in poetic form.

Bullock was a man of tremendous energy and enthusiasm. He had a strong sense of duty to his parishioners, and was highly respected by his contemporaries.

C. E. THOMAS

Chester Records Office, EDA/1/10, Bishop of Chester's act book 1809–25. Lincolnshire Archives Office, Ord. Reg., I, f.7. PRO, Adm. 37/5904 (muster book of HMS Mutine); 37/6760 (muster book of HMS Snap). USPG, Journal of SPG, 33, p.254, 15 March 1822; SPG, C/CAN/NS, letter of William Bullock, 13 Sept. 1841; letter of John Inglis, 17 May 1847. R. H. Bullock, A memoir of the very Rev. William Bullock, D.D., dean of Nova Scotia (Halifax, 1899), 5, 25, 33. Harris, Church of Saint Paul, 207.

BUNN, THOMAS, lawyer, legislator, and politician; b. 16 May 1830 in the Red River Settlement, eldest son of Dr John Bunn* and Catherine Thomas; m. Isabella Clouston in 1854, and Rachel Harriott in 1859; d. 11 April 1875 at St Clements, Man.

Thomas Bunn was raised in the parish of St Paul (Middlechurch) and educated at the Red River Academy, and he settled in the parish of St Andrews. Bunn's mother was of part-Indian blood; his father was a local doctor and councillor of Assiniboia; Bunn himself became a member of the Church of England and a freemason. He was able, therefore, to have some influence in the Indian community and to enter English society in Red River. In January 1868 Bunn was appointed a member of the Council of Assiniboia and held this office until the council ceased to function in September 1870. On 17 Dec. 1869 he succeeded W. R. Smith as executive officer of the council with a salary of £100 per year.

In 1869 Louis Riel* had begun to organize resistance to the transfer of the North-West to the dominion of Canada without prearranged terms. Bunn was elected a representative from St Clements to the council of English and French parishes convened on 16 Nov. 1869 to draw up terms for entry. He hoped for a united front to negotiate these terms of union with Canada. Most English settlers, however, were disposed to think that Canada would be just, and if it were not, that Great Britain would ensure a fair settlement. Many English were willing to support Riel's policy of union through negotiation, not so much because they thought negotiation was necessary, but because they hoped thus to preserve peace in the Red River Settlement. Bunn tried indeed to pursue an intermediate position, and the strains were sometimes great. By accepting Riel's policy, Bunn, in a sense, made himself Riel's English half-breed lieutenant, despite the fact that there was no bond between the men.

On 19 and 20 Jan. 1870, a mass open-air meeting was held to hear Donald Alexander Smith*, commissioner of the Canadian government. Bunn was chairman of the discussion. It was decided that a convention should be held to prepare terms for negotiations with Canada, and that delegates should be elected. Bunn was one of those appointed to a committee to arrange the elections. He himself became a delegate from St Clements. From 27 January to 3 February, the convention prepared a second list of rights and approved the formation of a provisional government. Riel made Bunn secretary of state in the provisional government.

On 24 August the military forces of the crown under Colonel Garnet Joseph Wolseley* reached Upper Fort Garry (Winnipeg) and the provisional government was swept from power. Bunn survived its fall and may have been present at a meeting of the Council of Assiniboia which Wolseley revived in an attempt to settle the situation. Indeed, Bunn continued as usual in Red River society and set out to establish himself in the new order. As a man of some education and a fluent speaker with a judicious cast of mind, he decided to go into law. He was called to the bar of the new province of Manitoba in 1871, and was clerk to the First General Quarterly Court held in the new province on 16 May 1871. St Clements returned him as its first member to the provincial Legislative Assembly on 30 Dec. 1870. Thus Bunn's career decidedly bridged the way from the old order to the new. His early death in 1875 cut short his passage into it.

W. L. MORTON

Begg's Red River journal (Morton). Canadian North-West (Oliver), I, 71, 582, 620. Rapport du comité spécial sur les causes des troubles du Territoire du Nord-Ouest en 1869–70 (Ottawa, 1874), 114–19. R.B. Mitchell, Medicine in Manitoba; the story of its beginnings ([Winnipeg, 1955]), 42. J. H. O'Donnell, Manitoba as I saw it from 1869 to date, with flash-lights on the first Riel Rebellion (Winnipeg and Toronto, 1909), 60.

BURNABY, ROBERT, commission merchant and legislator; b. 30 Nov. 1828 at Woodthorpe, Leicestershire, Eng., fourth son of the Reverend Thomas Burnaby and Sarah Meares; d. a bachelor, 10 Jan. 1878, at Woodthorpe.

Robert Burnaby came to British Columbia at the end of 1858 as an experienced civil servant from Her Majesty's Customs Office in London, and with a personal introduction to Governor James DOUGLAS from Sir Edward Bulwer-Lytton. Burnaby's first year on the Pacific coast was a busy one: he spent a short time as private secretary to Richard Clement Moody*, commander of the Royal Engineers at New Westminster; he explored for coal with Walter Moberly* at Burrard Inlet; and he made a short visit to San Francisco.

During this year he also founded the firm of Henderson and Burnaby, commission merchants, in partnership with Edward Henderson, an old school friend from Christ's Hospital and a man of means, who managed the London office. This type of business was precarious since the distance from sources of supply and risks in transportation encouraged overtrading and excessive speculation. The death of Henderson in 1865 and the general economic depression in Vancouver Island and British Columbia brought the firm to an end – a failure caused in part apparently by unwise investment in real estate. Burnaby then embarked upon a real estate and insurance business of his own. The exigencies of a mercantile career seem to have overwhelmed this man who, by upbringing and training, was more suited to a position in government service.

Robert Burnaby was intensely interested in the welfare of Vancouver Island and British Columbia, and did all in his power to promote stable economic conditions. Before the end of his second year in Victoria he was elected to the Legislative Assembly of Vancouver Island for the districts of Esquimalt and Metchosin, and he served his constituents well for five years. He was one of the founders of the Victoria Chamber of Commerce. During an 1866 visit to London on private business he attended a meeting of prominent Victoria merchants and officials who strongly favoured the union of the two colonies and other measures for developing and improving their economic prospects. This group carried its resolutions to the secretary of state for the colonies.

Burnaby was an active freemason and helped found the First Victoria Lodge in 1860. Among his recreational pursuits was a love of drama, and in 1863 he served as president of Victoria's Amateur Dramatic Association. Burnaby numbered among his intimate friends Colonel Moody, Arthur Thomas BUSHBY, Henry Pering Pellew Crease*, Judge Matthew Baillie Begbie*, Edward Graham ALSTON, and Thomas Elwyn*. In 1869 severe ill health caused Burnaby's retirement and five years later his return to England. Friends arranged for him to travel in the Hudson's Bay Company bark Lady Lampson; they later presented her captain, James Gaudin, with a generous purse in gratitude for the attention he had paid the ailing Burnaby during the voyage.

Early in 1878 news reached Victoria that this "prominent and much respected merchant" had died. An honest, conscientious man of spirit, a clear-headed thinker, a "power" in his masonic lodge, a lucid speaker, full of fun, and clever, Burnaby has been fittingly commemorated in a number of place names in British Columbia including a lake, a strait, an island, a municipality, two mountain ranges, and finally Burnaby Mountain, the seat of Simon Fraser University.

MADGE WOLFENDEN

PABC, Robert Burnaby correspondence; Edward Bulwer-Lytton to James Douglas, letter of introduction, 8 Oct. 1858, testimonial re: Robert Burnaby. "Robert Burnaby and municipality," Art, Historical, and Scientific Assoc. of Vancouver, B.C., Museum and Art Notes, I (September 1949), 19–21. W. M. Draycot, "Early history of the Burnaby family," Art, Historical, and Scientific Assoc. of Vancouver, B.C., Museum and Art Notes, I (September 1949), 11–14; "The early history of the Burnaby family," Burnaby Advertiser, 17, 24, 31 July, 7 Aug. 1947. George Green and G. H. Slater, "The biography of Robert Burnaby," Burnaby Advertiser, 21, 28 Aug., 4 Sept. 1947. "Journal of Arthur Thomas Bushby" (Blakey Smith). R. L. Reid, Grand Lodge of British Columbia A.F. & A.M.: historical notes and biographical sketches, 1848–1935 (Vancouver, n.d.), 7–8. G. H. Slater, "Robert Burnaby . . . ," Most Worshipful Grand Lodge of Ancient, Free and Accepted Masons of British Columbia, Proceedings, 1944, 137–53.

BUSHBY, ARTHUR THOMAS, public servant and amateur musician; b. 2 March 1835 in London, England, younger son of Joseph Bushby and Anne Sarah Stedman; d. 18 May 1875 in New Westminster, B.C.

Arthur Thomas Bushby's father was a highly respectable London merchant with West Indian estates. His mother, an accomplished linguist, was responsible for the first English translation (1863) of Hans Christian Andersen's The ice maiden, besides many other translations from Danish and Spanish, and was a frequent contributor of fiction to the New Monthly Magazine. Educated in England and on the continent, Bushby had become an exceedingly well trained and versatile amateur musician before he left London in 1858 to seek his fortune in the gold colony of British Columbia; it would seem indeed that he felt more at home in the musical world than in the business pursuits in which he had been employed under his father's direction. When he arrived in Victoria by way of Panama on Christmas Day 1858, he intended to establish himself as a merchant; but after one abortive attempt to set up a steam sawmill he entered government service where he proved himself "an upright, consistent and fearless public officer."

On 8 Feb. 1859 Governor James DOUGLAS (to whom he had brought a letter of introduction from the governor and committee of the Hudson's Bay Company in London) appointed him private secretary to Judge Matthew Baillie Begbie* – "just the thing I want," says Bushby's journal – and he was delighted to accompany Begbie on his first strenuous circuit on the mainland, acting as "clerk of the court, assize clerk, registrar, clerk of the arraigns &c" though he admits that he had never even been in a court of justice before. On 4 May 1859 he was officially appointed registrar of the Supreme Court of B.C., and on 8 May 1862, "in consequence of high testimony borne to his character & services by the Judge," Douglas appointed him registrar general of deeds for British Columbia at a salary of £500 a year. This promotion enabled him to marry, on 8 May 1862, the governor's third daughter, Agnes, to whom he had been unofficially engaged since 1859. He built a house for her in New Westminster, then the capital of British Columbia, and here the couple spent what seems to have been an unusually happy married life until "dear Arthur's" untimely death 13 years later. There were five children, four daughters (one of whom died in infancy) and one son.

Bushby held the office of registrar general until 1 June 1870, when he was replaced by Edward Graham ALSTON and himself became postmaster general (he had been appointed acting postmaster general on 12 April 1866). He was also registrar of joint stock companies (14 May 1866), justice of the peace (11 Jan. 1867), a commissioner of savings banks (18 June 1869), and a member of the Legislative Council (1869–70). He remained postmaster general until confederation when the dominion government took over the postal service of the province. In the meantime however Bushby had received his commission as county court judge (20 July 1869) and stipendiary magistrate (1 Aug. 1869) and had taken full charge of the District of New Westminster. As resident magistrate he was concerned with the administration of the jail, and both his humane feelings and his conscientious discharge of his duty are evidenced in his various representations to the government. He was indeed, as Douglas said, "a most worthy man, careful and attentive to the duties of his office," and he was both respected and loved wherever he went. In the fall of 1864 he travelled on horseback with the colonial secretary over the roughest of trails to the newly discovered Kootenay mines, and the party brought back safely from Wild Horse Creek (now Wild Horse River) what he calls "the treasure – some 70 lbs weight of gold dust." In the winter of 1872–73 he took the place of the resident magistrate in the Cariboo, winning the goodwill of all in his official capacity and the warm thanks of the Cariboo Amateur Dramatic Association at Williams Creek for his musical help in their charitable benefits. In December 1874 he went to Jervis Inlet, where he managed to settle a dispute with the Seechelt (Sechelt) Indians to the satisfaction of all concerned.

Bushby also played a prominent part in community affairs in New Westminster. He served on the Royal Columbian Hospital Board, 1860–71, and was appointed to the board of the public library in 1868. He was on the first board of school trustees, 1867, and was appointed inspector of schools for the District of New Westminster on 2 May 1870. He was also elected the first ensign of the New Westminster Volunteer Rifle Corps in 1863. In more purely social matters he was equally in demand, especially, of course, because of his musical abilities and his generous disposition. On 26 Jan. 1859 he had helped some 40 music lovers including Lumley FRANKLIN to found the Victoria Philharmonic Society, the first amateur musical organization west of the Canadian Rockies, and his fine tenor voice continued to be heard at concerts for worthy causes until the end of his life. At the New Westminster local dances he played violin or piano, occasionally even cornet and drum, and in the May Day celebrations for which the city was already becoming known he took an active part, being immensely popular with the children. In 1873 he tried acting for the first time, and was promptly elected president of the dramatic club. In a more serious vein Bushby was an exceedingly valuable supporter of Holy Trinity Church (Church of England). As his journal demonstrates, the firm foundation of his life was a simple Christian faith which expressed itself in all manner of good works, from acting as churchwarden, 1860–71, superintending the Sunday school and training the choir, to "pulling a bell" when needed and collecting pew rents.

Bushby's journal makes abundantly clear that he never spared himself, either in his official or in his private life, and he was only 40 when he died. He was buried in the Church of England cemetery at Sapperton (now part of New Westminster) with every possible mark of respect, and a memorial window was erected in Holy Trinity Church with the inscription "The memory of the Just is blessed."

DOROTHY BLAKEY SMITH

PABC, Bushby family papers; Arthur Thomas Bushby

papers; James Douglas, "A confidential report upon the character and qualifications of the principal officers of this government," Douglas to the Duke of Newcastle, 18 June 1863. British Columbia, Blue Books, 1859–70 (copies in PABC); Legislative Council, Journals, 1869–70. British Columbia Government Gazette (Victoria), 1871. Colonist (Victoria), 1858–75. Government Gazette (New Westminster, Victoria), 1866–70. Mainland Guardian (New Westminster, B.C.), 22 May 1875. Victoria Daily Standard, 20 May 1875. Victoria Gazette, 1858–59. R. E. Gosnell, "Sixty years of progress; British Columbia, portraits of some of those who laid its foundations . . . ," in E. O. S. Scholefield and R. E. Gosnell, A history of British Columbia (Vancouver, Victoria, 1913). "Journal of Arthur Thomas Bushby" (Blakey Smith).

C

CALF SHIRT. See ONISTAH-SOKAKSIN

CAMERON, ANGUS, North West Company partner and HBC chief factor; b. in 1782 or 1783 in the parish of Kirkmichael, Banffshire, Scotland, elder son of James Cameron and Janet Farquharson; d. at Nairn, Scotland, 11 Aug. 1876.

Although his uncle, Æneas Cameron*, was a partner of the North West Company in command of the Timiskaming District, Angus Cameron came to Canada on his own in the spring of 1801, engaging as a clerk with the company on 2 June. He arrived at Fort Timiskaming with the June canoes, surprising his uncle, who sent him a few months later to Matawagamingue, a frontier post on present-day Mattagami Lake, Ont. Apart from his being "an indifferent schollar and not very eager to improve himself," Æneas found him entirely satisfactory "in every other respect." Angus soon became master of Matawagamingue, remaining there until he succeeded to Fort Timiskaming in 1822.

During these years Cameron acquired tremendous influence over the Indians, whom he ruled autocratically but with genuine sympathy and understanding. After 1813 the Hudson's Bay Company had only one post in the Timiskaming District – Kenogamissi Lake, some 30 miles below Matawagamingue – and Cameron's outstanding success in opposing them there was no doubt chiefly responsible for his becoming commander of the district when Alexander McDougall* retired from Fort Abitibi in 1816. A few years later William McGillivray* was to describe Cameron as "the best trader" in the Southern Department, asserting that even as late as 1821 the combined Timiskaming and Lake Superior returns were valued at £20,000. Unlike the English servants, the Timiskaming traders remained for long periods at the same posts, and the loyalty of the Indians to them contributed greatly to the defeat of the HBC in that district and also slowed Timiskaming's orientation to Moose Factory after the union of 1821. The Indians' personal attachment to Cameron himself – and later to his nephew James Cameron* – also largely accounts for the failure in the area of early independent traders from Canada.

Cameron became a partner in the NWC about 1816. His contempt for his English neighbours made it hard for him to accept the union in 1821; his resentment doubtless was increased by his restriction, as a recent partner, to a chief tradership, despite the Montreal agents' preference for him over many of his seniors. Subsequently the agents' failure to notify him of Timiskaming's transfer from their control to the Southern Department led this proud, uncompromising man into a dispute with the governor and council at Moose Factory. He won his battle to retain command of Fort Timiskaming but, after inheriting a considerable fortune from Æneas in 1822, he apparently decided to retire on becoming eligible for a chief trader's interest. With this in mind he bought the late Alexander McDougall's farm at Lachine. Going to Montreal in the summer of 1826, however, he was faced with the bankruptcy of the agents with whom Æneas' legacy and all his own savings were deposited. Governor George Simpson*, not yet personally acquainted with him but aware of his importance to Timiskaming, suggested that he cancel his resignation. This Cameron was not inclined to do but, at Simpson's request, he did return to Fort Timiskaming for the 1826–27 season.

The following summer brought further troubles; the McDougall heirs, who had discovered they were not credited in the agents' accounts with the money Cameron had paid them, sued him, and the affair dragged on until settled out of court in 1835. Allowed bail within Lower Canada, Cameron re-entered the company's service and Simpson appointed him to Lac des Deux Montagnes, where trading opposition was rampant. His energy, skill, and amicable relationship with both the Iroquois and the Algonkin villages, as well as with the Roman Catholic clergy, soon led to improvement and by 1831 his principal competitors had given up. Three years later, after petty traders had settled on Lake Timagami, Simpson sent him back to Timiskaming, giving him "carte blanche" in its direction. Again he quickly disposed of opposition, and continued progress in the district spoke, in Simpson's own word, "volumes" in his favour. Nevertheless since the preferment list was crowded with the overflow of the union he had to wait until 1838 to become chief factor.

By this time lumberers had reached Timiskaming's borders and in 1840, in an effort to discourage them, Simpson and Cameron began lumbering for the company on Lake Timiskaming. This experiment terminated on Cameron's retirement three years later, the losses having outstripped any possible value. Cameron himself now felt that the sooner the company exhausted Timiskaming the better, although in fact the post was to remain profitable longer than he seems to have anticipated.

Cameron returned to Scotland in the autumn of 1843; his three children preceded him but their mother, probably an Indian woman, of whom nothing is known, remained in Timiskaming. The following spring he bought the estate of Firhall, near Nairn, abandoning all thoughts of settling in Canada. In April 1845 he married Elizabeth Morison, who died in August 1846 after giving birth to a son. Like his uncle Æneas, Cameron suffered greatly from rheumatism, apparently a legacy of their years in "the wilds of Canada." Despite the affliction he was the longest surviving of the NWC partners.

When Angus Cameron, the most important of the succession of Camerons to command Timiskaming, went to the fort at the turn of the 19th century, the district was isolated by its geographical situation and by the deliberate policy of the NWC agents even from the rest of the Montreal trade. When he retired 42 years later, the Canadian presence was making itself felt; Roman Catholic missionaries were visiting the posts and lumberers had pushed beyond Lake Timiskaming. Like the best fur trade officers, Cameron combined initiative, managerial ability, and understanding of the Indians with the virtues of economy, honesty, and sobriety, and he played a decisive role in Timiskaming's most prosperous years, under both the NWC and the HBC. Even after he retired, his influence lingered on, to the company's advantage, for a decade or more.

ELAINE ALLAN MITCHELL

Cameron family papers, in possession of the author with restricted copies in PAO. HBC Arch. B.99/a/1–23 (Kenogamissi journals); B.99/e/1–8 (Reports); B.239/c/1 (York Factory correspondence); D.4/5–127 (George Simpson's correspondence outward); D.5/2–52 (George Simpson's correspondence inward).

CAMERON, DAVID, first chief justice of the Supreme Court of the colony of Vancouver Island; b. autumn 1804 in Perthshire, Scotland; d. 14 May 1872 near Victoria, B.C.

David Cameron spent his youth in Perth, Scotland, where relatives financed him as a cloth merchant in 1824. Cameron was "too liberal in giving credit" and the business failed. In 1830 he left for Demerara where he became the overseer of a sugar plantation, and in 1838 he acquired a small property of his own on the Essequibo River. He suffered serious losses, which he blamed on the effects of emancipation. He surrendered his property, and in 1851 applied to the courts for a legal discharge from his liabilities. Cameron was by then managing a sugar plantation "with a fair income, and every comfort consistent with [his] position," yet this application was unopposed. During his residence in Demerara, Cameron married Cecilia Eliza Douglas Cowan, James DOUGLAS' sister, whose first husband had evidently deserted her. Douglas seems to have been involved in the offer to Cameron of an appointment as Hudson's Bay Company agent at the Nanaimo coal mines on Vancouver Island, which HBC Governor Andrew Colvile made in a letter of 1 March 1853. Principally because his wife's failing health required a more temperate climate, Cameron accepted the position, at £150 yearly plus board. The Camerons, with their daughter Edith Rebecca, who was about ten years old, arrived in Victoria aboard the Vancouver in July 1853.

In September 1853 the Legislative Council of Vancouver Island authorized the creation of a Court of Common Pleas with jurisdiction in civil cases involving claims between £100 and £2,000; their action followed complaints by Governor Douglas of improper decisions by the Justice's Court. The council appointed Cameron judge for the new court at £100 per annum and requested him to draw up its rules and regulations. On 2 December the council established a Supreme Court of Civil Justice for the colony, to deal with cases of £50 or more, and right of appeal to governor and council. Cameron was appointed judge, his salary of £100 to be paid from duties on licensed ale-houses.

Opponents of the dominant "Family-Company Compact" at once seized upon Cameron's appointment, complaining that the council members were mostly HBC servants, that Cameron was an HBC employee and personally tied to Douglas, and that he lacked legal training. They were led by Thomas Skinner* and Edward Edwards Langford*, two of the four appointees to the first Justices' Court, and by James COOPER, a member of the council who had originally supported Cameron, and the Reverend Robert John Staines*, chaplain to the HBC and Victoria's schoolmaster.

On 5 December Cameron heard a complaint by Emanuel Douillet against Staines, who, with a magistrate's warrant from Skinner, had entered his premises to remove pigs which Staines said had been stolen (or strayed) from his Metchosin farm. Finally, on 2 Feb. 1854, Staines was exonerated and Douillet was fined and imprisoned; but Staines felt that by acting on Douillet's complaint Cameron had attempted "to convict the innocent and screen the guilty." Meanwhile, on 10 January, 90 settlers had signed a petition to Douglas protesting the establishment of the Supreme Court and particularly Cameron's appointment. But on the following day 54 freeholders protested against the petition, urging Douglas not to comply with the wishes of those who, having "little or no vested interest in the island," sought "to rescind important enactments framed expressly to protect property" thereby jeopardizing law and order. On 4 February a public meeting, chaired by Cooper, subscribed $480 to send Staines to England. The petitions he was to carry to Queen Victoria and the Duke of Newcastle [Henry Pelham Clinton], secretary of state for the colonies, were signed by James Cooper and 69 others on 1 March. Her majesty was requested to launch a strict inquiry into the establishment of the court and the appointment of Cameron. The petition to the Duke of Newcastle cited Cameron's "improperly close family connexion with the Governor," his lack of legal training, his "notorious and gross partiality, acrimony, malice and indecorum," his position as HBC clerk at Nanaimo, and his strenuous effort "to defeat the ends of justice" and "most vehement exertions on the side of knavery" (references to the recently concluded case of Douillet v. Staines). Staines died en route in a shipwreck, but on 20 April 1854 the petitions were sent to England.

In December Douglas received a letter from Sir George Grey, Newcastle's successor, requesting a report. Douglas staunchly defended both the establishment of the court and Cameron's temporary appointment, and concluded that the petitioners' "grievances were less real than imaginary." There matters rested until by order in council of 4 April 1856 the Supreme Court of Civil Justice of the Colony of Vancouver's Island was established, and on 25 April Cameron was confirmed as chief justice without jurisdiction in criminal cases. Soon after receiving his warrant, Cameron resigned his HBC office. The HBC properly felt colonial officials should be paid by the local legislature, but as the latter did not act Cameron continued at his 1853 salary until 8 Aug. 1860 when the assembly awarded him £800 annually, payable from the colony's land revenues.

On 17 Feb. 1857 the Legislative Council gave unanimous consent to Cameron's "Rules and Manner of Proceeding to be observed in the Supreme Court of Civil Justice of Vancouver's Island." The Victoria Gazette published the "Rules" in book form in 1858, the first book to be printed in the colony. Cameron was a member of Governor Douglas' party which proclaimed the establishment of the Colony of British Columbia at Fort Langley on 19 Nov. 1858. On 6 July 1859 Douglas appointed the chief justice to the Legislative Council of the Colony of Vancouver Island where at the time of his retirement he was serving as president.

The reform party had not rested in its efforts to embarrass Cameron. In London in May 1857 James Cooper testified before the parliamentary committee investigating HBC affairs that Cameron was unqualified for his post because "before he can decide upon a case, he has to refer to his books even in the most common case." Demands for his removal increased after Amor De Cosmos* began publishing the British Colonist in December 1858. De Cosmos, who relished the courtroom "rows" between the attorney general and the chief justice, was particularly alarmed in June 1861 when Cameron stated his opinion that certain acts of the assembly were contrary to law. The legislature sought to force Cameron's removal by refusing to permit bills to go to a third reading, and a motion to inquire into Cameron's seeming threat to legislative independence lost narrowly.

Cameron, with Douglas' support, withstood these attacks, but E. E. Langford was to cause special difficulties in the 1860s. At the opening session of the first Legislative Assembly of Vancouver Island on 12 Aug. 1856, Governor Douglas had appointed Cameron to administer the oath. Langford, after receiving the oath, protested the property qualifications for office holding. Unable to produce certification of qualification he was denied a seat in the assembly. In late 1859 he stood again and in his election address made ill-considered attacks on the governor, the council, and particularly the chief justice. A biting parody of Langford's address, possibly written by Judge Matthew Baillie Begbie*, was printed and widely distributed on New Year's Day 1860. It so discredited Langford that he withdrew from the election on 5 January and initiated a libel suit for

£2,000 damages against the printer. The suit was heard before Cameron on 16 and 17 April and a nonsuit was entered. But Cameron charged Langford with contempt for refusing to answer relevant questions and ordered a 24-hour imprisonment and a £10 fine. On the following day Cameron received a threatening letter from Langford describing the proceedings as "vile and illegal." Langford returned to England in January 1861; in June he submitted a complaint to the Duke of Newcastle in which he made charges against government officials on Vancouver Island and characterized his trial as "improper, illegal and vexatious."

In May and June 1862 Langford forwarded letters to Newcastle concerning Cameron's early financial difficulties and charged that Cameron was a man of obscure origins, without legal training, and an "uncertified bankrupt." Douglas, on request, in February 1863 forwarded statements from those charged, and explained that in 1853 he had chosen Cameron in preference to Langford, the senior magistrate, because the latter was "singularly deficient in judgment, temper, and discretion, and was much inferior both in legal and general knowledge to Mr. Cameron." He repeated an earlier statement that Cameron's appointment was originally to be temporary, and he offered to ask for the chief justice's resignation if the colonial secretary desired it. Cameron's own explanation of his personal affairs was accepted by Newcastle as "very straightforward and satisfactory," but he was not prepared to say whether Cameron should continue in office. Langford's complaint against Cameron did not proceed any further with the government and he next tried the House of Commons. The Colonial Office was asked for the relevant correspondence but no other action was taken and Langford was finally defeated in his efforts to obtain redress from what he considered to be arbitrary government and political privilege.

The reform party of the colony had again failed to dislodge Cameron, who emerged from the sordid affair with his dignity and his job. However, it was clear that a professionally qualified judge was needed as the affairs of the courts became more complex. Amor De Cosmos introduced a motion before the assembly on 4 Feb. 1864 requesting the governor to pension Cameron, who was to be replaced as chief justice by a qualified barrister from England. The motion passed, with Cameron's pension to be £500 yearly. Cameron's opinions were solicited by the colonial secretary, William Alexander George Young, the husband of his step-daughter Cecilia Eliza Cowan, and Cameron assented to the resolution provided that its terms were embodied in an act of the legislature. The act was passed in March, and upon the arrival of his successor, Joseph Needham, Cameron tendered his resignation to Governor Arthur Edward Kennedy* on 11 Oct. 1865.

On 2 Jan. 1867 it was announced that Governor Frederick Seymour* had appointed Cameron a justice of the peace, a position he held until January 1871. He served on the Board of Education for Vancouver Island, as a road commissioner for the districts of Esquimalt and Sooke, and as one of three commissioners appointed to carry out the provisions of "The Tax Sale Repeal Ordinance, 1867, Amendment Act." For the third time in his life, Cameron faced severe financial difficulties, and on 20 Jan. 1871 he filed a petition of bankruptcy in the Supreme Court of British Columbia. Cameron's debts totalled $22,055.08, and the creditors received an assignment of £150 from his £500 pension as well as his life assurance policy and a large portion of his properties in the Esquimalt District. In October 1871 Cameron was one of eight candidates nominated to represent Esquimalt in the legislature. He came forward, he said, to assist in working out responsible government and to promote the transition from the provincial to the Canadian tariff, which he felt would lower the cost of wheat and flour. He ran third in a final field of six candidates, losing the second seat for the district by only three votes. De Cosmos, now editing the Victoria Daily Standard, renewed old animosities in an editorial entitled "The Living and the Dead Politicians" in which he accused Cameron of being "up for sale again," resurrected by the "ring," and of coming forward "to fill Mr. Cameron's empty pocket; not to serve the country."

This was the last public outcry against Cameron, for on 14 May 1872 he died at his home, Belmont, after a severe attack of gout from which he had suffered for at least a year. Too late, the British Colonist faintly praised Cameron as "a man respected by all who knew him – a man without an enemy, and one who may be considered one of the founders of the prosperity of the Province."

WILLIAM R. SAMPSON

PABC, British Columbia, Supreme Court, Orders in Bankruptcy, March 1870–May 1875, "In the Supreme Court of British Columbia, in bankruptcy in the matter of David Cameron a bankrupt"; David Cameron papers; Colonial correspondence, David Cameron files. G.B., Parl., House of Commons paper, 1863, XXXVIII, 507, pp.487–540, Miscellaneous papers relating to Vancouver Island, 1848–1863. . . . Minutes of the Council of Vancouver Island, commencing August 30th, 1851, and terminating . . . February 6th, 1861, ed. E. O. S. Scholefield (Archives of British Columbia, Memoir no.2, Victoria, 1918). Daily British Colonist (Victoria), 1 Jan., 12, 19 Feb., 10 June, 21, 29 Nov. 1859; 26 April, 4 Aug. 1860; 22 Jan., 6, 7 June, 2, 3, 12, 16 July 1861; 16 Feb., 17 March, 21 April, 27 May, 8 Oct. 1864; 12 Oct. 1865; 2 April, 6 Aug. 1866; 9 Nov. 1868; 27 May 1869; 15 June, 10 Aug., 13, 19, 28 Oct. 1871; 15 May 1872. W. K. Lamb, "Some notes on the Douglas family," BCHQ, XVII (1953), 41–51. S. G. Pettit, "The trials and tribulations of Edward Edwards Langford," BCHQ, XVII (1953), 5–40. G. H. Slater, "Rev. Robert John Staines: pioneer priest, pedagogue, and political agitator," BCHQ, XIV (1950), 187–240.

CAMERON, JOHN HILLYARD, lawyer, businessman, politician, Orangeman, and prominent Church of England layman; b. at Blendecques, France, 14 April 1817, son of Angus Cameron; d. at Toronto, Ont., 14 Nov. 1876.

Angus Cameron, a soldier in the 79th Highlanders during the Napoleonic wars, remained after 1815 with the British forces in France, where his son John Hillyard was born. In 1825, when Angus was posted to Kingston, the family emigrated to Upper Canada. Hillyard attended Kilkenny College in Ireland, then at Kingston the Midland District grammar school and a co-educational school, operated by the Reverend John Cruikshank. He was briefly a schoolmate of Oliver Mowat* and John A. Macdonald*.

Angus was posted to York (Toronto) in 1831, and John Hillyard was sent to Upper Canada College. He then began the study of law under Henry John Boulton*, a Family Compact Tory. The rebellion of 1837 broke out as his legal training was coming to an end; he was a captain in the Queen's Rangers, and on 4 Dec. 1837 Colonel James FitzGibbon* sent him to Toronto to warn of the approach of William Lyon Mackenzie*'s forces. After serving briefly in the Toronto area he helped guard the Niagara frontier. Cameron was only 20 at the time, and the rebellion almost certainly helped to strengthen his conservative outlook.

Cameron returned to Toronto and was called to the bar of Upper Canada in 1838. He immediately formed a partnership with J. Godfrey Spragge*. In the 1840s Cameron built a lucrative law practice and a province-wide reputation. His work included criminal cases, and he produced two legal compendia. In 1840 he was a commissioner for the revision of the statutes of Upper Canada, and, as reporter to the Court of Queen's Bench in Canada West (still popularly called Upper Canada) from 1843 to 1846, he was responsible for inaugurating the Upper Canada Law Reports; he was appointed a QC in 1846. He was chairman of the 1856–57 commission for the consolidation of the statutes of Upper Canada. In 1860 he was elected treasurer of the Law Society of Upper Canada, and was called to the bar of Quebec in 1869. In 1843 he had married Elizabeth, the third daughter of H. J. Boulton. She died in 1844, leaving a son, and in 1849 Cameron married Ellen Mallet, daughter of an American general. They had two sons and two daughters.

Politics, a sure route to public recognition, was an easy one for a lawyer to take, and Cameron entered both municipal and provincial politics in 1846. In Toronto he was elected alderman for St Andrew's ward for 1846–47 and 1851–52, and for St John's ward in 1854 (when his ward colleague was Ogle Robert GOWAN) and 1855.

In the provincial sphere, Cameron gravitated naturally to the Conservative group. William Henry DRAPER, a "moderate Conservative," was government leader, but only by maintaining a precarious balance in the Legislative Assembly. Draper was dependent upon the Upper Canadian moderates and Tories elected after Lord Metcalfe*'s emotional appeals in the election of 1844, and they were far from a homogeneous group. The moderates refused to follow the Tories, and the Tories in turn bitterly resented Draper's support for the union of Upper and Lower Canada in 1841. The Tory faction was largely unrepresented in the Executive Council in order to retain the moderates' support; it stood by Draper, but only because to desert him would be to betray Metcalfe and his policies. Moreover, Draper had virtually no personal following, and attracted few French Canadians.

Within this near-vacuum of leadership Cameron seemed an attractive young politician. Reasonably moderate, he was respected as a lawyer and an able administrator. His popularity in Toronto might be sufficient to check the Tories within their stronghold. Although Cameron, as counsel to the Corporation of King's College, had opposed Draper's university bill of 1845, he was immediately offered the non-ministerial post of solicitor general for Upper Canada. His acceptance on 1 July 1846 was a move hardly calculated to please the Tory faction: Draper had just dismissed a Tory leader, Henry Sherwood*, from that post "because he [had] not given the administration his whole-hearted support." In later years Cameron was taunted with the epithet, "extreme Conservative," but in 1846 he clearly regarded himself as a follower of Draper, not of Sherwood. Cameron was asked to prepare two bills, one for a "uniform system of trying contested Elections," the other for the "better administration of Justice in Upper Canada." He had to be in the assembly in order to present his bills: the constituency of Cornwall was opened and Cameron was elected in August 1846.

With Sherwood, his potential successor, removed, Draper turned to a personal objective – the post of puisne judge of the Court of Queen's Bench in Upper Canada. On the anticipated death of the incumbent, Christopher Hagerman*, Draper promptly resigned as attorney general, and was appointed judge on 28 May 1847. Draper had hoped to choose his own successor and first asked Cameron to take over as government leader and attorney general west. He declined, arguing "that retaining [the] position of solicitor-general of Upper Canada will best serve the interests of the Province." Sherwood then became Draper's successor. Cameron consoled himself with promotion to a seat on the Executive Council, obtained on 22 May 1847.

The invitation to lead the Upper Canadian Conservatives was the peak of Cameron's political career. But he was not, in fact, in a position to succeed Draper. Cameron was asked because Draper was reluctant to surrender to Sherwood without at least token resistance. Draper's following was small and his choice limited to a handful of men, notably Cameron, John A. Macdonald, and William Morris*. None of these had the identification with Metcalfe's policies that enabled Draper to exercise some control over the Tories. Led by Allan MacNab* and Sherwood, the Tory members, the largest group of government supporters, were, consequently, now in control.

The political outlook, however, was unpleasant for the Conservatives. The new governor general, Lord Elgin [Bruce*], had no intention of bolstering up Sherwood's regime when the assembly was dissolved late in 1847. In the ensuing elections the government suffered overwhelming electoral defeat by the Reformers under Robert Baldwin* and Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine*. Cameron lost in Kent to Malcolm CAMERON and retained Cornwall by only 16 votes amid "evidence of gross irregularities." With his colleagues he left office on 10 May 1848.

Cameron was one of the few Conservative leaders to survive the election, and in 1850 George Duck described him as "the great gun of the Tories. . . ." But with the Conservatives virtually obliterated in Lower Canada and reduced to a small rump in Upper Canada, revival would require an alliance with French Canadians and policies attractive to moderate opinion in Upper Canada. Cameron could not provide this kind of leadership – he had no important ties with French Canada or its leaders, and his prominent role in the Church of England as a close colleague of Bishop John Strachan* and a strong defender of the church's claims to the clergy reserves alienated moderate opinion in Upper Canada. Dedicated to his church's claims to sectarian educational rights and closely identified with MacNab and Toronto conservatism, Cameron, though able, energetic, and popular in many quarters, was not palatable to most Upper Canadian moderates.

Confusion within Reform ranks after 1849, moreover, did not assist the Conservatives. Instead, new Reform leaders, Francis Hincks* and Augustin-Norbert Morin*, won an easy electoral victory in 1851. Cameron was not a candidate. He may have wanted rest, having been ill several times during the 1840s. The less taxing municipal sphere occupied him politically until 1854. In that year he obtained control of the Toronto British Colonist from Samuel Thompson*, whom he retained as editor. According to Thompson, "It had been a semi-weekly paper; he [Cameron] offered to furnish five thousand dollars a year to make it a daily journal, independent of party control; stipulated for no personal influence over its editorial views, leaving them entirely in my discretion. . . ." The arrangement continued until 1857.

Cameron contested the Toronto seat in 1854. He and John George Bowes* won, defeating Henry Sherwood, William Henry BOULTON, and George Percival RIDOUT. Cameron was now the senior member for Upper Canada's largest and wealthiest town. His return coincided with the formation of the Morin–MacNab–Macdonald Liberal-Conservative administration, and Macdonald, who had earlier dismissed Cameron as lacking in "general intelligence, and . . . [as] altogether devoid of political reading," successfully excluded him from the ministry.

Yet, in the crucial question facing the ministry, that of the clergy reserves, Cameron, striving to save as much as possible for the Church of England, differed from Macdonald only in degree. Macdonald was willing to see the favoured churches retain much of their income, and, in the settlement of 1854 whereby clergymen with recognized rights to income agreed to commute their claims, the Church of England, though losing its reserve lands, acquired a large capital fund which accrued to its benefit as the annuitants died. Cameron was given considerable credit for his church's success; he had worked closely with Strachan, and during the protracted and delicate negotiations with many of the annuitants he represented both the government and the church. His vigour in upholding the vested rights of privilege, and his refusal to support the coalition in the introduction of an elective upper house, however, lumped him in many minds with the "old Tories." His stand on these issues alienated Macdonald, who was further irritated in 1856 when Cameron supported George Brown in the latter's dispute with Macdonald over the results of the committee Brown had chaired in 1849 investigating conditions at the Portsmouth Penitentiary.

The "Corrigan Incident" gave Cameron an opportunity to intensify his campaign against the coalition. In February 1856 a jury found seven Roman Catholics not guilty of Robert Corrigan*'s murder at Lotbinière, and many Upper Canadian Protestants screamed indignation. Cameron took their lead and on 7 March moved in parliament a resolution asking for publication of Judge Jean-François-Joseph Duval*'s charge to the jury, which many Protestants felt had been irregular. It carried but the government, after winning a vote of confidence, refused to resign or to produce Duval's charge. The damage had nevertheless been done: divided internally and battered from without by Cameron, Brown, Grits, and Rouges, MacNab's government was disintegrating. MacNab was forced out as premier in May 1856 and Macdonald became leader of Upper Canada's Conservatives. John Charles Dent* was doubtless correct when he commented that "Mr. Cameron was very willing to have greatness thrust upon him. . . ." Cameron was not, however, a viable alternative to MacNab. The considerations that militated against his success in 1847–51 remained factors of real importance. The "Corrigan Incident" indicated the extent to which he would make use of religious and racist passion to build a regional following in Upper Canada. French Canada was outside his range of potential appeal. Cameron now "went into continuing opposition," with an occasional and small following of disgruntled backbenchers. Whatever leadership aspirations he retained were smashed by the financial panic of 1857.

Like many of his contemporaries, Cameron had developed an interest in transportation ventures. He served as a director of the Toronto and Guelph Railway (absorbed in 1856 by the Grand Trunk Railway) and as solicitor for the Great Western Railway, and was part-owner of the Niagara Falls Suspension Bridge Company. He was also heavily involved in insurance. He helped found the Canada Life Assurance Company in 1847 and was elected a director. He was chosen president of the Provincial Insurance Company in 1859, a position he held for many years, and later served as chairman of the Canadian board of the Edinburgh Life Insurance Company, and director of the Canadian Life Assurance Company and the Beaver Mutual Fire Insurance Association.

Among his earliest business ventures was the purchase of large tracts of land in the Toronto area, but it was heavy investments in speculative English securities, through the brokerage firm of Duncan Sherman and Company of New York, that made him a wealthy man. His paper profits in the boom of the mid-1850s were enormous. But in the fall of 1857 investment money dried up after a financial panic and an international depression followed. Canada was hard-hit because of her orgy of land and railway speculation during the early 1850s and a crop failure which coincided with the business crisis. Duncan Sherman and Company collapsed, and as Samuel Thompson explained: "Drafts on London were dishonoured, and Mr. Cameron's bankers there, to protect themselves, sold without notice the securities he had placed in their hands. . . ."

Cameron's losses reached the staggering sum of £100,000. Although he must have realized the futility of his decision, he promised to repay his debts pound for pound. What assets remained were liquidated or mortgaged, and much of his land was sold. Using Toronto properties as collateral, he borrowed large sums from the Church Society, in transactions later attacked as too much in his favour, and from the Commercial Bank. For the remainder of his life Cameron carried the burden of these heavy debts. All other interests suffered as he strove, chiefly through the practice of law, to raise large sums of money. When he died his liabilities still exceeded his assets by $200,000.

His political career also suffered immediate decline. The Colonist could no longer be supported; instead it became an organ of the Macdonald–George-Étienne Cartier regime. Much of his political independence vanished; within a few months he started to receive legal patronage from Macdonald.

One of Cameron's strongest political bases had been his connection with the Church of England. Deeply committed to its welfare, and through it to education, he had served both causes in a variety of ways. With an early law partner, James McGill Strachan, the bishop's son, he represented the missionary service and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Upper Canada. A representative Church of England leader, he was appointed to the first senate of the University of Toronto in 1850, and served on the University Visitation Commission in 1850, "to report a code of proper Statutes, Rules and Ordinances for the Government of the University [of Toronto]," and on the endowment board of the university and of Upper Canada College in 1850; he was a member of the council of the latter. When John Strachan established an Anglican university in the province following the creation of the University of Toronto, Cameron introduced Trinity College's incorporation bill in the assembly in 1851. After several years on the council of Trinity College (and as a professor of law from 1852), he was elected to succeed Sir John Beverley Robinson* as second chancellor of the college in 1863, a post he held until his death. Cameron took these educational duties seriously; he founded scholarships and involved himself in financial management. Cameron was also sufficiently influential within the church to overcome Strachan's reluctance to have a successor bishop appointed in the see of Toronto; at the diocesan synod in 1865 he moved the resolution that in 1866 permitted Alexander Neil Bethune to be elected coadjutor.

But grief as well as satisfaction came from his church connection. Division had been growing within the Church of England between the low church and high church parties. The rupture was made open in the election of the bishop of the new diocese of Huron in 1857. Trinity College became a focal point of accusations from the low churchmen, especially Bishop Benjamin Cronyn of Huron; in 1863 Huron College was founded in opposition to Trinity. Cameron's close identification with Trinity College, and his association with Strachan and Bethune, both regarded as high churchmen, linked him with that group, and he lost his position as a representative churchman.

His association with the church's investment fund also proved damaging. In 1861 the Toronto Globe charged that he could not account for the money from the clergy reserves commutation fund entrusted to him by the Church Society for investment. It claimed that he handed over instead "a quantity of land which though not of the full value of the monies placed in his hands was apparently accepted by the Church Society." J. W. Gamble, chairman of the committee which administered the commutation fund, and C. J. Campbell of the executive committee, immediately issued "a flat denial" of the charges. The Globe, doubtless influenced by the fact that Gamble and Campbell were well-known Conservative stalwarts, stuck by its charge.

More serious was the accusation in May 1865 by W. H. Boulton, a cousin of Cameron's first wife, that large sums administered by the Church Society had been manipulated by Cameron for his personal benefit, and that the Church Society, leading members of which were Cameron's friends and political colleagues, camouflaged the situation through an inadequate auditing arrangement. The society's management committee exonerated Cameron, but nonetheless his reputation suffered. The Globe pointed out that the Church Society refused to approve a full and competent audit, and it in fact established a strong case that Cameron had borrowed more than $40,000 from church funds on "insufficient" security.

With this series of reversals in business and church connections, and Macdonald confirmed as Conservative leader, Cameron, to retain any independent political authority, needed another power base. He had found it in the Orange order. During the 1840s and 1850s the Orange order had gained both in numbers and in respectability. It had moved, under Ogle R. Gowan's leadership, into a continuing alliance with Conservative moderates like Macdonald. But George Benjamin* became grand master in 1846 and he tended towards Upper Canadian sectionalism, suspicious of any Conservative alliance with French-speaking Catholics and not unwilling to work with Reformers. A schism occurred in 1853 when Gowan attempted to unseat Benjamin as grand master. Cameron, who joined a Toronto lodge, no.507, in 1856, was given much credit for the reunion in that year of the two grand lodges, under George Lyttleton Allen*. Cameron was a follower of Benjamin, but, although willing to oppose the Cartier-Macdonald government on regional and racial issues, he was not in favour of an alliance with the Reformers. He was elected grand master in 1859 and served until 1870, when he was succeeded by Mackenzie Bowell*.

The Orange order became the backbone of lower class support for the Conservative party. Although Cameron's role as leader of this group has sometimes appeared to be anomalous, he was doing what the Duke of Cumberland, a grand master of the British lodges, had done earlier in Britain. He might be using the order for his own political ends, but Orangemen would also benefit in obtaining a leader who was a member of the social élite – a man who combined prestige with organizational ability. As grand master, Cameron quickly undertook a major reorganization, establishing three grand lodges in the Canadas, for Western Canada, Central Canada, and Eastern Canada, in 1859. A grand lodge was provided for each of the Maritime colonies, and each of the three western districts of Saskatchewan, British Columbia, and Vancouver Island was given permission to form a separate grand lodge as soon as it had ten primary lodges; by 1863 organizational work was under way in both Newfoundland and British Columbia. Cameron also involved himself in international Orange activities.

A crisis involving the order was occasioned in 1860 by the visit of the Prince of Wales to Canada. Because the Orange order was banned in Britain, the prince was advised by the Duke of Newcastle to give no official recognition to the order in Canada. Orangemen were infuriated by what they regarded as a slur on their loyalty. In a series of comic-opera incidents at Kingston and elsewhere, Orangemen strove to have the prince pass under an Orange arch or to recognize the order in some equivalent manner. Newcastle was generally successful in avoiding official contact with the Orangemen, who directed much of their anger at the Canadian government, and at Macdonald in particular. Cameron muted Orange fury with Macdonald while collecting signatures for a petition, protesting Newcastle's advice and affirming Orange loyalty, which he took to London in 1861. His motivation is difficult to assess. Perhaps it was to prevent the "Orange Order from breaking completely away from Sir John Macdonald," as Richard Cartwright* thought, but his massive petition has been seen by a modern historian, D. G. Creighton, as a threat to the Conservative ministry: "Acclaimed once more, brought suddenly back to something like his old prominence, Cameron was virtually leading an anti-ministerial wing of Conservative Orangemen. . . ." Certainly Cameron sought more influence, which would add to his prestige and give him additional patronage power and a voice in making policy. Consistent with his Benjaminite views, he was a strong supporter of representation by population, and by advocating regional policies he was strengthening his political position in Upper Canada. But his personal financial struggles precluded the accepting of office. What Cameron wanted was influence, not formal leadership. His new base could possibly give him such influence within the Conservative party as Macdonald's ally, if Macdonald could accept the fact that Cameron was no threat to his leadership.

Cameron ran against George Brown in the Toronto by-election resulting from the accession to power of the Reformers in 1858, but lost in this endeavour, which was probably not very serious. In the general election of 1861, with his finances improving, he successfully contested Peel, an Orange stronghold, and held the seat until 1867. Back in the assembly after an absence of four years (he was not a candidate in 1857), he found a troubled ministry. The cabinet underwent chronic reorganization in 1861–62, and Macdonald had difficulty maintaining his position. Representation by population had become so popular in Upper Canada that many Conservatives espoused it in spite of Macdonald's stubborn refusal to endanger his alliance with the French Canadians by it. Conservative advocates of rep by pop would have to be admitted to the cabinet, but Macdonald would not have Cameron. There is no conclusive evidence, however, that Cameron wanted to enter the cabinet in 1861. The next year he claimed that he was asked but this claim too is unsupported. Cameron did cooperate with Macdonald in the delicate task of cabinet reorganization in 1862, as intermediary between Macdonald and Thomas Clark STREET, a rep by pop Tory from Welland.

After the fall of the Cartier-Macdonald government in 1862, Macdonald overcame his old suspicion that Cameron was a rival for leadership, and Cameron in turn was willing to accept a minor position in Canadian public life. Their rapprochement was sealed at a public dinner in February 1863, when Cameron affirmed his loyalty to Macdonald and assured Conservatives that their differences had been resolved. Differences of view could now prove useful rather than harmful; in 1863, for example, when Cameron voted against third reading of Richard Scott*'s education bill, he helped soothe militantly Protestant Conservatives who saw the bill as a manifestation of "French domination." So firm was the reconciliation that Macdonald attempted to bring Cameron into the short-lived Macdonald–Sir Étienne-Paschal Taché* government of 1864. Unable to have the attorney generalship, Cameron refused, "as I would never take any office in any Ministry which was outside of my profession." Yet Cameron knew that as leader Macdonald must be attorney general west; he himself could not give up the full-time practice of law. But he would support the ministry: "I must show myself in the House . . . or my friends here will think that there is something wrong, and that I am not giving the government the support which they ought to receive."

Cameron supported confederation in 1865, but with reservations. He was enthusiastic about transcontinental expansion and anxious to see rep by pop effected; he also felt that the alternative to confederation was annexation to the United States. He preferred legislative union, but he was confident that it would come. His main objection was to the lack of public involvement in the confederation movement. He wanted "a constitutional appeal . . . to the people," but was resigned to the failure of a resolution to that effect. When the new constitution for Ontario was debated, Cameron moved for a two-house legislature; this motion too was lost.

The Fenian troubles of 1866 illustrated Cameron's usefulness to the regime; Lord Monck* asked him to assist in muting Orange–Catholic hostility, as "there is a certain amount of bad feeling beginning to exhibit itself between Protestants and Roman Catholics . . . in connection with the late Fenian raids. . . ." Later in 1866 and in 1867 he was associated with Robert Alexander Harrison in the prosecution of many Fenian invaders. In 1868 he displayed his professional independence by defending Patrick James Whelan*, the murderer of D'Arcy McGee*.

In 1867 Cameron contested Peel for the House of Commons. He was out of the country for most of the campaign, attending the founding meeting of the Imperial Grand Orange Council at London, and he needed assistance from Macdonald in a contest so doubtful that Macdonald postponed it for as long as he could (a practice made possible by not holding simultaneous elections). Cameron ultimately won a narrow victory.

Cameron's political standing declined rapidly after 1867. In 1856 Macdonald had offered Cameron a judgeship; when a judicial appointment for Cameron was mooted in 1867, Macdonald dismissed it. Later in 1867 Cameron wanted the speakership of the House of Commons and "pressed" his claims "vigorously"; James Cockburn* obtained the post. As his independence declined, Cameron's loyalty to the ministry increased. He sometimes assisted the prime minister in drafting legislation, and often acted for Conservatives in contested election cases. Liberal leader Edward Blake* regarded Cameron as a ministerial tool, describing him in 1873 as "the gentleman who had never hesitated to come to the front on doubtful and desperate issues. . . ."

Cameron's involvement in the Pacific scandal dramatically reveals his political decline. In 1873 he became chairman of the parliamentary committee appointed to investigate Lucius S. Huntington*'s charge of a causal tie between the grant of the transcontinental railway charter to Hugh Allan* and Allan's massive contributions to the Conservative campaign in 1872. Cameron assisted the ministry's delaying tactics by moving on 5 May 1873 the postponement of the committee's proceedings until 2 July, when parliament would be in session. The grounds he gave for the delay were specious: the impossibility of proceeding with the investigation in the absence of Cartier and John Joseph Caldwell Abbott*. The Liberals regarded him with suspicion, and Alexander Mackenzie* believed that Cameron himself had obtained a $5,000 "indefinite loan" from Allan – "such is the Chairman of the investigating Committee." Macdonald claimed that he had not consented to Cameron's appointment to the parliamentary committee, and had not suggested his name.

Cameron had in fact obtained $5,000 from Allan, through Macdonald, to finance his 1872 election campaigns in Peel and Cardwell. He lost Peel in 1872 but was elected for Cardwell, a safe Orange and Conservative seat, where he had asked for Macdonald's assistance to obtain the nomination. He retained Cardwell in 1874 in spite of the Liberal sweep, and was still a member when he suffered a heart attack and died at "The Meadows," his Toronto home, on 14 Nov. 1876.

Well educated, a gifted lawyer, and with close ties to the provincial élite, John Hillyard Cameron showed considerable promise during his early career. His initial political base – Toronto conservatism, the Church of England, and the business community – was not strong enough to propel him into a position of power in a party dominated after 1856 by John A. Macdonald, and his situation was badly compromised when his large fortune vanished in 1857. His later association with the Orange order and with sectional and regional policies such as representation by population failed to overcome the crippling effects of these losses. Thus his political position was never strong, and has probably been overestimated by both his contemporaries and historians. He was nevertheless essentially a political man, who remained in parliament until his career there had come to involve both pain and humiliation.

Donald Swainson

MTCL, John Hillyard Cameron papers. PAC, MG 26, A (Macdonald papers); B (Mackenzie papers), ser.2; MG 27, I, D8 (Galt papers); RG 33, 1, vol. 2. PAO, A. N. Buell papers; John Hillyard Cameron papers; Sir Alexander Campbell papers; Sir John A. Macdonald letters, 1855–1891, copy of letter, J. A. Macdonald to J. G. Moylan, 9 Aug. 1867; John Strachan letter book, 1844–1849; John Strachan papers; Samuel Street papers. Globe (Toronto), 1846–76. Mail (Toronto), 1872–76. Canada, Province of, Parliamentary debates, 1846–65; Confederation debates. Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1867–68 (Ottawa, 1967); Journals, 1873, app.1, "Report of the Royal Commission. . . ." Edward Blake, Address by Mr. Blake at Bowmanville (n.p., 1873). Documentary history of education in Upper Canada (Hodgins), III, V, VII–XVIII, XX. [J. A. Macdonald], Letters (Johnson), I. Samuel Thompson, Reminiscences of a Canadian pioneer for the last fifty years: an autobiography (Toronto, 1884). Can. directory of parliament (Johnson). Can. parl. comp., 1873. Morgan, Sketches of celebrated Canadians. Notman and Taylor, Portraits of British Americans, III. Political appointments, 1841–1865 (J.-O. Coté). Wallace, Macmillan dictionary.

W. P. Bull, From the Boyne to Brampton, or John the Orangeman at home and abroad (Toronto, 1936). Careless, Brown. Richard Cartwright, Reminiscences (Toronto, 1912). Cornell, Alignment of political groups. Creighton, Macdonald, young politician; Macdonald, old chieftain. Dent, Last forty years. J. L. H. Henderson, John Strachan, 1778–1867 ([Toronto], 1969). A history of the University of Trinity College, Toronto, 1852–1952, ed. T. A. Reed (Toronto, 1952).

William Leggo, The history of the administration of the Right Honorable Frederick Temple, Earl of Dufferin, K.P., G.C.M.G., K.C.B., F.R.S., late governor general of Canada (Montreal and Toronto, 1878). Moir, Church and state in Canada West. Joseph Pope, Memoirs of the Right Honourable John Alexander Macdonald G.C.B., first prime minister of the dominion of Canada (2v., Ottawa, [1894]). Sissons, Ryerson, II. F. A. Walker, Catholic education and politics in Upper Canada: a study of the documentation relative to the origin of Catholic elementary schools in the Ontario school system (Toronto and Vancouver, 1955). Wilson, Clergy reserves of Upper Canada.

D. R. Beer, "Transitional toryism in the 1840's as seen in the political career of Sir Allan MacNab, 1839–1849," unpublished MA thesis, Queen's University, 1963. "The clergy commutation fund," Church Chronicle Extra (Toronto), September 1865. D. G. Creighton, "An episode in the history of the University of Toronto," University of Toronto Quarterly (Toronto), XVII (1947–48), 245–56. F. J. K. Griezic, "An uncommon Conservative: the political career of John Hillyard Cameron, 1846–1862," unpublished MA thesis, Carleton University, 1965. B. W. Hodgins, "The political career of John Sandfield Macdonald to the fall of his administration in March 1864: a study in Canadian politics," unpublished PHD thesis, Duke University, 1964. George Metcalf, "Draper Conservatism and responsible government in the Canadas, 1836–1847," CHR, XLII (1961), 300–24; "The political career of William Henry Draper," unpublished MA thesis, University of Toronto, 1959. W. J. S. Mood, "The Orange Order in Canadian politics, 1841–1867," unpublished MA thesis, University of Toronto, 1960. V. M. Nelson, "The Orange Order in Canadian politics," unpublished MA thesis, Queen's University, 1950. "Portraits of the Canadian parliament of 1850," ed. N. F. Morrison, Ont. Hist., XLII (1950), 153–58. Hereward Senior, "The character of Canadian Orangeism," in Thought, from the Learned Societies of Canada (Toronto, 1961), 177–89. M. H. Small, "A study of the dominion and the provincial election of 1867 in Ontario," unpublished MA thesis, Queen's University, 1968. Swainson, "Personnel of politics." Trinity University Review (Toronto), XV (1902), 96–97.

CAMERON, MALCOLM, businessman, politician, and temperance advocate; b. at Trois-Rivières, L.C., 25 April 1808, son of Angus Cameron, a hospital sergeant in a Scottish regiment, and Euphemia McGregor; d. 1 June 1876, at Ottawa, Ont.

Malcolm Cameron, the son of Presbyterian Scots, spent his early years in Lanark County, Upper Canada, where his father settled after the disbanding of his regiment. Angus Cameron established a tavern beside the Mississippi River between Lanark and Perth, and Malcolm, "the barefoot ferry boy," carried travellers across the river. At 15 he took a position in a store in Laprairie, then worked as a stable boy in Montreal. He returned to Perth where he attended the local school and eventually obtained employment as a clerk in a brewery and distillery.

In 1828 Cameron entered into a short-lived partnership in a general store at Perth with his brother-in-law, Henry Glass. Four years later he, John Porter, and Robert Gemmell set up as general merchants. This business prospered, and while on a purchasing trip to Scotland in April 1833 he married a cousin, Christina McGregor.

Cameron's business interests expanded in the 1830s. He began dealing in real estate around Perth. In August 1834 he joined with his brother John in establishing the Bathurst Courier; it was to be an independent weekly, the "slave or the tool" of no party, but it was sold one year later because the wealthy and Tory merchants of the area would not advertise in it. Malcolm's attention had meanwhile moved westward to the St Clair region which had impressed him during a trip in 1833. He established in 1835 a general store at Port Sarnia, which he put under the management of an agent, and purchased 100 acres of what is now downtown Sarnia for £400 from Elijah Harris, deputy of the local Indian agent. The land was divided into lots, some of which he sold in the 1830s and 1840s and at a large auction in April 1857. Conspicuous among those he encouraged to settle were half-pay officers and Scottish weavers who had originally established themselves in Lanark.

Cameron himself moved to Port Sarnia in 1837; on 4 Aug. 1837 the partnership of Porter, Gemmell and Company was dissolved. At Port Sarnia he set up lumber and flour mills and he built ships to transport merchandise along the lakes from Chicago to Quebec City. He also acquired good wooded land in the interior away from Lake St Clair and established a timber business. In 1847 he was a contractor in the building of the Great Western Railway.

Cameron was greatly influenced by Scottish "Radicals" who had settled around Lanark, and in 1836 his interest in politics had led him to run as a moderate Reformer for Lanark. He was elected although he had made no clear statement of his intentions other than to support the connection with Britain and act in the interests of the constituency. He generally sided with Robert Baldwin*, Marshall Spring BIDWELL, and other Reformers in opposing Sir Francis Bond HEAD during the session of 1837. He was in Hamilton when rebellion broke out and he volunteered under Allan MacNab*; 16 days later he resigned when he considered his services no longer necessary. At the end of the 1839 session Cameron exhibited the temper which, along with an unwillingness to commit himself and a tendency to impulsive action, would characterize his later career. On the last night of the session a bill was rushed through to sell the clergy reserves and to place the proceeds in the hands of the imperial government for it to apportion. Judging this action to have been accomplished by force and drunkenness, with "every rule of the House, every pledge of members, every principle of honour in man trampled under foot," he swore never to enter the house again.

In fact, Cameron did not attend the next session. However he accepted the invitation of a group of friends in Lanark to stand again in the anticipated elections, the first after the union of Upper and Lower Canada (now Canada West and Canada East). He continued his independent stand, making vague promises to support the institutions on which the happiness of the province depended, although he did say he saw in the policies of Lord Sydenham [Thomson*] liberal tendencies he might endorse. He won the seat, and during the session of 1841 supported the administration formed by Sydenham. He had not agreed with Baldwin when the latter resigned, just as the assembly was to convene in 1841, over Sydenham's refusal to take other Reformers such as Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine* into the government. Cameron now consistently voted with the majority against Baldwin, and was placed on a committee to prepare and report on a draft speech in answer to the speech from the throne. It was later said that in 1841 Cameron was offered but refused the post of inspector-general; no proof of this offer seems to exist and observers such as Francis Hincks* questioned the truth of the story. By 1842, however, Cameron returned to his support of Baldwin, and in that year was appointed inspector of revenue under the Baldwin–La Fontaine ministry. He resigned in September 1843 when he could not approve the government bill to move the capital to Montreal instead of retaining it at Kingston. Yet he had not considered that a political principle was involved and he thought that the ministry had been wrong in making it a government question. He felt no reluctance in continuing to recognize Baldwin's leadership.

Cameron again represented Lanark in 1844 although life now centred on Sarnia. In the 1847 elections he ran in Kent, defeating John Hillyard CAMERON, member of William Henry DRAPER's Executive Council, by a large majority. When the second La Fontaine–Baldwin ministry was formed in March 1848, Malcolm Cameron became assistant commissioner of public works. He nevertheless continued his pattern of independence, and as early as May 1848 Baldwin was forced to write him a stern letter demanding his immediate presence in Montreal and an explanation of why he had not yet appeared in the assembly. The alternative, he intimated, was dismissal. Then, in April 1849, having prepared a school bill at Baldwin's request, Cameron tabled it, in the midst of the furor over the rebellion losses bill and before informing Egerton Ryerson*, superintendent of education in Upper Canada, of its contents. Ryerson objected strongly, particularly to clauses forbidding the clergy to act as visitors in the common schools and banning the use of all books containing "controversial theological dogmas or doctrines," a phrase which he feared could mean the exclusion of the Bible from the schools. The bill passed and Ryerson resigned. Later, however, Baldwin and Hincks, in a calmer atmosphere than had prevailed in April, reconsidered the question; in late December Ryerson was asked to continue in his post as though the act of 1849 had never existed.

Cameron's unpredictable behaviour was not confined to politics; on one occasion while travelling with Baldwin he disappeared, and when the latter began to search, he was horrified to find his colleague stripped to the waist in an empty bar room having a thorough wash, claiming it was among the best he'd ever had. But Cameron's reaction to annexation talk was doubtless less awkward for Baldwin. Immediately after the Annexation Manifesto was issued in October, he denounced the movement as a treasonous conspiracy "by a set of disappointed and disloyal men to dismember the Empire."

Early in December 1849, however, Cameron resigned his cabinet seat, accusing his colleagues of not consulting him on cabinet changes, of not accepting his policies for retrenchment, and of refusing to allot funds for local improvements. He also declared that his post was a useless one. Others saw the affair differently; Baldwin stated that the first time Cameron had spoken of his resignation, he had mentioned only pressing business interests. As for retrenchment, Baldwin, La Fontaine, and James Hervey Price* all attested to the fact that Cameron had found the assistant commissioner's salary too low. Denying the charge that Cameron had not been consulted on cabinet changes, they concluded, as did many, that his resignation was "the result of personal spleen and mortified vanity," when he hadn't been offered the much-desired commissionership of crown lands.

Cameron's resignation did not remove him from the public eye. Almost immediately he began to act with a new radical faction in Upper Canada – with William McDougall* and those who were becoming known as the "Clear Grits." He had become restive under discipline and under Baldwin's leadership. He had also a common interest with the Grit faction. In 1840 he had felt that state support should be removed from all religions or apportioned equally to all that had a regularly constituted ministry. Now, he came out strongly for the Grit position against any church-state relationship at all. When John Wetenhall*, his successor in the cabinet, presented himself for re-election in Halton in 1850, Cameron successfully championed the anti-government Grit candidate, Caleb Hopkins. With his bluff manner and hearty enjoyment of debate, Cameron assailed the new minister on numerous occasions with criticisms of the ministry, and relentlessly overpowered the mentally unbalanced Wetenhall.

Later at the founding meeting of the Toronto Anti–Clergy Reserves Association in May 1850, he moved with the support of Grit journalist James Lesslie* that the administration make the settlement of the reserves a ministerial question. The reserves and rectory lands, and the funds derived from them, should, he proposed, be devoted to education "or to such other objects of public utility as may be in accordance with the well understood wishes of the community." The association, wishing to avoid an anti-ministerialist cast, rejected the proposal, but on it Cameron based his own position in the house. When no reference to the clergy reserves or seigneurial tenure was made in the speech from the throne in May, Cameron moved an amendment that the house regretted the omission; the motion was decisively defeated. He continued to play a prominent role as radical opposition to the ministry developed. In June he proposed that the assembly act on the clergy reserves question first and seek British sanction later. Although the motion was defeated, it and other resolutions drew the support of a large proportion of the Reform element of the Upper Canadian section of the province, demonstrating the growth of opposition in the assembly to the Baldwin–La Fontaine ministry not only from the right but also from the left.

In November 1850 Cameron announced his intention of resigning his seat. His stated reason was his wish to devote more time to business concerns, but privately he seemed disenchanted with parliamentary life. On the one hand the ministry showed no signs of dealing with the reserves, while on the other he had begun to fear that Clear Grit principles would lead to annexation. As a lumberman and a shipper he was naturally interested in expanding business opportunities, and in February 1850 he had been sent to Washington by a group of Toronto merchants in an unsuccessful attempt to interest various congressmen in reciprocity. He was utterly opposed, however, to annexation. He did not resign but he attended the 1851 session only infrequently.

By the time the Hincks–Augustin-Norbert Morin* ministry succeeded Baldwin and La Fontaine in 1851, George Brown's Globe in Toronto had adopted an independent stance, fearing that Hincks would favour closer church-state relations in order to retain the support of the Roman Catholic Lower Canadian Reformers. Hincks needed a new organ in Toronto; McDougall of the North American saw his chance to advance Grit fortunes and a deal was made. According to McDougall, the arrangement was that two Grits, Cameron and John Rolph*, would join the ministry which would proceed with "all reasonable progressive measures"; the North American would support it, abandoning for the time being the full Grit platform. Hincks' version differs slightly: he said he asked Rolph first but that Rolph refused to enter without Cameron; when moderate Reformer Sandfield Macdonald declined to accept the post of commissioner of crown lands an opening was available which Cameron could fill. No specific portfolio, it appears, was mentioned when Cameron agreed to take office, but he went home to Sarnia in October 1851 thinking he would become postmaster general. When details of the new cabinet were announced, however, he found himself president of the council. This office he had frequently declared superfluous, and he immediately resigned.

Cameron ran as an independent in Huron in the elections of December 1851 and won, but it is for his activities in neighbouring Kent that he is best remembered. Here Brown, supported by Alexander Mackenzie* and the Central Reform Association of Lambton, was running as an independent. In 1849–50, Brown and Mackenzie had considered the survival of the ministry essential for any Reform progress, and Cameron had aroused their enmity by resigning from it, out of, Brown maintained, bad temper. The animosity remained. Cameron thundered onto the scene in Kent hoping to achieve the same success on behalf of the ministerial candidate, Arthur Rankin, as he had for the anti-ministerial Hopkins in Halton in 1850. He promised Brown a "coon hunt on the Wabash," circulated letters urging his friends to attend Brown's meetings to show him what real Reformers were made of, and appealed to the local Irish to drive out the man who had so often taken anti-Catholic stands in the past. Cameron taunted Brown about changing sides and withdrawing support from the ministry, accused him of trying to split the Reform movement and of sowing discord between Catholic and Protestant, and called him a "liar" and a "political prostitute." Brown, however, was more than able to hold his own. As to the charges of inconsistency, hadn't Cameron himself, a leader of the Clear Grit movement, suddenly joined a ministry most of whose members he had recently opposed? Brown repeatedly outscored Cameron and won the election; "the Coon" acquired a name which stuck for years.

Although Cameron had run as an independent in the election, Hincks was still anxious to have him in the ministry. As he saw it, Cameron wanted more work for the same pay, and arrangements were made to create a bureau of agriculture and attach it to the presidency of the council. Cameron was offered the position, and in early February 1852 he accepted. Life during the sessions of 1852 and 1853 must have been uncomfortable for Cameron, who was repeatedly put in the position of voting with the ministry against principles he had previously supported. When a government proposal to increase representation within the two sections of the province came up for debate in March 1853, Brown proposed an amendment for representation by population without regard to any division between Upper and Lower Canada. Cameron voted against the amendment, and the North American explained that Grit advocacy of representation by population had referred to redistribution within the sections only. A government-sponsored school bill, passed in June 1853, enlarged the separate school rights in Upper Canada; in the voting only ten Upper Canadian members, including Cameron, supported the measure and 17 went against it. The ecclesiastical corporations question increased the discomfort of the Grit ministers: after a number of bills had been passed incorporating hospitals and charitable, religious, and educational institutions in Lower Canada, the administration introduced a general bill to cover all cases. As for the opposition, neither the Conservatives, under the leadership of MacNab, nor Brown hesitated to point out inconsistencies and to enjoy themselves at the Grit ministers' expense. And among their Grit allies, disillusionment about Cameron and Rolph was growing; Lesslie asked Alexander Mackenzie in May 1853 if he regarded them as traitors or as men overwhelmed by influences they hadn't anticipated.

Cameron became postmaster general in August, replacing James Morris*. As such, he automatically served on the Board of Railway Commissioners, and he was named a government director for Canada West when the Grand Trunk Railway Company was formally organized. In November 1853 he was instrumental in persuading J. R. Gemmill, publisher of the Lanark Observer, to establish the Lambton Observer and Western Advertiser (later the Sarnia Observer). During that winter Cameron was also involved in a libel suit brought on when Mackenzie insinuated in the Lambton Shield that he had attempted a shady land deal when a member of the La Fontaine–Baldwin government. Baldwin, Price, and William Hamilton Merritt*, Cameron's colleagues in that ministry, foiled Mackenzie by declaring themselves bound by an oath of cabinet secrecy. The jury decided for Cameron, but the publicity attracted by the case did him no good.

When the elections were called for July 1854, Cameron accepted invitations to run in both South Lanark and Lambton. His campaigning was restricted to Lambton, however, where a second instalment of the "Coon chase" was taking place between himself and Brown. Brown accused Cameron of engaging in underhanded railway and land deals, using his position as postmaster general to mail election literature, holding out advantageous offers to lumbermen for staves, arranging for jobs, bringing in boatloads of French and Irish-Catholic lumbermen to swell his cheering section on nomination day (in fact opening a tavern for them), and belonging to a corrupt ministry. Cameron protested that he was being slandered, played up his role in the temperance movement, and defended the ministry, saying that it was being as progressive as circumstances permitted. Again Cameron's temper displayed itself: at one meeting he warned Mackenzie and a friend that they would go to hell with their associates "unless they repented of their slanders against the Ministry." In the end Cameron was defeated in both Lambton and South Lanark and was out of the assembly for over three years.

During this period Cameron appears to have withdrawn from some of his commercial enterprises. He had acted in 1853 with the Baron van Tuyll* van Serooskerken in selling lots in the Bayfield Estate in Huron County, and in 1857 he was selling town lots in Sarnia. He remained a large land owner but retired from the shipping business and appears to have sold his store. By February 1857 it was rumoured that his finances were "irretrievably embarrassed."

When it became known that elections would be held in the late fall of 1857, Brown intimated to Mackenzie that he would run in Lambton if the Reform committee wanted him to, but suggested that they consider a local candidate. "If Cameron were only repentant & thoroughly convenanted to go for the points [of the Reform Alliance of 1857] & against the Ministry," wrote Brown, "it would be no loss to let him in." At Brown's suggestion

Mackenzie and Archibald Young sought out Cameron to discuss his views, but negotiations failed when tempers flared. Cameron entered the campaign in Lambton as an independent, refusing to support or condemn the moderate Conservative ministry of John A. Macdonald* and George-Étienne CARTIER, and promising to judge it on its actions. An anti-ministerial candidate would also be in the fight; when it became evident Brown would not run, Hope Mackenzie was nominated. With few fundamental differences between Hope Mackenzie and Cameron other than support of the ministry, the campaign assumed a bitter personal character. Cameron was narrowly elected amid much hard feeling on all sides.

For the first year after his re-entry into the assembly Cameron voted almost consistently with the government of Macdonald and Cartier, because it was untried, he said, and should be given a chance to prove itself. When Brown proposed a resolution calling for representation by population in March 1858, Cameron voted against it, although he proposed a similar move himself in June. He then defended this apparent inconsistency by saying that he hadn't wanted to vote a want of confidence in the ministry. Others explained it as a desire to "gratify his spleen" against Brown. In early August he voted against the short-lived Liberal ministry of Brown and Antoine-Aimé Dorion*, claiming that Brown had violated his political principles in his greed for office. It was not until March 1859 that he executed a complete volte-face, removed his support from the government of Cartier-Macdonald, and joined Brown in vigorously condemning Alexander Tilloch Galt*'s higher tariff legislation. He had earlier objected, he said, to William Cayley*'s dismissal and the increase in members' salaries, but the new tariff had been the last straw. The Globe remarked, "There is one good thing about the member for Lambton – he never does things by halves, and having resolved to go into opposition, he took his stand accordingly." This stand was reaffirmed in April when he spoke out strongly against government proposals for financing seigneurial reimbursements in Lower Canada.

In September 1859 the western parliamentary opposition met in Toronto to discuss future policy; it was decided that constitutional changes were necessary for the country and that a large convention should be held to consider these and to revive interest and enthusiasm for their cause. "Malcolm was there," Brown wrote, "and behaved like a Trump. Took capital views & showed a workable spirit." Mackenzie and the Central Reform Committee, remembering old animosities and Cameron's erratic political record, were not so enthusiastic. They decided, however, that although they would not commit themselves for the future they would cooperate with Cameron now, "in view of the alarming state of the country." When the Reform Convention met in November 1859, Cameron served on two committees and led off the debate. After praising the present unanimity of feeling he explained his conversion from ministerial ranks. He had always supported union, he said, but it had become unworkable and with representation by population apparently a remote possibility under the existing system, a federal scheme was the only solution. Here he looked beyond Upper and Lower Canada and advocated a platform on which other territories could enter the federation; they would be creating "the nucleus of an empire extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific."

Cameron's last major activity in the assembly was the chairmanship in 1860 of a select committee to consider the University of Toronto. In June of that year he was offered and accepted the Reform nomination for the Legislative Council seat for St Clair; he won by acclamation. For two and a half years in the council he continued to urge federation and expansion. He advocated the construction of railways across the continent, and in 1862 visited British Columbia. Arriving in New Westminster in August, he carried from there to Great Britain a petition of a committee, with William James Armstrong* as chairman, formed by persons on the mainland who wanted their own government. He was considered an ideal delegate because of his political experience and connections, and because of his disinterestedness; however, he had already, in fact, asked the Duke of Newcastle in 1861 to remove Sir James DOUGLAS as governor of the colony.

In 1863 Cameron was appointed queen's printer jointly with Georges-Pascal Desbarats*, and for six years was out of politics altogether. In 1869 he surprised the people of the federal riding of Renfrew by announcing that he would run there in a by-election. He was defeated by John Lorn McDougall*, and was again defeated in the Ontario election for South Lanark in 1871 when he campaigned for an extension of the franchise and against the coalition government of Sandfield Macdonald. He tried again in the federal election of 1872 in Russell, but lost to James Alexander Grant*. In 1874 he was elected as a Liberal for South Ontario over Thomas Nicholson Gibbs* and sat in the federal house for two years. He died at Ottawa on 1 June 1876, survived only by an unmarried daughter. At the time of his death he was deeply in debt. His taxes were in arrears, and he owed money to several banks, trust and loan companies, and individuals. In his last years he was a director of the Ontario and Quebec Railway and the railway linking the Marmora Iron Works to Colborne, and of the Royal Mutual Life Assurance Company, and president of the Ontario Central Railway.

Although his political career was erratic, there was one cause to which Cameron was devoted throughout his life, that of temperance. He was on the executive of many societies, including the Sons of Temperance, and introduced a number of bills on the subject in parliament. He is, however, probably best remembered as a businessman, a founder of Sarnia, and an independent and quick-tempered politician, one of the early leaders of the Clear Grit movement in Canada West.

MARGARET COLEMAN

MTCL, Baldwin papers, 35, no.107; 38, nos.5, 8, 11, 13, 24, 39–63; 54, nos.68, 69; 55, no.56; 56, no.56; 58, no.94; 61, no.91; 65, no.86; 70, no.72; 73, no.71; 78, nos.18, 19, 20; 87. PAC, MG 24, B40 (Brown papers), pp.58–60, 147, 167, 195, 202, 206, 283, 443–44, 456, 519–20, 929–30, 1094, 1787, 1791, 1798, 1799. PAO, Charles Clarke papers, William McDougall to Clarke, 25 July 1851, 2 Feb. 1853; Mackenzie-Lindsey collection, William Spink to W. L. Mackenzie, 29 Jan. 1852; Cameron to Mackenzie, 2 April 1852; Spink to Mackenzie, 22 April 1852; Cameron to Mackenzie, 30 April 1852; Spink to Mackenzie, 7 May 1852; Cameron to Mackenzie, 10 May 1852; Thomas Webster to Mackenzie, 4 Oct. 1852; John Scott to Mackenzie, 27 Oct. 1852; James Lesslie to Mackenzie, May 1853. Queen's University Archives, Alexander Mackenzie papers, George Brown to Mackenzie, 11 Oct. 1851, 17 March 1853, 16 April 1854, 17 Oct., 25 Nov. 1857, 29 Jan. 1858; Brown to Luther Holton, 24 Sept. 1859; Brown to Mackenzie, 28 March 1860; Mackenzie to Mary Thompson, 29 April 1876.

Canada, Province of, Legislative Assembly, Journals, 1841–60. Charles Clarke, Sixty years in Upper Canada, with autobiographical recollections (Toronto, 1908), 76–78. Francis Hincks, Reminiscences of his public life (Montreal, 1884), 252–56, 263–65, 272. Upper Canada, House of Assembly, Journals, 1836–39. Canadian Illustrated News (Montreal), 2 Oct. 1875, 213. Examiner (Toronto), 5 Dec. 1849; 13, 20 Feb., 13 March, 13 Nov. 1850. Globe (Toronto), 1 Oct. 1844; 1847–60; 2 June 1876. Lambton Observer and Western Advertiser (later Sarnia Observer and Lambton Advertiser), 1853–63; 2, 9 June 1876. North American (Toronto), 1850–52. Perth Courier (titled Bathurst Courier, 1834–57), 1834–41; 8 Nov. 1844; 30 June, 14 July, 4 Aug. 1854; 16 June, 9, 16 July 1869; 21 Oct. 1870; 6 June 1876; 7 Jan. 1943.

C. D. Allin and G. M. Jones, Annexation, preferential trade and reciprocity; an outline of the Canadian annexation movement of 1849–1850, with special reference to the questions of preferential trade and reciprocity (Toronto and London, 1912), 97, 332–33, 336–38, 345, 348. Careless, Brown; Union of the Canadas. Dent, Last forty years. Victor Lauriston, Lambton's hundred years, 1849–1949 (Sarnia, Ont., 1949), 91–99, 224–27. J. S. McGill, A pioneer history of the county of Lanark (Toronto, 1968), 147, 156–61, 186–87, 191. Moir, Church and state in Canada West. Sissons, Ryerson, II. D. C. Thomson, Alexander Mackenzie, Clear Grit (Toronto, 1960).

CAMPBELL, ROLLO, printer, newspaper publisher, politician; b. 18 Dec. 1803 at Dunning-Mason, Perthshire, Scotland, son of John Campbel (sic) and Nelly Smith; d. 2 Jan. 1871 at Montreal, Que.

In May 1822 Rollo Campbell emigrated to Montreal from Greenock, Scotland, where he had learned his printer's trade with several small weekly newspapers. In Canada he was employed as a printer by the Montreal Gazette and then by the Morning Courier, a Conservative commercial paper which he printed from its establishment in 1835 until 1836 or 1837. He was first a partner in the firm of John C. BECKET, then on his own, and he soon nurtured his printing business into one of Canada's biggest. He maintained branches in Toronto and Quebec in addition to his Montreal headquarters. Campbell printed the assembly's Sessional papers from 1842 to 1859, and he often won contracts to print its Journals and the reports for almost every administrative department and agency. He also published the Weekly Register from 1844 to 1847 and the monthly Colonial Protestant during 1848. Besides government documents and newspapers, Campbell printed "Books, Pamphlets, Catalogues, Cards, Cheques, Funeral Cards, Circulars, Auction Bills, Railroad do., Steamboat do., Programmes, Bill Heads, Posters, and Labels." He guaranteed his workmanship would be "equalled by few, surpassed by none, and on moderate terms." Campbell's business soon made him wealthy enough to own valuable real estate and to satisfy certain political ambitions, common enough to contemporary printers.

Campbell participated in Reform politics for years, and in 1844 was printer for Francis Hincks*' newspaper the Pilot until it got its own print-shop. In the same year Campbell also founded his own paper the Gazetteer, of which nothing is known except that it ceased publication after only a few issues. Campbell re-entered the newspaper business in 1849 when on 20 April, "entirely ruined" by a £500 libel verdict, the Pilot's proprietors auctioned off their business. Campbell bought it and was officially endorsed by Montreal's Reform party. He described his political convictions as reform, progress, equality, utility, and the voluntary principle. "Give the people as much liberty as they are able to enjoy and turn to good account," he urged. "Educate them for self government, and let the power be enlarged as their capacity to use it beneficially increases." From his Place d'Armes office Campbell published the Pilot on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays; the Weekly Pilot and Journal of Commerce, for outlying areas, was printed on Wednesdays. One of Campbell's editors was the Reverend John Mockett Cramp*, later president of Acadia College. Another was William Bristow*, after 1854 publisher of the Argus. With such editorial assistance, Campbell had time for other political ventures.

In March 1851 he ran for the Montreal city council seat for Saint-Laurent. The main campaign issue was the proposed suburban "Boulevard job." Campbell and such supporters as Jean-Baptiste-Éric Dorion* believed that after the central city's citizens were provided with essential services there would "be time enough to talk of Boulevards, in the suburbs, at the city cost." In the turbulent elections Campbell lost to Tory Joseph Russell Bronsdon, 111 to 124, though most wards elected Reformers. He failed in two bids to unseat incumbent mayor Charles WILSON in 1852 and 1853, but he won the Saint-Laurent council seat in 1852. He held this post until 1856 when he was elected an alderman for Saint-Laurent. The next year he retired from politics. He had worked diligently on the council; he wanted respite from work, and he planned to visit his native land.

In 1857, in Scotland, Campbell gave two talks, later published as Two lectures on Canada, in which he encouraged prospective Scottish emigrants to settle in Canada. Back home, Campbell's Montreal printing business continued to thrive, but his once informative and provocative Pilot floundered along with the Reform party. Its news was mainly sensational, it contained little political commentary, and it was crowded with advertisements. Campbell's financial difficulties in the spring of 1862 forced the Pilot to shut down. Afterwards he ventured into other fields. In the 1864–65 city directory he listed his occupation as "city assessor," and in 1865–66 "Customs House Officer." He had earlier held the unpaid customs post of deputy master of Montreal Trinity Board. From 1866 to 1867 he was again described as a "printer." Upon his death in 1871 he was survived by his wife Elizabeth Steel, and a son, Dr Francis Wayland Campbell*.

Rollo Campbell was one of those successful Scottish immigrants absorbed into Montreal's solid Protestant middle class. His career in business and his son's entry into a profession were typical. Even his tenure in public office was not unusual since municipal politics attracted many such participants. Campbell's main distinction was his politically committed Pilot, unfortunately acquired when his party's work was almost finished, and when new leaders, new problems, and new solutions thrust aside the old.

ELIZABETH NISH

[Rollo Campbell's Two lectures on Canada (Toronto, 1857) are interesting since they give an idea of his deep devotion to Canada and of his confidence in her future. The Pilot (Montreal), 1849–62, is the best source of information for Campbell, giving as it does all sorts of information about him, as well as expressing his political convictions. O. B. Bishop, Publications of the government of the Province of Canada, 1841–1867 (Ottawa, 1963) never discusses Campbell, but this book is an excellent one for studying anyone such as Campbell who did so much government printing. E.N.]

General Register Office (Edinburgh), Register of births and baptisms for the parish of Dunning. St Catherine Street Baptist Church (Montreal), Register of births, marriages, and burials, 2 Jan. 1871. Beaulieu et Hamelin, Journaux du Québec. Canadian newspapers on microfilm/Catalogue de journaux canadiens sur microfilm. Montreal directory (Mackay), 1864–73. Wallace, Macmillan dictionary, 110. W. H. Kesterton, A history of journalism in Canada (Carleton Library series, 36, Toronto, 1967).

CAMPBELL, THOMAS EDMUND, military officer, secretary, politician, seigneur of Rouville; b. in London, Eng., perhaps in 1809, probably in 1811; d. in 1872, probably at Saint-Hilaire, Que.

Captain Thomas Edmund Campbell arrived in Canada in 1837 after 14 years of service in the British army (which included numerous postings in the Near East), and soon came into the limelight when, on 10 Nov. 1838 as commander of the Mohawks at Caughnawaga, he took part with the volunteers of the Lachine brigade in the attack on the rebels at Châteauguay. Afterwards the volunteers set fires and began to pillage a number of houses and terrorize the habitants; he sought out the ringleaders, who were all white, placed them under arrest in Lachine, and conducted the Indians back to Caughnawaga. For their part in the capture of 75 Patriotes, the Indians were congratulated and mentioned in dispatches by Sir John Colborne*.

A year later, Major Campbell (as he now was) became aide-de-camp and military secretary to Governor Charles Edward Poulett Thomson*. In this office he played a decisive role in the election of 1841, acting as "election agent" in Lower Canada for Thomson, now Lord Sydenham, and being, as the governor himself averred, his "sole reliance" for victory. He it was who formulated the strategy of placing the polling stations in areas where they would be most convenient to "loyal" voters who would support the union, and of making sure any troops which might be dispatched to "check violence" would be available only to sympathizers with the governor. In Beauharnois he personally led the military into their positions around the poll to prevent the anti-unionists from voting. His advice and tactics won an unexpected 20 out of 42 seats for Sydenham in Canada East.

Sometime about 1840 he had married Henriette-Julie Juchereau Duchesnay, and four years later acquired the seigneury of Rouville. (He was survived by one son, Bruce.) In 1846, having retired from the army, he settled in Saint-Hilaire to become almost wholly involved in developing his land. He set apart over 150 acres as a model farm, and took a deep interest in the growing of trees. In the mid-1850s, when he heard of Principal John William Dawson*'s work at McGill in natural history, he sent him a carload of spruce trees and the saplings which apparently became the great elms bordering the campus's central avenue. In 1848, Lord Elgin [Bruce*] described Campbell as "one of the most enterprising seigneurs in the province."

Perhaps because of his success, certainly because of his compatibility with both linguistic groups (all the transactions of Major Campbell's seigneury were conducted in French), Lord Elgin prevailed upon him to become his civil secretary. As such, he was also ex officio superintendent-general of Indian affairs, for between 1844 and 1860 all civil secretaries automatically served in this capacity. Having taken office on 31 March 1847, he resigned on 30 Nov. 1849 because of Lord Elgin's (and the capital's) move to Toronto. Once again he retired to Saint-Hilaire, whence he re-emerged in the winter of 1854–55 on a commission appointed to consider military defence. He sat with Sir Allan Napier MacNab* and Colonel Étienne-Paschal Taché*, their report resulting in the Militia Act of 1855 with its double system of sedentary militia and "volunteers."

In the general election of 1857 he was elected as member of parliament for Rouville, and in the house voted consistently with the Conservatives of Canada East. In 1861 he was defeated by the Liberal Lewis Thomas Drummond*, and retired from politics. He continued his interest in defence, however, and when the American Civil War and the Trent crisis provoked increasing anxiety in the colony, he agreed to sit on another commission formed in January 1862. In addition to Colonel Campbell (as he now was), who spoke for the military forces of the province, the commission was composed of George-Étienne CARTIER, John A. Macdonald*, Alexander Tilloch Galt*, and Sir Allan MacNab acting for the political interests, and Colonel Daniel Lysons*, a regular British officer who represented imperial concerns. The report of this commission, dated 15 March 1862, was a strong plea for the old sedentary system, from which a force could be trained to constitute the real defence of the Province of Canada. It was on the bill resulting from this plan that the Cartier-Macdonald government was defeated.

Although he became a director of the Bank of Montreal and of the Grand Trunk Railway, Colonel Campbell always maintained that the development of his seigneury was his central interest. He greatly enjoyed the rural life of French Canada. On 12 Oct. 1855, at a banquet in Cobourg to honour Sir Edmund Walker Head*, he is said to have declared about the habitant: "I have now lived nine years among the French Canadians, and I believe I can honestly claim to have learned something about them, and speak about them with some authority. Believe me, Jean-Baptiste, as the French-Canadian is often called, is an honest and good subject. He is hard working and kind.... I have never lived among better people."

JACQUES MONET

[Bruce and Grey], Elgin-Grey papers (Doughty), I, 20, 28, 54, 66, 134, 387; II, 810–11. [C. E. P. Thomson], Letters from Lord Sydenham governor-general of Canada, 1839–1841, to Lord Russell, ed. Paul Knaplund (London, 1931), 110. Canada and its provinces (Shortt and Doughty), VII, 396–401. Cornell, Alignment of political groups. E. J. Devine, Historic Caughnawaga (Montreal, 1922). E. A. Collard, "Popular Major Thomas Campbell," Gazette (Montreal), 11 Feb. 1943. P.-G. Roy, "Le major Thomas-Edmund Campbell," BRH, XI (1905), 359–61.

CANTERBURY, Viscount. See MANNERS-SUTTON.

CARON, RENÉ-ÉDOUARD, jurist, politician, second lieutenant governor of Quebec; b. 21 Oct. 1800 at Sainte-Anne-de-Beaupré, L.C., son of Élisabeth Lessard and Augustin Caron, a well-to-do farmer and MHA for Lower Canada; d. 13 Dec. 1876 at Quebec.

René-Édouard Caron was educated at the college of Saint-Pierre-de-la-Rivière-du-Sud (Montmagny County), where the rudiments of Latin were taught; with this preparation he was admitted to the Petit Séminaire of Quebec in September 1813 as a boarder. He took the full classical course there, and left in 1820 after two years of philosophy. He studied law in André-Rémi Hamel's office, was called to the bar on 7 Jan. 1826, and carried on his profession at Quebec. There he was not long in building up a good reputation as a jurist, at the same time acquiring a fairly well-paying clientele. In 1844 he went into partnership with Louis de Gonzague Baillargé*, who had studied under him; six years later the two lawyers were jointly appointed lawyers of the city of Quebec. The archives of the Petit Séminaire of Quebec also show that Caron was legal adviser to his Alma Mater. The firm of Caron et Baillargé was dissolved when Caron was appointed judge of the Superior Court in 1853.

It was by way of municipal institutions that Caron entered politics. On 31 March 1831 the House of Assembly of Lower Canada passed the bill that incorporated the city of Quebec and conferred on it the right to administer itself through an elected body. This law received royal sanction on 5 June 1832 (1 Wm IV, c.52). The city was divided into 10 wards, each having the right to elect two councillors. The councillors were to choose the mayor from among themselves at their first meeting. The new law was to remain in force until 1 May 1836. The first elections took place in 1833, and Caron became one of the representatives for the Palais district. Elzéar Bédard* was elected mayor, but in March 1834 the majority of the councillors voted in favour of Caron. He became second mayor of Quebec and remained so until 1 May 1836, when, the law not having been renewed, justices of the peace once more assumed direction of the city [see Hippolyte Dubord]. Quebec had a second experience of a municipal system in 1840, as the result of an ordinance of the Special Council (4 Vict., c.35) by virtue of which the governor appointed the mayor. Lord Sydenham [Thomson*] chose Caron, and the latter was elected at the end of two years, when the office again became an elective one. He relinquished it in 1846.

In the summer of 1834, during the period of Caron's first administration, cholera ravaged the town of Quebec and claimed more than 2,000 victims. He organized the struggle against the epidemic and was not afraid to expose himself to the disease. He was again mayor when two successive fires, in May and June 1845, destroyed the greater part of the town. Appointed chairman of the relief committee, he gave proof of firm devotion to duty and great organizing ability.

In 1834 Caron was elected MHA by acclamation, for the Upper Town of Quebec, and from the beginning he was one of the French Canadian moderate liberals in the assembly of Lower Canada. He adopted the ideas defended by Étienne Parent in Le Canadien and was not slow to oppose the radical wing led by Louis-Joseph Papineau. Though he voted for the Ninety-two resolutions, he was soon identified with a small group of assemblymen, "the Quebec party," which favoured a policy of conciliation. Caron and his friends tried to give concrete form to this policy in March 1836 when Papineau was refusing to agree to vote supplies. Caron voted against the French Canadian leader, who triumphed in his no-compromise policy. On 6 March a large number of Caron's electors presented an address to Papineau approving his action, and by implication censuring their representative, and Caron judged it necessary to resign.

On 22 Aug. 1837 the Colonial Office authorized the governor, Lord Gosford [Acheson*], to appoint at one time ten legislative councillors, including seven French Canadians. Caron was one. The council was to disappear following the suspension of the constitution in 1838. In 1837 Caron refused to sit on the Executive Council. In January 1840, when the plan of union that had been adopted by the legislature of Upper Canada became known, Caron was one of the most active members at Quebec of the movement led by John Neilson* which opposed it. During a meeting held on 17 January, at the home of the notary Louis-Édouard Glackmeyer*, the first stages in the struggle were organized. A few days later Caron took part in a popular gathering at which a petition "against Union and for the constitution of 1791" was read. With Étienne Parent and François-Xavier Garneau*, he was a member of a committee of some 40 prominent citizens who in April managed to collect 38,928 signatures against the proposed union; a Quebec merchant, Vital Têtu, agreed to present them to the British parliament. The new constitution was none the less adopted, and ratified by Queen Victoria on 23 July 1840. In common with the majority of French Canadians, Caron deplored the new regime, but he had to accept it and before long was participating in its institutions. On 14 June 1841 he was appointed a member of the Legislative Council of United Canada, and was its speaker from 8 Nov. 1843 to 19 May 1847, and from 11 March 1848 to 14 Aug. 1853.

Caron took over as speaker of the council from Robert Sympson Jameson*, who had resigned in protest against the decision, backed by the government and accepted by parliament, to move the seat of the capital from Kingston to Montreal. The choice of Caron by Governor Sir Charles Theophilus Metcalfe*, who had first bargained with Peter McGill* and John Neilson, was initially regarded by the government of Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine* and Robert Baldwin* as another move taken by the governor without consulting his ministers, but it was rather difficult for La Fontaine to oppose it because of the personal qualities of Caron, whom La Minerve, on 9 Nov. 1843, called "one of ours."

The 10-month break in Caron's speakership was occasioned by his taking part in political negotiations in 1845, 1846, and 1847. The negotiations, which aroused much strong feeling at the time, resulted from the desire to introduce Lower Canadian representatives into the Tory government, and were indeed the prelude to the recognition of responsible government in the Province of Canada. Already, on 10 March 1844, Denis-Benjamin Viger*, who was attempting to form a ministry following the resignation of the La Fontaine–Baldwin government, had offered Caron the post of attorney general for Canada East. He would have had to seek election to the assembly, but he was promised that if defeated he could resume his seat on the Legislative Council. Caron refused the offer. He was nevertheless considered a moderate who was easier to deal with than La Fontaine. At the beginning of July at Quebec, and at the beginning of August at Montreal, the first talks took place between Caron and William Henry Draper, who was regarded as a Conservative and on the whole opposed to La Fontaine's Lower Canadian Reformers. Draper made known to Caron his wish that other French Canadians as well as those who were in it already would join the administration. He is thought to have mentioned Augustin-Norbert Morin* in particular, expressly ignoring La Fontaine because of the personal difficulties between the latter and Governor Metcalfe. Caron, loyal to his moderate sentiments, agreed to serve as intermediary, but it was not until 8 September that he wrote to La Fontaine to convey to him Draper's offers of some portfolios for the Lower Canadian Reformers. Caron ended his letter with these revealing lines: "I must tell you that in my opinion our present situation cannot last. What we are offered is little enough, but it might be the beginning of something better. It is very possible that I see things wrongly, but it seems to me that this opening is well worth thinking about; I am informing you of it for this reason, so that you may consider it and be free to act, but the matter should be dealt with carefully." Two days later La Fontaine replied; his letter, according to historian Thomas Chapais*, "constitutes a document of capital importance for the constitutional history of this period." "What is proposed to us," wrote La Fontaine, "is a repudiation of the principle of responsibility, in so far as it applies to Lower Canada. Since Mr Draper admits that the Lower Canadian section of the ministry does not represent Lower Canada, why keep it? Why not, in accordance with your principles, form a new administration for Lower Canada, with the help of some one who would be instructed to do it constitutionally?" On 17 September Caron wrote to Draper, to convey to him what could be regarded as La Fontaine's refusal, and in his letter he was one of the first to state what was to be recognized later as the principle of the "double majority." "The principle has been established," he wrote, "that the direction of affairs should be in the hands of the two dominant parties in each of the sections of the province, that the government should not run Lower Canada by means of a majority obtained from Upper Canada, nor should it impose laws on the majority in Upper Canada as a result of the assistance given to it by Lower Canada, and that a government should last only so long as it is supported by a majority in each of the sections of the province." The negotiations went on and ended fruitlessly in November 1845, when Draper informed Caron that, as Metcalfe felt obliged by illness to relinquish his post, the situation had changed, from which we may presume that the governor was not unacquainted with the actions of the Upper Canada politician.

At the beginning of April 1846 the Draper-Caron negotiations, which had been more or less secret, were the subject of a parliamentary debate during which La Fontaine read out all the correspondence between Draper, Caron, and himself: this conduct cast a chill on the relations between Caron and La Fontaine. In Dix ans au Canada de 1840 à 1850 . . ., Antoine Gérin-Lajoie* wrote: "What some of M. Caron's friends regretted, when all the correspondence was published, was to see that in a letter to Mr Draper, dated 8 Sept. 1845, he showed himself desirous of seeing a reaction in favour of Sir Ch. Metcalfe's government, a feeling that he concealed from M. La Fontaine. The latter could not but say publicly that if he had been aware of this letter his correspondence with M. Caron would have been discontinued immediately."

In August 1846, two months after Viger's resignation, Draper tried again, but unsuccessfully, to persuade Caron and Morin to enter a coalition analogous to the one he had proposed the preceding year. In a letter addressed to La Revue canadienne on 28 Aug. 1846, Morin wrote: "I must say unreservedly, on the subject of the recent negotiations between the provincial government on the one hand and M. Caron and myself on the other, that in this whole affair the steps taken by M. Caron, and my own, have been as honourable as I desired my own to be."

The third attempt at negotiations with Caron took place in April 1847, when Lord Elgin [Bruce*], who had been appointed governor the preceding year, sought to regulate the strange situation whereby French Canadians were represented in the government only by Denis-Benjamin Papineau*, to whom the majority of Lower Canadian MLAS were hostile. Papineau and William Cayley*, the inspector general in the government, offered Caron the presidency of the Executive Council. The latter nearly succumbed to the invitation, but he seems to have been prevented from doing so by the advice of his friend Morin, and by the desire to see La Fontaine come to power, as is revealed by a letter dated 11 April 1847 from Thomas Cushing AYLWIN to La Fontaine: "I sincerely believe that Caron wants to do something worth while, and that he desires to see you recalled to power."

However that may be, Caron was relieved of the speakership of the Legislative Council, after he had been made to understand that the post had to be held by a politician who enjoyed the government's confidence, and he was replaced by Peter McGill. In the following session, in June 1847, Caron made a long speech in support of a series of resolutions put forward by John Neilson, in which it was argued that the French population was not sufficiently represented in the cabinet. He recalled all the dealings in which he had been involved, and concluded: "I am certain I have done nothing for which I should lose my seat; if I can reproach myself with anything, it is that I put my trust in the ministry. If the government had acted in this way for the good of the country, or even if it had acted in a polite manner, I should have been satisfied; but so long as it will not show that it had good reasons to treat me as it did, I shall say that its conduct was unjustifiable. When I accepted the position of Speaker of the Council, I stipulated that it should not be a political one. For four years I gave up my profession, and I consider that the ministry has no right to take this office from me without offering me what it gives to every official of the government who is deprived of his employment."

During the summer after the 1847 session a political association was formed at Quebec called the "Comité constitutionnel de la réforme et du progrès," and Caron was elected president of it. At the beginning of November the association launched a manifesto against the government; one of its resolutions demanded that the chief advisers of the governor should be "men enjoying the confidence of the people's representatives." In the elections of December 1847, which ended at the beginning of January 1848, the Reform party obtained a majority in the two parts of the country. Caron recovered his post as speaker of the Legislative Council, and at the same time entered the La Fontaine–Baldwin ministry. In the 1849 session he was among those in the upper house who warmly supported the rebellion losses bill. On the occasion of a ministerial reshuffle in November 1849, Caron ceased to be the representative for the Quebec region and was replaced by a Quebec lawyer, Jean Chabot*, as chief commissioner of public works. However, he remained speaker of the Legislative Council. A few weeks before, he had signed the loyalist manifesto, published by La Minerve on 15 October, which opposed the Annexation Manifesto; the loyalist manifesto began by the following declaration of faith: "Sincerely attached to the institutions that the mother country has recently recognized, and convinced that these institutions are enough to assure us, through wise and judicious legislation, of a prompt and effective remedy for all the wrongs of which our province may complain, we believe it our duty to protest without delay, publicly and solemnly, against the opinions expressed in that document [the Annexation Manifesto]."

On 28 Oct. 1851, Caron, still in his capacity as speaker of the Legislative Council, entered the government of Francis Hincks* and Morin. He remained in it until 15 Aug. 1853, when he was appointed judge of the Superior Court to replace the late Jean-Baptiste-Édouard Bacquet. On 29 Jan. 1855 he became a judge of the Court of Appeal, following the death of Judge Philippe Panet*.

Judge Caron was a member of the Special Court which was created under the authority of the seigneurial act of 1854, and presided over by the chief justice, Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine. On 11 March 1856, with other judges of the Court of Appeal and the Superior Court, he gave his verdict on the legal problems that had been submitted to him. Each judge had the right to formulate his observations separately, which Judge Caron did; his remarks were published in 1856 in the Lower Canada Reports; seigniorial questions. In this collection he made a fairly detailed study of three problems: the nature and extent of the right of ownership of the local seigneurs over their fiefs and seigneuries; the nature and extent of their right of banalité; the ownership of rivers and running water, whether navigable or not.

Caron's name has remained closely linked with the codification of civil law in Lower Canada. On 27 April 1857 George-Étienne CARTIER introduced before the Legislative Assembly of United Canada the "Act to provide for the Codification of the Laws of Lower Canada relative to Civil matters and Procedure." The bill became law on 10 June (20 Vict., c.43). It provided for the appointment by the governor of three persons as commissioners, to "reduce into one code to be called the Civil Code of Lower Canada, those provisions of the Laws of Lower Canada which relate to Civil Matters and are of a general and permanent character, whether they relate to Commercial Cases or to those of any other nature." Once this task was completed, the commissioners were to reduce to "another Code, to be called the Code of Civil Procedure of Lower Canada, those provisions of the Laws of Lower Canada which relate to Procedure in Civil Matters and Cases, and are of a general and permanent character." The two codes were to be patterned as far as possible on the structure of the French codes "known as the Code Civil, the Code de Commerce, and the Code de Procédure Civile." The preamble to the act recalled the reasons for undertaking the codification. The civil laws in force in Lower Canada derived for the most part from the Custom of Paris, which had been applied in New France and of which the Quebec Act had ensured the continuance. These laws had, however, been modified by laws of English origin, so much so that there were not always good comparable versions in the two languages utilized before the courts. France, by codifying its law at the beginning of the century, had set an example for Lower Canada, as had Louisiana in its last civil code, adopted in 1825. Moreover, the French codification had suppressed the commentaries pertaining to those laws that pre-dated the Revolution, and in certain cases it seemed necessary to modify the old rules.

On 28 Nov. 1857 Cartier first approached the chief justice of Lower Canada, Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine, to ask him to direct the commission, but La Fontaine refused: "there are too strong reasons against it; the first, the only one I need give, is the state of my health." On 4 Feb. 1858 three commissioners were appointed by the government: René-Édouard Caron, Augustin-Norbert Morin, and Charles Dewey Day*, the latter two being judges of the Superior Court. In the letters of appointment the provincial secretary asked them to devote all their time to the task of codification, starting from 1 April, which meant that they had to give up the cases they had heard. Judge Caron was not officially appointed president of the commission, but he acted as such. The commissioners met for the first time at Quebec, on 20 May 1858, and were authorized to rent an office in a house belonging to Caron. On 10 June another meeting took place "to determine the best plan to follow," and the work was apportioned between the commissioners and the secretaries.

The appointment of Caron touched off a brief controversy, reported in the Quebec papers of March 1859. The judge claimed that he had agreed to be a member of the commission only on condition that he could deliver judgements in the cases he had heard. His two colleagues maintained that he did not have the right to sit, and he finally yielded to their arguments. When Morin died in 1865, Joseph-Ubalde BEAUDRY replaced him as commissioner, and Louis-Siméon MORIN succeeded Beaudry in the post of secretary. In 1862 Thomas Kennedy Ramsay*, a secretary of the commission, was dismissed from his post for political reasons, and was replaced by Thomas McCord*.

Caron drafted "Notes on the plan to be followed in the preparatory work of codification," but Judge Day was entrusted with writing the first report, dealing with obligations. On 12 Oct. 1861 the commissioners submitted it to the government. The other reports appeared at intervals until 25 Nov. 1864, at which date the report on commercial law was delivered. The codifiers' recommendations were then brought before parliament by the government, and were the object of a law adopted in 1865 (29 Vict., c.41). Caron and his colleagues next devoted their attention to drafting the code of civil procedure, which came into force on 28 June 1867. The two codes were not solely Caron's work, but of the codifiers it was certainly he who by his knowledge of law and the equitable quality of his judgement left the deepest imprint upon them.

Caron then resumed his duties as a judge, and on 14 Feb. 1873 was appointed lieutenant governor of Quebec in succession to Narcisse-Fortunat Belleau*, the first holder of the position. He took as his motto the following Latin words, "suaviter in modo fortiter in re." In this office he acquitted himself with great dignity. He gave the residence of Spencer Wood, which his predecessor had hardly lived in, an air of vice-regal grandeur. A pious man, he decided to establish a chapel there, and mass was celebrated in it for the first time on 23 Oct. 1873. Caron died on 13 Dec. 1876, and his funeral took place in the basilica of Quebec on 20 December. The papers were happy to stress that the city of Quebec had not witnessed the funeral of a head of state for over a century. The funeral oration was delivered by the vicar general Thomas-Étienne Hamel*, who recalled the piety of the deceased and emphasized that at Spencer Wood "the evening prayer and the rosary were recited by the lieutenant governor," probably as it was done at Sainte-Anne-de-Beaupré during the young peasant's childhood. Caron had remained deeply attached to his native village, a celebrated place of pilgrimage, and on 26 July 1875, not long before his death, he had presented a processional banner to the church of Sainte-Anne-de-Beaupré in the name of several subscribers, and in the presence of 7,000 pilgrims. He was buried in Belmont cemetery.

On 10 July 1865 Caron had received from Université Laval the degree of doctor of laws honoris causa. On 24 Nov. 1875 he had been promoted to the rank of grand cross of the order of St Gregory the Great. On 20 June 1848 he had been made a queen's counsel. He had been an officer in the militia, becoming a lieutenant on 6 Dec. 1825 and a captain in the Quebec artillery on 30 Dec. 1837. On 15 Sept. 1853 the Société Saint-Jean-Baptiste of Quebec had thanked him for the important services he had rendered as its second president from 1842 to 1852.

On 16 Sept. 1828, at Notre-Dame de Québec, Caron had married Marie-Vénérande-Joséphine Deblois, daughter of Joseph Deblois and Marie-Vénérande Ranvoyzé. They had several children, including Joseph-Philippe-René-Adolphe*, a minister in the governments of John A. Macdonald*, John Joseph Caldwell Abbott*, and Mackenzie Bowell*; Corine, wife of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick*; and Marie-Joséphine, wife of Jean-Thomas Taschereau* and mother of Louis-Alexandre*, the future prime minister of Quebec.

Among the secondary personages of the union period, Caron occupied one of the first places. To a certain extent, he represented moderate sentiments in his region, with his sincere desire to reach compromises in order to benefit from the union, but he never yielded on the principles he regarded as essential. He was one of those who brought about responsible government, and, furthermore, his legal knowledge enabled him to carry through to a successful conclusion the important task of codification. Louis-Philippe TURCOTTE seems to have aptly expressed the judgement of his contemporaries when he wrote at the time of his death: "His career has been useful to his country. He has always followed a straight course, guided solely by his conscience and his conception of duty."

J.-C. BONENFANT

[The Caron papers are found in the ANQ and the ASQ, Fonds Caron, 1–4; MSS, 764–817. They consist of a certain number of private and official letters, account books, and especially documents he used in the codification. A concise inventory of the latter is found in a study by Professor J. E. C. Brierley, "Quebec's civil law codification; viewed and reviewed," McGill Law Journal (Montreal), XIV (1968), 521–89.

The correspondence between Caron, Draper, and La Fontaine is published: Correspondance entre l'Hon. W. H. Draper et l'Hon. R.-É. Caron; et entre l'Hon. R.-É. Caron, et les honorables L.-H. Lafontaine et A.-N. Morin, dont il a été question dans un débat récent dans l'Assemblée législative (Québec, 1846). It also appeared in English: Correspondence between the Hon. W. H. Draper & the Hon. R. E. Caron . . . (Montreal, 1846).

No real biography of Caron has been written. The one published by the Journal de Québec on 14 Dec. 1876, the day after the death of the lieutenant governor, over the initials L.T. was only a copy, with a few variants, of a pamphlet by L.-P. Turcotte, L'honorable R.-É. Caron, lieutenant-gouverneur de la province de Québec (Québec, 1873). The biography of Caron in Le Jeune, Dictionnaire, I, is often referred to but is quite incomplete. However it is patterned after a more complete biography, found in Dent, Canadian portrait gallery, I.

General works on the union are full of material on Caron: Chapais, Histoire du Canada, V, VI; Dent, Last forty years; Antoine Gérin-Lajoie, Dix ans au Canada de 1840 à 1850; histoire de l'établissement du gouvernement responsable (Québec, 1888); Turcotte, Canada sous l'Union; Monet, Last cannon shot. The last of these is the most recent and gives a more balanced view of Caron. J.-C. B.]

CARON, THOMAS, secular priest, teacher at the seminary of Nicolet; b. 19 June 1819 at Saint-Antoine-de-la-Rivière-du-Loup (Louiseville), L.C., son of Louis Caron, farmer, and Euphrosine Béland; d. 24 Sept. 1878 at Nicolet, Que.

Like many young men of his parish and the surrounding area, Thomas Caron enrolled at the seminary of Nicolet in 1831 for his classical education. Seven years later he began the study of theology, at the same time teaching the adolescents of the seminary. He was ordained priest in 1842, lived in the institution that had trained him, and was at first a teacher of rhetoric and theology there. Subsequently he was in turn director of students, teacher of theology, and director of seminarists. His bishop appointed him three times superior of the seminary of Nicolet (1855–59, 1861–68, 1871–77), and in 1857 chose him as vicar general of the diocese of Trois-Rivières.

As a priest Thomas Caron was profoundly imbued with the evangelical spirit. Always ready to give of himself ungrudgingly, and of exemplary goodness, he was loved by all those who lived near him. It was no doubt for this reason that pupils called him "papa Thomas." When he was teaching the seminarists, he drew up courses which have survived in manuscript form and which are a sound synthesis of the numerous theological treatises that were to be found in his personal library. He was most careful to provide teaching of good quality.

As a member of the corporation of the seminary of Nicolet, Caron worked towards the affiliation of the seminary with the Université Laval. In 1863 he succeeded in smoothing away the difficulties that had been delaying the realization of this project for ten years. The authorities of the seminary of Nicolet had indeed feared to lose their independence to the seminary of Quebec, whose priests directed the Université Laval. This question had barely been settled before he had to take up the problem of the poor results of the Nicolet students in the university examinations.

The finest moment of his life was probably in 1869, when his bishop, Thomas Cooke*, chose him to accompany Bishop Louis-François Laflèche* to the Vatican Council; Laflèche and Caron were friends of long standing. But on his return Caron had to defend his college against the inhabitants of Trois-Rivières, who insisted that the seminary of Nicolet close its doors. He opposed this demand with all his strength, so much so that his health was affected. According to Bishop Joseph-Antoine-Irénée Douville, who knew him well, this affair was one of the reasons for his premature death.

CLAUDE LESSARD

ASN, Boîte I; Boîte II; Polygraphie, V, 19, 21–24, 32–33; Séminaire, VII, 56; Séminaire, IX, 39–51. L'Écho de Saint-Justin (Louiseville, Qué.), 2 mars 1925. J.-A.-I. Douville, Histoire du collège-séminaire de Nicolet, 1803–1903, avec les listes complètes des directeurs, professeurs et élèves de l'institution (2v., Montréal, 1903), I, 409; II, 115–21. Germain Lesage, Histoire de Louiseville, 1665–1910 (Louiseville, Qué., 1961), 170.

CARPENTER, PHILIP PEARSALL, Presbyterian minister, conchologist, and social reformer; b. 4 Nov. 1819 in Bristol, Eng., youngest of six children of Lant Carpenter and Anna Penn; d. 24 May 1877 in Montreal, Que.

Philip Pearsall Carpenter attended Bristol College, 1833–36, and then Manchester College, York, 1837–40; that college became affiliated with the University of London and he received a BA degree in the same year, 1841. In that year also he was ordained a Presbyterian minister. His first ministry was at Stand (Lancashire), 1841–46, where on 1 Dec. 1841 he became an avowed teetotaller. The period 1841–50 was one of distress and discontent in the manufacturing areas, and there were riots and burning. Carpenter was much concerned with these social problems. In his ministry at Warrington (Lancashire), 1846–58, where his religious commitment became Unitarian in emphasis, he tried to alleviate unemployment and ill health from lack of sanitation; he started a day and night school for men, an industrial school for women, was secretary of a working men's sanitary association, taught swimming to working people, and helped to establish an industrial school in 1847. In this latter school, printing was used as a means of encouraging literacy and teaching a trade to the unemployed. Subsequently a cooperative printing business, the Oberlin Press, was established, and it printed religious publications.

In his youth Carpenter had helped to arrange shells in the Bristol museum and he kept his interest in collecting. In 1855 he was helped by a relative to purchase a famous collection of west Mexican sea shells, made by Frederick Reigen. Carpenter reviewed over 100,000 shells in this collection, and gave two reports on it to the British Association for the Advancement of Science in 1856 as well as publishing at the Oberlin Press a 552-page Catalogue. From this collection, sets were given to the British Museum and sent abroad; one was accepted by the State Cabinet of Natural History in Albany (New York) on condition that Carpenter be its curator. Many scientific publications by Carpenter followed between 1855 and 1873, principally on living mollusks from British Columbia to Panama; he also participated in meetings of the British Association for the Advancement of Science.

Carpenter was given leave of absence at Warrington in 1858, and went to Albany. The visit to America was all the more welcome as his lack of sympathy with dogma and his belief in "the right of any member of the Church to search freely after the truth, and to hold and teach whatever appears to him to reveal the will of God" had set him apart in Warrington and were to lead to a final disassociation with the church there in 1862.

After arranging the Mazatlan shells at Albany, he went to arrange and catalogue the shell collection of the Smithsonian Institution, Washington, and when he returned to England the collection was sent to him so that he could continue. His strong views against slavery in the critical period before the Civil War made it necessary that he remain in the Smithsonian during his work in Washington. Carpenter travelled over 12,000 miles in America, meeting with temperance and anti-slavery groups. He attended many Roman Catholic services, with which he found himself in "religious sympathy" and whose music he greatly enjoyed. On three visits to Montreal he lectured on sanitary reform and at McGill University on his scientific work, becoming a friend of Sir John William Dawson* and Sir William Edmond LOGAN. He collected natural history specimens, and became a corresponding member of a number of scientific societies in the United States and England. In 1860 he received a PHD degree from the University of the State of New York, the first such degree granted by that body.

Carpenter returned to Warrington in 1860, and ministered there for another year and a half. On 1 Oct. 1860 he married Minna Meyer, formerly of Hamburg, Germany, a friend of long standing; they adopted a young American orphan boy whom Carpenter had befriended in the Smithsonian Institution. He continued his arranging of shells and writing of scientific articles.

The Carpenters left for Montreal on 26 Oct. 1865. Believing that McGill University was the best place in British North America for natural history, he had given his large shell collection to McGill University, to be called the Carpenter Collection. In Montreal he continued to look after it and he gave lectures at various times, but he did not have a formal position at McGill. He opened West-End Select School for boys, often from Montreal's best families, in 1866. His preoccupation with social welfare continued, and he was involved in several citizens' committees endeavouring to combat the high death rate in Montreal and the unsanitary conditions which made attacks of pestilence a danger. Among his associates were William Hales Hingston*, Alexander Vidal*, William Bennett Bond*, and William Workman. He was an indefatigable worker, lecturing and publishing pamphlets on temperance and on vaccination, and he continued his scientific work and writing, particularly a monograph on Chitons. Poor health gradually sapped his energy, and he died of typhoid fever.

Carpenter was a natural and persistent lecturer, with a sincere love of humanity, who strove in his ministry to follow the teachings of Jesus Christ. Prohibitionist, abolitionist, vegetarian, a supporter of reform in the living conditions of the poor and illiterate, he was respected and loved by all, whether they agreed with his doctrines or not. His chief personal delights were music and the collecting of shells, and from the latter enthusiasm he made himself an outstanding authority among the conchologists of his day by his careful and persevering habits of analysis and comparison.

Katherine V. W. Palmer

[P. P. Carpenter wrote two reports for the British Association for the Advancement of Science on west coast Mollusca. The second, "Supplementary report on the present state of our knowledge with regard to the Mollusca of the west coast of North America," Report of the British Association for the Advancement of Science for 1863 (London, 1864), 517–686, is still one of the best compendiums in molluscan literature, particularly in reference to the west coast, from Linnaeus to Carpenter's day. It has a wealth of data and concise evaluation. Carpenter's principal works are: Catalogue of the collection of Mazatlan shells in the British Museum: collected by Frederick Reigen, described by P. P. Carpenter, ed. J. E. Gray (London, 1857); "Description of (supposed) new species and varieties of shells, from the Californian and west Mexican coasts, principally in the collection of Hugh Cuming," Zoological Society of London, Proceedings, XXIII (1855), 228–35; Memoirs of the life and work of Philip Pearsall Carpenter . . . chiefly derived from his letters, ed. R. L. Carpenter (1st ed., London, 1879; 2nd ed., 1880); The mollusks of western North America . . . embracing the second report made to the British Association on this subject with other papers . . . (Smithsonian Miscellaneous Collections, X, Washington, 1873). k.v.w.p.]

K. E. H. Palmer, Type specimens of marine Mollusca described by P. P. Carpenter from the west coast (San Diego to British Columbia) (Geological Society of America, Memoir 76, [New York], 1958).

CARRALL (Carroll), ROBERT WILLIAM WEIR, doctor and politician; b. 2 Feb. 1837 at Carrall's Grove, near Woodstock, U.C., son of James and Jane Carrall; d. 19 Sept. 1879 at Carrall's Grove, Ont.

Robert William Weir Carrall, the grandson of a United Empire Loyalist, described himself as "a patriotic Canadian, descended from a race of patriotic Canadians – one of the oldest families in Canada." He is said to have been educated at Trinity College, Toronto, though he did not graduate, and he received his MD from McGill University in 1859. He practised for a short time in his native country, but late in 1862 he became a "contract" surgeon with the Union forces of the United States and served during the Civil War as acting assistant surgeon. He was on duty first at Emory Hospital, Washington, D.C., from 12 Dec. 1862 to 12 Sept. 1863, and subsequently at the Marine United States General Hospital at New Orleans, La., from 5 Dec. 1863 until his contract was cancelled at his own request on 8 July 1865.

By the end of October 1865 Carrall was established as a medical doctor in Nanaimo, Vancouver Island, where he took an active part in community affairs. He was elected ensign of the Nanaimo Volunteer Rifle Corps and was one of the "musical amateurs" who attempted to organize a brass band. He appears to have also been a freemason, a charter member of the Nanaimo Lodge no.1090, A.F. & A.M.

In 1867 Carrall left Nanaimo for Barkerville, where he practised his profession and also invested in various mines. The mining records for 1868 show that he had an interest in two companies on Williams Creek, and he is said to have been "the lucky owner of two shares in the rich Minnehaha claim." Confederation was now in the air, and Carrall, from the first "a zealous advocate" of the scheme, was chairman on 23 Nov. 1867 of a large meeting at Barkerville which passed a resolution in favour of confederation. He was reported as declaring that "we will span the continent with a cordon of thinking, energetic, pulsating humanity, and a railroad will follow as a consignment [sic] to their necessities." For Carrall had returned from his 1862–65 sojourn in the United States "a greater Canadian than ever," and he could foresee his native Canada stretching from ocean to ocean, still part of the British empire and enabled by means of a transcontinental railroad "to compete with the United States for the European immigration." Carrall reported the feeling in the Cariboo to Sir John A. Macdonald*, whom he was later to eulogize as "a mighty Prince" and "the great father of this young Dominion . . . one of the nation-makers." Macdonald urged him to "keep the Union fire alight until it burns over the whole Colony," and Carrall did his utmost.

In the October 1868 election, in which confederation was the main issue, he gained a seat on the Legislative Council, on which he served until 1871. In January 1870 Governor Anthony Musgrave*, taking every precaution to ensure confederation and well aware of the doctor's correspondence with Sir John, gave him a seat on the Executive Council, and on 20 April he was appointed one of the three delegates to Ottawa to discuss the terms of British Columbia's union with Canada. In Ottawa, Carrall was the only delegate to have an interview with Macdonald, who was too ill to take part in the general negotiations, in which Carrall's role was to "make the most" of the interior of British Columbia and its economic value to Canada. After the triumph of the British Columbia delegation Carrall remained for a time in his native province, and on 31 Dec. 1871 he was appointed to the Senate.

He took his seat on 11 April 1872 as one of the three senators from British Columbia and made his maiden speech on 22 May on the insolvency laws. His most notable achievement came in 1879, during the last session before his death, when he introduced the bill "to make the first day of July a Public Holiday by the name of Dominion Day." He had made the proposal, apparently, as soon as he entered the Senate, but such a measure was deemed inexpedient at that time, for "some of the provinces were new in the harness of Confederation, and were restive – Nova Scotia to wit." In 1879 it was B.C. which was "irritated and restive," as Carrall admits. Nevertheless, he thought, "now is the time to legislate for a complete crystallization of the factions of the Dominion into one harmonious whole," by establishing one particular day as a national holiday, as every other country has done. He himself, he adds, has "always loved the Dominion dearly. I helped to bind it together, and I have worked since with all the energy I possessed by vote and voice, to consolidate it." In spite of the opposition of his fellow senator from British Columbia, Clement Francis Cornwall* (who felt that the union of his province with Canada had "not been so consummated as to render it expedient that we should establish any particular day as a recognition of Confederation"), Carrall's bill was passed.

A "good natured, sociable and companionable" bachelor, who "knew everybody almost between Halifax and Cariboo," Carrall seems to have thoroughly enjoyed his life in Ottawa, though he complained privately in 1872 that he was "worked to death socially – Dinners or Dances every night, and all the next day the anguish of having lost my heart which I invariably do from one to four times every night, oh! why was I created with such susceptibilities? or why on earth [are] the girls so sweet!!!" Just a few months before his death Carrall was married in Ottawa on 8 May 1879 to Mrs Elizabeth Amelia Macdonald Gordon, daughter of a former sheriff of Goderich, who survived him. Local tradition has it that Carrall married the widowed sweetheart of his youth so that he could leave her his property.

He is said to have died of "ulceration of the stomach." This was probably a condition of long standing, for George A. Walkem*, then premier of British Columbia, wrote privately to Sir John from Victoria on 29 Nov. 1878 that he was "afraid poor Carrall's days will be numbered. Liver, kidneys, & stomach are all badly affected & the doctor considers his recovery hopeless. He is of course in bed." Nevertheless Carrall rallied sufficiently to return to Ottawa to take part in the session of 1879 and to carry through with fortitude and spirit his cherished bill to establish Dominion Day.

Dorothy Blakey Smith

PABC, Robert William Weir Carrall correspondence, 1866–76; J. S. Helmcken, "Reminiscences" (5v. unpublished typescript, 1892), V. PAC, MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), correspondence with R. W. W. Carrall, 1868–78; correspondence regarding R. W. W. Carrall, 1870–87. National Archives (Washington), Old Military Records Division, Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, Medical officers file, R. W. W. Carrall. British Columbia, Legislative Council, "Debate on the subject of confederation with Canada," Government Gazette Extraordinary (Victoria), March 1870. Canada, Senate, Debates, 1872–79. Cariboo Sentinel (Barkerville, B.C.), 1868–71. Colonist (Victoria), 4 Oct. 1879. Nanaimo Gazette, 1865–66. Victoria Daily Standard, 4 Oct. 1879. Can. directory of parliament (Johnson). Can. parl. comp., 1873; 1874; 1875; 1878; 1879. M. A. Ormsby, British Columbia, chap. 9; "Relations between British Columbia and the Dominion of Canada," unpublished PHD thesis, Bryn Mawr College, [1934]. British Columbia & confederation,

ed. W. G. Shelton (Victoria, 1967), especially Brian Smith, "The confederation delegation," 195–216.

CARTER, Sir JAMES, lawyer and judge; b. in Portsmouth, Eng., 25 Jan. 1805, son of Captain James Carter of the British army, one-time mayor of Portsmouth; d. at Mortimer Lodge, Berkshire, Eng., 10 March 1878.

James Carter went to school in Walthamstow, one of his schoolmates being Benjamin Disraeli, and continued his education at Manchester College, York, and at Trinity College, Cambridge. He then studied law at the Inner Temple under his cousin, John Bonham Carter, was called to the bar in 1832, and served on the western circuit until 1834. With the aid of his cousin's political influence he was appointed in 1834 to the New Brunswick bench by the secretary of state for the colonies, Thomas Spring-Rice.

Carter's appointment, coming at a time when the province was in the throes of political excitement over crown lands and quitrents, caused an uproar especially among the legal profession who were educated to believe that judicial honours would fall to them in strict line of seniority. There were many outbursts in the press against the appearance on the New Brunswick bench of a 29-year-old stranger from England; a meeting of the New Brunswick bar passed a resolution protesting the appointment. The historian James Hannay* correctly interprets their reaction as one against "a gross insult" to the people of the province. A new colonial secretary apologized and promised that in the future judicial appointments would go to natives of New Brunswick.

Yet Carter's character and presence on the bench were so impressive that the heated reaction against him quickly abated. Lemuel Allen WILMOT wrote a panegyric on him in the press on 25 Feb. 1835, concluding the piece with the quotation, "O wise and upright judge, how much older art thou than thy looks." Approval grew stronger as the presence of a judge who was free of the family connections and alliances that explain New Brunswick politics at the time became more appreciated. Probably the most famous case he heard was that of the libel action against James Doak and Thomas Hill*, two journalists who in 1844 were jailed for contempt of the House of Assembly. Carter's award of a habeas corpus brought to an end the assembly's old custom of imprisoning those who offended its "privileges."

The second occasion on which Carter unwittingly became a principal in a constitutional quarrel was in 1851 when he was appointed chief justice. Renowned for an ability to keep out of politics, he found his name a subject for political speculation, each time with fortunate results. The lieutenant governor, Sir Edmund Head*, confronted by a divided government who refused to give collective advice on a successor to the chief justice, Ward Chipman*, unilaterally made the recommendation that Carter receive the appointment. The reasons Head gave were Carter's superior legal education, his aloofness from politics, and his private fortune. Charles FISHER led a powerful agitation in the assembly and the press against the appointment. The cry arose that the lieutenant governor had violated the principle of responsible government and that New Brunswick had slipped back under the complete control of Downing Street. Sir Edmund Head was called a tyrant, but Carter was serenely unaffected.

Having served as a referee in the Ryland case, a contentious affair in Anglo-Canadian relations, Chief Justice Carter was knighted in 1859. Eager to strengthen ties between the mother country and colonies, the British government had previously suggested awarding honours to eminent citizens of the province. The lieutenant governor, John Henry Thomas MANNERS-SUTTON, replied that honours would not produce the political result intended and that public opinion would be hostile. He would name but one man, Carter, as worthy of knighthood. Nothing was done until public opinion abruptly changed with news that the award had been conferred on Brenton Halliburton*, justice of Nova Scotia. Carter then became the first resident of New Brunswick to receive the honour of knighthood.

Suffering from failing health, Carter resigned in 1865. By arrangement with the lieutenant governor, Arthur Hamilton Gordon*, the withdrawal was carefully timed so that a place on the bench could be offered to the leader of the anti-confederate government, Albert James Smith*, thus easing the way for New Brunswick to accept confederation. Smith, however, refused.

In 1866 Carter left for England, where he died 13 years later at the residence of his son. He had been married three times: in 1831 to Emma Wellbeloved; in 1844 to Mary Ann Elizabeth Miller, by whom he had two sons; and in 1852 to Margaret Spencer Coster, by whom he had one daughter. Although he occupied a leading place in the more intellectual areas of Fredericton society, Carter enjoyed the wild life of the wilderness, keeping a bear and a beaver in captivity on his premises at Frogmore. He is invariably described as a highly cultivated man, gifted with a melodious singing voice, who for many years played the organ at St Anne's Church in Fredericton. A man of mild temperament and retired habits, his prominence as a figure of controversy in New Brunswick's public life was quite unsought. The province discovered, however, that he had served it well.

W. S. MacNutt

[There is no collection of Sir James Carter's private papers in New Brunswick. Summaries of his judicial cases can be found in the Public Archives of New Brunswick. PRO, CO 188/105–188/132 contain numerous references to Carter. The Robb Letters at the University of New Brunswick Library, Archives and Special Collections Dept., contain many flattering allusions to him. For a biography see: Lawrence, Judges of New Brunswick (Stockton), 339–70. Also see Hannay, History of New Brunswick, II, 88, 94, and MacNutt, New Brunswick, 242, 342, 378–79, 437. W.S.M.]

CARTER, ROBERT, naval officer, magistrate, and politician; b. at Ferryland, Nfld., in 1791, son of William Carter*, judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court, and Anne Weston; m. to Anne Hutchings by whom he had one son and three daughters; d. in St John's, Nfld., 25 May 1872.

Robert Carter was the grandson of the first Carter to settle in Ferryland, where the family were prominent merchants and holders of the magistracy. He appears to have joined the navy at an early age, and was retired soon after the peace of 1815 with the rank of lieutenant. In 1843 he was promoted commander (retired). After the death of his elder brother William in 1815, Robert Carter was appointed surrogate magistrate in his place, probably early in 1817. He served in that capacity at Ferryland until early in 1826, when he retired amid subsequently unsubstantiated accusations of improper judicial behaviour. The first general election in Newfoundland was held in 1832, and Carter won the Ferryland seat. From that time his career was largely politically oriented and he moved to St John's.

The years between 1832 and 1836 saw the rise of denominationalism in local politics, and Carter, a member of the Church of England, was defeated in the Catholic district of Ferryland in 1836. From 1842 to 1852 and again from 1855 to 1859 he represented Bonavista Bay, and from 1859 to 1865, Fortune Bay. Both these districts were largely Protestant. Throughout his time in the assembly, Carter was a prominent member of the Protestant Conservative party, which was, however, in a minority from 1836 to 1861. But since, before the introduction of responsible government in 1855, patronage lay in the hands of the governor and council, Carter received several appointments of ascending importance. He remained a justice of the peace for the Ferryland area and served as a road commissioner there in the late 1830s. Following the fire that devastated St John's in June 1846, he was appointed supervisor of streets, an important post which he held until the replanning of the town was completed in 1848. In October 1849 Carter became colonial treasurer and a governor of the Savings Bank. The tenacity with which he held to these posts slightly impeded the transition to responsible government in 1855. His demand for a retirement allowance being disallowed, Carter refused to resign. He argued that he had not been appointed as treasurer under the conditions imposed by the resolution, passed by the assembly in April 1849 and later approved by the Colonial Office, which stated that all executive appointees after that date would be liable to removal without compensation upon the introduction of responsible government. He received neither pension nor sympathy, and finally in May 1855 Governor Sir Charles Henry Darling* had to order him from office.

Carter's resistance to the change was typical of many of his class, who feared not only the loss of their positions but also a Roman Catholic political ascendancy. In 1861 a crisis within the largely Catholic government party led by John Kent enabled the Conservatives under the leadership of Hugh Hoyles*, openly backed by the governor, Sir Alexander Bannerman*, to seize power. Carter became colonial secretary in the Hoyles ministries of 1861 and 1861–65. When Hoyles resigned as premier in the summer of 1865 to become chief justice, Carter lost his post, but he remained a member of the Executive Council until just before the election that fall. The Conservatives were again victorious under the leadership of his nephew, Frederick B. T. Carter*. Carter retired from public life at the same time and lived in St John's until his death.

Never of outstanding importance in the political life of his time, Carter was a prominent member of, and spokesman for, the local establishment. Unlike his peers, however, Carter was neither in trade nor in the law; he had an economic dependence on political office which reinforced his resistance to responsible government but hastened his adaptation to the new order.

J. K. Hiller

PANL, Newfoundland, Dept. of the Colonial Secretary, letter books, 1815–27; Newfoundland, Executive Council, minutes, 1865. Newfoundland, Blue Books, 1832–65 (copies in PANL); House of Assembly, Journals, 1836, 1837, 1838, 1840. Gunn, Political history of Nfld. J. R. Smallwood, "The history of the Carter family in Newfoundland," unpublished typescript, 1937 (copy at PANL). E. A. Wells, "The struggle for responsible government in Newfoundland, 1846–1855," unpublished MA thesis, Memorial University of Newfoundland, 1966.

CARTIER, Sir GEORGE-ÉTIENNE, lawyer, politician, prime minister of the Province of Canada; b. 6 Sept. 1814 at Saint-Antoine-sur-Richelieu (Verchères County, L.C.), son of Jacques Cartier (1774–1841) and Marguerite Paradis; d. 20 May 1873 in London, Eng.

Cartier's family made no claim to have descended from the discoverer of Canada, who had no children, but they were content to believe, without seeking proof, that a distant ancestor had been a younger brother of the Saint-Malo navigator; they were wrong, although he may have belonged to the same family. All the same, George-Étienne Cartier was coquettish enough to call the country house that he owned near the village of Hochelaga "Limoilou," after Jacques Cartier*'s manor.

In 1738 Jacques Cartier, dit l'Angevin, of Prulier in the diocese of Angers, France, set out for New France. In 1744 he married Marguerite Mongeon at Beauport, and became a salt and fish merchant at Quebec. In 1772 one of his sons, Jacques, settled at Saint-Antoine-sur-Richelieu, about 36 miles from Montreal. There he engaged in the grain trade and from 1804 to 1809 represented the constituency of Surrey, later Verchères, in the House of Assembly of Lower Canada. He left his son Jacques a sizeable fortune, which allowed him to lead the agreeable and easy life of a wealthy country squire. Eight children were born of the marriage of Jacques Cartier and Marguerite Paradis in 1798; George-Étienne was the seventh. Another son, François-Damien, also practised law, and was the professional partner of the politician.

Cartier, baptized on the day of his birth at Saint-Antoine-sur-Richelieu, received the name of George in honour of the reigning sovereign George III, hence the English spelling. As there was no school at Saint-Antoine, the boy was first educated by his mother. In 1824 he entered the college of Montreal, directed by the Sulpicians, with whom he retained connections all his life. He was a diligent and brilliant pupil. He completed his secondary education in 1831, and then started his legal training in the office of Édouard-Étienne Rodier*, a Montreal lawyer, who was favourably disposed towards the demands of the Patriote party. Called to the bar of Lower Canada on 9 Nov. 1835, he began to practise his profession with his former employer, also continuing to take an active interest in the struggles that marked these years of great excitement, especially in the region of Montreal.

While he was a student Cartier had worked during the 1834 elections on behalf of Louis-Joseph Papineau and Robert Nelson. On 24 June of the same year, at a banquet in Montreal which heralded the birth of the Société Saint-Jean-Baptiste, he had sung a song that he had just composed and that was to survive him, O Canada, mon pays, mes amours. At the 1835 banquet he sang another patriotic song he had composed, Avant tout je suis Canadien, which later became a rallying-call for the Fils de la Liberté, an association of French Canadian militants, to which Cartier belonged [see Leblanc]. Furthermore, in May 1834 he had been one of two secretaries of a political organization set up under the name of the Comité Central et Permanent du District de Montréal, which demanded that the government respect civil liberties. During the autumn of 1837, when the situation worsened in Lower Canada and rumbles of revolution were heard in assemblies [see Papineau], Cartier took part in the events in circumstances which, although unclear, enable us to situate him among those called Patriotes. Later on, his participation in the 1837 disturbances did not seem to him a gesture against England, even if he took pleasure in recalling with a smile that he had been a "rebel"; he claimed that it was, rather, a youthful escapade in which, as he wrote on 20 Sept. 1838 to Charles Buller*, the secretary of Lord Durham [Lambton*], he had not "forfeited his allegiance to the government of Her Majesty in the province of Lower Canada." It was, he said, against an oppressive minority rather than against the crown that he had fought, as is shown by these words uttered on 24 Sept. 1844 in a speech at Saint-Denis: "There is no longer any danger of a return to the events of 1837, caused by the actions of a minority which desired to dominate the majority and exploit the government in its own interests. The events of 1837 have been badly interpreted. The object of the people was rather to reduce this oppressive minority to nothingness than to bring about a separation of the province from the mother-country." However that may be, Cartier, who was probably not present at the assembly of the six counties, held at Saint-Charles on 3 October, was at the battle of Saint-Denis on 22 November, and far from deserving the accusations of pusillanimity heaped upon him by some of his opponents, he seems to have acquitted himself bravely. In his speech at Saint-Denis in 1844 he was able to exclaim without being contradicted: "I was of your number, and I do not think I showed lack of courage."

After the Patriotes' defeat at Saint-Charles, Cartier, who had remained at Saint-Denis, had to hide, with his cousin Henry Cartier, at Verchères, where he spent the winter with a farmer. His death was announced in the papers, but in reality he had to flee to the United States after his hiding place was discovered. He lived at Plattsburgh and Burlington (Vermont) from May to October 1838. A proclamation of 9 Oct. 1838 annulled Durham's ordinance, by which on the preceding 28 June Cartier had been included among those accused of treason. He then returned to Montreal and took the authorities to witness that his conduct was "the most pacific and the most irreproachable."

The following year Cartier returned to the practice of law with his brother François-Damien. His great period of activity as a lawyer extended from this year until 1848. After he became a minister, in 1854, he no longer had the time or the opportunity to concern himself personally with his clientele. He had as partners later François-Pierre Pominville, Louis BÉTOURNAY, and Joseph-Amable Berthelot*, and his office numbered among other clients the Grand Trunk and the Sulpicians. In 1852 Cartier introduced in parliament the bill creating the Grand Trunk Railway Company. On 11 July 1853 he was appointed its legal adviser for Canada East. His opponents were quick to accuse him of collusion with the biggest railway company of the day. In 1854, to an MLA who accused him of being an agent of the Grand Trunk and receiving money from it, Cartier replied: "But I do not depend upon the company. I am independent, my private clientèle renders me so . . . the public has had sufficient confidence in me as a lawyer to render me independent of all emolument I may receive from the Grand Trunk company." One must nevertheless note that according to the deed of partnership between Cartier and Pominville, the politician was entitled to only one fifth of the income received, and that this restriction did not apply to the business of the Grand Trunk Company.

While carrying on his profession, Cartier continued to take an interest in public affairs. At the time of the reorganization of the Société Saint-Jean Baptiste in 1843, he became its secretary. In the political sphere, he accepted the union, became a supporter of Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine*, and demanded the application of the principle of responsible government. On 18 Sept. 1842, immediately following the formation of the first ministry of La Fontaine and Robert Baldwin*, Cartier wrote to La Fontaine to congratulate him and tell him of his enthusiasm: "Your appointment has electrified our hearts and our spirits." Cartier seems to have quickly accepted the idea that armed resistance to authority was useless, and that it was better to seek to bring about constitutional reforms. In 1844, when the La Fontaine–Baldwin ministry resigned as a result of the refusal of the governor, Sir Charles Theophilus Metcalfe*, to accept its recommendations, Cartier campaigned in favour of ministerial responsibility in the general elections that followed. Because he did not feel sufficiently established in his profession, he rejected a number of proposals that he should himself be a candidate, but finally agreed to stand against Amable Marion in a by-election in Verchères; on 7 April 1848 he was elected a member of the Legislative Assembly of United Canada. It was then that his true political career began; it continued uninterrupted until his death.

Cartier took his seat at the session that began at Montreal on 18 Jan. 1849, and that was marked at the end of April by the adoption of the rebellion losses bill and by the ensuing riot. He was in favour of the measure, although he did not take part in the debate. He also sided with La Fontaine in the debate that pitted the latter against Papineau. To the former leader who had returned to politics after his years of exile and who asked for the repeal of the union, La Fontaine replied that the regime had been planned in order to crush the French Canadians, but that the latter had succeeded in utilizing it for their own benefit, and they must continue to extract every advantage from it. Cartier was to put this idea into practice. Only one of his speeches during this session has been preserved, one dealing with the St Lawrence and Atlantic Railway and delivered on 15 Feb. 1849; in it all the interest he was to take in railway development, to which he was accused of being slavishly devoted, is already apparent. That same year, as an MLA, he protested against the movement started among politicians and businessmen, particularly of English origin, in favour of the annexation of Canada to the United States, and the subsequent published Annexation Manifesto [see HOLTON]. Cartier all his life had an almost morbid fear of the United States, and was always strongly opposed to its republican institutions. He continued to dread annexation, and in 1870, in a speech against a possible customs union with the United States, he went so far as to say: "Individually, the Americans are good neighbours, but as a nation, there are no individuals in the world who are less liberal towards other peoples, except the Chinese."

Cartier soon showed himself to be one of the most important French Canadian MLAS. He was re-elected by acclamation in Verchères in the general election of December 1851, and in 1852 took his seat at Quebec, now once more the capital La Fontaine had just retired, and power was held by the moderate Reformers, led by Augustin-Norbert Morin* and Francis Hincks*. In general, Cartier supported the two men, but he refused to join the government they directed; he frankly admitted, in a speech on 22 Sept. 1852, that the inadequate stipend attached to the post offered was one of the reasons that prevented him from accepting. Cartier defended the government's policy, nevertheless, against the opposition, which reproached it for postponing the discussion of important questions, such as the secularization of the clergy reserves and the abolition of seigneurial tenure. The government was however in a minority, and it decided to appeal to the governor general, Lord Elgin [Bruce*], to dissolve parliament and call a general election. In August 1854, Cartier was re-elected in Verchères over L.-H. Massue. Of the three groups of representatives returned – the moderate Reformers of Lower and Upper Canada who supported the Hincks–Morin government, the radical Reformers of Upper and Lower Canada, and the Conservatives – none possessed an absolute majority, and none could form a stable government. From the first day of the session, when the speaker was elected, the Hincks–Morin ministry saw how precarious its position was. The Reformers had decided at a general meeting that Cartier should be their candidate for this post. For their part, the Clear Grits and the Conservatives of Upper Canada were in favour of John Sandfield MACDONALD, who had already held the post, and the Lower Canadian opposition wanted Louis-Victor Sicotte*, the MLA for Saint-Hyacinthe. Cartier was proposed on 5 Sept. 1854, but only collected 59 votes against 62, and it was Sicotte who was finally elected. Despite its weakness, the government continued to sit until 7 September, when it was defeated on a question of privilege. The Hincks–Morin government resigned, and an alliance of the Conservatives and moderate Reformers then took place; it was the origin of the Liberal-Conservative party. This coalition supported the ministry of Allan Napier MacNab* and Augustin-Norbert Morin, who was replaced on 27 Jan. 1855 by Étienne-Paschal Taché*. When the MacNab–Taché government was set up, Cartier was called upon to assume the office of provincial secretary for Canada East. As the law required that a minister should have his mandate renewed by his electors, Cartier stood again in Verchères. His opponent was Christophe Préfontaine, and he emerged victorious from a violent struggle waged against him by the radical Reformers, the Rouges, with whom he would have to contend from then on. On 24 May 1856 the MacNab–Taché ministry was replaced by that of Taché and John A. Macdonald*, and Cartier became attorney general for Canada East. On 26 Nov. 1857, as Prime Minister Taché had decided to give up active politics, John A. Macdonald, with Cartier, formed a government; in this government, which was called Macdonald–Cartier until 1 Aug. 1858 and then, from 23 May 1862, Cartier–Macdonald, Cartier remained attorney general.

Since La Fontaine had departed and Taché was growing old, Cartier had become the most influential man in the Lower Canadian section. At the elections held at the end of 1857, following the formation of the ministry, Cartier was re-elected in Verchères over his former opponent Préfontaine but was defeated in Montreal, where he had also stood, by Antoine-Aimé Dorion*. (In the general election of 1861, Cartier stood only in the newly created riding of Montreal East, and this time he emerged victorious from the battle against A.-A. Dorion.) For some years the assembly had been discussing the selection of a permanent capital: the cities of Quebec, Montreal, and Bytown (Ottawa) had been suggested. In 1857, nonplussed by varying opinions, the Macdonald–Cartier ministry obtained approval for an address to the queen in which she was requested to choose a capital. On the advice of her Canadian ministers, she decided on Ottawa. At first a supporter of Montreal, Cartier had finally come round to Ottawa, a choice which at the time seemed surprising, but which was consistent with the development of Canada westwards. In July 1858, when the royal decision was made known, a motion passed by a vote of 64 for and 50 against stating that "in the opinion of this House the City of Ottawa should not be the permanent seat of the government of this province." The Macdonald–Cartier ministry decided to resign and was replaced for two days by a ministry led by George BROWN and Antoine-Aimé Dorion; it was unable to preserve the majority required to remain in power because of the necessity for the new ministers to be re-elected. To avoid this difficulty the Cartier–Macdonald ministry, which replaced it, resorted to a device that has remained in history under the name of "double shuffle." Interpreting strictly the law that dispensed with re-election for a minister called to another ministerial post within a period of one month after his resignation, the ministers first accepted portfolios different from those they had held in the former government, and the next day resumed their former offices, thus being freed from the obligation to be re-elected. The Cartier–Macdonald ministry did, however, have to resign in May 1862, after being defeated in the house on the second reading of the Militia Bill: several supporters of Cartier deserted him on the grounds that the new law would result in excessive expenditure.

During this period from 1857 to 1862, Cartier gave evidence of great activity. In the autumn of 1858 he went to London with Alexander Tilloch Galt* and John Ross to put before the English government a plan for the federation of the provinces of British North America. Cartier had expressed approval of such a measure in August 1858, when Galt had entered the government on condition that it accept his plan of federation. However, in the face of the reticence of the other provinces, the English government did not deem it wise to put the plan into effect. Cartier was received by Queen Victoria, and it was on this occasion that he stated that an inhabitant of Lower Canada was an Englishman who spoke French. In the summer of 1860, in his capacity as prime minister, he accompanied the Prince of Wales during his visit to Canada and with him, on 25 August, officiated at the opening of Victoria Bridge, of which he had encouraged the construction [see HODGES].

As a minister and prime minister, Cartier was the guiding spirit behind many legislative measures; these measures contributed, in the middle of the last century, to the development of United Canada, and established institutions out of which have grown those that still govern Canada, and more particularly Quebec. In 1855 the government of which Cartier was a member had passed the Lower Canada Municipal and Road Act of 1855 (18 Vict., c.100), which created municipalities corresponding to the church parishes and grouped them in county municipalities; it was the basis of the system still to a great extent in force in Quebec. In 1860 Cartier had this law reshaped, and on 6 March declared that "our municipal system is one of the principal institutions in Lower Canada." He was also a supporter of the organization of primary education in Lower Canada. In 1856 he completed the fundamental 1846 Act (9 Vict., c.27), which established schools in all parishes and confirmed the principle of the religious duality of these schools, by having parliament decree that a council of public instruction be formed, made up of Catholics and Protestants (19 Vict., c.14), and that there be established some training schools for male and female teachers (19 Vict., c.54). He was not a member of the government when, on 18 Dec. 1854, an act for the abolition of feudal rights and duties in Lower Canada (18 Vict., c.3) was ratified, but he had long been in favour of this measure, and in 1853 he had declared categorically: "The seigniorial tenure retards the progress of the country." In 1859, he was to have a law passed which Upper Canada scarcely liked, and on which discussion was lengthy – one sitting lasted 39 hours – to increase the compensation to be paid to former seigneurs, a law that in Cartier's words "will satisfy all the large interests and . . . do justice to the seigniors as well as to the censitaires" (22 Vict., c.48). In 1856 he took part in a reform of the Legislative Council, accepting with some reservations, its elective basis.

It was in the sphere of the administration of justice, and in that of law, that Cartier was to accomplish his greatest reforms. In 1857 he got parliament to enact that in the Eastern Townships, populated mainly by Anglophones, French laws would apply as elsewhere in Lower Canada (20 Vict., c.43). The uncertainty that had hitherto prevailed threatened to create a system of personal law under which persons of the same territory were judged according to different law, by reason of their origins. In the same year, going against old traditions, he brought about the decentralization of the judiciary (20 Vict., c.44). By this measure, the number of judges in Lower Canada was considerably augmented, and new judicial districts were instituted outside the large towns. The work of which he was most proud was the codification of civil law. In 1857 he had an act passed "to provide for the codification of the laws of Lower Canada relative to civil matters and procedure" (20 Vict., c.43). To this end provision was made for the setting up of a commission; its president was Judge René-Édouard CARON, who did excellent work during the period 1859 to 1865. Cartier had parliament approve the plan that was drafted (29 Vict., c.41), and the civil code of Lower Canada came into operation on 1 Aug. 1866. The commission then codified the rules of civil procedure, and they were given effect on 28 June 1867. Cartier also, with John A. Macdonald, initiated the great legislative compilations which in 1859 made it possible to publish, in English and French, The consolidated statutes of Canada, and, in English, The consolidated statutes for Upper Canada; in addition, in 1861 The consolidated statutes for Lower Canada appeared in French and English. Hence La Minerve was able to write on 21 May 1873, at Cartier's death: "Besides what he has done for the advancement and material prosperity of our country, M. Cartier can claim the honour of having remoulded the legislation of Lower Canada, and of having endowed us with a code of laws which, in this respect, raises us to the level of the most civilized nation in Europe."

Standing out as he did against the ministry of John Sandfield Macdonald and Louis-Victor Sicotte from 24 May 1862 to 15 May 1863, and that of J. S. Macdonald and Antoine-Aimé Dorion from 16 May 1863 to 29 March 1864, Cartier was the government's chief opponent. In the general election of July 1863, he again was a candidate in Montreal East, where he defeated Antoine-Aimé Dorion. The latter had for several years been Cartier's principal opponent in Lower Canada. The liberal ideas that he defended were precisely those that Cartier despised. Dorion's alliance with George Brown harmed him in the minds of the Catholic hierarchy, with which Cartier was on good terms, and despite his great qualities he was forced to spend almost all his life in the opposition.

The session that opened at Quebec on 19 Feb. 1864 was to return Cartier to power and bring about the birth of confederation. At the beginning of the session, Cartier violently criticized the government of J. S. Macdonald and Dorion, which enjoyed only a slight majority. On 25 February he began one of the most fiery and lengthy speeches of his career, which went on for 13 hours and throughout several sittings, and in which he attacked the entire policy of the government. Finally, on 21 March, without waiting to be overthrown, the government resigned. The governor general, Lord Monck*, then called on Cartier to take office, but the latter refused, alleging as a pretext that in the circumstances it was better to put at the head of the administration a man less involved in the political struggles of the last few years. The governor followed his advice, and asked Étienne-Paschal Taché, a legislative councillor and former prime minister, who had almost entirely retired from political life in 1856, to form a ministry. Taché accepted, with John A. Macdonald as his counterpart for Upper Canada, and Cartier entered the government as attorney general for Canada East.

On 14 June 1864 the Taché–Macdonald government was defeated as a result of a vote of censure in the house for neglecting to give effect to a loan previously promised to the City of Montreal. In six years, it was the sixth ministry overthrown; no group seemed capable of taking hold, and a general election, the third in three years, did not seem to be a solution. Then on 16 June after some days of manœuvring, discreetly directed by Lord Monck, a coalition ministry was formed; its leader was theoretically Taché, but the real leaders on the Conservative side were John A. Macdonald and Cartier, with whom George Brown had agreed to ally himself on condition that the constitutional difficulties of the past few years be settled. Like Cartier, the political leader of Upper Canada set aside his personal antipathies for the sake of a national objective. All groups, except the radical liberals of Lower Canada, whom Cartier did not need and whom he regarded as his irreconciliable enemies, were represented in the coalition, which was given its essential character by the presence in the same ministry of Cartier and Brown. Up to then they had been unyielding adversaries, but they agreed to unite in order to bring about the federation of Upper and Lower Canada, or, if possible, the confederation of all the colonies of British North America. Indeed, the new government undertook to "bring in a measure during the next session for the purpose of removing existing difficulties by introducing the federative principle into Canada, coupled with such provisions as will permit the Maritime provinces and the North-West Territories to be incorporated into the same system of government."

Within the coalition ministry, Cartier was one of the men chiefly responsible for the birth of confederation. After the setback of 1858, he was convinced that a plan emanating from a coalition government would be more acceptable to the mother country. The British government was moreover now in favour of such a plan, as a result of the inquiry that the secretary of state for the colonies, the Duke of Newcastle [Clinton], had circumspectly conducted when he had accompanied the Prince of Wales to Canada in 1860. Cartier became the advocate of a federation of the provinces of British North America because it appeared to him the best way of extrication from the political difficulties of the period, created especially by the question of representation by population. Lower Canada, which in 1840 had received representation equal to that of the less populous Upper Canada, now was favoured by the subsequent reversal in proportions. Cartier realized that Lower Canada could not hold out indefinitely against rep by pop, and that acceptance of it would not have as many disadvantages in a federative state: several areas important for French Canadians, such as education and justice, would be dependent on a local legislature. Cartier also feared annexation to the United States, and in 1865 he declared: "We must either have a Confederation of British North America or else be absorbed by the American Confederation." In order to consolidate the federation of the provinces, and ensure their expansion and economic development, Cartier strongly encouraged the building of the Intercolonial, which was to make Canada one country from east to west. His connections with the railway companies, and the fact that his legal office represented the Grand Trunk – which would gain from the extension of the line towards the Atlantic ports – had no doubt prompted him to favour such a programme, necessary, he felt, for the development of the south shore of the lower St Lawrence. Finally, it was natural that as a politician he should desire to play a role on a larger stage. From June 1864 to 1 July 1867, Cartier bent his energies and intelligence to the realization of the federative project.

Cartier was a member of the United Canada delegation that took part in the Charlottetown conference at the beginning of September 1864, and he was one of the principal speakers who succeeded in convincing the representatives of the other colonies of the advantages of a confederation. By his speeches in favour of the plan, he also participated in the publicity that marked the delegates' return journey via Halifax and Saint John, N.B. At the Quebec conference, held behind closed doors from 10 to 27 October and for which no official account exists, Cartier seems to have remained on the whole silent. This attitude is explained by the fact that the delegates from the colonies were studying John A. Macdonald's proposals, which had been prepared beforehand by the cabinet of United Canada; Cartier had preferred to defend there the measures he believed necessary to safeguard the interests of his Lower Canadian compatriots. At the session of February and March 1865, the Quebec resolutions, containing the details of the plan for federalism, were discussed and approved. Cartier defended them in a long speech on 7 Feb. 1865, first quoting certain texts at length, to prove that the French Canadians had preserved their institutions, their language, and their religion by their adhesion to the British crown, and that furthermore, by not responding to invitations from Washington at the time of the revolution, they had made it possible for British power to continue in America. He concluded: "These historical facts teach us that French-Canadians and English-speaking Canadians should have for each other a mutual sympathy, having both reason to congratulate themselves that Canada is still a British colony." "If we unite," he added, "we will form a political nationality independent of the national origin and religion of individuals." He was opposed to the "democratic system which prevails in the United States," proclaiming that "in this country we must have a distinct form of government in which the monarchical spirit will be found." He asserted that the clergy were in favour of confederation. "The clergy in general," he said, "are opposed to all political dissension, and if they are favourable to the project, it is because they see in confederation a solution to the difficulties which have so long existed." Subsequently he intervened several times during the debate in the house to answer the arguments of the project's opponents. In particular he opposed an appeal to the people that Antoine-Aimé Dorion wanted to make in order to ascertain popular feeling towards this measure. On 13 March he even went so far as to admit formally, half seriously and half in jest: "It is true, I consult no one when I want to make a decision." He alleged as a pretext the urgency that there was to submit the project to the British government once the assembly had approved it, in accordance with the agreement with the other colonies, even if the latter had not approved in their turn. Indeed, it became evident that the Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island legislatures would not adopt the plan that had been conceived at Quebec. Furthermore in the general election of March 1865 in New Brunswick the supporters of confederation were defeated, and in Nova Scotia the legislature showed some reserve. Despite this situation, Cartier went to London in April, after the session, to present to the government the plan for federalism conceived at the Quebec conference and approved by the legislature of United Canada.

Having returned to Canada at the beginning of July 1865, Cartier continued to play the part of the real leader of the French Canadian majority in the ministry directed by Sir Narcisse Fortunat Belleau*, after Taché's death in July 1865. He took part in the last session held at Quebec, from 8 Aug. to 18 Sept. 1865, and in the first held at Ottawa, from 8 June to 15 Aug. 1866. During the latter session Cartier won acceptance of the plan for the future constitution of Quebec, which provided for the existence of an upper, non-elective chamber; such a chamber was not proposed for Ontario. According to Cartier, economic considerations were not a reason for refusing to give more dignity to our legislative institutions. In reality, a Legislative Council had been established in Quebec for another more precise motive, which his contemporaries stressed: it was intended to protect the Anglo-Saxon minority from the possibility of being harmed by any measure emanating from a lower chamber that represented the popular feeling of the French Canadian majority. It was also during this session that the government of which Cartier was a member suffered a reverse, while attempting to settle the problem of minority rights in education. On 31 July, Hector-Louis Langevin*, solicitor general for Canada East, introduced a bill, inspired by Galt, the object of which was to ensure more rights for Protestants in Quebec. The natural reaction of the Catholics in Upper Canada was to ask that they be granted similar rights, and on 1 August the MLA for Russell, Robert BELL, whose riding on the borders of French Canada was inhabited by many Catholics, introduced on behalf of the separate schools of Upper Canada a bill corresponding to Langevin's. As the MLAS for Upper Canada were opposed to the measure, the government withdrew Langevin's bill, and Bell did the same with his. Galt resigned from the ministry, and Cartier felt obliged to declare, in a speech given at Montreal on 30 Oct. 1866: "After telling you that the Protestants of Lower Canada will have all possible guarantees, I must add that the Catholic minority in Upper Canada will have the same guarantees.” While the opposition newspapers highly approved of such a declaration, they expressed scepticism about this promise of Cartier’s, and asked what would be the concrete solutions. Cartier and his supporters never gave any precise details.

The fate of the Protestant and Catholic minorities under a future federation was to be discussed again and decided at the London conference. Cartier left Montreal for London on 12 Nov. 1866, and from 4 December on he took part in the work of the conference. The delegates from Canada, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia approved, with a few changes, the Quebec resolutions; these became the London resolutions, and finally the British North America Act, which was ratified by Queen Victoria on 29 March 1867. According to testimony published on 26 May 1873 in Le Constitutionnel of Trois-Rivières by Elzéar Gérin*, who was in London, John A. Macdonald tried to transform the federative system that had been accepted at Quebec into a much more centralized union. George-Étienne Cartier allegedly opposed it, and threatened his colleague that he would wire Prime Minister Belleau and ask for the ministry to be dissolved. Macdonald did not insist. This version has been accepted by some historians, without serious proof, but it remains true that Cartier continued in London, as he had at Quebec, to protect the interests of Lower Canada. He won for his French Canadian compatriots living in Quebec rights that he believed essential at the time. He wanted a Quebec that was master of its destiny in the matter of education, common law, and local institutions. Furthermore, he endeavoured to protect the religious rather than linguistic rights of the minorities in other provinces. One may even wonder whether Cartier believed in a veritable Canadian duality which would allow French speaking Canadians to enjoy their rights fully throughout the country from the point of view both of education and of the use of their language. On 15 January Cartier left London for Rome, where he was given an audience by Pope Pius IX. By the end of the month he was back in the British capital, where he took an enthusiastic part in social activities. He returned to Canada in the middle of May.

On 1 July 1867, the day of the official birth of the dominion of Canada, Cartier was at Ottawa. He entered the cabinet, formed by John A. Macdonald at the request of the governor general, Lord Monck, as minister of militia and defence. When the governor announced that Macdonald had been created by Queen Victoria a knight of the Order of the Bath, and that a number of other politicians, including Cartier, were made companions of the same order, a dignity inferior to the first, the French Canadian leader refused the distinction. In the spring of 1868 Cartier was created a baronet, which conferred on him the title of “Sir” and gave him a rank equal to that of the prime minister. At the end of August and beginning of September 1867, elections were held to choose representatives to the House of Commons and to the Legislative Assembly of Quebec. Cartier stood in Montreal East as candidate for both houses, as the law allowed. He was elected to Ottawa after a hot fight against the labour and liberal candidate Médéric Lanctot, and he was elected to Quebec against Ludger Labelle. His party gained a resounding victory in the federal and provincial elections. Out of 65 members from Quebec elected to the House of Commons, there were only 12 opponents of confederation. At Quebec, Cartier officially played a somewhat unobtrusive role, content to be merely a member of the house supporting the government of Pierre-Joseph-Olivier Chauveau*, which in fact was strongly under the influence of the federal body. In the general election of 1871, Cartier again managed to get elected to the Legislative Assembly of Quebec, over Célestin Bergevin, but, fearing the voting in Montreal, he stood in Beauharnois.

In August 1872, in the federal general election, Cartier was again a candidate in Montreal East. His Liberal opponent was Louis-Amable Jetté*, and he was defeated by a crushing majority, thus meeting what was called his “political Waterloo.” Instead of seeking election in another Quebec riding, which would have required the resignation of a Conservative member and probably resulted in a contested election, Cartier agreed to stand in Provencher, Manitoba, where Louis Riel* and Henry James Clarke* were contestants. The latter gave up his candidacy at the request of the lieutenant governor, Adams George Archibald*. As for Riel, he withdrew after much hesitation, acceding to the earnest requests of Alexandre-Antonin Taché*, archbishop of Saint-Boniface, who was happy to avert in this way the complications that the presence of the Métis leader would certainly have brought about at Ottawa. Cartier therefore had no opponent and was elected in September 1872 without even going to the riding, which he was never to see.

Cartier’s defeat in the riding of Montreal East which he had represented for 11 years, and in a town for which he had worked diligently, occasioned surprise and even regrets among his opponents. The governor general, Lord Dufferin [Blackwood*], even wrote to Cartier to express his complete sympathy, and Ignace Bourget*, bishop of Montreal, offered him his condolences. Worn down by illness, Cartier had aged, and had lost his erstwhile ascendency over his supporters; the temporary rise of the Parti National, and to a certain extent the setback that the New Brunswick school question might have seemed to be for Cartier, explain his defeat. At the end of 1871 a certain number of young Liberals, particularly from the Montreal region, among them Louis-Amable Jetté, had attempted to make a synthesis of the best ideas of the two great parties, and had started the Parti National in order to transform the political atmosphere. They were rapidly to return to the Liberal party, but they had time, with their aggressive spirit, to contribute to Cartier's defeat. Furthermore, during the 1871 session the New Brunswick legislature had passed a law declaring that in order to obtain state aid schools must be neutral, which to all intents and purposes made it impossible for the Catholic schools to operate. The latter existed in New Brunswick by virtue of custom, not of law, and thus they could not avail themselves of the protection afforded by article 93 of the British North America Act. In the 1872 session the federal parliament was asked to intervene, and Cartier, in a speech delivered on 29 April, while deploring that New Brunswick had passed the law which had come under attack, admitted that it was valid, and that the protection of minorities at the beginning of federalism was proving to be weak. He was seriously reproached in Quebec.

From 1867 until his death, Cartier was Macdonald's principal lieutenant, and often replaced him as prime minister and leader of the government in the House of Commons. He was a kind of co-prime minister, practically the equal of Macdonald. Officially, he was minister of militia, and attached much importance to this task. He proposed, as a Quebec newspaper put it at the time, to take his "revenge for 1862." He brought before the House of Commons what he regarded as one of the most important measures in his political career, a militia bill that set up a theoretical force of 700,000 men, authorized the formation of numerous regiments, and was the basis of the Canadian system of defence until the war of 1914 (31 Vict., c.40). In the speech that he delivered on 31 March 1868 to introduce the bill in the House of Commons, Cartier explained that he was establishing an active and a reserve militia comprising all the male residents of Canada, from the ages of 18 to 60. "The measure which he was about to introduce . . . would have afforded," he was reported to say, "the means of protection and defence required during the last three years, but at a greatly reduced expenditure. Should there be another Fenian invasion they should be met with still stronger force than on the previous occasion. They would make known by their fortifications and militia measure that they were determined to be British. . . ."

Among Cartier's achievements immediately following confederation, may be placed the negotiations that conducted and the measures he had passed to extend Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific. It was mainly Cartier who was the moving spirit behind the advance westwards; this was something in which he took great pride, but in which, in retrospect, he also saw a few flaws. In October 1868 Cartier and one of his government colleagues, William McDougall*, went to London to negotiate the acquisition of Rupert's Land and the North-West Territory. As McDougall fell ill, the whole burden of the discussions with the British government and the Hudson's Bay Company fell on Cartier alone. He remained in London until April 1869, and had the opportunity to mingle in the political and social life of the capital. Finally, at the beginning of spring, the British government made the company a proposal by which it would receive £300,000 for its territory and retain one-twentieth of the fertile belt. The shareholders accepted the offer, and Cartier returned to Canada in triumph, his negotiations having added more than a quarter of North America to the territory of Canada. At the end of May Cartier had approved by parliament the agreement concluded with the imperial government and the Hudson's Bay Company (32–33 Vict., c.3); when the imperial parliament had in its turn ratified the agreement, the territories were officially joined to Canada on 23 June 1870. It was then necessary to organize these vast spaces, and create political and administrative cadres for the some 10,000 Métis, the descendants of Indians and French and Scotch white people, who lived in the Red River region. The Canadian government had made a clumsy attempt to occupy the new territory and already in the autumn of 1869 had found itself up against resistance from the Métis and from a provisional government directed by Louis Riel. It was Cartier who succeeded in negotiating a solution with Bishop Taché that satisfied most of the Métis' requests, and that took concrete shape in May 1870 with the creation of a new province, Manitoba, which was given a political and administrative system analogous to that of Quebec (33 Vict., c.3). The Métis were guaranteed land; the rights of the two languages were recognized, and the schools of the religious minorities, whether they existed by virtue of law or of custom, were authorized.

It is also to Cartier that we owe in large part the entry of British Columbia into the Canadian confederation. During the spring of 1871, in the absence of John A. Macdonald, who was sick, he obtained the Canadian parliament's approval for the address seeking the establishment of a sixth Canadian province, in return for the promise that it would be linked with the rest of Canada by a railway through the Rockies. "Before very long," Cartier exclaimed prophetically, "the English traveller who lands at Halifax will be able within five or six days to cover half a continent inhabited by British subjects." This became possible in 1885. The government, not wishing itself to build the railway, decided to entrust the responsibility for it to a company, to which in return it would ensure subsidies and grant blocks of land. In the spring of 1872, Cartier introduced a bill in the House of Commons that provided for the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway (35 Vict., c.71). It was at the time of the adoption of this bill that Cartier gave the exultant cry: "All aboard for the West!"

To carry out such a gigantic undertaking, the government had to choose between two financial groups that were competing for its favours. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company, headed by Sir Hugh Allan*, president of a large shipping concern, obtained the contract at the beginning of 1873. It was known that Allan was a political friend of Macdonald and Cartier, but it was none the less a surprise when, at the beginning of April 1873, the Liberal member Lucius Seth Huntington* rose in the House of Commons not only to expose the American origin of the capital of Allan's company, but in particular to assert that the financier had in some sort purchased his contract by paying $350,000 into the Conservative party's funds during the 1872 elections. In the inquiry that ensued, it was proved that Cartier had written to Allan, promising to allow him to build and run the railway, and that he had asked Allan in other letters for sums of money, which were in fact paid: Cartier himself had received $85,000. Such practices were part of the political customs of the day, but this time they were somewhat less than prudent. They are explicable in Cartier's case only by the habit of power, the belief that the good of the party was identified with that of the country, and perhaps also by the beginning of an illness to which he was to succumb at the moment when what has been called the "Pacific Scandal" burst.

At the end of September 1872, after his defeat in Montreal East, Cartier had sailed for England to get treatment in London: he had been suffering since 1871 from chronic nephritis, known as Bright's disease. He had spent the winter in England with his wife and his two daughters. On 20 May 1873 the transatlantic telegraph – Cartier had hailed its inauguration in July 1866 joyously – transmitted from London a telegram in which Sir John Rose*, the former Canadian minister of finance, then acting as a kind of semi-official representative of Ottawa to the imperial government, announced that Sir George had died that morning at 6 o'clock, and that his body would leave on the 29th for Quebec. The news reached Ottawa in the beginning of the afternoon, and John A. Macdonald, after announcing it to the House of Commons, burst into tears; incapable of continuing to speak, he remained with his right arm extended in a dramatic gesture over the empty seat of one who had been his companion for nearly 20 years. The Prussian, which was transporting Cartier's remains, arrived at Quebec on 8 June. A Libera was chanted in the basilica at Quebec, and the coffin was then taken to Montreal. He lay in state in the Palais de Justice, then was conveyed, in the midst of a crowd such as Montreal had never known, to the church of Notre-Dame, where the funeral took place. Cartier was buried in the cemetery at Côte-des-Neiges, where a monument still recalls his memory.

Benjamin Sulte*, a journalist and historian, who during Cartier's last years was one of his associates, has left a portrait of him that his contemporaries considered accurate: "Sir George," he wrote, "was of medium height, even a little short, but one's first impression was of a man of unusual vigour. Without being fat, he was somewhat plump and chubby, so much so that his nerves and muscles were so to speak hidden under this covering. His hands and feet were small, superbly moulded. His head, set straight on his neck, was extremely mobile. . . . The very French liveliness that one noticed immediately one approached him had nothing of that importunate character that the English say is peculiar to the French temperament." The French writer Prosper Mérimée, who had met the Canadian statesman in Paris in 1858, wrote to one of his English correspondents: "I have seen M. Cartier. I was delighted to make his acquaintance. It seems as if I saw a Frenchman of the 17th century returned to visit the country which he had left two centuries before." Cartier was not a great speaker. He spoke with precision and logic in French and in English, sometimes making a few mistakes in the latter. He was a great worker, a strong-willed man, sure of himself, almost overweening. He was a leader who imposed his will somewhat brutally. He could also be genial, particularly at the numerous gatherings held in his home at Ottawa during the last years of his life.

Cartier had a profoundly conservative mind. True, he accepted discoveries and progress; he understood better than some others the transformations that the acceleration of communications would bring about, and it was not out of mere personal interest that he was in favour of railways. But, in the realm of ideas, he feared innovations, and particularly those advocated by liberals inspired by the 1848 revolution and by American republicanism. He was attached to British institutions, which, in conferring responsible government, seemed to him to guarantee sufficiently the triumph of a democracy tempered by a non-elective upper chamber. From the religious point of view, he was not a mystic but a sincere Catholic. Among his possessions, after his death, was found an Imitation de Jésus-Christ in Latin, which he seems to have consulted frequently and in which he had underlined the conclusion of chapter XXIX, book 3; in English it reads as follows: "He who does not desire to please men nor fear to displease them will enjoy great peace." For Cartier, to be a French Canadian was to be a Catholic. He was respectful of the clergy, to whom, according to him, French Canadians owed great gratitude, but he none the less preserved his full freedom of judgement and decision in temporal matters, so much so that he was regarded as a gallican. Immediately after confederation, he supported his former masters, the Sulpicians, in their opposition to the archbishop of Montreal, Ignace Bourget, who wanted to divide the parish of Montreal. He showed his gallican convictions on that occasion by claiming that it was the job of the state and not of the bishop to intervene in the civil organization of parishes.

By his marriage, which was solemnized on 16 June 1846 in the church of Notre-Dame at Montreal, Cartier had become allied to an excellent bourgeois family of Montreal. He had married Hortense Fabre, who was born on 28 Feb. 1828. She was the daughter of a wealthy merchant, Édouard-Raymond Fabre*, and the sister of Édouard-Charles Fabre*, the future bishop of Montreal, and of the journalist Hector Fabre*. Cartier and his wife had three daughters: Reine-Victoria, Joséphine, and Hortense. After Cartier's death, Lady Cartier never returned to Canada, and died at Cannes in 1898. Cartier's relations with his wife and her family were not always good. This situation was made public when some time after the statesman's death his will was published; certain provisions of it revealed some mistrust with regard to Lady Cartier and her family. Its publication revived political quarrels, and La Minerve of 7 July 1873 contented itself with saying: "We ask only one thing of our friends, that is to study the testator's intentions with impartiality and to take note of the expression of his religious sentiments which it contains."

Cartier's disappearance changed Canadian political life a great deal. For the Conservative party in Quebec it was one of the first blows that shook the omnipotence it had known at the beginning of confederation, and which it was not able subsequently to recover. In practice Cartier and Macdonald had been equal political leaders for more than a decade, and the former was never replaced in the search for a Canadian equilibrium. After La Fontaine and Morin, who in a brief period in power gave a new direction to politics, Cartier was the most illustrious of a long line of French Canadian politicians who were determined rightly or wrongly to play a role within institutions which, at first sight, seemed foreign to their spirit and their interests. When we judge him, we must place him in his time, and avoid condemning him in the light of the events that have taken place in the last 100 years, and that he could not reasonably have foreseen.

J.-C. Bonenfant

[The most complete biography of George-Étienne Cartier is by H. B. M. Best, "George-Étienne Cartier," unpublished PHD thesis, Université Laval, 1969. In his introduction, Best gives a list of the archival repositories he consulted, the main ones being the PAC, ANQ, and ASSM. The papers of the Cartier estate (property of the Succession Cartier, Montreal) also contain interesting information.

Best's thesis has lessened the importance of other works as sources of information on Cartier. The main ones are: [G.-É. Cartier], Discours de sir Georges Cartier . . ., Joseph Tassé, édit. (Montréal, 1893); Cartier's major speeches between 1844 and 1872 are found in this collection. There is no critical editing but it includes notes which place the speeches in the political context. The Parliamentary debates on confederation (Province of Canada) contain the speeches of politicians during the debate on the plan for confederation. They give a good picture of the various opinions held by the population as expressed by Cartier's supporters and opponents. John Boyd, Sir George Etienne Cartier, Bart., his life and times: a political history of Canada from 1814 until 1873 (Toronto, 1914). By a journalist strongly sympathetic to Cartier but without a historian's craft, this work leaves much to be desired, but for a long time it was the most complete study of Cartier. It was translated into French by Sylva Clapin and includes a fairly extensive bibliography. Chapais, Histoire du Canada, IV-VIII; by a historian of Canadian parliamentary life, these volumes cover the period 1833–67 and provide a good background to Cartier's career. Alfred Duclos de Celles, Cartier et son temps (Collection Champlain, Montréal, 1913); a brief, rather laudatory biography. J.-L.-K. Laflamme, Le centenaire Cartier, 1814–1914; compte rendu des assemblées, manifestations, articles de journaux, conférences, etc., qui ont marqué la célébration du centenaire de la naissance de sir George-Étienne Cartier et l'érection de monuments à la mémoire de ce grand homme d'état canadien (Montréal, 1927). Rumilly, Hist de la prov. de Québec, I. The first volume in this long series deals primarily with Cartier's influence on the government of Quebec, although he was then a minister in Ottawa. Benjamin Sulte, "Sir George-Étienne Cartier," Mélanges historiques, Gérard Malchelosse, édit. (21v., Montréal, 1918–34), IV contains some interesting personal details on Cartier. J.-C. B.]

CASAULT, LOUIS-ADOLPHE, soldier, deputy adjutant-general of the Canadian militia; b. 21 Oct. 1832 at Saint-Thomas de Montmagny, L.C., son of Louis Casault and Françoise Blais; d. 2 July 1876 at Quebec.

Louis-Adolphe Casault's ancestors had come originally from Saint-Pierre-Langers, Lower Normandy, and settled at Saint-Thomas de Montmagny in 1759. Louis-Adolphe was the 13th child of the family; one of his brothers, Louis-Jacques*, became founder and first rector of the Université Laval, and another, Louis-Napoléon*, chief justice of the Superior Court of Quebec. At the age of 12 Louis-Adolphe was enrolled as a boarder at the Petit Séminaire of Quebec and subsequently attended the college of Sainte-Anne-de-la-Pocatière. After his college course, he entered the firm of Casault, Langlois et Angers of Quebec, headed by his brother, Louis-Napoléon, where he studied law for three years.

The legal profession did not, however, appeal to his restless spirit and, in a burst of patriotic enthusiasm, he enlisted in the French army on the outbreak of the Crimean War in 1853. He later wrote: "young and enthusiastic, I was unable to resist wanting to play a part in this event which was already stirring up so much interest in both hemispheres." He had hoped to join the Zouaves in France, but because he was a foreigner he was sent to the Foreign Legion. He served in the Crimea, 1854–55, and was present at the battle of Chernaya and at the capture of the Malakoff at Sebastopol. In June 1856 he went to Algeria with the legion, and took part in the bitter campaign against the Berbers in 1856–57. Although in the Crimea he had become a corporal of grenadiers despite his small stature, and had been promised advancement, Casault lacked the necessary political connections in France to gain promotion. Accordingly, when his enlistment expired in March 1857, he took his discharge and returned to Canada where he wrote a series of articles describing his experiences in the Crimea and Algeria; these were published in 1857 by his cousin, Joseph-Charles Taché*, in Le Courrier du Canada. He intended to resume the study of law, but, when the 100th Regiment of Foot (Prince of Wales's Royal Canadians) was raised in Canada for the British army in 1858, Casault once more found himself in uniform. On 29 June he received a commission as lieutenant and served with his new regiment in England, Gibraltar, and Malta.

Following his retirement from the British army in 1868, he entered the Canadian service, was promoted lieutenant-colonel and became deputy adjutant-general of the militia in Military District 7, with headquarters at Quebec. In 1870 he raised and commanded the Quebec Regiment, one of the two militia regiments which formed part of Colonel Garnet Joseph Wolseley*'s Red River expedition, sent to maintain peace and order in the newly formed province of Manitoba. The militia were in garrison in the winter of 1870–71, the Quebec Regiment being stationed at Lower Fort Garry (Winnipeg). In the spring of 1871 Casault resumed his appointment at Quebec. On the recommendation of Wolseley, he was made a CMG on 16 Dec. 1871.

Lieutenant-Colonel Casault retained his appointment as deputy adjutant-general at Quebec until 16 May 1876, when he was obliged to retire owing to ill health and was succeeded by Lieutenant-Colonel Henri-Théodore Juchereau Duchesnay. At 43 years of age, he died at Quebec, where he was buried with full military honours.

Louis-Adolphe Casault was not long survived by his wife, the former Julie-Cimodecée Cauchon, daughter of the Honourable Joseph-Édouard Cauchon*, whom he had married in 1868. They left two children.

George F. G. Stanley

L.-A Casault, "Trois ans dans l'armée française," Le Courrier du Canada (Québec), sept. et oct. 1857. Canada, Report on state of militia, 1869–76. Le Canadien (Québec), 6 juill. 1876. Journal de Québec, 4 juill. 1876. Morning Chronicle (Quebec), 6 July 1876. Hart, New army list, 1859–69. Le Jeune, Dictionnaire, I, 323. P.-G. Roy, Les juges de la province de Québec, 103.

F.-É.-J. Casault, Notes historiques sur la paroisse de Saint-Thomas de Montmagny (Québec, 1906). Benjamin Sulte, Histoire de la milice canadienne-française, 1760–1897 (Montréal, 1897), 60, 74, 80, 84 F. E. Whitton, The history of the Prince of Wales's Leinster Regiment (Royal Canadians) (2v., Aldershot, Eng., 1926). F.-J. Audet, "Officiers canadiens dans l'armée anglaise," BRH, XXIX (1923), 91. "Les trois frères Casault," BRH, XLVI (1940), 141–42.

CASAVANT, JOSEPH, organ-builder; b. 1807 at Saint-Hyacinthe, L.C., son of Dominique Casavant and Marie-Desanges Coderre; d. 9 March 1874 in the town of his birth.

Joseph Casavant first became a blacksmith. He sometimes liked to abandon the music of the anvil to listen to the only piano in his village, which was in the house of Jean Dessaulles, seigneur of Saint-Hyacinthe. Of an inquiring and enterprising spirit, Casavant gave up the trade of blacksmith at the age of 27 and went to Sainte-Thérèse, with $16 in his pocket, to study under the direction of the parish priest Charles-Joseph Ducharme*, who had just founded a classical college. Although he lived in the village, Casavant studied at the presbytery. He had lost nothing of his taste for music, and he spent hours "drawing sounds from an old piano and from a violin of his own contriving." His natural ingeniousness led Ducharme to advise his pupil to study the mechanism of the organ. The parish priest lent him the works of Dom François de Bédos de Celles, one of which was an enormous treatise, L'art du facteur d'orgues; through the latter Casavant obtained his initiation into manufacturing instruments and learned his new trade. Soon success came his way, for he managed to finish a partially built organ which was in the presbytery and to give it life. The result was that by 1840 he was able to undertake, in his workshop at Saint-Hyacinthe, the building of an organ for the parish church of Saint-Martin on Île Jésus.

In 1843 he offered for sale another instrument, with 12 stops, and in 1844 the parish council of Saint-Jean (Laval County) wanted to have its Casavant organ. It was probably at this period that he took into partnership Augustin Lavallée, father of Calixa Lavallée*, and previously a blacksmith like himself. Casavant's growing fame soon brought him an order for an organ for the church at Bytown (Ottawa). He went to this town to live temporarily, and it was there that on 19 June 1850 he married Marie-Olive Sicard de Carufel. Two sons were born of this marriage: Claver on 16 Sept. 1855, and Samuel on 5 April 1859.

Meanwhile Joseph was receiving more and more orders, and producing an increasing number of fine instruments; for example, those of Kingston (1854), Longueuil (1860), and Saint-Jérôme (1861). In 1866 Joseph who, following the custom of the time, considered himself old at an early age, made over his establishment to his assistant, Eusèbe Brodeur. But he was mindful of his sons' future, and he came to an understanding with the new owner so that the latter would take in Claver and Samuel as soon as they were old enough to learn the trade.

History shows that he was right to steer his sons towards organ-building. Indeed, they became masters of their craft, and their reputation spread throughout America and even to Europe. If the name of Casavant still inspires respect, it is surely because of the company started by the brothers Samuel and Claver. But if they have acquired fame, it is because Joseph, their father, was able to transmit to them creative genius and the love of their art. We can only regret that nothing exists today of those instruments built a century ago by a blacksmith with music in his soul.

Antoine Bouchard

Cyclopædia of Can. biog. (Rose, 1888), 590. Encyclopedia of Canada, II, 10. Émile Dubois, Le petit séminaire de Sainte-Thérèse, 1825–1925 (Montréal, 1925), 53–54. Frère Élie [J.-S. Phaneuf], La famille Casavant; histoire, généalogie, documents, portraits (Montréal, 1914). Gérard Morisset, Coup d'œil sur les arts en Nouvelle-France (Québec, 1941), 116, 118–19. Léonidas Bachand, "L'orgue et les frères Casavant," La Vie canadienne (Montréal), I (1929), 588–92. Antoine Bouchard, "Casavant Frères; facteurs d'orgues depuis un siècle," Forces (Montréal), no.2 (1967), 28–33. Victor Morin, "L'orgue, ce merveilleux instrument," Les conférences du club musical et littéraire de Montréal (Montréal), 1re sér., I (1941–42), 93–105.

CASSIDY, FRANCIS, lawyer, president of the Institut Canadien and of the St Patrick's Society of Montreal, member of the provincial parliament, and mayor of Montreal; b. 17 Jan. 1827 at Saint-Jacques-de-l'Achigan (Montcalm County, L.C.), of Irish parents, Francis Cassidy and Mary McPharlane, who had left County Cavan, Ireland, to emigrate to Canada; d. 14 June 1873 at Montreal, Que.

A Celt to his finger-tips, young Francis Cassidy soon revealed the distinctive qualities of his race, which would enable him to carve out an enviable place for himself in the country chosen by his parents as their second fatherland. "He was," as Laurent-Olivier David* described him, "a little Irish red-head, with a merry eye, a sprightly air, a precocious mind, and lively as a cricket."

His intellectual alertness and eagerness to learn led him, once through primary school in his native parish, to the college of L'Assomption, where he was admitted in 1838 to the first year of the classical course. Despite his family's poverty, he managed to complete the full course of classical studies thanks to the moral and financial support given by Abbé Étienne Normandin, who was director of the college and teacher of philosophy there from 1839 to 1846. Francis Cassidy never forgot that it was this remarkable benefactor who enabled him to finish his studies at the college, particularly after he had lost his father.

Armed with a letter of introduction from his rhetoric teacher, Pierre Garnot, he went to Montreal in 1844 to study law, and entered the office of lawyers Pierre Moreau and Charles-André Leblanc, on the corner of Craig and Saint-Gabriel streets, as a clerk. He had only $60 a year to live on.

As this sum was clearly insufficient even for an ascetic's existence, he began to give French lessons. He liked to recount that at that period it was his lot to wear the same pair of cotton trousers summer and winter, and in severely cold weather to remain in bed on Sundays to save the cost of a fire in his room.

Cassidy qualified as a lawyer on 18 Aug. 1848, and soon entered into partnership with his employers. When Moreau retired, Cassidy shared with Leblanc the responsibility for a large clientele, attracted by a competence that soon made Cassidy, "in criminal and civil proceedings . . . one of the most brilliant lawyers of the Montreal bar," according to David. The latter indicated the reason for this success: "His pleas were concise, terse, and sound; he did not speak for the sake of speaking, to produce an effect on his audience, but only to win his case and convince his judge." On 5 Aug. 1863, at the age of 36, Cassidy was appointed queen's counsel. On many occasions he was called upon to be a member of the council of the Montreal bar. He was elected bâtonnier in 1871, the first Irish Catholic to obtain this distinction.

Cassidy had now become a person of note. His compatriots had chosen him president of the St Patrick's Society, founded in 1834. Profoundly Irish, but brought up in a French-speaking environment and counting a large number of French Canadians among his clients, he was considered to be the embodiment of the entente cordiale that his illustrious compatriot Thomas D'Arcy McGee* wished to see between the Irish and the French Canadians.

It was precisely because of Cassidy's racial origin that the Institut Canadien, of which he was a founder – he was also its secretary and archivist in May 1849 and its president from November 1849 to November 1850 – abolished one of the basic clauses of its constitution. Hitherto, only a French Canadian could belong to it. On 26 Feb. 1862 a friend of Louis-Antoine Dessaulles*, who at that time was disputing with Hector Fabre*, wrote in L'Ordre: "In 1850 the Institut Canadien was presided over by Mr. Cassidy, an Irishman on both sides of his family, and we thought . . . that it was time to do away with this contradiction between fact and law."

Francis Cassidy was elected president of the Institut Canadien a second time, for the period May 1857 to May 1858. Before the end of his term as president, some 135 members resigned on 22 April, under the leadership of Louis LABRÈCHE-VIGER and Hector Fabre, and founded the Institut Canadien-Français on 10 May. The Institut Canadien having been the object of episcopal censure, Fabre's group wanted "to remove from the library a certain number of immoral and irreligious books, applying to this reform the greatest degree of liberalism compatible with the moral interests of the population and public security." The majority of the members, however, refused to allow anyone the right of supervision and of prohibition of books and reading material. Since agreement did not prove possible, the supporters of Fabre's temperate argument left the institute.

Although the Institut Canadien was attacked by Bishop Ignace Bourget* in pastoral letters of 10 March, 30 April, and 31 May 1858, Cassidy remained a member of the association until May 1867. Consequently, when in 1870 he was chosen to be one of the defence lawyers in the lawsuit over the burial of Joseph Guibord* [see TRUTEAU], one of the lawyers on the other side, Joseph Doutre*, his former confrère at the Institut Canadien, took malicious delight in pointing out to him on one occasion that from 1858 to 1867, i.e. for "nine years," he had lived "in that leprosy of impenitence" which he himself "so energetically condemned" in his plea. For in this famous case, according to Cassidy, the opposing parties were not Henriette Brown and the parish council of Notre-Dame, but the Institut Canadien and "the Church of Canada herself, threatened in her most essential immunities." Cassidy, "obeying life-long convictions" and fulfilling "a sacred duty" required of him in his "double capacity as an English subject and a Catholic," defended in his plea, step by step, the stand taken by the bishop of Montreal, as it was set out before Judge Charles-Elzéar MONDELET on 10 and 11 Jan. 1870 by the administrator of the diocese, the vicar general Alexis-Frédéric TRUTEAU.

In the following year his friends persuaded Cassidy to try politics by standing as a provincial candidate in the electoral district of Montreal-West. He was elected by acclamation, and sat in the house at Quebec throughout one parliament. This "likable character" "cut the most curious figure possible" according to Alexandre Lacoste*, who described his interventions as follows: "If the fire of discussion, fanned by party spirit, broke out in the Legislative Assembly, Mr. Cassidy hurled himself into the fray, challenging the right and the left in turn; he accused contestants of exaggeration, asked his friends the Liberals to abandon some of their pretensions, entreated the Conservatives not to misuse their power, and tried to bring about a reconciliation based on mutual concessions. One could divine in Mr. Cassidy the lawyer who had had to reconcile many litigants, but the situation was quite different in the house, where this role of adjudicator and arbitrator was not understood. Needless to say, the sceptre of this new-style Neptune never succeeded in calming the storm."

At the time when Cassidy was endeavouring to play a part for which he was obviously not destined, the illness that was to carry him off prematurely was beginning to undermine his strength. Nevertheless, once more he allowed himself to be persuaded, and stood for the mayoralty of Montreal, to which he was elected by acclamation in February 1873. But he was not able to discharge his new duties for more than a few months, since he died on 14 June 1873 at the age of 46.

His funeral was an impressive one. By a strange coincidence it took place at Notre-Dame two days after that of Sir George-Étienne CARTIER, whose candidature in the district of Montreal-East he had fought the previous year on behalf of his friend and colleague in the Guibord case, lawyer Louis-Amable Jetté*.

Francis Cassidy had remained a bachelor. According to David he regretted not having married, being of the opinion "that marriage alone gives youth its strength and maturity its joy."

PHILIPPE SYLVAIN

Plaidoirie des avocats in re Henriette Brown vs la Fabrique de Montréal; refus de sépulture (Montréal, 1870), 1–13. L'Ordre (Montréal), 26 févr. 1862. Pierre Beullac et É.-F. Surveyer, Le centenaire du Barreau de Montréal, 1849–1949 (Montréal, 1949), 85–90. L.-O. David, Biographies et portraits (Montréal, 1876), 168–80. A. D[uclos] de Celles, "Sir Alexandre Lacoste," Men of the day, a Canadian portrait gallery, ed. L.-J.-C.-H. Taché (Montreal, [1890–94]), 273–81. J.-B.-É. Dorion, Institut canadien en 1852 (Montréal, 1852). Anastase Forget, Histoire du collège de l'Assomption (Montréal, [1933]). J.-L. Lafontaine, Institut canadien en 1855 (Montréal, 1855). Sylvain, "Libéralisme et ultramontanisme," Shield of Achilles (Morton), 111–38, 220–55. É.-F. Surveyer, "Two of the early English-speaking Bâtonniers of the Montreal bar," RSCT, 3rd ser., XLIII (1949), sect.II, 45–55.

CAUCHON, dit LAVERDIÈRE, CHARLES-HONORÉ. See LAVERDIÈRE

CAWTHRA, WILLIAM, capitalist; b. Yeadon, Yorkshire, Eng., 29 Oct. 1801, son of Joseph Cawthra* and Mary Turnpenny; d. Toronto, Ont., 26 Oct. 1880.

Joseph Cawthra came to Canada in 1803 and settled near the present Port Credit on Lake Ontario. Limited financial resources led him to enter retail trade, one of the few business opportunities of that time. Before long Cawthra broadened his shop into a general store.

His son William was educated by the Reverend G. Okill Stuart* at the Home District grammar school, which was open to children of all ages. William then went into his father's shop, which, like many others in York (Toronto), had profited from heavy British purchasing during the War of 1812. After his father died in 1842, William closed the shop, having inherited it and the greater part of a substantial estate. In 1849 he married Sarah Ellen Crowther, sister of James Crowther, a lawyer, and lived in a brick cottage in Yorkville village, at Bloor and Jarvis Streets in present-day Toronto.

While living there he built a large and handsome house at Bay and King streets. It was completed in 1853 and there he passed the rest of his days. Designed in classical style by Joseph Sheard*, it was constructed of cut stone, with roof timbers hand-hewn and fastened together by wooden pegs. The house was in the area of Cawthra's principal business interests, for he owned downtown property bought by his father or himself. The rents in that district rose in value and no doubt constituted the greater part of Cawthra's income. He also, however, made loans of a conservative character, on the security of real estate or of bank and government bonds and was a large holder of bank stocks. He was a director of the Bank of Toronto and of one or two companies. He had at least one secretary or agent, but as he does not appear to have had a business address he evidently conducted his affairs from his house.

Cawthra was alderman for St Lawrence ward in the first Toronto City Council of 1834, and again in 1836 after a conservative reaction had eased. In 1847 he was appointed by council to the Board of Trustees for common schools. He was an active worker in the House of Industry and a contributor to the building of the Toronto General Hospital. He died, without issue and intestate, leaving an estate of more than $2,000,000. His beautiful house long remained as his monument, but he is a shadowy figure of whom there is little record.

G. DE T. GLAZEBROOK

York County Surrogate Court (Toronto), will of William Cawthra. Past and present, notes by Henry Cawthra and others, comp. A. M. Brock, ed. A. H. Young (Toronto, 1924), 32–36. Middleton, Municipality of Toronto, I, II. Ross and Trigge, History of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, III, 356–57, 384.

CÉRÉ DE LA COLOMBIÈRE, MARIE-JULIE-MARGUERITE, dite Soeur Mance, Religious Hospitaller of St Joseph of Montreal, superior of her community 1851–57 and 1863–69; b. 29 June 1807 at Longueuil (Chambly County), L.C., daughter of François Céré de La Colombière, farmer, and Ursule Brin; d. 6 Dec. 1876 at Montreal, Que., and buried on the 9th in the vault of the monastery.

Marie-Julie-Marguerite Céré de La Colombière entered the Hôtel-Dieu of Montreal on 19 Feb. 1825 and on 17 March 1827 made her solemn profession of poverty, chastity, and obedience. She held various posts before assuming the headship of her community. Between 1851 and 1869 she was four times elected superior of the Hospitallers. The 12 years of her administration are particularly noteworthy for three projects: St Patrick's Hospital, assistance to orphans and the aged, and the lazaret at Tracadie (New Brunswick) for the care of lepers.

On 21 June 1852, in the old Baptist college, Sister Mance founded St Patrick's Hospital, intended for the Irish. She enlarged the sphere of activity of the Hospitallers in 1856; to the care of the sick she added help to orphans, and she admitted old men to the Hôtel-Dieu. St Patrick's Hospital and the orphanage, which was just beginning, were combined with the Hôtel-Dieu when it was moved in 1860 from Rue Saint-Paul to the domain of Mont-Sainte-Famille, on the slopes of Mount Royal.

On 12 Sept. 1868 Sister Mance sent some of her nuns to take over the direction of the lazaret at Tracadie, in New Brunswick, and look after the lepers there [see Ferdinand-Edmond GAUVREAU]. In reality Sister Mance was founding a new independent community of the Institute of Religious Hospitallers of St Joseph. Out of the lazaret was to grow the Hôtel-Dieu of Tracadie; the former disappeared in 1965.

The annals of the Hôtel-Dieu of Montreal say of Sister Mance: "Great and memorable events took place under her administration and are associated with her memory to remind us continually of her name and her good deeds." By extending both spiritually and materially the activities of the Hôtel-Dieu of Montreal, Sister Mance gave new impetus to the first charitable work of the Hospitallers of Ville-Marie. Julie Céré, dite Sœur Mance, therefore nobly bore the name of Jeanne Mance*, the founder of the Hôtel-Dieu of Montreal, and kept intact the spirit of charity that animated Mothers Judith Moreau* de Brésoles, Catherine Macé*, and Marie Maillet*, the first Hospitallers who came from La Flèche (department of Sarthe) to Ville-Marie on 20 Oct. 1659.

ANDRÉE DÉSILETS

AHDM, Actes de décès, 1681–1890, 9ᵉ feuillet, 77; Annales, II, 260–347; Annales, III, 216, 228–320; Lettres circulaires, nécrologies, 1861–1884, X, 226–36; Obédiences des religieuses hospitalières de Saint-Joseph de l'Hôtel-Dieu de Montréal, 1827–1876; Procès-verbaux, vêture et profession, 1787–1847, 99, 104; Registre des entrées et professions. Jeanne Bernier, Trois siècles de charité à l'Hôtel-Dieu de Montréal, 1642–1942 (Montréal, 1949). L'œuvre de trois siècles à Ville-Marie, 1659–1959; les Religieuses hospitalières de Saint-Joseph ([Montréal], 1959).

CHANDLER, EDMUND LEAVENS, merchant and politician; b. 21 Dec. 1829 at Freligh sburg, Missisquoi County, L.C., son of Horace Mitchell and Lydia Leavens; d. 21 Aug. 1880 at Brome Corner (Brome, Que.).

Daniel Chandler, grandfather of Edmund Leavens, was born in East Hartford, Connecticut, and came to Canada in 1799, settling with his wife, Dolly Ayer, in "Slab City," an early local name for Frelighsburg. There Edmund Leavens was born. After receiving an "Academical education," he taught school, and at age 21 went to Lowell, Massachusetts, where he was secretary in a company of real estate dealers. In 1855 he moved to Brome Corner where he became a partner of Henry Rogers Williams, dealer in dry-goods, hardware, groceries, etc. At this time Brome Corner, although only a village of about 150, was the centre of a prosperous dairy-farming region and "the chief seat of business in the township." In the same year Chandler was elected secretary-treasurer of the Brome County council, and he held this office for 13 years. In 1856 he was elected chairman of the board of school commissioners of the township and served for six years. Three years after his arrival he was erecting a brick dwelling (still in use) and a small brick store adjoining it, in which he ran a general business until his death. He married, on 9 April 1860, Amanda Jane Darling, a teacher in the village's select school. His wife long survived him, but their only son died in 1878 at age 17, the year his father was elected to parliament.

Chandler's public career included serving as mayor of the township of Brome (1868–72) and as warden of Brome County (1868–72). "He was one of the original and most influential promoters of the South-Eastern Railway, of which corporation he was elected Secretary-treasurer, holding that office from the formation of the company in 1867 'til 1876." This railroad (later to be taken over by the Canadian Pacific Railway) was of great importance in the development of Brome County; at Brome Corner the first sod for it was turned in August 1871 and the first train arrived in Knowlton in 1875; regular service from Sutton Junction to Sorel started in 1879.

"Although [Chandler was] an active and earnest supporter of the Liberal party all his life, this gentleman's aversion to pushing himself forward kept him many years in the background of politics." On 17 Sept. 1878, however, he became the Liberal member of parliament for Brome County in the House of Commons in the general election. He defeated, by a large majority, Judge Samuel Willard Foster of Knowlton, although the Liberal government under Alexander Mackenzie* was defeated by John A. Macdonald*. Chandler remained the sitting member until his death in 1880. By his death "Brome County lost one of its most highly esteemed citizens."

H. B. S.

Bishop Stewart Memorial Anglican Church Cemetery (Frelighsburg, Que.), Daniel Chandler. Brome County Historical Society Museum Archives (Knowlton, Que.), Genealogical records, Mrs. A. J. Patten Chandler to H. B. Shufelt, 9 Sept. 1933. St John's Anglican Church Cemetery (Brome, Que.), Chandler family. St Paul's Anglican Church (Knowlton, Que.), Registers. Guide to Canadian ministries since confederation, July 1, 1867–January 1, 1957 (PAC pub., Ottawa, 1957), 12. Illustrated atlas of the Dominion of Canada... (Toronto, 1881), xviii. George Chandler, The Chandler family: the descendants of William and Annis Chandler, who settled in Roxbury, Mass. 1637 (1st ed., Boston, 1872; 2nd ed., Worcester, Mass., 1883). Cyrus Thomas, Contributions to the history of the Eastern Townships: a work containing an account of the early settlement of St. Armand, Dunham, Sutton, Brome, Potton, and Bolton . . . (Montreal, 1866), 256–58.

CHANDLER, EDWARD BARRON, lawyer, judge, politician, and administrator; b. 22 Aug. 1800 in Amherst, N.S., son of Charles Henry Chandler and Elizabeth Rice; d. 6 Feb. 1880 in Fredericton, N.B.

Edward Barron Chandler's grandfather, Colonel Joshua Chandler, had been a member of the Connecticut legislature and a relatively wealthy man before joining the loyalist ranks and settling in Nova Scotia in 1783. One of Joshua Chandler's sons, Samuel, took an active part in the public life of Nova Scotia; two of his daughters married into influential New Brunswick families: Mary married Joshua Upham*, a puisne judge of the Supreme Court and an early member of the Legislative and Executive councils of New Brunswick, and Sarah married Amos Botsford*, first speaker of the New Brunswick assembly. Edward Barron Chandler claimed that he had experienced hardships in his youth; but even if this were the case, his wealth of proper family connections was to prove compensation for any loss of family fortunes.

Chandler's father was sheriff of Cumberland County, N.S., and he was brought up and educated in Amherst. Later he studied law with his cousin, William Botsford*, at Westcock, near Sackville, N.B., wrote bar admission examinations in Nova Scotia in 1821, and was admitted to the bar of New Brunswick in 1823. In the same year he was appointed judge of probate and clerk of the peace for Westmorland County, N.B., positions which he held until 1862. Chandler resided at Dorchester and within a few years had built his family residence, Rocklyn, a "home of lavish hospitality even for a Colonial magnate." His law practice and judicial appointments must have been lucrative for Chandler was soon thought to be a man of considerable wealth. In 1822 he had married Phoebe Millidge, a descendant of the Botsfords; they had 11 children, seven of whom lived to maturity.

Chandler's long association with New Brunswick politics began when he was elected to the House of Assembly in 1827 to represent the county of Westmorland. From his first session in the assembly in 1828, he took an active part in deliberations and, despite his youth, he was soon regarded as one of the leading members of that body. The first issue in which he became involved concerned the control of crown lands and the disposition of the customs revenue in the province. Both were directed by personnel appointed by the Colonial Office, which administered all revenues. To Chandler this arrangement denied the people of the province one of their basic freedoms. During his first year in the assembly he sat on a committee to consider these problems, and in 1833 he and Charles Simonds* went to London as a committee on grievances in an attempt to solve the conflict. The delegation nearly realized its objectives and Chandler gained a great reputation as a champion of the people. He later advocated the granting of a permanent civil list in return for complete control of the casual revenues by the assembly – a step which was taken in 1837.

While he sat in the assembly, Chandler continued to play the role of the tribune, becoming involved in such questions as the quitrents, Catholic emancipation, the rights of the Acadian population, school administration, the revision of provincial laws, and immigration. In all of these issues he adopted a progressive and enlightened attitude to problems and continually pleaded with his colleagues for a rational, calm, and dispassionate approach. During the 1830s, for example, Chandler warmly supported measures which would exempt Acadians from being taxed for poor relief since they cared for their own poor. In addition Chandler argued in favour of a grant for an Acadian school in Kent County to be administered by the Roman Catholic bishop. As might be expected, such a proposal was bitterly opposed by some members of the assembly. In giving the measure his continued support, Chandler displayed a keen insight into the way of life of the Acadian people. Because of their "peculiar habits and manners," he acknowledged that the French could not send their children to the public schools. It would be in vain, he said, for legislation to endeavour to assimilate them with other groups.

An advocacy of this kind gained for him the reputation of a moderate reformer, although such labels must be read carefully in the context of New Brunswick politics of that period. It would be a mistake, for instance, to compare his role with that played by the principal reformers in the other provinces. The casual revenues–civil list issue illustrates perhaps better than any other Chandler's theory of government. In his view, democracy would be served when complete control of the provincial revenues was turned over to the assembly, with the important qualification that the initiation of money bills be left with individual members of that body. He felt strongly that the power of the people's representatives should not be diminished by placing this all-important responsibility with the executive which, in New Brunswick, the assembly could not remove by a want-of-confidence motion. He consistently opposed, during this early period, the principle of party government and cabinet responsibility. Thus, although he was a moderate and responsible representative of the people, and although he advocated a basic form of democracy, he clearly did not accept responsible government in the sense in which it was advocated by Joseph HOWE and the Canadian reformers.

Despite his interest in the affairs of the assembly, Chandler aspired to higher things and in 1834, at the age of 34, he applied directly to the Colonial Office for a position on the bench of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick. The application was not successful, but in 1836 he was appointed to the Legislative Council where he remained until 1878. In the upper house, Chandler, despite his youth, played the part of an elder statesman. Whether by accident or design, his appointment came just as the casual revenues–civil list bill was being debated, and he took a strong stand in favour of the measure. He was opposed by men with obvious vested interests such as Thomas Baillie* and Joseph Cunard*, but the bill eventually passed by a vote of eight to five. Chandler's presence seems to have had a levelling influence on the council whose members were traditionally supporters of the status quo.

In 1843 Chandler joined the Executive Council of Sir William Colebrooke* and, with one brief interruption, remained the acknowledged leader of the "compact" government until 1854. In this position of power he was able to impose his version of responsible government on the province. In November 1846 and March 1847 Lord Grey [Henry George Grey] made his attitudes on colonial government clear. The essence of his policy was that the government of the provinces must not be carried on in opposition to the wishes of the people, and that there should be no obstacle placed in the way of a responsible cabinet system. By 1848 the actual colonial administration of British North America was changing, and Chandler was aware of these events. But such radical change did not seem to be practical given the situation in New Brunswick. With no municipal government and with the assembly's control of public moneys, the members commanded the powerful tool of patronage, and were not anxious for change. In effect this was a rather benevolent patriarchal form of government in which the great power of the Legislative and Executive Councils was balanced by the assembly's power over funds. Such a system allowed the members of the "compact" to control major government policy, while leaving to individual members in the assembly the care of matters of purely local interest. Change was counselled from without, but there was no broadly based demand for it within the province.

Into this climate in 1848 came a new lieutenant governor, Sir Edmund Head*, determined to carry out the instructions of Lord Grey. It is significant that the man he chose to lead his government was Edward Barron Chandler. By this time Chandler was publicly supporting the principle of responsible government, and he did make a sincere effort to choose as executive councillors members of the assembly who could be said to enjoy the confidence, if not the active support, of the majority of the elected members. The new government contained an interesting mixture of old "compact" hold-overs, "conservative" members, and two of the most prominent reformers – Lemuel Allan WILMOT and Charles FISHER. It represented the best of the talent available, enjoyed the confidence of the assembly, and was heralded as a "responsible" administration. Beneath the surface, however, little had changed; during the six years in which this government remained in power, the administration of the province was carried on much as it had been in the past. Members of the assembly sacrificed little for they retained the right to initiate money bills and they were not subject to party discipline of any kind. In all of this Chandler emerges as the eternal pragmatist.

During the years when Chandler led the government, New Brunswick was caught up in the great era of railway building, and Chandler became a leading advocate of an improved system of transportation within the province and with its neighbours. Of immediate interest was a line which would connect the east coast of the province with the port of Saint John and the western counties. The proposal had been studied in the late 1840s and in 1850 it received a boost when railway promoters in Maine expressed an interest in tying in to a New Brunswick–Nova Scotia system [see John POOR]. In the summer of that year Chandler and several other legislators from New Brunswick and Nova Scotia attended a great railway convention in Portland, Maine [see J. W. JOHNSTON and Howe]. It was at this meeting that the foundation was laid for the European and North American Railway Company.

At the same time discussions were carried on concerning a railway between Halifax and Quebec running through New Brunswick, but Chandler and his colleagues were sceptical about that scheme. In the first place, this line was being proposed primarily for military and political rather than economic reasons. Secondly, the British government, which would have to bear the brunt of the financing, supported the Intercolonial route, along the east coast and north shore of the province, whereas the majority of influential New Brunswickers favoured a Saint John River valley route. Nevertheless, in 1851 Chandler and Joseph Howe went to Toronto to meet the members of the Canadian legislature, and there they agreed in principle to build the railway. Early in 1852 a delegation of Canadians headed by Francis Hincks* met with Chandler in Fredericton and later, accompanied by Chandler, went on to Halifax to meet with Howe. In these meetings they agreed upon the Saint John valley route and discussed the financial arrangements, taking for granted that the British government would assume its share. They were greatly disappointed, however, when a delegation headed by Hincks and Chandler met the colonial secretary in London in the spring of 1852 and were informed that the British would give no financial support to a line running through the Saint John valley because such a route would not give the military advantages of a coastal railroad.

Chandler was disappointed to see his plans dashed by a stubborn British government, but he stayed on in England in an attempt to salvage something. As far as the New Brunswickers were concerned, the essential part of the scheme was a line to the American frontier, and before returning home Chandler negotiated with the firm of Peto, Brassey, Betts, Jackson, and Company for its construction. Negotiations were completed and approved by September 1852 and work began the following year. Although it would be many years before adequate railways were built in the province, the era of railway construction had at least commenced, and the man primarily responsible for it was Edward Barron Chandler.

The question of a reciprocal trade agreement with the United States was discussed periodically while Chandler was government leader. Many New Brunswickers, including Saint John businessman John ROBERTSON, Wilmot, and John R. Partelow*, a leading Saint John MLA, favoured such a proposal in the 1840s and early 1850s. By 1854 there was a certain scepticism that the province would receive sufficient compensation – free admission to the United States of processed lumber, fish, and other natural products, and, most of all, permission for New Brunswick ships to participate in the American Atlantic coastal trade – for its loss of exclusive rights to the inshore fisheries. During that year Chandler, Francis Hincks, and Lord Elgin [James Bruce*] went to Washington for negotiations, and, as a result, signed the reciprocity treaty of 1854. When Chandler returned home, however, he found considerable opposition to the terms of the treaty being expressed by some of the province's newspapers. Immediately he and Partelow went to Quebec to confer with Elgin and returned with renewed conviction of the potential value of the treaty. By November they succeeded in having it ratified by the legislature.

An election in 1854 heralded great changes in New Brunswick and marked the end of the most active part of Chandler's career. A relatively cohesive group of opposition members had formed in the assembly under the liberal banner of Charles Fisher, and early in the session Chandler's "compact" government was defeated. The government resigned, recognizing for the first time the truly responsible nature of the executive, and the new lieutenant governor, John Henry Thomas MANNERS-SUTTON, called upon Fisher to form a government. Chandler, of course, retained his seat in the Legislative Council; he continued to take an active part in provincial affairs as the most prominent member of the "Dorchester Clique" and as leader of the opposition in the upper house. It was in this capacity that he became intimately involved in the confederation movement.

When the conference on Maritime union was convened in 1864, Chandler was appointed as one of the New Brunswick delegates, and he attended the conference in Charlottetown and further meetings in Halifax and Saint John. He had never taken a strong stand on the issue, and from the outset he adopted a questioning attitude. Thirty-seven years' experience in the political life of New Brunswick had taught him that Maritime politicians would not act contrary to the dictates of local pride and jealousies, which caused disagreement on such an elementary question as the location of a capital. When the possibility of a broader British North American union was raised, however, Chandler warmly supported it and fought strongly for a preliminary union of the Maritime provinces on the grounds that, as a unit, their position in the wider union would be more powerful. Chandler's enlightened arguments were not popular, and the cause of Maritime union was forgotten, much to the disgust of the lieutenant governor, Arthur Hamilton Gordon*.

In the fall of 1864, Chandler went as a New Brunswick delegate to the Quebec conference and participated in the drafting of the 72 resolutions. He made ardent representations against John A. Macdonald*'s case for a strong central authority, though he soon recognized that he was fighting a losing battle. Faced with the defeat of his stand on provincial rights, Chandler nevertheless acknowledged the inevitability of confederation and took comfort in the strong Maritime representation in the Senate, which he interpreted as an absolute guarantee that the Upper Canadians would not dominate the new union.

During the following year the confederation scheme encountered great opposition among the electorate in New Brunswick and for a time it appeared that achievement of it might be destroyed, or at least indefinitely postponed. Throughout the war of words waged during 1865 and 1866, Chandler, ignoring new political alignments, remained consistent in his support. He taunted the anti-confederates with statistics on the financial situation in the province and warned of the dire consequences of remaining outside confederation. The position of this respected member of the old establishment was simply another factor which militated against the anti-confederation cause. Albert James Smith* and his followers failed to find a viable alternative to confederation and in June 1866 Samuel Leonard Tilley* and the confederates were returned to office. Later that year Chandler went to London for the conference which was to weld the 72 resolutions into legal form. His opposition to investing the residual power in the central government had not changed but the Canadian delegates were irrevocably committed to the Quebec scheme and would allow no major revisions.

Confederation did not bring an end to Chandler's public career, despite his advanced age. He was offered a seat in the Senate of Canada, but throughout the confederation debate he had maintained that he was not interested in public office for himself and, true to his word, he declined the appointment. In 1868, however, he was asked to become one of the commissioners appointed to oversee the construction of the Intercolonial Railway and he accepted the position. Ten years later, at the age of 78, he received his final public appointment – as lieutenant governor of New Brunswick, succeeding Tilley.

Edward Barron Chandler's career in the public life of his province must be unique, if only because of its longevity. Between 1823 and 1880 he held public offices continuously in positions ranging from a county clerk of the peace to lieutenant governor. This long experience and a wealth of family, business, and political connections made him one of the most powerful public figures in New Brunswick in the 30 years preceding confederation. Throughout his career, Chandler does not seem to have been motivated by any overriding political principle. A loyalist and a member of the Church of England, he was always identified with the establishment or the "compact," and yet he displayed democratic tendencies. He was constantly concerned that the will of the people should be upheld, and he consistently supported the rights of the minority Acadians and Irish Catholics at a time when such advocacy demanded a certain amount of courage. It is in this respect more than any other that Chandler, as a representative of the "compact," differed from his counterparts in Upper Canada. In spite of these tendencies, however, he was not an innovator. His watchwords were reason and caution. In essence, he was a practical man living in a climate that did not produce, or even gladly suffer, novel political theories.

The fact that his views on the nature of responsible government and the party system prevailed for so long in the province is a commentary on the lack of political sophistication in New Brunswick in the first half of the 19th century. The province either did not produce or did not want a Howe, a Robert Baldwin*, a William Lyon Mackenzie*, or a Louis-Joseph PAPINEAU. Responsible government did come, however, and the fact that it came without bloodshed is to some degree attributable to the stability of Chandler's leadership.

MICHAEL SWIFT

N.B. Museum, Hazen family papers, E. B. Chandler to Sir John Harvey, 3 Feb. 1840; W. C. Milner coll., Chandler correspondence; Tilley family papers, correspondence between E. B. Chandler and S. L. Tilley; Ward family papers, John Ward and Sons letter book, 1832–36; Webster coll., Chandler correspondence. PAC, MG 27, I, D15 (Tilley papers), 1864–67. PANB, New Brunswick, Executive Council Draft minutes, 1843–56 (microfilm in PAC, MG 9, A1). PRO, CO 188/54–188/55, 188/84–188/85, 188/94, 188/104–188/106, 188/127. New Brunswick, House of Assembly, Journals, 1828–36; Legislative Council, Journals, 1836–67. Speeches delivered in the Legislative Council, New Brunswick, on confederation and the resignation of the government, and correspondence connected therewith, reporter, Samuel Watts (Fredericton, 1866).

Colquhoun, Fathers of confederation. M. O. Hammond, Confederation and its leaders (Toronto, 1917). James Hannay, History of New Brunswick; The life and times of Sir Leonard Tilley: being a political history of New Brunswick for the past seventy years (Saint John, N.B., 1897). Lawrence, Judges of New Brunswick (Stockton). MacNutt, Atlantic provinces; New Brunswick. G. E. Rogers, "The career of Edward Barron Chandler – a study in New Brunswick politics, 1827–1854," unpublished MA thesis, University of New Brunswick, 1953. Waite, Life and times of confederation. Edward Whelan, The union of the British provinces, intro. D. C. Harvey (Gardenvale, P.Q., and Toronto, 1927). W. M. Whitelaw, The Maritimes and Canada before confederation (Toronto, 1934). A. G. Bailey, "Railways and the confederation issue in New Brunswick, 1863–1865," CHR, XXI (1940), 367–83. D. G. G. Kerr, "Head and responsible government in New Brunswick," CHA Report, 1938, 62–70. W. S. MacNutt, "The coming of responsible government to New Brunswick," CHR, XXXIII (1952), 111–28.

CHANTER, THOMAS BURNARD, merchant, shipbuilder, and landed proprietor; b. in 1797 (baptized 6 April) at Great Torrington, Devon, Eng., only son of Moses Chanter and Elizabeth Burnard; d. 17 March 1874 at Bideford, Devon.

Thomas Burnard Chanter's uncle Thomas Burnard, a successful English merchant and shipbuilder, established a shipbuilding settlement, New Bideford (later Bideford), on the eastern end of Lot 12, Prince Edward Island, in 1818. A year later, Chanter, who had been trained in England to be a merchant and shipbuilder, assumed charge of the venture. Shortly afterward he took over a farm on Penman Point, P.E.I., which he named Port Hill; here he built a house and a store to serve the extensive settlement on the eastern part of Lot 13; he also established a fishing industry out of Richmond Bay. Chanter became a justice of the peace and captain of the 5th Battalion of the Island militia, and was an unsuccessful candidate for the colony's assembly in 1823.

He returned to England to live in Bideford in 1829 and Thomas Heath Haviland* (d. 1867) became agent on the Island for Chanter's financial interests in the timber trade, land, shipbuilding, and shipping. In 1835 Chanter acquired extensive landholdings, stores, and shipbuilding sites in the area of present-day Alberton, P.E.I. These he ran from England in association with Lemuel Cambridge of Charlottetown. Through the years Chanter's money built at least 35 ships on the Island, and he was responsible for the settlement there of a number of skilled shipbuilders. His ships brought hundreds of immigrants from Britain to Quebec and to P.E.I. On the island these settlers provided labour and a market for his stores.

Thomas Chanter never returned to Prince Edward Island but remained at Bideford, where he and his wife Isabella Scott, whom he had married in 1829, had a fine estate. Chanter played a prominent role in the business and political life of the west of England until his death. He was survived by several children including Robert Campbell Chanter who settled on the Island at Mount Stewart Bridge. Thomas Chanter played a significant part in the establishment of shipbuilding in P.E.I., and this industry was to become one of the Island's most important. His settlements on Lots 12 and 13 also played an important role in populating the western part of the Island.

BASIL GREENHILL

Private Archives, Lot 13, Prince Edward Island, Port Hill papers, especially letters from Thomas Chanter to William Ellis, 31 Oct. 1831 – 10 Aug. 1836. North Devon Journal (Barnstaple, Devon), 23 Jan., 16 Oct. 1828; 24 June 1830; 4 April 1831; 31 March 1836; 29 Dec. 1842; 26 Jan. 1843. Prince Edward Island Register (Charlottetown), 13 Nov., 29 Dec. 1824; 27 May 1825; 7 Aug., 19 Sept. 1826. Basil Greenhill and Ann Giffard, Westcountrymen in Prince Edward's Isle, a fragment of the Great Migration (Newton Abbot, Eng., and Toronto, 1967). Past and present of Prince Edward Island . . . , ed. D. A. MacKinnon and A. B. Warburton (Charlottetown, [1906]).

CHAREST, ZÉPHIRIN, parish priest; b. 21 Feb. 1813 at Sainte-Anne-de-la-Pérade, L.C., son of Antoine Charest and Marie-Anne Marchand; d. 7 Dec. 1876 at Saint-Roch de Québec.

Zépharin Charest was born of well-to-do farmers, and was one of a large family; one brother was a doctor, and Bishop Louis-François Laflèche* was a relative. He was a pupil at the seminary of Nicolet, and, thanks to an outstanding memory, he was brilliantly successful. He completed his theological studies at Quebec, where on 11 Dec. 1836 he was ordained a priest. He was then appointed curate of Saint-Roch de Québec, and there he was to spend the remainder of his life. At the time of the events of 1837 and 1838, the parish of Saint-Roch was one of the most disturbed areas in the Quebec region. The parish priest and his curates were required, when called upon by the bishop, to preach against the revolutionary movement. On these occasions some of the inhabitants of the district even uttered threats against the priest and his curates. In 1839 Charest succeeded the parish priest David-Henri Têtu.

During the second third of the 19th century the Saint-Roch area developed with great rapidity; from less than 8,000 inhabitants in 1831 it went up to nearly 25,000 in 1871. Country dwellers who had come there to work at shipbuilding on the St Charles River were particularly numerous. Charest took an interest in the material as well as the spiritual condition of this population, whose way of life was crude and who had little education. Since the schools run by laymen were too few in the area [see Antoine LÉGARÉ], he appealed to the religious communities to lend a hand. In 1841, following the wish of Bishop Joseph-Octave Plessis*, he asked the sisters of the Congregation of Notre-Dame, who were already in residence in Lower Town, for their services. He had a spacious convent built in which the nuns went to live in 1844, and he made himself their chaplain. The convent of Saint-Roch, which took in boarders and day-pupils, was the object of his tender care and his favourite refuge. The sisters left to the parish priest the task of dealing with many material as well as spiritual questions. The convent had 1,000 pupils at the time of Charest's death.

In 1852 the priest installed at Saint-Roch, in a school first called the École du Sacré-Cœur then the École Lagueux, the Brothers of the Christian Schools, who had arrived at Quebec in 1842. The Saint-Roch parish council, prompted by Charest, assumed the costs of building and maintaining the establishment. When Charest died, there were 800 children in the school run by the brothers.

A number of misfortunes, such as the fires at Saint-Roch in 1845 and 1866, made apparent the charity of Charest, whom contemporaries likened to St Vincent de Paul. Moreover, in 1866, as the shipbuilding which had brought prosperity to his parish was declining before his eyes, he assumed the leadership of a committee to establish the basis for the Shipbuilding Association of Quebec. This company of small shareholders wanted to revive the shipbuilding industry. It seems to have produced meagre results, for shipbuilding continued to decline and emigration from Quebec increased until 1872. The parish of Saint-Roch thus lost much of its drive and vitality.

In 1853 a church was opened for worship at Saint-Sauveur, under the religious leadership of the Oblate fathers [see Flavien DUROCHER]. Saint-Sauveur, which was served by Saint-Roch, developed rapidly, and soon its worshippers asked to be detached from the mother parish. The complete autonomy of the parish of Saint-Sauveur, obtained in 1867, seems to have been accepted regretfully by Charest, who was growing old.

On 7 Dec. 1876 he died at the age of 63. He was given an impressive funeral, attended by 7,000 people and some 50 priests. A few days later he was buried in the church of Saint-Roch. Shortly before that the authorities had changed the name of Rue Saint-Antoine to Rue Charest. Today Boulevard Charest is one of the main arteries of the capital of Quebec.

PIERRE SAVARD

Archives paroissiales de Saint-Roch (Québec). Le Canadien (Québec), 22 janv. 1866. Raoul Blanchard, L'Est du Canada français, province de Québec (2v., Montréal et Paris, 1935), II, 202ff. Carrière, Histoire des O.M.I., III, 137–46. Drolet, Ville de Québec, III, 63–66. J.-C. Gamache, Histoire de Saint-Roch de Québec et de ses institutions, 1829–1929 (Québec, 1929). Histoire de la Congrégation de Notre-Dame de Montréal (10v., Montréal, 1941–), VII, 122, 124; IX, 141. P.-G. Huot, Éloge du Rév. M.Z. Charest, curé de St. Roch de Québec (Québec, 1876). L'Œuvre d'un siècle; centenaire des Frères des écoles chrétiennes au Canada (Montréal, 1937). P.-G. Roy, Les cimetières de Québec (Lévis, Qué., 1941), 199; Les rues de Québec (Lévis, Qué., 1932), 43.

CHAUSSEGROS DE LÉRY, ALEXANDRE-RENÉ, lawyer, legislative councillor, and senator; b. 26 March 1818 at Quebec, son of the Honourable Charles-Étienne Chaussegros* de Léry, seigneur of Rigaud-Vaudreuil, and Josephte Fraser, daughter of Judge John Fraser*; d. 19 Dec. 1880 at Quebec and buried at Saint-François-de-la-Beauce (Beauceville) on 23 December.

After finishing his classical studies at the Petit Séminaire of Quebec, Alexandre-René Chaussegros de Léry received instruction in law from Louis de Gonzague Baillargé*. On 28 July 1842 he was admitted to the bar of Lower Canada. Barely two years later, on 12 Feb. 1844, he married Catherine-Charlotte-Élise Couillard, by whom he had three sons, including William-Henri-Brouage*. Those who knew him are agreed that he gave scant thought to his profession. Law interested him a great deal, but only as it helped him to run his own affairs efficiently.

Alexandre-René Chaussegros de Léry owned properties in Rue d'Auteuil and Rue Sainte-Famille at Quebec, at Sainte-Marie, and at Saint-François-de-la-Beauce. He had also inherited two seigneuries, Rigaud-Vaudreuil and Sainte-Barbe-de-la-Famine. On 10 Aug. 1864 he sold his house in Rue Sainte-Famille to the seminary of Quebec: four years of discussion had been necessary for the two parties to reach an agreement on the price. This sale was probably occasioned by his activities after the discovery in 1846 of gold nuggets in the bed of the Rivière Chaudière. At that time Chaussegros de Léry hoped to become rich by engaging actively in the mining of gold deposits. Everything was in his favour, for around the same period gold was found on his Rigaud-Vaudreuil seigneury. The crown, by letters patent dated 18 Sept. 1846, had recognized him from then on as owner of all the "gold and silver mines, surface mines and ores" on this seigneury. In 1865, with the fever of gold in his blood, he took part in the founding of the De Léry Gold Mining Company. His profits as a shareholder in this project are not known. There is reason to believe, however, that at that time his financial position was good, since in 1867 he was one of a group promoting the plan for a railway to link the towns of Lévis and Portland (Maine). A company was formed on 24 Feb. 1869, under the name of Compagnie de Chemin à Lisses de Lévis à Kennebec; it was also called the Levis and Kennebec Railway Company (now Quebec Central Railway Company). Chaussegros de Léry was its president, but Joseph-Goderic Blanchet* and Louis-Napoléon Larochelle* seem to have done much more than he for this undertaking.

His somewhat inconspicuous role might perhaps be explained by his appointment on 2 Nov. 1867 to the Legislative Council to represent the constituency of Lauzon. Four years later, on 13 Dec. 1871, he became a senator, replacing Elzéar-Henri JUCHEREAU Duchesnay, but he found it difficult to discharge all his obligations adequately; hence he resigned from this post on 11 April 1876.

Chaussegros de Léry was a kindly and affable man, according to Narcisse-Henri-Édouard Faucher* de Saint-Maurice; he always had a friendly word or an excuse for others. The impression left is that he was in his time representative of the perfect Canadian gentleman. He was a charitable man, and made a number of gifts to the parish council of Sainte-Marie-de-la-Beauce. In business, however, he could drive a hard bargain and did not readily give ground before a competitor. He lived comfortably but was careful not to let any of his wealth slip out of his hands.

CLAUDE LESSARD

ANQ, Famille Chaussegros de Léry, Alexandre-René. ASQ, Lettres, X, 39, 119; Seigneuries, LXVIII–LXX; Séminaire, XXXIV, 32–38; LXXII, 19a; LXXXI, 71–71c; CCII, 123–24; S.M.E., 12 juill. 1864; Université, LXXV, 102. L'Écho de Lévis, 1869–76. L'Opinion publique (Montréal), 27 janv. 1881. Pierre Fontanel, Minéraux et roches du Canada (Montréal, 1924). Honorius Provost, Sainte-Marie de la Nouvelle-Beauce; histoire religieuse (Québec, 1967), 391–92. P.-G. Roy, La famille Chaussegros de Léry (Lévis, Qué., 1934), 33–36; Fils de Québec, IV, 22–23.

CHESLEY, SOLOMON YEOMANS, public servant and politician; b. 29 April 1796 at Shodack (now Castleton-on-Hudson), Rensselaer County, N.Y., son of All Saints Chasley (Chassley, Chesley) and his wife Lené Yeomans; m. 18 Aug. 1825 Margaret Ann Vankoughnet, by whom he had a large family; d. 5 Nov. 1880, in Ottawa, Ont.

Solomon Yeomans Chesley's parents left Shodack "for the wilds of Canada" in 1800, settling in Cornwall, Upper Canada. In February 1806 he went to live on the Iroquois lands at St Regis, where the border divides Canada and the United States. By November 1813 he was so fluent in Mohawk that he was appointed interpreter in the Indian Department, and on 25 July 1814 he was commissioned lieutenant in the St Regis Company of Indian Warriors. His services in the War of 1812–14 at Fort Covington, Châteauguay, Four Corners, and Plattsburgh earned him a grant of land and an appointment on 1 Aug. 1815 as agent at St Regis. Aided by 12 chiefs and warriors nominated by the band, Chesley managed about 50,000 acres in Upper and Lower Canada and nine islands in the St Lawrence; the Iroquois leased much of this land to tenants. In 1832 Chesley, who could speak Iroquois, French, and English, succeeded J.-B. de Lorimier as resident or superintendent at St Regis, while remaining as agent. Chesley's residency began at about the same time as the appointment of the Reverend François-Xavier Marcoux, a French-speaking Roman Catholic, as government missionary to the band.

Chesley along with Major William Plenderleath [Christie*], also of the Indian Department, and the Reverend George Archbold, Anglican rector at Cornwall, induced Lord Aylmer [Whitworth-Aylmer*] to allow an annual stipend for a schoolmaster at St Regis, and the Reverend Éléazar Williams*, an Iroquois educated at an Episcopal seminary in Connecticut, was hired. His school, in which he taught from English books, opened in July 1835 and attracted 40 students before Father Marcoux learned of the school in September. Roman Catholic Bishop Jean-Jacques Lartigue* wanted the Indian parents to withdraw their children from the school, and Lord Gosford [Acheson*] removed government support but declined to eject Williams from St Regis. The school closed, and when, in 1847, another school was planned the bishop was asked to name the schoolmaster.

The controversy caused embarrassment to the government which had not wanted to question the position of the Roman Catholic Church at St Regis. Perhaps as a result of Chesley's activities in the matter, his post was slated for abolition in 1837. However, his experience at the exposed Iroquois lands made him useful during the disturbances in Lower Canada later the same year, and he was retained. He kept his life-long interest in the education of the Indians, supporting the manual labour schools pioneered by Plenderleath in Lower Canada.

Chesley had run in the Cornwall riding for the House of Assembly in the election of 1836, as a Tory, but was defeated by George Stephen JARVIS. He took the seat in 1841, but lost it to Rolland Macdonald* in 1844. In the assembly, Chesley opposed Hamilton Hartley KILLALY's selection of the south side of the St Lawrence as the site of the Beauharnois Canal, claiming that the soundings on charts drawn by Frederick Preston Rubidge* were misleading; the canal was built, flooding some of the St Regis lands.

The Indian Department was reorganized soon after his electoral defeat in 1844, and Chesley left the residency on 8 July 1845 to become second clerk at Montreal under the new chief clerk, George Vardon. As a result of a further reorganization in the department, Chesley was appointed accountant in 1851. He was now the most senior departmental official with continuous service since 1813. It was Chesley rather than the chief clerk who acted as superintendent-general briefly in 1852, until a former superintendent-general, Major Thomas Edmund CAMPBELL, was appointed pro tem., and in 1854 until Laurence Oliphant* was appointed. Thereafter, Chesley was in fact, if not title, assistant superintendent-general and, on occasion, for example in 1856, acting superintendent-general.

Learning that the Indian Department was to be taken over by the colonial government, Chesley on 18 Jan. 1859 asked for a pension. On 1 December he retired and moved to Cornwall after having lived in the capital of Canada since 1845. He was elected mayor of Cornwall in December 1860. He later moved to Ottawa and in 1872 he was elected a member of the New England Company, an Anglican society which fostered Indian education.

GEO. MAINER

PAC, RG 7, G1, 87, p.78; RG 8, I, D2, 1171, p.334. PAO, Diary collection, S. Y. Chesley diaries, 1851–54; MS 155, St Regis mission papers (microfilm copy). PRO, CO 42/503, 71; 42/515, 51, 94; 42/516, 36, 607; 42/599, 371; 42/617, 42. British Colonist (Toronto), 21 Jan. 1845. Canada, Province of, Legislative Assembly, Appendix to journals, 1846, app.V, "Report. The select committee to which was referred the petition of Wishe Tegaréhontie and others . . ."; Sessional papers, XVIII (1860), PT.3, no.40, "Return to an address . . . for statements of appointments to public office since July, 1860." Chronicle & Gazette and Kingston Commercial Advertiser, 28 Oct. 1843. Ottawa Citizen, 6, 8 Nov. 1880. Peterborough Examiner, 17 Jan. 1861.

CHEVALIER, HENRI-ÉMILE, journalist and man of letters; b. 13 Sept. 1828 at Châtillon-sur-Seine, Côte-d'Or, France; d. 25 Aug. 1879 in Paris.

Scarcely anything is known about Chevalier's early years except that he enlisted in a regiment of dragoons in 1847, and that he stayed in it three years, at the same time contributing to various newspapers. The liking that he developed for this sideline prompted him to leave the army in order to devote himself full time to republican political journalism, which was then an occupation as hazardous as soldiering. An article he published in the newspaper he had just started, Le Progrès de la Côte-d'Or, landed him in Dijon prison. Republicans were sentenced to exile in great numbers by Charles-Louis-Napoléon Bonaparte [Napoleon III], after his coup d'état of 2 Dec. 1851. Victor Hugo, young Chevalier's idol, went to Guernsey; his distant disciple chose to continue in the United States, the land of liberty, a career that he had barely started. He landed at New York in the spring of 1852, worked for the Courrier des États-Unis there, and left it after a few months because the director, Eugène Masseras, turned over the journal to the Bonapartist cause. At the end of 1852 or beginning of 1853 he came to Montreal, where he knew he would find affinities of language and where he hoped to find affinities of thought. His hopes were not to be disappointed.

In February 1853 he became editor of La Ruche littéraire et illustrée, started by George-Hippolyte Cherrier with the object of publishing exclusively Canadian works in monthly instalments of 64 pages. But La Ruche littéraire – starting with the March issue, it ceased to be illustrated, for want of good sketchers – could never be kept supplied with strictly Canadian material: until it finally disappeared in 1859 it reproduced French writings and translations of foreign works. Moreover, from August onwards, Chevalier and his contributors, mostly exiles like himself, could not resist the desire to give "an account of the diplomatic events of the two continents." Entitled from then on La Ruche littéraire et politique, the paper published poems and pensées of Voltaire and Victor Hugo, gave generous place to romantic poetry, was a medium for republican and antibonapartist ideas, and condemned the intolerance that marked the tumultuous visit of Alessandro Gavazzi* to Canada [see Charles WILSON]. Chevalier, now co-owner of La Ruche, published in this journal instalments of his own novels which had an historical flavour, for instance "L'Héroïne de Chateauguay," "L'Iroquoise de Caughnawaga," and "Le Pirate du St Laurent," in which are to be found episodes taken from L'Histoire . . . by François-Xavier Garneau*, and "Les Mystères de Montréal," a rather obvious imitation of the Mystères de Paris by Eugène Sue. The liberal character of La Ruche no doubt impressed contemporaries as much as did the ungainly manner of these first novels of Chevalier. A proof is that one reader even deplored the "pitiful political chronicles of a blood-red rougisme" that he read there. However, it was lack of funds that brought about the disappearance, in June 1859, of La Ruche, which the preceding month was said to be "at the peak of prosperity," and not the "blood-red rougisme." In the latter respect Chevalier had truly found in the Canada of the 1850s a well-disposed environment.

The Institut Canadien was showing itself at the time in its true colours: the divorce between its thinking and that of the church under Bishop Ignace Bourget* was pronounced, and the clash of uncompromising attitudes was sure to come into the open. Certainly the members of the Institut Canadien, a sort of popular university in Philippe Sylvain's words, had a keen sense of material and social progress which they wanted to communicate to the country, as well as a desire to help the French Canadian community. They waged their fight to the beat of a drum; they blazened forth to the world their leitmotiv of "light, progress, knowledge." They glorified revolutions and their "immortal principles," they protested against the authoritarianism preached by the church and against the temporal power of the pope, they advocated the separation of church and state and even the neutrality of teaching, and, in the name of the right of peoples to decide their own fate, they heartily approved of Italian unification, which was in process of being realized. In their battle they faced the undisputed champion of the most stringent ultramontanism, Ignace Bourget, archbishop of Montreal, who waited for them with vizor lowered. For him, the church represented the supreme authority, and all Catholics owed obedience to its overriding power in religious, scientific, and political matters. This theocratic system, according to which revolution constituted the "absolute evil," could not therefore accommodate a single one of the positions taken by the liberals of the Institut Canadien [see DOUTRE].

It can readily be guessed with what faction Henri-Émile Chevalier would side, especially since the church rallied whole-heartedly to Napoleon III, and since in Canada this sympathy continued until 1859. Shortly after his arrival in 1853, Chevalier was admitted into the Institut Canadien, which that year numbered 499 members. The library contained 2,701 volumes, and its reading room was stocked with 66 newspapers, Canadian, American, and European. The new arrival, full of fervour, used his persuasive powers to get the institute to receive French republicans who were passing through Montreal. In 1854 he gave two "lectures" there (and the apostate, Narcisse Cyr*, three), was entrusted with a course of 18 lessons on French history and literature, and, an important point, was made librarian of the institute. He was still directing La Ruche, and found time to contribute to Le Moniteur canadien, La Patrie, and Le Pays. Moreover, in June 1859 he was to become editor of this last paper, which was the official organ of French Canadian liberalism. All his activities bore the stamp of rougisme, and Chevalier defined himself as follows: "What am I? A socialist republican. What do I want? Social reforms. What do I aspire to? The abolition of nationalities."

This credo did not fit in at all with Bishop Bourget's now belligerent ultramontanism. In 1858 the latter decided to curb the diffusion of revolutionary ideas by the Institut Canadien, and to proscribe books and papers which infected people with this poison. "Impious books" and "bad newspapers" (meaning Le Pays) were to disappear, and it rested with the bishop, backed by the decrees of the Council of Trent, to judge the nature of the works harboured by the institute's library. The liberals saw in this a direct attack on their liberty, and one can ill imagine "citizen" Pierre Blanchet* and Louis-Antoine Dessaulles* having their reading censured by the archbishop of Montreal. So the Institut Canadien kept its few hundreds of volumes deemed harmful by the Congregation of the Index, but lost 135 members who did not want to incur the anathema of their bishop [see CASSIDY].

Chevalier did not appear among the dissidents. He had given up his post as librarian, but none the less continued to take part in the life of the institute. A proof of this is the lectures that he gave there in 1857 on "the history, climate, and produce of the Hudson Bay territory." He held his meetings at the "café de la mère Lepère," in the Ruelle des Fortifications, when his numerous activities permitted. For as well as directing La Ruche, working at the institute, and contributing to various newspapers, Chevalier wrote novels, translated others, translated also the reports of the Canadian Geological Survey, and even, for a fee, gave French lessons. It is not surprising that his health was undermined. (It seems that his financial situation was always precarious, but we do not know whether family obligations were a burden on his budget. We know that he married a Miss Sophronie Rouvier and that they had a still-born child at Saint-Rémi-de-Napierville.) Wearied by this toil, conscious perhaps that even beyond the ocean he could not compete with Louis Veuillot, he took advantage of the amnesty granted to political exiles by Napoleon III on 16 Aug. 1859. Less stiff-necked in his antibonapartism than Louis Blanc and Victor Hugo, Henri-Émile Chevalier left Canada on 17 March 1860. An old enemy, L'Ordre, exclaimed with a sigh of relief: "May the winds be propitious to him!"

Chevalier was only 31, but he was rich with an experience that he would try to turn to account in his own country. He worked on the staff of Le Progrès, and of L'Opinion nationale, a journal of left-wing Bonapartists. He also dabbled in politics, and represented the district of Grenelle on the Paris city council from 1871 to 1875. But it was the literary aspect of his career that was connected with Canada, and that consequently interests us.

James Fenimore Cooper's success in France was sensational; the South American reminiscences of Gustave [Olivier Gloux] Aimard, dressed up in fictional form, still enjoyed great popularity. Chevalier, in a society where romantic literature was out of date and where his radicalism closed the doors of the great newspapers against him, quickly found the course to take: he would turn his American experience into cash. His drawers contained nothing suitable. Never mind about that! He dug up Les Trappeurs de la baie d'Hudson, a translation he had made himself of a work by J. H. Robinson and had published in La Ruche, changed the title and a few of the translator's notes, and resolutely offered Les Pieds-Noirs by Henri-Émile Chevalier to the French public; it went through six editions in two years. In 1861, the same year, appeared a French translation of the Wanderings of an artist among the Indians of North America . . ., by Paul KANE. Given such an opening, he decided to write a series of novels, titled Drames de l'Amérique du Nord, of which Les Pieds-Noirs would be the first instalment. La Huronne would be the second stage. This Huronne is a queer medley: the first two chapters of the "Mystères de Montréal" formed the prologue, eight chapters of "La Huronne de Lorette" were added as they stood, and the rest was borrowed fairly liberally from Paul Kane. The plot is simple (in 1841 two young men leave Montreal for the west coast, to rescue the fiancée of one of them), and is a pretext for describing the geography and customs of Canada and for evoking its history. The two travellers meet a Métis, Poignets d'Acier, a central figure of the succeeding volumes (La Tête Plate, Les Nez-Percés, Les Derniers Iroquois, Poignets d'Acier), who is going to get rich in the gold mines, fight the Indians, direct the Fils de la Liberté during the 1837–38 insurrection, and undertake to drive the English out of Canada and Hudson Bay. The intrigue lacks probability, the figures do not stand out, characters get forgotten during the course of so many wanderings, and each heroine is carried off by Indians, but there is a profusion of "local colour," and the volumes proved successful. By this time an authority on Canada, Chevalier published an historical novel on Jacques Cartier*, produced a very presentable edition of Le Grand Voyage . . . by Brother Gabriel Sagard*, and began another series of Canadian novels, this time without links between them. Examples are Le Chasseur noir, Les Requins de l'Atlantique, Peaux-Rouges et Peaux-Blanches, and La Fille des Indiens rouges (the story of a French explorer who preceded the Cabots in Labrador and Newfoundland in 1494).

It must be allowed that Chevalier has a brisk, lively style, and a fiery imagination, which unfortunately is spoiled by the absence of any kind of discipline in the construction of the plots. His characters act under the impulse of some vague caprice on the part of their creator, and often serve only to express his opinions and prejudices. Chevalier is not sparing of historical facts and details, but his concern for exactitude is too often akin to that of his illustrious predecessor Chateaubriand. His feverish urge to publish harmed the quality of his work and even adversely affected his intellectual honesty. "He writes at the dictates of the moment," Edmond Lareau* said, speaking of his literary contributions to La Ruche, "at top speed, to fill the pages of the issue. You would think the publishers were wrenching the manuscript from his hands." This judgement may also be applied to his later work.

In short, Henri-Émile Chevalier was one of the group of French republicans who came, as exiles from their country, to the banks of the St Lawrence, where they disseminated their ideas and set passions afire at the Institut Canadien. Having returned home, they held learned discourse on a country that they knew superficially. Not over scrupulous, but hard-working, scamping what he did but conforming to the taste of the time, Henri-Émile Chevalier was not out of place in this context.

MARC LA TERREUR

The principal fictionalized works of Henri-Émile Chevalier are: L'héroïne de Chateauguay; épisode de la guerre de 1813 (Montréal, 1858); Le pirate du St Laurent (Montréal, 1859). In the series entitled Drames de l'Amérique du Nord are: Les Pieds-Noirs (Paris, 1861); La Huronne, (Paris, 1861); Les Nez-Percés (Paris, 1862); Les derniers Iroquois (Paris, 1863); Les requins de l'Atlantique (Paris, 1863);

Peaux-Rouges et Peaux-Blanches; ou, Les douze apôtres et leurs femmes (Paris et Toulon, 1864); La fille des Indiens rouges (Paris, 1866).

AJM, Registre d'état civil (notes biographiques fournies par J.-J. Lefebvre). F.-X. Garneau, Voyage en Angleterre et en France dans les années 1831, 1832 et 1833, Paul Wyczynski, édit. (Coll. Présence, sér. A: Le Saint-Laurent, Ottawa, 1968). La Ruche littéraire (Montréal), févr. 1853–1859. Pierre Larousse, Grand dictionnaire universel du XIX^e siècle . . . (17v., Paris, 1865–90), XVI. Gustave Vapereau, Dictionnaire universel des contemporains . . . (5^e éd., Paris, 1880). Théophile Hudon, L'Institut canadien de Montréal et l'affaire Guibord; une page d'histoire (Montréal, 1938). Lareau, Hist. de la littérature canadienne, 286–89. Sylvain, "Libéralisme et ultramontanisme," Shield of Achilles (Morton), 111–38, 220–55. Beatrice Corrigan, "Henri-Émile Chevalier and his novels of North America," Romanic Review (New York), XXXV (1944), 220–31. É.-Z. Massicotte, "Émile Chevalier et Montréal en 1860," La Revue populaire (Montréal) (oct. 1910), 92–97. Robert [Philippe] Sylvain, "Lamartine et les catholiques de France et du Canada," RHAF, IV (1950–51), 375–97.

CHISHOLM, GEORGE KING, politician, militia officer, and farmer; b. 4 Sept. 1814 in Nelson Township, U.C., eldest son of William Chisholm*, founder of Oakville, and his wife Rebecca Silverthorn; d. 14 April 1874, Oakville, Ont.

George King Chisholm was educated at the Nelson common school, at Gore District grammar school in Hamilton, and at Upper Canada College in York. He married Isabella Land, granddaughter of Robert Land*, the founder of Hamilton, in 1840. They lived in Hamilton for nine years before moving to Oakville; they had several children.

On 21 June 1841 Chisholm was appointed serjeant-at-arms in the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Canada. His duties were mainly ceremonial, especially to attend the speaker with the mace, but they also required him to expel disorderly and irregularly admitted persons from the house. While performing these functions in April 1849 in Montreal, he was injured in the riots over the rebellion losses bill. In 1854 he resigned his post and successfully contested an election in Halton County as the Conservative candidate.

Chisholm was instrumental in organizing Trafalgar Township and the town of Oakville. He helped found the White Oak Chapter of freemasons at Oakville and for years headed the town's school board. When the town of Oakville was incorporated in 1857, he was chosen as its first mayor. Chisholm was equally active in the militia. Commissioned captain in the 2nd Regiment of Gore militia in 1830, he saw active service during the 1837 rebellion. When the Gore District was abolished in 1849 and the militia of Halton County was organized into battalions, Chisholm was gazetted major of the 1st Battalion of Halton (formerly the 2nd Gore). He was promoted on 11 Dec. 1857 to the rank of lieutenant-colonel and was placed in command of the 1st Halton. During the period of the Fenian raids, he stationed companies to guard the shore of Lake Ontario; in 1866 he proceeded to Fort Erie with 52 men but arrived too late to participate in the battle.

Four years later Chisholm retired from public life; he died at Oakville on 14 April 1874. A copy of a photograph of Chisholm can be seen at the Old Post Office Museum in Oakville.

HAZEL C. MATHEWS

PAO, Misc. 1850, letter of G. K. Chisholm to J. S. Macdonald, 16 March 1850. Can. biog. dict., I, 408–10. H. C. Mathews, Oakville and the Sixteen: the history of an Ontario port (Toronto, 1953).

CHRISTIE, ALEXANDER, HBC chief factor and administrator; b. 1792 in Scotland; d. 9 Dec. 1872 in Edinburgh, Scotland.

Alexander Christie, said to be from Glasgow, joined the Hudson's Bay Company in 1809 and was sent to Moose Factory to investigate the possibilities of the lumber trade. He returned to Britain in 1810 but was back in Moose Factory the following year to establish a sawmill. In 1817 he was in charge of the company's Eastmain business and made his headquarters at Rupert's House. One of his major duties at the time was the supervision of the company's whale fishery business. At the time of the union of the HBC with the North West Company in 1821, he was listed in the Deed Poll as a chief factor. Christie was on furlough in 1824, and in charge of Moose Factory from 1826 until 1830 when he was transferred to York Factory. Three years later he was placed in charge of Red River and appointed governor of Assiniboia.

On 10 Feb. 1835, at Red River, Christie's marriage with Anne Thomas, daughter of Thomas Thomas* Sr, was confirmed by the Church of England. Like many company employees, Christie had married according to "the custom of the country" since in remote areas of the HBC's territory clergymen were seldom present to perform the ceremony. Formal marriage ceremonies and baptism of children took place when a missionary visited the area or when the couple reached a settlement where a church had been established. Two of Christie's sons, Alexander and William Joseph, and a grandson, Alexander, entered the company's service.

While he was in charge at Red River, Alexander Christie supervised the building of Lower Fort Garry, which had been begun about 1831 some 20 miles north of present-day Winnipeg; he also began construction of Upper Fort Garry on the site of an earlier company post of the same name at the confluence of the Red and Assiniboine rivers. Between 1839 and 1844 he was in England on furlough and at Moose Factory.

During his second term as governor of Assiniboia – from 1844 until his retirement in 1848 – Christie was forced to take strong measures against free traders in the Red River Settlement who challenged the HBC's legal right to a fur trade monopoly. Individual traders and small merchants, led by Andrew McDermot* and James Sinclair*, sought an unrestricted trade with American settlements to the south. The problem became particularly acute after 1843 when Norman Wolfred Kittson*, an agent for Henry H. Sibley* of St Paul, established an American trading post at Pembina just across the international boundary. Christie attempted to limit such trading by threatening to inspect the mails and seize goods imported by merchants and traders engaging in illicit trade. He issued a proclamation on 7 Dec. 1844 stating that the company's ships would not receive, at any port, goods addressed to anyone unless that person lodged at the company's office at Upper Fort Garry (Winnipeg) a declaration to the effect that he had neither directly nor indirectly trafficked in furs. On 20 December he ordered that all letters be sent to Fort Garry for inspection.

Christie, however, had no adequate force to support his authority, and his efforts were unsuccessful. It was his opinion that only a military force could maintain law and order in the settlement. As a result of HBC requests to the imperial government (and the possibility of war with the United States over Oregon), a force of approximately 350 men of the 6th Royal Regiment of Foot was sent to Red River in 1846 under Colonel John Folliot Crofton*. These troops were replaced two years later by 56 army pensioners under Major William Bletterman Caldwell*. The latter group proved ineffective, and illegal trading continued. Following the trial of Pierre-Guillaume Sayer in 1849 on a charge of illicit trade, the company abandoned all legal means of enforcing its monopoly [see George-Antoine Bellecourt].

Alexander Christie was considered one of the most influential chief factors in the company during his career, and in recognition of his services was granted a half share in the company's profits for two years beyond the normal retirement period.

Hartwell Bowsfield

Canadian North-West (Oliver). Hargrave correspondence (Glazebrook). HBRS, XXIV (Davies and Johnson). [Mactavish], Letters of Letitia Hargrave (MacLeod). J. S. Galbraith, The Hudson's Bay Company as an imperial factor, 1821–1869 (Toronto, 1957). J. P. Pritchett, The Red River Valley, 1811–1849, a regional study (New Haven, Conn., and Toronto, 1942). "The Christie family and the HBC," Beaver, III, no.11 (1923), 417–19.

CHRISTIE, DAVID, politician and farmer; b. in Edinburgh, Scotland, in October 1818, son of Robert Christie; d. at Paris, Ont., 14 Dec. 1880.

David Christie was educated at Edinburgh High School; he was a good student, particularly well versed in Latin literature. In 1833 he came to Canada with his family. The next year his father took up a farm near St George in the southern part of Dumfries Township (in what is now South Dumfries Township), an area of largely Scottish settlement in the Grand River valley of Upper Canada. The Christie family was closely connected with the Dumfries Secessionist Presbyterian congregation, especially through David's uncle, the Reverend Thomas Christie, a Presbyterian missionary in the district for the United Associate Secessionist Church, a fragment split from the established Kirk in Scotland. David was certainly exposed to the Dumfries church's strongly held doctrine of voluntaryism – that churches should be voluntary organizations, not established, aided, or in any way interfered with by the state.

In the following years he also gained a strong interest in the improvement of agriculture, as he became an experienced farmer in his own right. By 1846 he was actively engaged in the movement to encourage better farming in Canada West through the holding of regular agricultural exhibitions. In August he was delegate to a meeting at Hamilton which set up the Provincial Agricultural Association. This in turn organized the first of an annual series of provincial fairs, held in Toronto that October. Christie again was a member of the committee that arranged the second provincial exhibition at Hamilton in 1847. He practised what he preached about agricultural improvement; in 1850 his own wheat won first prize at the fifth provincial fair in Niagara (-on-the-Lake).

Christie was emerging as a well-established, well-known member of the farming community, a fact signalled when, under the act of 1850 that incorporated the semi-official Board of Agriculture of Upper Canada, he was named one of its first members. He also served as reeve of Brantford Township in 1850, following the inception of the newly organized system of local municipal government for Canada West. And during the next decade he particularly gained a reputation as a stock breeder on the extensive new farming property he acquired between Brantford and Paris, though he was still engaged as well with the Dumfries farm. Further, he continued to be active with the Provincial Agricultural Association, becoming its second vice-president in 1851 and first vice-president in 1853, and being elected president in 1855 – at which time he gave an eloquent presidential address on the theme of agricultural education.

Christie had developed still another keen interest, provincial politics. He was a staunch Reformer in background and temperament; indeed, his political and religious views had much in common with those of his old Edinburgh schoolmate, George Brown, now editor of the Toronto Globe. The two Scots were in frequent contact by the late 1840s, and may well have been from Brown's own arrival in Canada in 1843. Brown did not, however, share Christie's enthusiasm for reforming the constitution along fully elective lines, once responsible government had been achieved in Canada by 1849; in supporting a British parliamentary pattern Brown stood with the main, moderate Reform group associated with Robert Baldwin*. But David Christie, full of zeal for democratic progress, turned toward a more radical element, concerned by the apparent tendency of the party to rest on its laurels, now that Reform had gained office as well as responsible rule.

The feeling that ministerial leaders were growing fat, if not unprincipled, in power was particularly likely to bring a response from Reform grassroots in agrarian Canada West. And Christie assuredly shared the rising demand among the farming community for cheap and simple government close to the people – not to mention the demand to abolish the clergy reserves system that gave churches (chiefly the Church of England) public funds from reserved lands. Accordingly, in the fall of 1849, he became engaged with a small but vigorous coterie who sought to remake the Reform party in a more radical image. This group, which included experienced politicians such as Malcolm Cameron and later Caleb Hopkins, as well as younger idealists such as Christie and William McDougall*, were quickly denominated the "Clear Grits." There are several possible origins for the name, but "the best authenticated version," according to John Charles Dent*, traces it to a discussion between Brown and Christie in the autumn of 1849 over the emerging radical movement, wherein Christie rejected any who might hang back like Brown, declaring, "We want only men who are clear grit."

Although it is impossible now to document that origin, the Globe certainly began applying the term to the radicals in December 1849. Moreover, it was evidently accepted by them, connoting as it did thoroughgoing reform integrity: in early 1850 they formulated a "clear grit" platform calling for elective institutions throughout, universal suffrage, and secularization of the reserves. By the following summer they had made sufficient impact in parliament to cause Baldwin to resign as premier. The Francis Hincks*–Augustin-Norbert Morin* Liberal regime that succeeded had to admit two Clear Grits, Cameron and John Rolph*, to the cabinet, a bargain worked out in July 1851 by McDougall and Christie. And in the ensuing general elections at the close of the year, Christie successfully ran for Wentworth County, which then included the Brantford area, to enter parliament at the age of 33.

Brown had meanwhile broken with the Reform ministry, because it had failed to settle the reserves question and had fostered Roman Catholic separate schools, but he continued to oppose the Clear Grits because of their advocacy of elective institutions and because they themselves, as he saw it, had now sold out for office. Undoubtedly Christie found himself in a difficult position after parliament opened in August 1852. The Hincks government showed more interest in promoting the new railway era than in taking up basic constitutional reform. Besides, not only did it still hang back on the reserves, but it also supported further enlargements of Catholic separate school rights in Canada West and incorporations of Catholic religious bodies in Canada East, thanks largely to the powerful French Canadian influence in its midst. These proceedings were sorely compromising for Grit ministerial supporters such as Christie, scarcely less voluntaryist on church-state issues than Brown. Indeed in January 1853, during the parliamentary recess, Christie met Brown in a grand public debate back in his constituency at Glen Morris, and, despite bold efforts to justify his support of the ministry, came off second best.

Nevertheless, Christie continued to hold a prominent place within Grit circles, a fact displayed when McDougall, voicing his own discontent with the Hincks government in a letter to Charles Clarke* in September 1853, even suggested that Christie might replace Hincks as leader. By 1854 the mounting strains between the eastern and western sections of the existing Canadian union and the unrest within Reform itself in Canada West, threatened to upset the government. In June it was beaten in the house, and elections were quickly called. This time, Christie stood for East Brant, one of two constituencies in the new county of Brant which had recently been divided off from Wentworth. He was narrowly defeated by a Conservative candidate, Daniel McKerlie – because, he said, "I had the whole Brown influence against me." Still worse, when parliament met in September, the Hincks and Morin Liberals joined with Conservative forces to establish the Sir Allan MacNab*–Morin Liberal-Conservative government ("Awful treachery" to Christie). At least the new coalition was committed to secularize the reserves. Christie himself had hopes of overturning McKerlie's one-vote lead through contesting the electoral verdict. He still affirmed, "I have full confidence in Democratic principles. . . . The people will be brought to see their duty."

The electoral commission decided in Christie's favour in March 1855, and he was again seated in the Legislative Assembly. Here he found the Reform factions left in opposition beginning to form a common front against their Liberal-Conservative foes. In particular, the Clear Grits and Brown were moving together, as the former set aside their demand for elective institutions, at least for the present, and the latter concentrated on representation by population, to overcome eastern Conservative and French Catholic power in the Canadian union.

Like many Clear Grits, Christie was inclined to favour the outright repeal of the union of the Canadas, considering representation by population "a just and righteous thing" but "too slow a remedy." He nevertheless gradually came around in response to Brown's and the Globe's forceful appeals for Reform unity. By September 1856 he could write: "Our friend Brown is wrong on many points. I suspect he will never go the length of constitutional changes and repeal. . . . He is a powerful man [however]. . . . We did right in standing by him." This knitting up of party ties, qualified as it might be, was symbolized by the Reform Convention of January 1857 in Toronto, which Christie attended. Indeed, he was one of the signers of the requisition calling it.

The reunited Reform forces carried Canada West in elections held late in 1857. Christie, returned again for East Brant, was on hand for the major debates on the ills of the union in the session of 1858 and the hectic summer change from the John A. Macdonald*–George-Étienne CARTIER Conservative government to Brownite Liberals, and swiftly back to Macdonald and Cartier again. In the autumn, however, he campaigned for a seat in the upper house, the Legislative Council. This had been made elective in 1856, and it was a less demanding arena than the assembly. Hence he would have more time for his growing farm outside Brantford; and he was also involved in local railway development: earlier in promoting the Buffalo and Brantford line (which became the Buffalo and Lake Huron Railway), and now in negotiating with Buffalo interests for a bridge to give direct rail access over the Niagara River. He was elected for the Erie division (which included his home territory) of the Legislative Council, and in December resigned his seat in the assembly.

He continued to be prominent in the Reform party. At the grand Reform Convention of November 1859, in Toronto, he was one of the vice-chairmen and a member of the key committee that controlled the structure of the sessions – although Brown's close associates still kept an effective grip upon them. At the convention, indeed, Christie seemed to have dropped some of his earlier outright radicalism. He did not support a demand for repeal of the union, and instead endorsed the Brownite call for a federation of the two Canadas as a step towards a future general British North American federation. Yet the next year he was informing one enduring radical associate, William Lyon Mackenzie*, that the convention's federal scheme would not do: "I now see that the only thing to save Upper Canada is a Simple Dissolution of the Union." In any case, Christie's role was now more one of prestige than of party influence. His political activities had less significance in the upper house, and old Grit radicalism had largely been tamed within the Brownite Liberal party. Accordingly, he played no very weighty part in politics in the early 1860s, as the Canadian union wound through mounting crises to complete deadlock in 1864. But when out of deadlock came the coalition of Brown, Cartier, and Macdonald to seek confederation, Christie gave it earnest support from his place in the Legislative Council. At the same time he advised the government on patronage questions in the Brant area as a leading Reform figure there.

During the confederation debates of 1865, when the plan for federal union was put to parliament, Christie spoke strongly in the council in favour of the scheme. True to his past, he did criticize the proposed federal Senate because it was to be an appointed, not an elected body: "I have always been an advocate of the elective principle." Still, he said, "I shrink from the responsibility of voting against the scheme because of that objection." And the next year, when it was enacted that existing members of the Legislative Council of Canada should be appointed to the Senate of the new confederation, Christie, at the end of his eight-year elected term, proceeded to accept a life position in the future federal upper house.

With the coming of confederation he remained actively involved in Liberal affairs. He attended the Reform Convention of June 1867 in Toronto; he worked faithfully in the party interest in the elections that followed, both in the federal sphere and in that of the new province of Ontario; and he sought to maintain his strong political influence in Brant County. Yet, as Sir John A. Macdonald shrewdly pointed out to a disconsolate local Conservative in October 1867, having become a senator had really greatly reduced Christie's importance: "the fact of being a nominee of the Crown instead of the choice of the people deprives him of any real hold."

In the following years David Christie nevertheless remained to the fore in the Senate itself; he had become one of the patricians of Liberalism. Thus, when Alexander Mackenzie* formed a Liberal government in November 1873, he was named secretary of state in the cabinet. But after the government won a sweeping election victory he was moved to the post of speaker of the Senate in January 1874, a post more honorific and less onerous, which he held with distinction until his resignation in October 1878 when the Mackenzie government fell. Although not an eloquent orator, Christie had forceful dignity, straightforward logical clarity, and a judicious choice of words that earned him respectful attention. After he left the speakership at the age of 60, he virtually withdrew from public life. Still, even in the years before, much of his most significant activity had not been in the Senate at all.

He had especially kept his interest in agricultural development; for example, he had served in various capacities in the Provincial Agricultural Association, and was its president again for the last time in 1870–71. In 1873 the Liberal government of Oliver Mowat* in Ontario named him a member of the commission which was responsible for setting up the Ontario School of Agriculture (later part of the University of Guelph). Subsequently, in 1880, he was president of the Dominion Council of Agriculture and of the American Shorthorn Breeders Association, an international body. He also sat on the Senate of the University of Toronto from 1863, and briefly in 1875 was administrator of the province of Ontario, during the illness of Lieutenant Governor John Willoughby CRAWFORD.

Meanwhile, he had continued to make his own estate, "The Plains," an agricultural showplace. The Dumfries property was also held until 1871, and by 1868 Christie already had, by deed, some 540 acres in his Brantford Township estate, on which he built a handsome mansion. He had married Isabella Turnbull of Dumfries in 1848. She died in 1858, and in 1860 he was married again, to Margaret Telfer of Springfield in Elgin County. The Christies had a large family at their Plains residence, where they frequently housed friends, political allies, and visiting agriculturalists. Moreover, from 1866 onward, a one-time schoolfellow become political enemy and now again an increasingly close friend, George Brown, had been developing his own extensive farming estate at Bow Park on the other side of Brantford. In the 1870s the two became frequent visitors, happily reminiscing about past political battles. Christie, in fact, became vice-president of the cattle company which Brown incorporated for his large-scale pedigreed stockbreeding enterprise at Bow Park.

Like Brown's, however, Christie's final years were clouded by financial troubles. The deep depression of the later 1870s, the venture into the costly business of raising pedigreed cattle for a Canadian market not yet ready for it, undoubtedly had as much to do with his difficulties as with Brown's. But Christie had no powerful Globe to fall back on, and he was much more seriously overextended. He went bankrupt. His household goods were sold at auction in Brantford in December 1879; he had to leave the Plains for quarters in nearby Paris. And there the next year he suffered a trivial wound in his foot which refused to heal. His exhausted state forbade the operation needed for gangrene. He died on 14 Dec. 1880, aged 62 – only months after George Brown: their two interconnected lives thus having coincided in the year of both birth and death.

J. M. S. CARELESS

Blue Lake and Auburn Women's Institute (Paris, Ont.), "Tweedsmuir history" (copy in PAO). PAC, MG 24, D16 (Buchanan papers); MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), 339. PAO, Charles Clarke papers; Mackenzie-Lindsey collection. Brantford Weekly Expositor, 17 Dec. 1880. Canada, Province of, Confederation debates. Globe (Toronto), 10 Dec. 1849, 10 Jan. 1850, 22 Aug. 1851, 9 Jan. 1857, 11 Nov. 1859, 16 Dec. 1880. Weekly Globe (Toronto), 19 May 1876. Dom .ann. reg. 1880–81. Encyclopedia of Canada, III.

Careless, Brown. Cornell, Alignment of political groups. Dent, Last forty years. C. M. Johnston, Brant County: a history, 1784–1945 (Toronto, 1967). W. J. Rattray, The Scot in British North America (4v., Toronto, 1880–84), II. James Young, Public men and public life in Canada . . . (2v., Toronto, 1912), I; Reminiscences of the early history of Galt and the settlement of Dumfries, in the Province of Ontario (Toronto, 1880).

CHURCHILL, EZRA A., merchant, shipbuilder, and politician; b. 1804 at Yarmouth, N.S., to Ezra Churchill and Elizabeth Trefry; d. 8 May 1874 in Ottawa, Ont.

Ezra A. Churchill's father, a mate on a Yarmouth brigantine, was lost with his ship, Hibernia, in 1806, and his mother returned to her home in Hantsport, where she remarried and raised her son. On 10 Nov. 1824 Ezra Churchill married Ann Davidson of Falmouth, N.S., and they had two sons and several daughters. Following the death of his first wife, he married Rachel Burgess of Billtown, N.S., by whom he had four children; only one son lived beyond infancy.

Ezra Churchill began his career in Hantsport. In 1841 he bought shares in a small brigantine, and in 1844 he commissioned the building of another brigantine of 128 tons. In the 1850s he bought shares in at least two more vessels and owned the controlling interest in five others. One of these, the 697-ton Morning Star, launched in 1856, was the first ship built by Churchill; it was followed by such large vessels as the 1,138-ton La Gloire, built in 1862, the 1,383-ton Marlborough, built the following year, and the 1,050-ton British America, launched in 1869. Like other vessels built in the province, they were cargo ships with the blunt lines of the work ship rather than the sleek lines of the clipper ships which were designed for speed. Churchill differed from other builders at the time because he left much of the construction to his master builder, Robert Fuller. His yards continued to build smaller vessels suitable for the coastal trade long after other major yards had ceased this practice. At his death, his fleet and yards, among the foremost in the province, were taken over by his two sons, John and George. In the mid-1880s the Churchill yards, like other shipyards in the provinces, began to decline.

Churchill, who was obviously interested in the commercial and financial aspects of shipping, became involved with an attempt to establish a new provincial bank. A charter was granted in 1864 by the legislature for the Mutual Bank of Nova Scotia. The project did not develop any further, however, despite the support of the finance minister, Isaac LEVESCONTE, and other prominent Conservative assemblymen including H. A. N. Kaulback of Lunenburg and Peter Smyth of Inverness.

In 1855 Churchill was elected to the assembly as the member for Falmouth Township. When this seat was abolished in 1859, he sat as a member for Hants County, North Division, from 1859 until 1867. He was a relatively quiet supporter of the Conservative party but withheld support from Charles Tupper* by abstaining in the 1866 vote on confederation. He did not take part in the 1867 general election but joined with Jeremiah NORTHUP to help elect Joseph HOWE in the "better terms" by-election of 1869. Churchill was appointed, probably on Howe's recommendation, to the Senate in February 1871.

K. G. PRYKE

PANS, Scrapbook 109, 134–35. Directory of N.S. MLAs (Fergusson). J. V. Duncanson, Falmouth – a New England township in Nova Scotia, 1760–1965 (Windsor, Ont., 1965), 208. Wallace, Wooden ships and iron men . . . , 131–35, 204–5. [The author was also given significant aid by G. V. Shand of Windsor, N.S. K.G.P.]

CLARKE, JAMES PATON, musician; b. 1807 or 1808, probably in Scotland; m. Helen Fullerton 25 Dec. 1831, by whom he had several children; d. 27 Aug. 1877, at Yorkville (Toronto), Ont.

James Paton Clarke, the son of a musician, is first reported as a music seller's assistant in Edinburgh. In 1829 he was a musician at St George's Church in Glasgow and, in 1834, became organist at St Mary's Episcopal Chapel in Glasgow. Several of his songs appeared in British periodicals about 1832.

Clarke came to Canada in 1835. He may have settled at Elora, Upper Canada, as a farmer, but his first documented position in Canada was that of organist at Christ's Church in Hamilton in 1844 and 1845. In 1845 he gave two concerts in Toronto: in one he led a choir at the opening of St George's Church, and later he conducted a concert planned by John McCaul*, vice-president of King's College and an ardent promoter of fine music. McCaul probably induced Clarke to move to Toronto, where the latter became conductor of the Philharmonic Society (McCaul was president) from 1845 to 1847, in 1855, and in 1872–73, and of the Toronto Vocal Music Society from 1851 to 1853.

Under McCaul's influence Clarke usually featured music by Mozart, Haydn, or Beethoven in his concerts. He presented several symphonies by Mozart and Beethoven, although perhaps not in their entirety and hardly in their full instrumentation. He also conducted overtures and excerpts from oratorios, as well as some national, sacred, operatic, and humorous songs, and his own vocal pieces. Many of these performances were local premières. As was then usual, programmes were nearly always mixtures of orchestral pieces, vocal solos, choral music, or instrumental virtuoso display, performed by an equally mixed array of amateur and professional musicians. Clarke was not always a conductor: he also appeared as piano accompanist and as singer in ensembles. He was organist in Toronto at St James' Cathedral from 1848 to 1849, and probably at St Michael's Roman Catholic Cathedral.

Clarke became part of the local cultural élite as a composer as well. His songs were written to texts by Samuel Thompson*, the Reverend Robert Jackson MacGeorge*, Catharine Parr Traill [Strickland*], and other Canadian writers. This activity culminated in 1853 in the Lays of the maple leaf, or songs of Canada. It was the longest composition yet published in Canada and one inspired entirely by the country's scenery and its pioneers, hunters, and woodsmen. It was well received, and one contemporary hoped that he would "ere long again . . . gratify the public by other strains of that harp, which he touches with so masterly a finger. . . ."

Clarke obtained the Bachelor of Music degree from King's College (University of Toronto) in 1846, almost certainly the first such degree to have been granted by a Canadian university, and he may also have become an honorary music adviser at the college. In 1848 William Henry DRAPER presented him with three special university prizes for his compositions, the results of a contest. In 1856 he was to receive a degree of Doctor of Music, the first in Canada, from the university but it may not actually have been granted.

The years 1853–56 mark, in fact, the end of Clarke's brilliant career and the beginning of two decades of rarely interrupted obscurity. He was replaced as the conductor of the Toronto Vocal Music Society in 1853 and was an unsuccessful candidate for a professorship at Trinity College. He is not known to have published any music after 1853 or to have occupied any church or school position. In 1854 his songs were criticized as being "sadly deficient in both design and originality." He also seems to have left Toronto, but he had come back by 1861 when he co-edited A selection of chants and tunes for the Church of England Diocesan Synod of Toronto.

One more return to prominence occurred when the Philharmonic Society was revived in 1872 with McCaul president and Clarke conductor. The Messiah was performed on 28 Feb. 1873 with 160 singers and 30 orchestral players. Though uneven in quality the performance was judged "exceedingly creditable" in view of the inexperience of the singers. Clarke's health was failing and the Philharmonic Society continued under other leaders, notably Frederick Herbert Torrington*. Clarke's death came suddenly four years later.

Clarke was considered a "conscientious and earnest musician, a clever composer, and an able and successful teacher of the piano forte." Half a century after his emigration, his "reputation of being an excellent musician and vocalist" was still remembered in Scotland. Extremely versatile, as a musician in a pioneer country had to be, Clarke also tuned and repaired organs, and participated as a violinist and violist in several short-lived string quartets during his later years.

In Toronto Clarke had at least 15 vocal compositions published and another ten are known to have been performed, but only one instrumental work has been discovered. His musical invention is rooted in folk song and the idiom of the turn of the 18th century. His better melodies have a fresh outdoor quality; their simplicity is deliberate. The sincerity and clean harmonies of Clarke's unsophisticated songs stand in contrast to the flood of more pretentious music with feigned emotions which began to be produced in Canada after 1850. His most famous pupil was his son, Hugh Archibald, who made his debut as a pianist in 1854 and was trained entirely by his father. He was appointed in 1875 to the University of Pennsylvania staff, and was one of the first two university professors of music in the United States.

HELMUT KALLMANN

Christ's Church (Hamilton, Ont.) account book. MTCL, minute book of the Toronto Choral Society, 1845, and of the Philharmonic Society, 1846–47. St James' Cathedral (Toronto), churchwardens' register and minute book, 1842–1908.

Canadian church psalmody: consisting of psalm tunes, chants, anthems, etc., with introductory lessons and exercises in sacred music, ed. J. P. Clarke (Toronto, 1845). J. P. Clarke, Lays of the maple leaf, or songs of Canada (Toronto, [1853]). Parochial psalmody: a new collection of the most approved psalm tunes . . ., ed. J. P. Clarke (2nd ed., Glasgow, 1831). A selection of chants and tunes, made by the committee of the Toronto Diocesan Synod . . ., [ed. J. P. Clarke et al.] (Toronto, 1861; 2nd ed., Toronto, 1867).

Anglo-American Magazine (Toronto), II (1853), 648. "Music and composers," Leader (Toronto), 31 May 1854. "Music in Toronto, reminiscences of the last half century," Mail (Toronto), 21 Dec. 1878. "The Philharmonic Society: first public concert – the Messiah," Mail (Toronto), 1 March 1873. A biographical dictionary of musicians, ed. Theodore Baker (New York, 1900). Helmut Kallmann, A history of music in Canada, 1534–1914 (Toronto and London, 1960). James Love, Scottish church music, its composers and sources (Edinburgh and London, 1891), 320. W. H. Pearson, Recollections and records of Toronto of old, with references to Brantford, Kingston and other Canadian towns (Toronto, 1914), 149, 214. D. J. Sale, "Toronto's pre-confederation music societies, 1845–1867," unpublished MA thesis, University of Toronto, 1968.

CLARKSON, THOMAS, merchant; b. Susworth, parish of Scotter, Lincolnshire, Eng., 26 Jan. 1802, son of John and Elizabeth Clarkson; d. 4 May 1874, at Toronto, Ont.

Thomas Clarkson apparently emigrated to York (Toronto) in 1832, where he appears as a storekeeper in 1837 and in the 1840s as an auctioneer. He also began in the 1840s to deal in produce and handle goods on commission, specializing in the grain trade; these two types of business were to occupy his attention for the rest of his life.

For some time prior to the beginning of 1845 he was in partnership with Thomas Brunskill of Thornhill.

Clarkson soon became active in the financial development of the city, where his position does not seem to have been hurt by the fact that he was prepared to accept the presidency of the local Annexation Association in December 1849. He was one of the incorporators of the Toronto Board of Trade in 1845; as its president from 1852 to 1859 he supported reciprocity, pressed for changes in the usury laws, and opposed tariff increases. He was also a founder and president of the Commercial Building and Investment Society (incorporated in 1851), helped establish the Bank of Toronto (and was one of the first directors in 1856–58), and was active in the Toronto Exchange, established in 1854 "for commercial business." Like many other members of the Board of Trade, Clarkson was closely associated with the unsuccessful Toronto and Georgian Bay Canal Company, chairing, in September 1855, a Toronto meeting of delegates from both Canada and such American centres as Chicago, Milwaukee, and Oswego. In 1856 he appeared at the head of the list of incorporators of the company.

The panic of 1857, with the depression that followed, put a stop to such expensive ventures and led to a general decline in trade. Clarkson's speech on his retirement as president of the Board of Trade in January 1859 concentrated on the problems of trade in Canada. The next year he moved to Milwaukee, then the centre of a rapidly developing region. There, with his sons Benjamin Reid and Robert Guy (1841–89), he established a produce and commission business known as T. Clarkson and Sons. Thomas and Benjamin returned to Toronto in 1864, but Robert remained in Milwaukee and carried on the business until his death. He became well known through his articles in the Evening Wisconsin, written under the pseudonym Tommy Dodd.

In Toronto Thomas re-established his business which had been discontinued after operating briefly as Clarkson, Hunter and Company. He also became an official assignee in bankruptcy for the province, thus assuming responsibility for the storage and sale of goods of bankrupts. In 1869 he took over the lease of a large grain storage elevator which he renamed Clarkson's Elevator, and he was active in the Produce Merchants Exchange in the city.

Clarkson was forced to retire in 1872 because of a paralytic stroke. On his death two years later his business was divided: Benjamin, who was already a partner, took over the elevator and grain business; the assignee business passed to his other partners, Thomas Munro and another son, Edward Roper Curzon Clarkson (1852–1931), who later developed the auditing firm which is now Clarkson, Gordon and Company.

An Anglican and parishioner of St James Cathedral, Clarkson was also a sabbatarian. In 1858 he was elected president of a revived Toronto Sabbath Alliance which supported the exemption of civil servants from Sunday work. He was active in the St George's Society of Toronto and joined the York Pioneer Society in 1871. He married first, Elizabeth Farnham (d. 1829) in 1821, by whom he had two children; secondly, Carrie Brunskill in 1834, after he had come to Canada, by whom he had four children; and thirdly, Sarah Helliwell (1824–78), in 1844, by whom he had ten children. One son, John Brunskill Clarkson (1835–1903), became a Methodist minister, and a grandson, John Reed Teefy*, was superior of the Roman Catholic St Michael's College in Toronto.

FREDERICK H. ARMSTRONG

PAO, W. H. Merritt papers, 22 Nov. 1854; Toronto city council papers, 6, 18 July 1836. Commercial Herald (Toronto), 6 March 1845. Globe (Toronto), 17 Jan. 1859; 26 June 1860; 21, 28 May 1866. Mail (Toronto), 5, 6 May 1874. "The annexation movement, 1849–50," ed. A. G. Penny, CHR, V (1924), 236–61. Canada, Province of, Statutes, 1856, c.118. Directory of the city of Milwaukee . . . 1860–61 (Milwaukee, 1860). Milwaukee city directory for 1863 . . ., comp. A. Bailey (Milwaukee, 1863). Edwards' annual directory to . . . the city of Milwaukee for 1865, ed. Richard Edwards (Milwaukee, 1865). Toronto, Directories, 1837–73. The roll of pupils of Upper Canada College, Toronto, January 1830, to June 1916, ed. A. H. Young (Kingston, Ont., 1917), 170–71. [A. J. Little], The story of the firm, 1864–1964: Clarkson, Gordon & Co. (Toronto, 1964), 3–13. Middleton, Municipality of Toronto, I, 488, 504. Joseph Schull, 100 years of banking in Canada: a history of the Toronto-Dominion Bank (Vancouver, Toronto, Montreal, 1958). Douglas McCalla, "The commercial politics of the Toronto Board of Trade, 1850–1860," CHR, L (1969), 51–67.

CLERK, GEORGE EDWARD, journalist; b. 18 March 1815 at Penicuik House, near Penicuik, county of Edinburgh, Scotland; son of Sir George Clerk, 6th Baronet of Penicuik, and Marie Law; d. 26 Sept. 1875 at Montreal, Que.

George Edward Clerk was born of an aristocratic but poor Scottish family whose manor was Penicuik House (to be devastated by fire in 1899). The barony of Penicuik, of which his father was the sixth holder, had become in 1646 the property of the Clerk family; earlier it had been distinguished by its attachment to the Stuart cause.

George Clerk, born in 1787, had married Marie, daughter of Ewan Law, in August 1810; she bore him eight sons and four daughters.

George Edward was the second of the eight sons. He studied at Eton, then, thanks to political backing, entered the Royal Navy as a midshipman; by this means he had an opportunity to sail along the west coast of Africa and witness many moving episodes of the slave trade. Early in the 1830s, he also formed part of the crew of a warship placed at Sir Walter Scott's disposal for a Mediterranean cruise.

Politics had put him into the navy; politics took him out of it after two years, a change of ministry having occurred. One of the openings available to a young Scottish aristocrat was therefore closed to him. There remained the army and the church, but neither offered enough attraction to a young man fired by the thought of a life of adventure. He therefore decided to emigrate to Australia, where for 14 years he was a sheep-farmer. An affliction of the eyes, caused by the intense reflection of sunlight on dry and sandy soil, forced him to return to Scotland.

In the meantime an important event had occurred in his life: he had been converted to Catholicism through reading a book by Nicholas Wiseman. Hitherto he had been somewhat indifferent to the question of religion; his one desire henceforth was to make his life conform as exactly as possible to the creed which he had espoused with one single surge of heart and mind.

On 7 Oct. 1847, while on his way to visit Australia a second time, he came to Montreal. He intended to stop there only for a short time, but an attack of rheumatic fever brought on by dampness first made him prolong his stay; then conjugal and paternal love – on 27 Nov. 1849, at Laprairie, he married Marie-Louise-Élisabeth Dupuis – introduced into this wanderer's existence an exemplary stability, by giving him permanent roots in the Canadian metropolis.

To earn a living, Clerk first tried his hand at being a notary. He then got in touch with Bishop Ignace Bourget* and Abbé Joseph Larocque*, editor of the Mélanges religieux. Thanks to them he had access to the library of the bishop's palace, and this allowed him to establish the bases of the philosophical and theological culture that was to ensure his success and authority as a journalist.

But it was only after the American Orestes Augustus Brownson, on 2 May 1850, had declined the invitation of Bourget and Larocque to become editor of a paper they had intended to entrust to his experience as a Christian publicist, that they turned to Clerk. Warmly encouraged by two spokesmen of the Irish Catholics of Montreal and Quebec, the bookseller James Sadlier and the parish priest Patrick McMahon*, the Scotsman accepted. On 8 May he laid before the bishops a rough draft of a paper, and they agreed to it. Three days later a circular informed the public that the English-speaking Catholics would soon be provided with a publication dedicated to the defence of their faith and their rights: "Impelled by the needs of the day, and at the request of several laymen who are deeply distressed that Catholicism in Canada does not have a single organ in the English language to repel the ceaseless attacks of Protestant journals, we have reached the following decision. We fully approve, as being an undertaking beneficial to religion, of the publication of a religious newspaper in English, provided that it is attached to no political party."

From then on it was a highly intriguing spectacle for Montrealers to watch the brisk campaigns conducted by this authentic Scotsman who became, with no ulterior motive, the herald and acknowledged defender of the largest English-speaking Catholic group in Canada, the Irish. Clerk, as a personality as well as a journalist, did not lack the characteristics, even the peculiarities, which arouse and retain the curiosity of the public, always partial to those men whose appearance and behaviour strike a note of originality in the monotony of the mass. With broad shoulders, eyes of a deep blue usually concealed behind glasses that were equally blue, hair brushed well back from his forehead, sidewhiskers and moustache trimmed in the style of the period, a cleanly chiselled mouth, original in his dress to the point of eccentricity, Clerk, although an unflagging worker, abandoned his pen and his books as often as he could to stroll through the streets in all weathers, carrying his inseparable cotton umbrella which he had brought from Australia, accompanied by friends, and followed by two or three dogs.

He entitled his paper, the first number of which appeared on 16 Aug. 1850, the True Witness and Catholic Chronicle. This title indicated a whole programme. It was also a declaration of war on John Dougall*, of the Montreal Witness, and George Brown, the founder and editor-in-chief of the Toronto paper the Globe. An emigrant Scotsman was wielding the claymore against two other Scotsmen, emigrants like himself. With truly Caledonian fervour on both sides, a struggle then began on the shores of the St Lawrence which certainly lost none of its fire for not being waged on the banks of the Clyde.

As well as being the uncompromising champion of the Catholic faith, Clerk showed himself the determined opponent of the Liberals, especially when they belonged to the Institut Canadien.

To the great satisfaction of the clergy, his preferences inclined him towards the Conservative party. Bishop Bourget wrote to him on 3 Oct. 1860: "When one looks through your columns with a modicum of attention, one is soon convinced that you are a true conservative, working at full strength to link this colony firmly with the mother country; and to succeed in this undertaking you are setting powerfully in motion, with your irresistible logic, the religious principle, which is indeed the one solid basis of civil and political society."

It was only when he thought that the interests of Catholicism were at stake that Clerk deviated from this political line, as he did for example over confederation. "In 1865," Laurent-Olivier David* wrote, "a public meeting called by the opponents of the plan for confederation took place in one of the rooms of the Institut Canadien-Français. During the discussion a man got up and began to speak in English; he declared emphatically against this change of constitution, and quoted as an example of the dangers that it contained for the French Canadian Catholic minority the history of the Catholics in Scotland and Ireland. His powerful build, his military bearing, and his incisive, energetic manner of speaking gave the impression of great physical and intellectual vitality." David, who did not yet know him, learned then that the speaker was George Edward Clerk, "the famous editor of the True Witness." And David added: as Clerk "had always given evidence of independence in politics, the opponents of Confederation were happy to have such a powerful assistant in their struggle against the new constitution."

The journal of which Clerk was the owner and practically the sole editor appeared every Friday. It was printed by John Gillies, who saw to its circulation. In 1858 the True Witness had 2,837 subscribers and was distributed by agents in 21 areas. In the following year Clerk transferred the ownership to Gillies, who made many trips to Canada West, the Maritimes, and Nova Scotia to increase the number of subscribers.

Despite Gillies' efforts, the financial situation of the True Witness always remained precarious. From the time the paper was started, Bishop Bourget had assured Clerk that he could count on an annual sum of $600, $200 coming from the bishopric, $200 from the Sulpicians, and $200 from the diocese of Quebec through the intermediary of the vicar general, Charles-Félix Cazeau*. If by chance one of these sources happened to dry up, Clerk did not fail to approach the bishop of Montreal and remind him of his initial promise. Thanks to this meagre subsidy, Clerk held on heroically to his post as editor, although there remained "very scanty means with which to support his large family," as vicar general Alexis-Frédéric TRUTEAU wrote to Bishop Bourget on 18 Feb. 1870. Indeed, of the Clerk-Dupuis marriage 11 children had been born; nine of them, six boys and three girls, reached adult age. The youngest of the sons, Jean-Pio-Robert, was to marry a daughter of Senator Laurent-Olivier David, who expressed his warm admiration for Clerk in some well-informed pages later published in Les gerbes canadiennes.

A quarter of a century of exhausting work and militant journalism had undermined Clerk's health, and he was finally struck down by a severe attack of angina pectoris in February 1875. Surrounded by his family, and having received the last sacraments of the church, he passed away on 26 Sept. 1875.

PHILIPPE SYLVAIN

ACAM, RLB, 11, p.450. Mandements des éveques de Québec (Têtu et Gagnon), III, 571–72. L.-O. David, Les gerbes canadiennes (Montréal, 1921), 67–80. Robert [Philippe] Sylvain, Clerc, garibaldien, prédicant des deux mondes : Alessandro Gavazzi (1809–1889) (2v., Québec, 1962), II, 323–29. Agnes Coffey, "George Edward Clerk, founder of the 'True Witness'; a pioneer of Catholic action," CCHA Report, 1934–35, 46–59; "The True Witness and Catholic Chronicle; sixty years of Catholic journalistic action," CCHA Report, 1937–38, 33–46.

COCHRAN, JAMES (he signed Cochran, but his family in Ireland used Cocoran or Corcoran), merchant and politician; b. 1802 at Granard, County Longford, Ireland, son of Timothy Cocoran (or Corcoran) and Margaret Flood; d. at Camp Hill Cottage, Halifax, N.S., 6 March 1877.

In 1825, when he was 23, James Cochran emigrated from Ireland to Halifax, where he was employed by the ship chandlery firm of Temple Piers* and his brother Lewis. The firm sold sailcloth, cordage, nails, spikes, and supplies needed by sailing ships; it also owned a ropewalk. Later Cochran operated as a commission merchant dealing in tobacco, tea, flour, sugar, and brandy. Cochran married Catherine Walsh at St Mary's Roman Catholic Cathedral on 28 Sept. 1829; they had four children, all of whom died without issue.

The accumulation of capital in Halifax during the American Civil War led to the incorporation of the People's Bank in 1864. George H. Starr was the bank's president with James Cochran, William J. Coleman, Benjamin Wier*, John Doull, and others serving as directors. By 1868 the bank had agencies at Wolfville and New Glasgow, and in 1875 established a branch at Lockeport, centre for the West Indies trade. In 1870 James Cochran also became one of the directors of the Acadia Fire Insurance Company which paid dividends as high as 15 per cent. Always an astute investor, Cochran died with a personal estate valued at $202,508 mostly in bank stock and debentures of the city of Halifax.

In 1835 James Cochran was admitted to the Charitable Irish Society, an organization founded in 1786 by prosperous Irish (both Protestant and Catholic) to help immigrants and to assist the poor and indigent among their countrymen in Nova Scotia. Cochran served as president of the society in 1853 and 1867; he was a generous contributor to its charities until his death. The Irish Roman Catholic population of Halifax had trebled before the influx caused by the potato famine of 1846, and continued to increase in succeeding decades. Cochran belonged to the influential class of Irish Catholics who acted with the Reform party and continued to support the Liberals after the Gourley Shanty Riots, but he took no active part in public life until 1867 when he was persuaded by his fellow anti-confederates to accept a nomination as one of the local candidates for Halifax County. Although he was in Europe for part of the campaign, he was elected to the assembly.

On 18 Feb. 1868 Cochran became a minister without portfolio in William Annand*'s anti-confederate government; in the assembly he served as chairman of the committee on trade and manufactures, where he worried about the adverse effect of higher federal tariffs on Maritime business. Annand's government was concerned with efforts to obtain the repeal of the British North America Act, but reluctantly accepted better financial terms from the Canadian government in 1869. Although Cochran favoured Nova Scotia's returning to independent colonial status, he refused to support annexation to the United States, and said that "the man who would not be loyal to this country [Britain] must be a fool or an idiot." He was a member of the education committee when the assembly considered separate schools, but "believed that the temper of the country would not admit of separate schools, and therefore I took but little trouble in the matter." He decided not to contest another election, and on 6 June 1871 was appointed to a seat in the Legislative Council to replace William James Stairs*. Cochran continued as a member of the Executive Council in Philip C. Hill*'s government where his opinions were valued because of his sound judgement and his integrity.

James Cochran was respected in the community for his benevolence, for his shrewd common sense in business and politics, and as an example of a poor, Roman Catholic, Irish immigrant who had become a financially successful, influential citizen.

Phyllis R. Blakeley

Archdiocese of Halifax, Chancery Office, marriage registers of St Mary's Roman Catholic Cathedral, 28 Sept. 1829. Halifax County Court of Probate, will of James Cochran. PANS, Charitable Irish Society, Minutes, 1850–66; Halifax County death registrations, June quarter, 1874; March quarter, 1877. Acadian Recorder (Halifax), 25 July 1872, 4 April 1874, 6 March 1877. Morning Chronicle (Halifax), 7 March 1877. Nova Scotia, House of Assembly, Debates and proceedings, 1868–71. George Mullane, Charitable Irish Society of Halifax, Canada, founded 1786; sketch of some of the foundation members of the Charitable Irish Society, including remarks on the "Morris family": being a paper read at a meeting of the society on November 20th, 1918 ([Halifax, 1918]), 8–9.

COCHRAN, JAMES CUPPAIDGE, clergyman and editor; son of Dr William Cochran* and Rebecca Cuppaidge, b. at Windsor, N.S., 17 Sept. 1798; d. at Halifax, N.S., 20 June 1880.

James Cuppaidge Cochran was born within the walls of King's College, Windsor, Nova Scotia, where his father Dr William Cochran was vice-president. Following a brief period in business he decided on the ministry as a career and entered King's College in 1821. He completed the requirements for the BA in 1824, but the degree was not conferred until 1825. Ordained a priest of the Church of England on 23 Aug. 1824, Cochran served the first 28 years of his ministry in Lunenburg, N.S. He married Anna Mathilda Power on 15 Dec. 1826, and had 12 children. From 1835 until 1840, Cochran was editor of the Colonial Churchman, a fortnightly newspaper published in Lunenburg. Always a keen student, he qualified for an MA from King's College in 1835. Throughout his lifetime he demonstrated great interest in his alma mater and served for 25 years as secretary of the board of governors. From 1850 to 1852 he undertook a successful canvass of the diocese of Nova Scotia to raise an endowment fund for King's College.

In 1852 Cochran moved to Halifax and for the next three years was editor of the Church Times. Here he strove "to make the paper not only the channel of information on all topics ecclesiastical and secular but also to give profitable instruction in righteousness." His editorials in both the Colonial Churchman and the Church Times exhibit strong views on a wide variety of issues such as temperance, education, and railway policy. These journalistic efforts provide a valuable commentary on social and political conditions in mid-19th-century Nova Scotia. Cochran also gave leadership in various humanitarian and philanthropic endeavours. These included waging a successful campaign to establish an institution for the education of the deaf and dumb and voluntarily serving as chaplain in both the Halifax asylum for the poor and the city prison.

In 1855 he was appointed rector of Salem Chapel, a former Congregational church leased by the Church of England for work among the poverty stricken in Halifax. A successful ministry of 11 years was climaxed by a dispute with Bishop Hibbert Binney* which led to his dismissal in 1866. The controversy stemmed from Cochran's insistence on wearing a black geneva gown while preaching. Following this incident he and his followers organized Trinity Church – a free-pew church – where he remained until his retirement in 1875. His long career was recognized in 1872 when King's College conferred upon him the degree DD, honoris causa.

William B. Hamilton

[There are numerous references to Cochran in USPG, SPG, D10, 1, 2. The Andrew William Cochran papers in PAC, MG 24, B16, contain some correspondence between James Cuppaidge Cochran and his brother Andrew William Cochran*. "Recollections of half a century," a lecture delivered by James C. Cochran at Halifax, 26 Jan. 1864, in manuscript form, is in PANS. His published works consist mainly of collections of sermons; a number of these are in PANS, the Library of King's College, Halifax, and Acadia University Library, Wolfville, N.S. The pamphlet [Hibbert Binney], Correspondence between the bishop of Nova Scotia and the Reverend Canon Cochran, M.A., touching the dismissal of the latter from the pastoral charge of Salem Chapel, Halifax, N.S. (Halifax, 1866) is in General Synod Archives, Church House, Toronto. W.B.H.]

See also: Colonial Churchman (Lunenburg, N.S.), 1835–40, and the Church Times (Halifax), 1852–55. T. R. Millman, "Canadian Anglican journalism in the nineteenth century," Can. Church Hist. Soc. J. (Toronto), III (1959), 1–19.

COCHRANE, Sir THOMAS JOHN, officer in the Royal Navy and colonial administrator; b. in England on 5 Feb. 1789, eldest son of Admiral Sir Alexander Forrester Inglis Cochrane and his wife Maria Shaw, widow of Captain Jacob Wheate; m. on 6 Jan. 1812 to Mathilda Ross by whom he had two sons and two daughters; d. in England in 1872.

During their careers both Thomas John Cochrane and his father excited a great deal of envy and provoked considerable acid comment against themselves. Earl St Vincent [John Jervis] stated that the "Cochranes are not to be trusted. They are all mad, romantic, money-getting and not truth-telling." Reputedly Sir Alexander practised nepotism unduly, as when he entered his seven-year-old son on the books of his ship Thetis as a volunteer in 1796 and kept him under his pennant until 1805, when Thomas was promoted lieutenant on Jason. He became its captain in 1806 and saw service on it in the West Indies until 1809. By 1825 Thomas Cochrane had put in 26 years of service in the Royal Navy, including eight years on the North American Station, which were presumed to have been useful experience for his appointment as governor of Newfoundland on 16 April of that year.

Cochrane ushered in a new era for Newfoundland. He was the first resident governor, ending over 100 years of naval administration of an island long considered by the Admiralty as a ward of its own policy – a "great ship" anchored off the Grand Banks – and by the West Country merchants as their special area of commercial exploitation. Tory and authoritarian by upbringing and profession, Cochrane was fond of ceremony and preferred good living; he brought to Newfoundland enough household effects to equip a palace and, according to Sir Richard Henry Bonnycastle*, he "displayed a magnificence in his vice-regal function before unknown" in the poor colony. To fit his ideas of good living, Cochrane had a new residence built for the governor. It stood on a ridge between Fort William and Fort Townsend far away from the dangerous fire area of the lower town. Designed in England, it was originally estimated to cost £8,778; increased size and frequent alterations at Cochrane's wilful discretion brought the final costs in 1831 to £36,000, a most embarrassing sum which provoked a court of inquiry. Government house, now surrounded by the burgeoning city of St John's, remains as a memorial to Cochrane. To add to his comfort and enjoyment he purchased land about three miles from the city where, beside a private lake, he built an ornamental retreat, Virginia Cottage, joined by a special road to government house. Despite his love of luxury, however, Cochrane was extremely energetic and dedicated to his duties.

By royal charter of 2 Jan. 1826 a change was made in the administration of Newfoundland. Cochrane was to divide it into three districts – northern, central, and southern – over which he was to place a chief justice and two puisne judges for whom ample salaries were to be provided. The Supreme Court was to be given power to admit a sufficient number of qualified solicitors and attorneys to practise in the courts. Richard Alexander Tucker* became chief justice with John W. Molloy and Augustus W. DesBarres the assistants, following this charter. The extension of a civil court system was not, however, matched by the introduction of a more customary form of civil government. In fact the Colonial Office refused to consider representative government and imposed a system similar to that just prepared for New South Wales, by which Cochrane ruled over Newfoundland with a nominated council, composed of the three judges and the commander of the garrison. As A. H. McLintock puts it, "this council was strictly advisory in its functions, for it was to be summoned by the governor to discuss only questions proposed by him, and as it was entirely official, the executive powers of the governor differed little from those under the old order." The differences, however, were there; the political climate in England was changing and in the colony there were men able and willing to challenge an indefinite continuation of oligarchical rule.

Despite the restraints of the new order, Cochrane took up the solution of the colony's problems, including its depressed economic situation, with enthusiasm. He countered the unconditional pauper relief, which he believed encouraged idleness and dependence upon the government, by providing employment on road-building projects to connect the capital with some of the adjacent outports; he encouraged agriculture by making small holdings available at nominal quitrents, though he believed that, because of the nature of the land, farming could only be complementary to the fishery; he stopped the practice of deporting the most destitute. He also sought to classify the application of the laws of England to Newfoundland, but this effort was interrupted. Cochrane attempted as well to set up a system of municipal government in St John's. In 1826 a group was called together to devise a municipal system for the city, but he failed to get unanimity. Political cabals, Protestant and Catholic dissension, English and Irish antagonisms, and mercantile resistance all worked against him. Finally in 1827 he requested that the Colonial Office coerce the city into accepting a plan of local government, but London refused. During Cochrane's regime St John's was therefore ruled by the council.

Conspicuous among Newfoundlanders in their support for a representative assembly, a problem that engrossed the colony, were Patrick Morris*, born in Waterford, Ireland, and Dr William Carson* of Kirkcudbrightshire, Scotland. Cochrane was opposed to an assembly; his reasons were cogent and, in the light of later developments, justified if not completely valid. He was well aware that the reformers' case for representative government had the support of some important merchants, although a not inconsequential number, resident and absentee, stood firmly against change. He had also been warned by the Colonial Office that the colony's population (approximately 60,000) had reached a size where its pressure against authoritarian rule could not be withstood. The governor, however, argued that among this substantial population only a small merchant class had the wealth, education, and respectability to take places in the legislature, and this group, along with their agents, were already fully occupied in their mercantile affairs. Even if the small professional class were considered along with the merchants, St John's alone would be well served. The lack of roads, the hostile climate, and a paucity of able men would leave the outports neglected. Cochrane was fully convinced that the existing form of government, with some innovations such as municipal governments for larger communities, was best suited for the mass of uneducated, politically innocent fishermen.

Sir James Stephen probably turned the scales in the reformers' favour when on 17 Dec. 1831 in his position as legal adviser to the Colonial Office he made a report on the suggested form of legislature for Newfoundland. He observed that "in every colony where the population is homogeneous, . . . a Legislative Assembly is an inestimable benefit; that it executes its proper functions with a degree of ability for which it rarely obtains sufficient credit; that it either prevents discontents or gives them a safe direction; that it creates more useful exercise of the understanding; affords much innocent pleasure; and creates a subject of permanent interests in societies which would otherwise stagnate in a listless unconcern about all questions of a public character." In the House of Commons George Robinson, member for Worcester, and long acquainted with Newfoundland through trade and residence, had already pressed the case for an assembly in September by relating that issue to the British reform bill. When Cochrane was advised in July 1832 by the home government that he had lost the argument, he did not resign but promised to further the new constitution as if he had thought of it himself. This resolve was not easily made for Cochrane's voice on the needs of the colony had not been heeded by Viscount Howick [Henry George Grey], the under secretary for the colonies, a Whig and an enthusiast for representative institutions.

In August 1832 Cochrane obtained a new commission, and in fact became the first civil governor of the island. He was empowered to create a legislature with an executive council of seven members subject to his suspension for any just cause, and to divide the island into nine districts from which a 15-member assembly was to be elected on a franchise so wide that it amounted to manhood suffrage. Cochrane retained the usual negative voice with power to adjourn, prorogue, and dissolve the legislature. His two years under the new constitution were far from happy. Troubles, which Lord Goderich [Frederick John Robinson] had sought to prevent when he was colonial secretary, fell with a vengeance upon the infant legislature: despite warnings from Goderich and James Stephen, the council and assembly were not cojoined, hence there were no councillors in the lower chamber to check the radicalism of the more vociferous members; equally the separate council was an open invitation for the entrenchment of privilege. Quarrels between the council and assembly were constant, violent, and even undignified. The assembly bickered with Cochrane, fought with the public over privilege, and at times sought to browbeat the judiciary into compliance with its wishes. Strong, irascible personalities on either side of the contest both in and out of the legislature embittered the public and private debates, and newspapers argued blatantly with no attempt to cover their bias.

Factionalism in high places was exemplified in two persons particularly. Henry John Boulton*, lately dismissed by Goderich from his office as attorney general of Upper Canada and appointed chief justice (and thus a member of the council) in Newfoundland in 1833 by Goderich's successor Lord Stanley, was far from impartial in his legal office and overbearing in his political position. The Roman Catholic bishop, Michael Anthony Fleming*, did not hesitate to play a role in politics, especially in support of the Catholic John KENT, and set a pattern for clerical involvement in politics. A running feud developed between Cochrane and Fleming and culminated in a libel action brought by the governor against the bishop's chaplain, Father Edward TROY, for allegedly writing a series of articles against the governor in the local press.

Cochrane's removal from office in 1834 was the result not only of his embroilment with the colony's reformers and the bishop, but also of an accumulation of grievances against him and the disappearance from office of Goderich, who, according to Cochrane, had promised him a longer period than two years under his commission of 1832. To add to Cochrane's discomfiture, Lord Stanley's successor, Sir Thomas Spring-Rice, reminded him of his past extravagant expenditures and criticized his tardiness in writing dispatches to London. Only partially justified was the Colonial Office's criticism that Cochrane was to blame for the mob violence against the Protestant editor, Henry D. Winton*, late in 1833 in St John's, and the unpreparedness of the garrison to suppress such violence. Cochrane suspected that his dismissal was also hastened by the constant complaints against him to the Colonial Office by the Catholic party and the reformers. To fill his cup of humiliation, he and his daughter Mary were reviled and pelted with filth on their way down Cochrane Street (named in his honour) to the ship ready to take him back to England.

Cochrane was never again employed in a colony, but he did re-emerge briefly in Newfoundland's affairs when he appeared before a select committee appointed in 1841 to enquire into the continuing legislative problems. On this occasion he reiterated his original belief that the colony was not ready for the constitution granted in 1832, and indicated that political events under Sir Henry PRESCOTT's governorship had served to strengthen his conviction. His opinions, along with others, persuaded the British government to modify a constitution they could not revoke, and led to the introduction of the Amalgamated Legislature the following year.

Cochrane served as the Conservative MP for Ipswich between 1839 and 1841, and in the latter year was promoted rear admiral; between 1842 and 1847 he was successively second in command and commander-in-chief of the China Station, and, from 1852 to 1855, commander-in-chief for Portsmouth. He ultimately rose to admiral of the fleet in 1865.

Though the events of his administration may not suggest a favourable verdict, Judge Daniel Woodley Prowse*, writing in the latter years of the 19th century, pronounced that "Sir Thomas Cochrane is now universally admitted to have been the best Governor ever sent to Newfoundland." Before his departure in 1834, England's oldest colony had been set on the rough and rocky road to representative government.

FREDERIC F. THOMPSON

PRO, CO 194/80–194/88. DNB. John Marshall, Royal naval biography ... (2v. and supps., London, 1823–30), I. O'Byrne, Naval biog. dict. Gunn, Political history of Nfld. A. H. McLintock, The establishment of constitutional government in Newfoundland, 1783–1832: a study in retarded colonisation (Royal Empire Society imperial studies, 17, London, 1941). Prowse, History of Nfld. Thompson, French shore problem in Nfld.

COFFIN, WILLIAM FOSTER, soldier, author, and civil servant; b. at Bath, Eng., on 5 Nov. 1808, son of an army officer and grandson of John Coffin*, a loyalist from Boston who moved to Quebec in 1775 and played a distinguished part in its defence against the Americans in 1775–76; d. at Ottawa, Ont., 28 Jan. 1878.

In 1813, William Foster Coffin's family came to Quebec. His father being in the army, Coffin was aware as a child of the echoes of the War of 1812. He learned French at this time, at the home of the parish priest of Beauport. In 1815, with the war at an end, the Coffins returned to England and William spent the next nine years at Eton. Perhaps because his uncle Thomas* was living at Quebec and had become a member of the Legislative Council of Lower Canada, William looked to the colony for a career. In 1830 he came to Canada, articled in Montreal, and, after reading law with Charles Richard Ogden* and Alexander Buchanan*, was called to the bar of Lower Canada in 1835. Two years later, he was active among the volunteers organized against the Patriotes, serving as an interpreter and intervening to protect the habitants and church property from pillaging by these volunteers.

This background of law and loyalty helped to shape Coffin's career in the ensuing years. In 1838 he was chosen by Sir John Colborne* to be assistant civil secretary for Lower Canada – an office created with a view to organizing a police force for the province – and in 1839 he became a police magistrate. In 1840, Coffin became commissioner of police for Lower Canada; two years later he was named joint sheriff of the District of Montreal, a post he resigned in 1851 when the legislature suddenly cut in half the income of the office. Coffin was frequently called on as a commissioner to investigate matters of law and order. In 1840 he looked into the state and condition of the Montreal jail; in 1841 he inquired into troubles on the Indian reserve at Caughnawaga and into election riots at Toronto [see George MONRO]. In 1854 he investigated accidents on the Great Western Railway and, in the following year, he studied the affairs of the University of Toronto. In 1855 also, he was sent to maintain order on the Gatineau "then seriously threatened by refractory characters to the great disquietude of the lumbering interest." Meanwhile, Coffin was acquiring land, wealth, and important interests in railways linking Montreal and New York.

In 1855, as a result of the Crimean War, Britain reduced her garrison in Canada to its lowest level in decades. Patriotic enthusiasm and anxiety at the possibility of war with the United States combined to persuade the government of the united province to revise the Canadian militia system. For the first time, formal authority was granted for the creation of units of volunteer militia. Coffin, a major in the older militia organization, was one of many who took advantage of the new legislation, forming the only militia field battery in Montreal. Since organizing field artillery involved hiring horses, recruiting men, and storing equipment, as well as mastering relatively complex training, only a man of enthusiasm and wealth could have managed so difficult a task.

To encourage Canadians to make permanent provision for their own defence, the British government decided to hand over, in 1856, most of its ordnance lands in Canada to the provincial authorities. With some misgivings, the Canadian government accepted the gift. At the suggestion of the governor general, Sir Edmund Walker Head*, Coffin was appointed commissioner for ordnance lands, a position he was to hold for the rest of his life. Choosing to establish himself in Ottawa, Coffin resigned his command of the Montreal battery, and received promotion to lieutenant-colonel as a final reward for his services.

Predictably, Coffin struggled hard to make Canadian government policy fulfil British expectations. The ordnance lands, he claimed, "represent a capital, the annual interest of which, if estimated as proposed, will exceed the present requirements of the militia of the Province." Rent from land and buildings in Ottawa alone would yield a million dollars a year for defence purposes. Coffin's efforts to secure the ordnance funds for Canadian defence were unavailing and his office and its revenues were soon swallowed up in the massive Crown Lands Department. For 18 more years he continued as a civil servant of first the provincial and later the dominion government.

Throughout his life, Coffin elaborated his claim that his grandfather had played the key role in saving Quebec in 1775 and, consequently, British power in North America. In the 1860s, with new threats of war with the United States, Coffin turned to a wider patriotic task in publishing 1812, the war and its moral. Although his younger contemporary, John Charles Dent*, condemned the book's unflagging patriotic bias, he merely underlined Coffin's own purpose: to combat the sensational American versions of the war and to offer "an antidote to the American literature of the day." The heroism of Sir Isaac Brock*, Tecumseh*, Laura Secord [Ingersoll*], and the Canadian militia is presented with enough fervour to contribute significantly to a mythology known to a century of English Canadian schoolchildren. By accentuating the significance of Charles-Michel d'Irumberry* de Salaberry and the battle of Châteauguay, Coffin did his best to provide both the founding races of Canada with the heroic legends he felt were necessary for their common nationalism.

After his first book, Coffin continued to write, chiefly lectures. Those which survive in print, such as Thoughts on defence, from a Canadian point of view and Quirks of diplomacy, exhibit an increasing sense of Canadian nationalism. Even after the withdrawal of British troops from central Canada in 1870–71, Coffin argued that Canadians could defend themselves from the United States. If the British chose to be generous at Canada's expense in their diplomacy with the United States, Canadians should be recompensed.

In 1873, Coffin declined the appointment of lieutenant governor of Manitoba. Five years later he died at his home, "Aux Écluses," near Ottawa. In Boston, on 6 July 1841, he had married Margaret Clark, herself of loyalist and military stock. She and one son, Thomas, survived him.

DESMOND MORTON

PAC, MG 30, D62 (Audet papers), 8, 565–69. W. F. Coffin, 1812, the war and its moral; a Canadian chronicle (Montreal, 1864); Memorial of William F. Coffin to His Excellency Sir Edmund Walker Head (Montreal, 1855); Quirks of diplomacy; read before the Literary and Scientific Society of Ottawa, January 22, 1874 (Montreal, 1874); Thoughts on defence, from a Canadian point of view . . . (Montreal, 1870). Dom. ann. reg., 1878, 333–34. E. J. Chambers, The origin and services of the 3rd (Montreal) field battery of artillery, with some notes on the artillery of by-gone days, and a brief history of the development of field artillery (Montreal, 1898). Dent, Last forty years, II, 566. Hodgetts, Pioneer public service.

COGSWELL, ISABELLA BINNEY, philanthropist; b. 6 July 1819 in Halifax, ninth child of Henry Hezekiah Cogswell* and Isabella Ellis; d. 6 Dec. 1874 in Halifax.

Isabella Cogswell's parents were born in the Nova Scotia outports; the Cogswells had emigrated from New England in the 1760s and the Ellis family were immigrants from Ireland. Henry Cogswell, an attorney, was first president of the Halifax Banking Company, an MLA, and member of the provincial Legislative Council. Isabella inherited her father's business instincts and carried on numerous property transactions in Halifax after his death. She also inherited his broad humanitarianism which was reinforced by the evangelical influence of her brother William Cogswell, curate of St Paul's Church. When her father's death left her free of family responsibilities, Isabella, who never married, devoted the rest of her life to bettering the educational and living conditions of the Halifax poor.

In the 1850s Isabella began assisting at Sabbath services at the Ragged School for pauper children. In the early 1860s she organized a ladies' committee to revive the faltering school; from it emerged, in 1863, the Halifax Protestant Industrial School, a home "for the reclamation of boys to the paths of industry and virtue." She headed a group of women who provided religious instruction at the school, entertained the teachers and boys at her residence, "Jubilee," and contributed financial aid, particularly for steam power in the workshop and for an endowment. She was also a founder and committee member of St Paul's Alms House of Industry for Girls, to which she granted a bequest for the carrying on of its work. To aid Christian women of inadequate means, Isabella participated in the founding, operation, and endowment of a home for the aged. Tirelessly, she laboured for St Paul's Parochial District Visiting Society and the Halifax branch of the Colonial Church Society which established Anglican schoolmasters and missionaries in Nova Scotia. With a bequest to Trinity, the free-pew church, and her assistance to interdenominational missions, she encouraged religious instruction for the poor. To aid them further, she endowed an orphans' home and served as first president of the Women's Christian Association.

Miss Cogswell's wealth encouraged not only philanthropic activity but also commercial transactions. Property was the principal field of her investment, and in 20 years of substantial purchases and sales she demonstrated the same good business sense as her competitors. Her mortgage holdings, the customary instruments of her purchases, were valued in excess of $95,000 at the time of her death. But the main directing force in her life was her belief that the body was the home of the soul. Her most consuming efforts were devoted to the moral improvement of her fellow citizens – never ostentatiously, never condescendingly, but always persistently.

S. BUGGEY

Halifax County Court of Probate, will of Isabella Binney Cogswell. Christian Messenger (Halifax), 9 Dec. 1874. Daily Acadian Recorder (Halifax), 7, 8, 9 Dec. 1874. PANS, Beech Street Mission, Report, 1882; Halifax branch of the Colonial and Continental Church Society, Reports, 1862–74; Halifax Protestant Industrial School, Reports, 1865–76; Halifax Ragged and Industrial Schools, Report, 1864; St Paul's Alms House of Industry for Girls, Reports, 1868–75. Harris, Church of Saint Paul, 245–46. E. O. Jameson, The Cogswells in America (Boston, 1884), 388–89.

COLES, GEORGE, farmer, merchant, brewer, distiller, and politician, b. 20 Sept. 1810 in Prince Edward Island, son of James Coles and Sarah Tally; d. 21 Aug. 1875 in Charlottetown Royalty, P.E.I.

George Coles spent his early years on his father's farm in Charlottetown Royalty. The Island was then at a primitive stage of development, and young George, not born into the local élite, received little formal education. At the age of 19 he went to England, where, on 14 Aug. 1833, he married Mercy Haine, who was to bear him 12 children. Later in the same year, he returned with his bride to Prince Edward Island.

On 29 Oct. 1833 Coles advertised that he had for sale, at his father's residence, several items, such as pipes and silverware, which he had brought back from England. By June of the following year he could announce that he had opened a "New and Cheap Store" in Charlottetown, selling imported manufactured goods and liquor. Eighteen months later he was advertising the products of a brewery and distillery which he had founded. He appears to have been successful in his new venture, for in May of 1836 he publicly thanked his patrons for their "kind and unexpected support." As the 1830s wore on, the production of beer and liquor became the focus of his business activities, and he advertised for the purchase of increasing quantities of barley and oats. Nevertheless, he did not restrict his talents to brewing and distilling. In 1840 he acquired a steam mill, in 1843 he announced that he had imported modern carding machines, and by the mid-1840s he was renting houses in Charlottetown. In addition, Coles managed a farm which the editor of the Islander described in 1843 as being "for its size . . . one of the best managed and most productive in the Island . . . in fact, a specimen on a small scale, of what may be seen as the effects of the most scientific husbandry in England." In all his ventures, George Coles was employing between 20 and 30 men, and had a capital outlay estimated as being between £7,000 and £8,000.

By this time, Coles had entered public life. In 1842 he had contested the rural constituency of New London and had been elected to the House of Assembly. The electoral card he distributed was non-committal as to party affiliation, but Coles was generally understood to be opposed to the radical escheat policies espoused by many of the Reformers. Escheat concerned the land question, the major issue in Prince Edward Island in the early 1840s, and indeed throughout Coles' career. In 1767 the Island had been divided into 67 lots, of approximately 20,000 acres each, which were parcelled out to various persons with claims upon the generosity of the crown. By the beginning of the 19th century there had been much consolidation of holdings, with the result that a few magnates, mostly absentees, came to own huge tracts. The owners often refused to sell their lands, and instead leased them, creating a neo-feudal system of tenure. In 1841, for example, fewer than one-third of the occupiers of land were freeholders. The landowners had received the lots under the stipulation that they fulfill certain requirements for settlement of the Island and that they pay quit-rents to the crown. In many cases, the obligations had been neglected, and the escheators advocated the establishment of a court of escheat to investigate non-fulfillment. The lands of the defaulting proprietors would be returned to the crown for distribution to the tenantry on a freehold basis. The escheators' plan, however, would require the consent of the Colonial Office in London, where the landlords' influence was paramount. Thus there were two possible grounds for opposition to the escheat agitation: that property rights should not be violated, and that the scheme was impractical and would never get the approval of the British government.

In speaking of the land question during his first term in the assembly, Coles usually chose the argument that escheat was impractical. But although he voted as a Tory regular, he did not take a reactionary position. He repeatedly made suggestions for the clarification and extension of the rights of tenants and squatters – this latter group composed 11.6 per cent of the occupiers of land in 1841. Coles was also pressing for the ultimate liquidation of leasehold tenure. This budding conflict of opinion between Coles and the rest of the established élite had strong roots in an inherent conflict of interest: Coles represented a different sort of capitalism than did a man like James Yeo*. The latter assemblyman had made his fortune mainly through his activities as a land agent, merchant, and carrier. Men in Yeo's position were concerned with extending their profits as middlemen in the established order, rather than seeing its stability disrupted. Coles more than once remarked that the land agents were more determined than the proprietors themselves to maintain the status quo.

Coles, on the other hand, was by this time primarily a manufacturer, whose prosperity as a producer of a consumer good depended upon the development of a healthy internal market with widespread purchasing power. As a distiller and brewer, he had no interest in seeing the tenants and squatters impoverished and capital exported en masse to absentee proprietors. Hence, his statement in the assembly in 1846 that conversion of the estates to freehold tenure would bring about "a greater consumption of manufactured articles" reflected an expectation growing logically out of his class interests; these, and not disrespect for the rights of property (as land agent and assemblyman William Douse had suggested), lay at the base of Coles' increasing concern for the abolition of leasehold tenure. The archaic productive relations which nurtured men like Douse and Yeo would have to be abandoned if Coles' style of capitalism were to flourish.

Thus Coles spoke out often and forcefully in these years; even in his first session he did not hesitate to oppose Tory leaders such as Edward Palmer* on small matters. Unfortunately for the young assemblyman, he became embroiled in a feud with the speaker, Joseph Pope*. Several times in the session of 1845 they exchanged harsh words; Pope even alleged that a young man had died from the effects of Coles' whiskey – a charge which the latter angrily and effectively refuted. In 1846 Coles refused to obey an order of the house to retract his description of a statement by Pope as "false," and as a result spent the rest of the session, 31 days, in the custody of the serjeant-at-arms. He had evidently not endeared himself to the Tory leadership, for only two assemblymen had opposed his disciplining, and they were Reformers.

The obtaining of responsible government, which Coles supported, dominated the late 1840s, and thrust him into the forefront of Island politics. The struggle was prolonged and intense, for the resident establishment and the Colonial Office were reluctant in the extreme to grant the change: not only was there a small population, but the interests of many members of the establishment were bound up in the land system, which they feared would be the first target of a popularly elected administration. However, Coles, as an entrepreneur without a vital stake in the retardation of the Island economy, was receptive when, two days after the close of the session of 1847, the governor, Sir Henry Vere Huntley*, invited him to join the Executive Council. The governor had his own feud with Joseph Pope and the local family compact, and desired a Reformer on his council in the place of Pope, who had resigned. Coles had broken with the Tories by this time, and in the session just ended he had explicitly endorsed the general positions of Alexander Rae, then the acknowledged leader of the Reformers in the house. Huntley had first approached Rae with the offer of a seat on the council, but the latter declined, and in so doing recommended Coles. Thus Coles became the first self-avowed Reformer to sit on the Executive Council of the Island. But the alliance between government house and the Reformers did not endure; in December of 1847, a new governor, Sir Donald Campbell*, who had no motives for combining with the insurgents against the compact, arrived to replace Huntley. One year later Coles resigned from Campbell's Executive Council, declaring that he lacked confidence in the administration. Campbell, for his part, advised the Colonial Office that, with Coles' departure, he expected less trouble from his council.

The problems of the governor, who had no sympathy with the movement for responsible government, had only begun. A new weapon had been given to the Reformers. In the same month that Coles resigned from the Executive Council, the Colonial Office decided that the Island was sufficiently prosperous to pay for its own civil list. In return for discharging this financial obligation, the Reformers demanded responsible government. As the struggle grew in intensity through the session of 1849, Coles clearly emerged as the leader of the Reform forces. The movement was also gathering general support outside the house: an election held in February 1850 resulted in an 18 to 6 victory for Coles' party.

When the new house assembled, it was at once apparent that Coles had the full support of the majority of assemblymen in demanding responsible government, and in expressing want-of-confidence in the Tory Executive Council. Nonetheless, Campbell refused to acquiesce in the Reform programme. Throughout two sessions called in the spring of 1850, the governor and the house failed to come to a modus vivendi; consequently, the Reformers refused to vote supply. After the sessions, Campbell, realizing that he would ultimately have to give in, suggested to the imperial government that they pass a statute placing new restrictions on the franchise to curtail any impulse to radicalism. But Lord Grey [Henry George Grey], the colonial secretary, had decided that the election of 1850 had clearly indicated that the Island electors desired responsible government and therefore should have it. He bluntly rejected the governor's proposals and, when Campbell died in October 1850, Grey gave the new governor, Sir Alexander Bannerman*, explicit instructions to accede to the wishes of the Reformers.

On 25 April 1851, Coles rose in the assembly and reported that he had formed a new Executive Council, possessing the confidence of the house. Coles was the predictable choice as premier: he had led the movement in the assembly, on the hustings, and as chairman of a five-man committee of the house formed in 1850 to correspond with sympathetic British parliamentarians. In all cases, he had refused to compromise with Campbell and the local Tories – he would have responsible government, or the wheels of government on Prince Edward Island would not turn.

Donald Creighton once wrote that "responsible government was a method, not a measure" – it was a system of political relationships which derived its real significance not from the bare fact of its establishment, but from the substantive changes which its advent facilitated. Such a government would only acquire meaning for colonial citizens if its inauguration were marked by new and more democratic policies. Coles and his colleagues recognized this. They did not rest upon their laurels, but followed up their struggle for responsible government with a vigorous legislative programme.

The first great measure of Coles' government was the Free Education Act of 1852. A visit to Massachusetts and Ohio in the autumn of 1848 had inspired this legislation; there Coles had observed the benefits of state-paid education, and had been told by former Islanders of the disadvantages they faced without at least primary education. With the act, the Island became the first Maritime colony in which the government paid the entire salaries of district school teachers. Previously, the districts had been obliged to raise part of the stipends by local assessment and tuition fees. After 1852, local taxes were to be used only for the erection and maintenance of school buildings, and tuition fees were abolished. Within two years the number of students enrolled in Island schools doubled, and by 1855 the Island's proportion of students in relation to the total population was reputedly one-third greater than that of either Nova Scotia or New Brunswick. The second major reform was of a similar nature – the franchise was broadened to become almost universal.

The most intractable problem confronting the reform government was the land question. Coles rejected escheat and other drastic solutions, although the Liberal caucus contained two or more radicals when he was in power in the 1850s. As Coles articulated his policy, it consisted of ameliorative legislation in the short run, and a programme of purchasing estates over a period of years. These transactions, on a voluntary basis, would involve "fair compensation" for the landlords, and would result in resale of the lands to their occupiers at minimal rates. Examples of the ameliorative measures were the rent roll bill, the one-ninth bill, and the tenants' compensation bill. The first of these would have imposed a small tax per acre on estates in excess of 500 acres. The Colonial Office disallowed it outright. The one-ninth bill was intended to regulate the extraction of rents from the tenantry. Although it failed to gain the assent of the British government when first passed in 1851, an amended version was eventually accepted. The purpose of the tenants' compensation bill was to indemnify ejected tenants and squatters for improvements made by them prior to ejectment. It too met obstruction from entrenched interests, and in 1855 Coles introduced a measure which was rigidly confined in scope: it applied only to those squatters who had been in use and occupation of their lands for a minimum of five years, and to those tenants who held leases for limited periods and were ejected before their leases expired. The squatters with less than five years on their lands, the tenants with 999-year leases (which were common), and the tenants ejected upon completion of, for example, seven-year leases, were left unprotected. "By asking too much," Coles said, "we shall, I fear, lose all." The Colonial Office refused to confirm even this bill.

The major component of Coles' land policy was the Land Purchase Act of 1853. Under its provisions, the government was empowered to buy estates in excess of 1,000 acres and to sell them to tenants and squatters in units up to a maximum of 300 acres. In 1854, the Liberals purchased the 81,000-acre Worrell estate, and began its resale [see William Henry Pope]. It was the first and last large purchase made in the 1850s: when the Island government passed a loan bill in 1857 to raise £100,000 for further purchases, the imperial government disallowed the legislation; and even if London had desired to cooperate, many proprietors, such as Sir Samuel Cunard*, had no intention of selling. Thus, Coles failed to liquidate leasehold tenure on Prince Edward Island.

Coles was the unchallenged leader of his party throughout this period of forward-looking government. He was the most effective defender of Liberal policies in the assembly, and his speeches reveal a thorough familiarity with all the major issues which were debated. He spoke directly to the point, and was able quickly to seize upon the weaknesses in his opponents' arguments. The only Liberal whose prestige approximated his was the brilliant journalist, Edward Whelan*. However, Whelan was often absent from his seat in the house, as he had little taste for the routine of party management and public administration – matters which he left by and large to Coles. Hence the energies of the two men were complementary rather than competitive.

Coles and his party remained in power until 1859, with the exception of some six months in 1854. In July 1853, largely because of the sudden rise in taxation occasioned by the Free Education Act, they had lost an election in which even Coles had been defeated. However, the partisanship of Governor Bannerman kept them in office until February 1854. After one session of Tory government, Bannerman dissolved the assembly over the objections of his new Executive Council, and called another election. His reasoning was that since the Franchise Act of 1853 had just become effective, the house had been rendered unrepresentative of the actual electorate. The new and enlarged body of voters gave the Liberals an 18 to 6 majority; Coles returned to the assembly, and assumed the additional duties of colonial secretary.

But, somewhere along the line, the Coles government had lost its edge. When the Bible question arose in late 1856, Coles badly underestimated its explosive potential. The controversy began at the inauguration of the Island's Normal School, when school visitor John Stark, who was also superintendent of the new institution, stated that reading and exposition of the Bible would be a part of the daily programme of all student teachers. The Board of Education quickly repudiated Stark's position, but this action did not become public knowledge. As a result, the Roman Catholic bishop of Charlottetown, Bernard D. MacDonald*, sent a protest against Stark's words to the secretary of the board. Coles soon learned of the bishop's letter, and arranged an interview, at which he explained that the school visitor's remarks did not represent government policy. The bishop then wrote a short letter to Coles, stating his satisfaction that he had been labouring under a misunderstanding, and authorizing the premier to show his retraction "to all whom it may concern." Coles neglected to do so, with disastrous consequences for his party. The bishop's first letter, which had not been temperately worded, went before a meeting of the board. A Protestant minister sitting on the board then published it, and began a campaign for the legal authorization of Bible reading in the district schools. Previously, the position of the Holy Scriptures had been governed by an informal system of local option; the bishop's letter, whose scope had not been limited to the Normal School, was held to be a threat to this extra-legal policy of permissiveness.

Religion in education became the prime determinant in Island politics for the next two decades. This was unfortunate for Coles, as he was vulnerable on issues such as the Bible question. He was an Anglican leading a party whose main electoral support came from the minority Roman Catholic community. By the time of his retirement, he had been denounced at various times by the militants of both denominational camps. The Bible question was the major factor in the defeat of his government at the end of the 1850s, as the Protestant electors deserted the Liberals en masse. More than once Coles misjudged the potency of the issue and the depth of the passions it could inspire, with the result that opportunities to allay them were missed. In addition, the Liberals were faced with claims that their land policy had reached a dead end, and that a modified system of responsible government known as "non departmentalism" was better adapted to the small population of the Island [see Pope]. At the election of 24 June 1858, the Coles government was sustained by the narrow margin of 16 to 14. The resignation in February 1859 of one Liberal member and the resulting confusion ended the session begun that month after only three days. A second election ensued, and although Coles indicated his willingness to resort to escheat in order to resolve the land question, his party was decisively defeated by the Tories led by Edward Palmer.

As leader of the opposition, especially in the first two years, Coles more than bore his share of the responsibility of criticizing the Tory government. Palmer and his colleagues settled the Bible question to the general satisfaction of both parties in 1860, by simply giving a statutory basis to the status quo. But, in the same year, a new Roman Catholic bishop of Charlottetown, Peter MacIntyre*, took office. He was a vigorous man, and was determined that the Roman Catholic St Dunstan's College should get public financial support equal to that of the newly established, secular, and public Prince of Wales College. His attempts to gain this and other ends in matters relating to education, and the controversial public writings of the Catholic college's rector, Father Angus MacDonald*, eventually led to a public vendetta between William Henry Pope, the colonial secretary, and the rector. This provided the Tories with another occasion to campaign against "Romish aggression," and to unite the Protestant majority against Coles and the Roman Catholic population. Again the strategy was successful, and, largely over the college question, Palmer's government was sustained at the polls in 1863 by an 18 to 12 margin.

When confederation of the British North American colonies became a topic for public discussion, Coles declared that he would support any plan of union which would guarantee the liquidation of leasehold tenure. The implication was that if this condition could not be met, union would not be acceptable. Coles adhered to this policy on confederation throughout his public career. At both the Charlottetown and the Quebec conferences, he insisted in vain on this point. The answer of the Canadians was that the Islanders were already promised more than their fair share of financial subsidies. When he returned home, Coles successfully led the Liberal party (with the exception of Whelan) into adamant opposition to the Quebec resolutions. In contrast, the Tory government split sharply over this issue.

Thus the Tories, like their predecessors in office, failed to resolve the land question. They had appointed, in 1860, a distinguished commission of investigation, whose recommendations had been disallowed by the imperial government; they had sent a delegation consisting of Palmer and W. H. Pope to London, and it had been stymied by the intransigence of a group of proprietors led by Cunard; and now the Canadian government had shown an equal lack of sympathy. The farmers of Prince Edward Island proceeded to take matters into their own hands: they formed Tenant Leagues whose members were sworn to resist the collection of rents. By the summer of 1865, class tensions were so sharp on the Island that the administrator, Robert HODGSON, called in troops from Halifax in order to prevent serious disorders. The unpopularity of this move and the deep Tory divisions over confederation determined the election of 1867 – the Liberals won by a majority of 19 to 11.

Coles resumed his position as premier and colonial secretary on 14 March 1867. At first it appeared as though there would be a complete restoration of the Liberal hegemony as it had existed prior to 1859. The government immediately returned to the principles of the Free Education Act of 1852, which the Tories had abrogated in 1863. After his brief flirtation with escheat, Coles had gone back to his programme of voluntary purchases of estates. Consequently, he had little use for the Tenant League movement; their "open defiance of the law" was "the disgrace of the Colony." He was proud that the leading Liberals "had taken every fitting opportunity to denounce the illegal organization, and to caution the tenantry against associating themselves with it." The mistake of the Tories was not in repressing the movement but in not acting sooner: if they had made use of the civil authorities, they would have avoided the recourse to troops. This position was consistent with Coles' class interests as an entrepreneur; just as in the 1840s he had had no interest in seeing the Island's farmer-consumers impoverished, he now had no interest in seeing the legal rights of property disregarded – even if it was property belonging to his political enemies. It was not the formation of a union, he said, which disturbed him – it was the refusal of its members to pay legally collectable rents.

Coles, however, was not fated to play his old role in Island public life for any length of time. His mind had begun a rapid deterioration; by the session of 1868, the attorney general, Joseph Hensley*, was the real Liberal house leader. By August, Coles had formally resigned as premier and during the next session he spoke rarely. In 1870 he was absent from the house for the entire session. His premature senility was commonly attributed to overwork and anxiety. In 1866 there had been a wave of incendiarism in Charlottetown, and Coles' business premises had had at least one narrow escape; a further factor was probably the untimely death of Edward Whelan on 10 Dec. 1867 in unhappy circumstances. Whatever the causes, Coles did not recover his mental capacities, although he lived until 1875.

By 1868 Coles had reached the effective end of his brilliant career. For over 20 years he had been at the very centre of Island public life. Throughout this time he had been a controversial figure: he had been subjected to more than one attempt to exclude him from the deliberations of the assembly in the 1840s and 1850s; he had reputedly duelled with Edward Palmer in 1851; he had been convicted of and fined for assault in the mid-1850s; and, on the floor of the house in 1861, he had challenged James Colledge Pope* to a duel "with sword or pistol." His political trajectory had been that of a vigorous and progressive entrepreneur in a colony laden with a neo-feudal land system. The major task which he had set for himself, in alliance with the bulk of the farm population, was the breaking of the power of the landlords and their agents; his means to this end included responsible government, an expanded franchise, a universal education system, and a voluntary land purchase act.

Coles' success was incomplete, partially because of the limitations which he and Whelan had been able to enforce within the Island's reform movement. Coles refused to sanction the radicalism of the Tenant Leaguers although his ideological position and theirs were basically similar. Coles and the Leaguers opposed the outside domination exercised by the proprietors, not property itself – after all, the farmers were demanding the right to become property owners. The difference was that Coles, as a man of substance, was not inclined to lend approbation to any programme of forcible seizures, whereas the tenants, as men of poverty, had fewer inhibitions. Whether Coles' leadership would have resulted in the League's success is an unanswerable question. The fact remains that he did not live to see the final resolution of the land issue.

When Coles died, the newspaper columns of the Island overflowed with praise. The Argus described him as "the brightest star that illumines the pages of the political history of his native province," and the Examiner, at that time a Conservative paper, wrote that "we, unhesitatingly, say no man in this Colony so honestly earned the respect and esteem of its people." George Coles, the father of responsible government, free education, a widened franchise, and land reform, had outlived all the animosity against him, and had become a bipartisan folk hero.

IAN ROSS ROBERTSON

[No collection of George Coles' papers has been found to date. All the manuscript sources mentioned here were read for the whole period of Coles' career; of special importance to the preparation of the text were: PAPEI, Henry Jones Cundall, letter book, 27 March 1867–26 May 1871, pp.137, 155; Report of the speeches and proceedings at the inauguration of the Normal School in Charlottetown . . ., reporter R. B Irving (Charlottetown, 1856), 27–29; Prince Edward Island, Executive Council, Minutes, 1847–48, 1851–59, 1867–68. Prince Edward Island, Supreme Court, Estates Division, will of George Coles, 3 July 1865. Prince Edward Island Libraries (Charlottetown), Dr John Mackieson diaries, 25 June 1851. PRO, CO 226/71, 259–61, 265–68, 287–300, 306–17, 328, 331, 332, 348–53, 358–68, 378, 451–58, 478; 226/73, 88–89; 226/83, 88; 226/90, 89–90; 226/105, 233.

The most important sources for Coles' career are the reports of the Prince Edward Island assembly and contemporary newspapers. The following are valuable for explaining Coles' early career, his positions on the land question, on an elective Legislative Council, and on trade with the United States, and his mental disability in later years: Prince Edward Island, House of Assembly, Debates and proceedings, 1855, 17, 20, 29–30, 52; 1857, 128; 1859, 10, 75, 84, 90; 1860, 11–14, 68; 1861, 88, 121; 1862, 29; 1863, 33; 1864, 18; 1865, 9, 67; 1866, 7–8, 9–13, 28–29, 46–47; 1868, 72, 224; 1869, 45, 200; 1870, 239, 241; 1873, 283–85, 287. For the assembly's punishment of Coles in 1846, his quick temper, the vacating his seat in 1848 and the subsequent by-election, and his disputed election defeat of 1853, see: Prince Edward Island, House of Assembly, Journals, 1846, 43–46, 98; 1848, 6–14, 58, 166–67; 1854, 8, 43, 58, app. L.

For aspects of his business career, his political affiliations, his opinions on the land question, his interest in education, his views on widening the franchise and on trade with the United States, his feud with Joseph Pope, the struggle for responsible government, and the by-elections of 1847 and 1848, see: Colonial Herald (Charlottetown), 21 Oct. 1843. Examiner (Charlottetown), 28 Aug. 1847; 8, 15, 22, 29 Jan., 18 March, 17 July, 7 Dec. 1848; 1 Jan. 1849; 14 Aug., 30 Oct. 1850; 3, 31 July, 7, 14 Aug. 1865. Islander (Charlottetown), 24 Nov., 1 Dec. 1843; 1, 8, 15 May 1846; 4 June 1852; 10 March 1854; 11 June 1869. Morning News (Charlottetown), 19 Oct., 11 Dec. 1844. Patriot (Charlottetown), 12 Nov. 1868, 27 April 1871. Royal Gazette (Charlottetown), 29 Oct. 1833; 17 June, 22 July, 25 Nov. 1834; 27 Oct., 8 Dec. 1835; 10 May 1836; 5 Sept. 1837; 1 Sept., 15 Dec. 1840; 7 June 1842; 7, 14, 21 Feb., 14 March, 4, 11, 18 April 1843; 5, 12 March, 20 Aug. 1844; 18 March, 1, 15, 22 April 1845; 24 Feb., 10, 17, 31 March 1846; 16, 23 March, 24, 27 April, 11 May, 15 June 1847; 15 Feb., 7 March 1848; 9 May 1850; 8 April 1851; 29 Jan., 23, 26 Feb., 5, 16 April, 17 May 1852; 7 March, 4, 11 April, 6 June 1853. Obituaries for Coles are in Examiner, 23 Aug. 1875, Island Argus (Charlottetown), 24, 31 Aug. 1875, and Patriot, 3 Sept. 1875.

There is no single comprehensive study of 19th-century Prince Edward Island. For the major issues and problems of Coles' era, the most relevant secondary sources are: Bolger, PEI and confederation. Duncan Campbell, History of Prince Edward Island (Charlottetown, 1875), 200. Clark, Three centuries and the Island, chap. 5, 6; p.95, table 3. MacKinnon, Government of PEI, chap. 3, 5, 6, and pp.296–99. MacNutt, Atlantic provinces, 210–12, 231–34, 252. George Sutherland, A manual of geography and natural and civil history of Prince Edward Island for the use of schools, families, and emigrants (Charlottetown, 1861), 132–35. D. C. Harvey, "Dishing the Reformers," RSCT, 3rd ser., XXV (1931), sect.II, 37–44. W. R. Livingston, Responsible government in Prince Edward Island: a triumph of self-government under the crown (University of Iowa studies in the social sciences, ed. Louis Pelzer, IX, no.4, Iowa City, 1931). Robertson, "Religion, politics, and education in PEI," chap. 1–7.

Additional works which have been useful in preparing this study are: Creighton, Road to confederation, 155–57, 171, 179–80. Greenhill and Giffard, Westcountrymen in PEI, especially chap. 7, 8. Waite, Life and times of confederation, 82–83, 96. H. R. Matthews, "Education in Prince Edward Island," unpublished MA thesis, Mount Allison University, 1938, 8. I.R.R.]

COLLINS, ENOS, seaman, merchant, financier, and legislator; b. at Liverpool, N.S., 5 Sept. 1774, first son of Hallet Collins and Rhoda Peek; d. at Halifax, N.S., 18 Nov. 1871.

Hallet Collins was a merchant, trader, and justice of the peace in Liverpool, N.S. He married three times, and was the father of 26 children; when he died in 1831 he left an estate of £13,000. His second child, Enos Collins, received little formal education, but went to sea at an early age probably as a cabin boy on one of his father's trading or fishing vessels. Before he was 20, he was captain of the schooner Adamant, sailing to Bermuda; in 1799 he served as first lieutenant on the famed privateer Charles Mary Wentworth. An ambitious young man, Enos Collins soon obtained part-ownership in a number of vessels trading out of Liverpool. During the Peninsular War he made a large profit by sending three supply vessels to break the Spanish blockade and replenish the British army at Cadiz.

Soon Enos Collins' ambitions outgrew the opportunities offered even by the thriving seaport of Liverpool, and he moved to Halifax where, by 1811, he was established as a merchant and shipper. During the War of 1812 he was an astute partner (with Joseph Allison*) in a firm which bought captured American vessels from the prize courts and sold their cargoes at a profit. Probably the firm prospered too by illegally including New England in the war trade between Nova Scotia and the West Indies. Collins was part-owner of three privateers, including the Liverpool Packet, the most dreaded Nova Scotian vessel to ply New England waters during the war.

In the decade after the war Collins participated in numerous business enterprises. He was successful in currency speculation, backed many trading ventures, carried on his mercantile activities, and entered the lumbering and whaling businesses. Like most of his contemporaries, he invested in the United States; it was rumoured that his American investments equalled his holdings in Nova Scotia. By 1822 Collins' ambitions seem once more to have outgrown his surroundings. Sir Colin Campbell* wrote to the colonial secretary, Lord Glenelg (Charles Grant), in 1838, "Sixteen years ago he [Collins] was about to remove from the Province for ever but was induced to remain by an offer made to him . . . of a seat in the council."

Collins' move into the principal governing body of the colony, the Council of Twelve, indicated the extent of his success. In 1825 he reinforced his position as a member of the ruling élite by marrying Margaret, eldest daughter of Brenton Halliburton*. In keeping with his social and economic position Enos Collins built a fine estate, Gorsebrook, where he and his wife entertained the governor and other leaders of the community. Collins and his wife had nine children, of whom one son and three daughters lived beyond childhood.

In 1825, after several unsuccessful attempts to gain a banking charter from the government, Enos Collins and a group of merchant associates – Henry H. Cogswell*, William Pryor*, James Tobin*, Samuel Cunard*, John Clark, Joseph Allison, and Martin Gay Black – formed a partnership and founded the Halifax Banking Company. The banking venture was the natural outgrowth of successful mercantile activity which provided each partner with the necessary capital to finance the new enterprise. Although Cogswell was president of the company, Collins was the dominant partner; the bank's transactions were conducted in the building which housed Collins' firm and the venture soon became known locally as "Collins' Bank."

One of the least attractive events of Enos Collins' career concerns the brandy dispute of 1830. In 1826 the assembly had imposed a tax of 1*s.* 4*d.* on foreign brandy in addition to the 1*s.* imposed by the imperial government. The customs collector decided that a duty of 2*s.* was sufficient, but he failed to inform the assembly of his decision. In 1830 E. Collins and Company petitioned the assembly demanding a refund on their duty, arguing that the customs collector had given them an unfair rate of exchange on the doubloons with which they paid the tax. Their petition provided the assembly with the information that the full tax was not being collected. The assembly immediately passed a bill restoring the full tax, but the council, controlled by Enos Collins and his associates, refused to accept the bill. For some time no tax was collected on imported spirits, and Collins, taking full advantage of the situation, proceeded to sell his stocks of brandy without paying a penny into the treasury. His behaviour provoked an angry reaction in the assembly and from the local press. Unfortunately for Collins and the other importers, George IV died, causing an election in Nova Scotia. The brandy election of 1830, fought on the issue of the tax, resulted in the return of an assembly which quickly reimposed the duty; the council accepted their decision. Not only did this dispute tarnish Collins' name, but it also provided an issue around which criticism of the Council of Twelve could be concentrated.

During the 1830s Collins continued to expand his business activities and to participate in governing the colony. In 1832, despite Collins' objections, the council granted a charter to the Bank of Nova Scotia and destroyed the monopoly of the Halifax Banking Company. Soon the two banks were involved in a currency battle which weakened the financial stability of the colony and gave Reformers another point of departure for attacks upon the ruling oligarchy. The decade witnessed growing discontent with the rule of the Council of Twelve, until, in 1837, the British government decided that reorganization was necessary. The new Executive Council of Nova Scotia did not originally include Enos Collins, but, at Governor Colin Campbell's insistence, Collins became a member on 8 May 1838. He continued in the position until 6 Oct. 1840, when a second reorganization necessitated his resignation. During the turbulent 1840s and 1850s Collins refrained from active politics, but he was a financial backer of the Conservatives.

Enos Collins spent the last 30 years of his life in partial retirement keeping a close eye on his investments but withdrawn mainly to the privacy of Gorsebrook. The battle against confederation provided the last fighting ground for the old man. Breaking a lifetime allegiance with the Conservatives, Collins threw his whole-hearted financial support behind Joseph Howe, Mather Byles Almon, and other members of the anti-confederation league. The vehemence with which Collins opposed the scheme is best expressed by Howe: "Enos Collins who is now ninety years of age . . . declares that, if he was twenty years younger, he would take a rifle and resist it."

Enos Collins was an astute, hard headed, and even progressive businessman. With an estate estimated at $6,000,000, he was rumoured to be the richest man in British North America. He belonged to the Church of England and supported it financially. Like his contemporaries, Collins recognized that the ruling class was responsible for the less fortunate and less successful members of society. He was a member of the Poor Man's Friend Society and gave generously to the blind and to other philanthropic ventures which were common in 19th-century Halifax.

Collins' life, however, does not represent a complete success story. He strove to become a member of the ruling oligarchy in a period when the changing times were giving political and social power to a much broader segment of the community. Long before Collins died, the way of life which he wanted and had achieved through his material success was disappearing. His stand against confederation was the last losing battle of a man who failed to recognize the vast changes occurring in British North America between 1840 and 1870.

DIANE M. BARKER and
D. A. SUTHERLAND

PANS, "Collins family," compiled by T. B. Smith; Log book of the privateer Charles Mary Wentworth. PRO, CO 217/115, 75–76. Acadian Recorder (Halifax), 8 Jan. 1898. Novascotian (Halifax), 1830, 1835–36, 1942. [Enos Collins], "Letters and papers of Hon. Enos Collins," ed. C. B. Fergusson, PANS Bull., XIII (1959). J. F. More, The history of Queen's County, N.S. (Halifax, 1873), 161–68. Ross and Trigge, History of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, I, 25–123. L. J. Burpee, "Joseph Howe and the anti-confederation league," RSCT, 3rd ser., X (1917), sect.II, 409–73. Peter Lynch, "Early reminiscences of Halifax – men who have passed from us," N.S. Hist. Soc. Coll., XVI (1912), 171–204. G. E. E. Nichols, "Notes on Nova Scotian privateers," N.S. Hist. Soc. Coll., XIII (1908), 111–52.

CONILLEAU, CHARLES, priest, Jesuit; b. 4 Aug. 1811 at Martigné, diocese of Mans, France; d. 1 April 1879 at Victoriaville (Arthabaska County), Que.

Charles Conilleau, the son of an ex-soldier of Napoleon Bonaparte, entered the Society of Jesus in 1846, after 12 years in the priesthood. In 1854 he was nominated to the New York–Canada mission, which was subject to the ecclesiastical province of France. He went to New York, and for a year devoted himself to studying English before going to Canada West.

From 1855 to 1859 he was at the Jesuit residence at Sandwich (Windsor, Ont.), where, under the immediate direction of the famous Father Pierre Point*, he had exclusive responsibility for English-speaking Catholics, who were already numerous in Windsor and Maidstone. To him goes the credit for the erection, in 1858, of the first church of the mother parish of Windsor, Saint-Alphonse. In the same year he reconstructed the church at Maidstone. At both places he established sound bases for religious development, and prepared the way for the canonical erection of both to parishes. In 1857, when the first bishop of London, Pierre-Adolphe Pinsonnault*, decided to bring all his seminarists together in the college at Sandwich, Conilleau became their teacher of theology, the first, it is thought, to hold this position within the confines of the present diocese of London. He watched closely the events that led Bishop Pinsonnault to transfer his episcopal seat from London to Windsor in 1859. The Jesuits at this point closed their house at Windsor and thus put an end to their evangelizing ministry in this historic place.

Father Conilleau was then appointed to the residence at Quebec, and nominated to the ministry, at that time an important one, in charge of parish missions and retreats for the priesthood. From 1862 to 1870 he was superior of the Jesuits at Chatham (Ont.), who worked throughout the region on behalf of English-speaking Catholics. In 1871 he was appointed superior and parish priest of the important parish of Guelph. Two years later, having returned to the province of Quebec, and despite failing health, he gave full attention to hearing confessions and preaching at Montreal and especially at Gésu. He had barely finished a parish retreat at Victoriaville when he died of a heart attack there on 1 April 1879. The clergy and congregation asked that burial be at this place where Conilleau had last preached the faith; he is thus one of the few Jesuits who were not buried in the cemetery of the community.

Father Conilleau's letters reveal a man who was disinclined to self-display, but conscientious and effective in carrying out the tasks assigned to him. He belongs to the heroic history of the beginnings of the diocese of London. Revered by his congregation, respected and esteemed by those who did not share his religious beliefs, he rendered great services to the Catholics of southern Ontario.

LÉON POULIOT

ASJCF, 1636–37; 5115, 2; A-1-7, p.66; A-2-4; D-7.

CONNELL, CHARLES, lumberman, magistrate, and politician; b. in 1810 in Northampton, N.B., one of 12 children of Charles Connell Sr, a Connecticut loyalist, and Mary Palmer; d. 28 June 1873 at Woodstock, N.B.

Charles Connell received a public school education in Northampton and later embarked on a career as a general businessman. He moved to Woodstock, New Brunswick, where he soon became one of Carleton County's leading lumbermen. In 1835 he married Ann Fisher, sister of Charles FISHER; they had four sons and three daughters. Connell took an active interest in local affairs and was justice of the peace for many years; he later became a justice of the Inferior Court of Common Pleas for Carleton County

Connell's career as a politician began in 1846 when he was first elected to the assembly. In 1849 he was appointed to the Legislative Council, but resigned in 1851 and was subsequently returned as a member of the lower house. In 1858 he became postmaster general in Charles Fisher's government and held this position until his defeat in the election of 1861. Connell's chief claim to fame lies in an incident which occurred while he held the cabinet post. A new issue of stamps was needed in 1860. When the stamps were released one bore the likeness of Connell rather than that of Queen Victoria or some other member of the royal family. There was a storm of protest, the issue was withdrawn, and Connell resigned. The Connell stamp went on to become a collector's item among philatelists and a mint copy is now valued at $1,000.

Charles Connell returned to the assembly in 1864 and was re-elected in the confederation elections of 1865 and 1866. He was a supporter of Samuel Leonard Tilley* and his efforts to have New Brunswick enter confederation. For a short time in 1866 and 1867 Connell served as surveyor general in Robert Duncan Wilmot*'s cabinet. Eager to broaden his field of political endeavour, Connell sought election to the first dominion parliament and won in Carleton County by acclamation. In the general election of 1872 he was again returned by acclamation, which attests both to his personal influence and to the apathy of the opposition.

Because party lines were not sharply drawn in New Brunswick during the early years of the confederation period, it is difficult to give Connell a political label. In New Brunswick politics he was a Liberal. As a supporter of confederation, he initially voted with Sir John A. Macdonald* and his coalition in the House of Commons, but thereafter generally supported Alexander Mackenzie* and the Liberals. However, as with many New Brunswick politicians, parochial sentiments rather than party affiliation usually decided his vote.

Charles Connell, an MP until his death, was survived by his wife, three sons, and three daughters. As a loyalist, a lumber merchant, a man of little education but a host of political connections, Connell epitomized the New Brunswick politicians of his era.

CHARLES F. MACKINNON

PAC, MG 24, A20 (Edmund Head papers), letter book, 3, p.622; MG 27, I, D15 (Tilley papers), Charles Watters to S. L. Tilley, 23 April 1860; Charles Connell to Tilley, 27 April 1860; A. J. Smith to Tilley, 27 April 1860. Morning Freeman (Saint John, N.B.), 25 July, 10 Sept. 1867; 9 July 1872. New Brunswick Reporter (Fredericton), 24 July 1872. St Croix Courier (St Stephen, N.B.), 14 June 1867. Saint John Daily News, 12 Aug. 1872. Can. parl. comp., 1869. Waite, Life and times of confederation, 233.

CONNOLLY, THOMAS LOUIS, priest, Capuchin, vicar general of the diocese of Halifax, bishop of Saint John, archbishop of Halifax; b. 1814 at Cork, Ireland; d. 27 July 1876 at Halifax, N.S.

Thomas Connolly's father, a Cork retail dealer, died when Connolly was three years old and he was reared by his mother, an innkeeper. Influenced by Father Theobald Mathew, a renowned apostle of temperance, Connolly entered the Capuchin order and in 1832 went to Rome to complete his studies for the priesthood. After his ordination at Lyons in 1838, he worked briefly at the Capuchin Mission House in Dublin and then as chaplain of the Grange Gorman Lane Penitentiary. When Father William Walsh*, a fellow Capuchin, was appointed bishop of Halifax in 1842, Father Connolly accompanied him to Nova Scotia as his secretary.

Father Connolly served as a parish priest at St Mary's Church, Halifax, and, in 1845, was appointed vicar general of the diocese. In 1852 he was appointed to succeed William Dollard* as bishop of Saint John. During his seven years in Saint John he encouraged the building of Catholic schools, oversaw the opening of a Catholic orphanage run by the Sisters of the Sacred Heart, and brought a group of Sisters of Charity to Saint John to teach. He also organized the construction of a cathedral for the city.

When Archbishop Walsh died in 1858, Bishop Connolly was named as his successor. His nomination was strongly supported by church leaders on both sides of the Atlantic including Archbishop Paul Cullen of Dublin and Archbishop John Hughes of New York. The four dioceses of Halifax, Arichat, Charlottetown, Saint John, and the newly created diocese of Chatham were under

Archbishop Connolly's jurisdiction. The religious unrest created in Nova Scotia in the mid 1850s by the controversy over enlistment in the Crimean war, by the Gourley Riots, and by William Young*'s abortive education bill of 1856, was beginning to wane; Connolly's tolerance and moderation did much to prevent any further incidents. [See Joseph HOWE and James W. JOHNSTON.]

The education bills of 1864 and 1865 brought Archbishop Connolly into conflict with Charles Tupper*. The archbishop strongly opposed the free school system based on compulsory taxation, and demanded instead a system that included separate schools for Roman Catholics. He feared that the school curriculum, which, under the new law, was to be controlled by the Council of Public Instruction, would not satisfy the educational demands of Catholics. When Tupper pointed out that the council was to consist of the entire Executive Council and that the number of Catholics in the province would ensure their adequate representation on it, Connolly assured Tupper that the bill ". . . shall have my support." His sensible and realistic attitude towards Tupper's ideas prevented a major conflict between the Roman Catholics and the provincial government. The agreement between the two led to the achievement of separate schools in practice if not in theory – an arrangement which has continued to the present without the conflicts that have plagued more formal arrangements in other parts of the country.

Archbishop Connolly was a strong supporter of confederation. He firmly believed that union of the British North American colonies was necessary and would be beneficial to Nova Scotia. He hoped that confederation would be a means whereby Maritime Catholics might obtain a legal recognition of separate schools similar to that given the Catholic minority in Canada West. In public debates on the subject of union he used the common arguments for the scheme. His first public utterance appeared in a letter to the editor of the Halifax Morning Chronicle on 13 Jan. 1865, in which he stressed the commercial advantages Nova Scotia would have as part of a larger community. At the end of the year he wrote an open letter to the lieutenant governor of New Brunswick, Sir Arthur Gordon*, by means of which he reassured non-Catholics that the Irish Roman Catholics of British North America had nothing to gain from the Fenians, "that pitiable knot of knaves and fools." He also used the Fenian threat as an indirect appeal in support of confederation for defensive purposes. He recognized that the life of Irish Catholics in British North America left much to be desired because of Protestant and Orange sentiment, but felt that their position was still superior to that of Irish Catholics in the United States.

Connolly's efforts to obtain educational concessions for the Catholics in the Maritimes took him to the London conference of 1866–67. The colonial secretary, Lord Carnarvon [Henry Herbert], Hector Langevin*, and many other Canadian delegates sympathized with his requests but the final initiative lay with the Nova Scotia delegates. Tupper remained firm in his opposition to separate schools, and the archbishop's demand was not granted. His attempt to have Tupper introduce separate school legislation in the House of Assembly in April 1867 also failed. Nevertheless, prior to the federal and provincial elections of 18 Sept. 1867, Connolly used an open letter to urge the Catholics of Halifax to vote: "The Whole Union Ticket – The Whole Five and Nothing but the Five." The city, with its large Roman Catholic population, voted for the union candidates, but the county polls overwhelmingly endorsed the Nova Scotia party candidates, giving them a sweep of the two federal and three provincial seats.

Despite this set-back Connolly continued to labour on behalf of confederation. His correspondence with John A. Macdonald* and Tupper is filled with his impressions of various personages and advice on how to enlist their support. He was constantly seeking favours for those who had served the cause of confederation, regardless of their religious affiliations. During the election campaign of 1872 he was the subject of a bitter attack by the Morning Chronicle because of a letter he wrote to Tupper in which he not only endorsed the policies of the Macdonald government but also gave Tupper permission to use the letter as he saw fit. In his reply to the Morning Chronicle editorial Archbishop Connolly defended his right as a citizen to take part in politics and accused the editors of trying to promote religious unrest. After this episode, however, he never again became publicly involved in politics.

In his efforts to promote the Catholic faith in the archdiocese he built numerous schools, churches, and a seminary where young men were trained for the priesthood. He also brought the Christian Brothers (Brothers of the Christian Schools) to teach in the diocese and increased the number of Sisters of Charity teaching in the schools.

Archbishop Connolly joined Bishop John Joseph Lynch* of Toronto and Coadjutor Bishop Louis-François Laflèche* of Trois-Rivières as Canadian representatives to the Vatican Council of 1869–70. Connolly was a member of the minority who opposed the infallibility definition introduced at the council. He firmly believed in the principle of papal infallibility but felt that the political climate was not right for the church to confirm the doctrine. Connolly left Rome before the final vote was taken, but he quickly acquiesed in the majority decision.

Thomas Connolly's greatest contribution to his country was his avid support of confederation. His influence upon the other bishops of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick led many of them also to become ardent supporters of the scheme. D'Arcy McGee* ranked Connolly and Oliver Mowat* of Ontario as two of the prime builders of confederation. His endeavours to heal the rift between confederate and repeal elements, and between Catholics and Protestants over the Fenian troubles, make him deserving of the eulogy of the Reverend George Grant*, a long-time friend: "He was a man of peace – ever seeking to build bridges rather than dig ditches between men of different creeds."

David B. Flemming

[At one time there was reported to be a substantial collection of Connolly's correspondence at the archives of the archdiocese of Halifax. Supposedly this collection was stolen by "an Englishman" nearly 20 years ago, and the authorities have never recovered it. The largest collection of Connolly's letters was discovered at the archives of the diocese of Bathurst, N.B. (over 60 letters to one of his closest friends, Bishop James Rogers*). Another equally large and important collection was found among the papers of Abbot Bernard Smith, a Benedictine and member of the faculty of the American College in Rome. Smith was Connolly's contact in Rome and represented him at the Vatican. A smaller collection was found among the papers of Bishop John Sweeney* of Saint John, N.B.

Letters dealing with Connolly's political involvement are found in ANQ, Sir Hector-Louis Langevin, L12; PAC, MG 24, B29 (Howe papers), 17, 32; MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), 116, letter books, 11–13, 16, 18, 20; F (Tupper papers), 1–4; PRO 30/6 (Carnarvon papers), 137. The Vatican Archives contain letters and documents relating to the archdiocese of Halifax in the 1860s and 1870s, but these are mainly concerned with purely religious matters. Saunders, Three premiers of N.S., and [Charles Tupper], The life and letters of the Rt. Hon. Sir Charles Tupper, ed. E. M. Saunders (2v., London, 1916) contain correspondence between Tupper and Connolly about the school question. Many of these letters are not in the Tupper papers, but have often been quoted, and are generally accepted as valid. D.B.F.]

Public letters are in: [T. L. Connolly], "The archbishop of Halifax on the Irish in British and in republican America," in T. D. McGee, The Irish position in British and in republican North America: a letter to the editors of the Irish press irrespective of party (2nd ed., Montreal, 1866), app.B; Morning Chronicle (Halifax), 14 Jan. 1865; Evening Express (Halifax), 16 Sept. 1867; British Colonist (Halifax), 30 Aug. 1872. An obituary is found in Acadian Recorder (Halifax), 28 July 1876. See also: "The late archbishop of Halifax, Nova Scotia," Catholic World (New York), XXIV (1876–77), 136–42. F. J. Wilson, "The Most Reverend Thomas L. Connolly, archbishop of Halifax," CCHA Report, 1943–44, 55–108.

CONROY, GEORGE, priest, Catholic bishop, and apostolic delegate to Canada; b. 31 Dec. 1832 at Dundalk, County Louth, Ireland; d. 4 Aug. 1878 at St John's, Newfoundland.

Born of a northern Irish family of modest means, George Conroy went to primary school in the primatial town of Armagh, then, at 17, went to Rome to complete his studies at the College of the Propaganda. On 6 June 1857 he was ordained priest at the church of St John Lateran by Cardinal Constantin Patrizi; in the same year he returned to his native country and was appointed to All Hallows' College, which was situated near Dublin and had been founded for the education of priests intending to serve with foreign missions. In 1866 Cardinal Paul Cullen of Dublin, who had known him at the college of Armagh, appointed him his private secretary; the young Father Conroy was also teacher of theology at Holy Cross College in Clonliff and editor-in-chief of the theological review, Irish Ecclesiastical Record (Dublin). After Bishop Cornelius MacCabe's death, Conroy was appointed to the combined sees of Ardagh and Clonmacnois, with residence at Longford, and on 11 April 1871 was consecrated bishop by Cardinal Cullen. It was from this post that he was summoned by Pope Pius IX to be the first apostolic delegate to Canada.

Bishop Conroy arrived at Halifax on 22 May 1877, and immediately set to work. His instructions, which remained secret until 1881, specified that he was to repair the divisions among Canadian bishops "in regard both to the political question and to other questions which are being heatedly discussed in Canada at the moment," such as the Université Laval, the Catholic Programme, and "undue influence." He was to put an end to "the excessive intervention of the clergy in political affairs," and to exhort the bishops to prudence in their relations with the state. Whereas the ultramontanes – bishops such as Ignace Bourget* of Montreal and Louis-François Laflèche* of Trois-Rivières, laymen such as François-Xavier-Anselme Trudel* and Joseph-Israël Tarte* – wanted to see the liberals condemned once and for all, Bishop Conroy endeavoured to make it clear "that the Church, in condemning liberalism, did not wish to censure all and each of the political parties who chanced to be called liberal." To this end he travelled through all the dioceses, met clergy and lay personalities, and presided over several meetings of Canadian bishops.

One of the first results he obtained was the publication, on 11 Oct. 1877, of a collective pastoral letter which recalled the various condemnations pronounced against Catholic-liberal doctrines, but which left "to the conscience of each to judge, under God's eye, what sort of men may be the subject of these condemnations, quite apart from the political party to which they belong." Soon the bishops appeared to be more united, the clergy was instructed no longer to interfere in political questions – there were, however, a few difficulties at the provincial elections of 1878 – and peace between church and state seemed to have returned in Canada. But it was precarious, for the ultramontanes, headed by Bishop Jean-Pierre-François Laforce* Langevin, argued that Bishop Conroy had been taken in by the liberals and had dangerously throttled "the salutary influence of the clergy." And they prepared to counter-attack. The aged Côme-Séraphin Cherrier* was not mistaken in saying to the delegate when he left: "Do you not know, Your Excellency, that they are only waiting for your departure to disobey you?"

Bishop Conroy set off from Canada for Rome, via Newfoundland, in June 1878. He left the memory of a "high-minded and conciliatory person," possessed of "an evangelical prudence" and admirable wisdom. The announcement of his illness created consternation among those who knew him; greater still was the surprise when news came of his death on 4 August. As a Quebec liberal paper, L'Événement, said: "This death is a public affliction, and affects us as if it were striking down one of our own priests."

NIVE VOISINE

ASTR, Fonds Louis-François Laflèche. Le Journal des Trois-Rivières. Mandements des évêques de Québec (Têtu et Gagnon), VI. Robert Rumilly, Monseigneur Laflèche et son temps (Montréal, [1945]), 128–46. Savaète, Voix canadiennes, X.

CONROY, NICHOLAS, farmer and politician; b. 1816 at Rathdowney, Ireland, youngest son of Thomas Conroy and Christine Le Herron; d. 13 Oct. 1879 at his home in Tignish, P.E.I.

Nicholas Conroy was educated in Ireland before immigrating to northwestern Prince Edward Island with his father in 1835. He took up farming, and as a comparatively educated man he often acted as an intermediary between his French-speaking Acadian neighbours and the land agents employed by the Cunards, the proprietors of his district. In 1842 he entered politics and was unsuccessful in contesting an assembly seat; four years later he was elected for Prince County, First District, and joined the Tory caucus. At this time he was not a moving force in the House of Assembly, and took little part in its debates.

Conroy did not run in the election of 1850, although he continued to be known as a Tory. He took an active part in public life again only when the Bible question arose late in the 1850s [see George COLES]. The Tories, in opposition, were demanding that "the open Bible" be legalized in the district schools, which were religiously mixed. The Liberal government, with the support of Bishop Bernard Donald MacDonald*, refused to give this statutory basis to permissive daily reading of the Bible fearing the supposed rigidities this would involve. Conroy, a prominent Catholic layman, supported the bishop and the government. He left his old party, and in 1859 successfully contested First Prince as a Liberal; William Henry POPE's Islander reported him as having said in June of the previous year: "THAT AS AN IRISHMAN AND A CATHOLIC HE WAS BOUND TO SUPPORT THE [Liberal] GOVERNMENT."

The Tories won the election, and Conroy found himself in opposition. He may have felt uncomfortable with the Liberals, for he soon attempted to bring about a reconciliation between the Conservatives and the Roman Catholic hierarchy. He was well suited for this task: not only was he a former colleague of the premier, Edward Palmer*, and of other Tory leaders, but in 1851 he had married Catherine McDonald, a niece of his parish priest, Father Peter MacIntyre*, who had become the new bishop of Charlottetown. These negotiations failed, and resulted in even more sectarian animosity. When the election of 1863 was held, the voters divided on religious lines; all Protestant districts returned Conservatives and all Catholic ones returned Liberals. In First Prince, MacIntyre and Conroy combined to oust the latter's running-mate of the previous campaign and to have George Howlan* elected in his place. Conroy lost his own seat in 1867, and remained out of politics for seven years, until he won a by-election following the appointment of Howlan to the federal Senate.

Conroy re-entered the assembly in 1874 virtually as a spokesman for Bishop MacIntyre. In a pastoral issued a few months earlier, the bishop had adopted a "centrist" position, and declared it the duty of Catholic electors to withhold support from all parties that would not grant the church its demands in matters of education. Conroy agreed with MacIntyre: "Catholic members [of the assembly] should not associate with any party who had the power to do right, and yet did wrong."

The correct course, he said, was to establish a separate school system in which religion and education would "go hand in hand." He often called upon Catholic assemblymen to desert the Conservative government, which was heavily dependent upon their support, and become "centrists." He was unsuccessful, however, as only one assemblyman and one legislative councillor joined him.

The election of 1876 provided a final settlement of the school question. The campaign was waged entirely upon the one issue, and the result was a victory for the "Free Schoolers" of Louis Davies* over the "Denominationalists" led by James Colledge Pope* and William Wilfred Sullivan*. Following the passage of the Public Schools Act in the next year, Conroy gave up the struggle for separate schools, and even became a trustee of the public school in Tignish. The school question had been the basis of Davies' coalition, and with its liquidation his government disintegrated. In September 1878 the premier attempted in vain to have Conroy and some other Catholic assemblymen return to the Liberal Party. When Sullivan formed a new Conservative administration in March of the following year, Conroy joined the Executive Council. However, ill health forced his resignation on 11 June, and two days later he was appointed registrar of deeds. He died of brain disease, leaving his wife and several children.

Nicholas Conroy was neither a brilliant man nor by nature a leader of men. On most issues he held the views of a conventional Island politician of his period; for example, he opposed confederation in the 1860s and advocated the abolition of leasehold tenure. He nevertheless also represents in its sharpest form a trend of fundamental significance in the social and political history of 19th-century Prince Edward Island: over the years, he became increasingly clerically oriented in matters of church and state. The mood of reaction within the Roman Catholic Church throughout the world, with which his friend Bishop MacIntyre agreed entirely, provides a partial explanation, but undoubtedly the death of his brother, Dr James Herron Conroy*, as an apostate also affected him deeply. Thus Conroy was basically a conservative man whose alignments were determined more by the interests of his church than by secular considerations; his three shifts in party allegiance reflect the instability of Island political parties in his time.

IAN ROSS ROBERTSON

[The author is indebted to Miss Margaret Conroy, a granddaughter of Nicholas Conroy, for an interview on 30 July 1969. PAPEI, Prince Edward Island, Executive Council, Minutes, 1879. Prince Edward Island, House of Assembly, Journals, 1847–49, 1859–66, 1874–79; Debates and proceedings, 1859–66, 1874–79; Supreme Court, Estates Division, will of Nicholas Conroy, 23 Sept. 1879. Abstract of the proceedings before the Land Commissioners' Court, held during the summer of 1860, to inquire into the difficulties relative to the rights of landowners and tenants in Prince Edward Island, reporters J. D. Gordon and David Laird (Charlottetown, 1862), 49–53. Obituaries will be found in Examiner (Charlottetown), 14 Oct. 1879, Patriot (Charlottetown), 16 Oct. 1879, and Pioneer (Montague, P.E.I.), 17 Oct. 1879. Can. parl. comp., 1875, 639. "Peter Conroy," Past and present of Prince Edward Island . . ., ed. D. A. MacKinnon and A. B. Warburton (Charlottetown, [1906]), 670–71. MacMillan, Catholic Church in PEI, 372–77. Robertson, "Religion, politics, and education in PEI." I.R.R.]

COOK, JAMES WILLIAM, lumber merchant and politician; b. in Williamsburgh Township, U.C., 11 Jan. 1820, son of George Cook and Sarah Casselman, and grandson of John Cook (Van Keugh), loyalist; d. at Morrisburg, Ont., 21 May 1875.

As the oldest of five brothers, James William Cook succeeded his father and his uncle, John Cook (1791–1877), in the management of the family's square timber business (to become known as Cook and Brothers), which began on the Castor and South Nation rivers in eastern Upper Canada. The firm had its headquarters at Morrisburg, but by the 1870s it had expanded to include operations in pine forests centring on Belleville, Toronto, Barrie, and Quebec City, and was claimed to be the largest square timber business in Canada. The principal office of the firm, however, was maintained by J. W. Cook at Morrisburg during his lifetime, with his two younger brothers, George J. (1824–1902) and John L., managing the branch offices. The firm continued to have a prosperous existence into the 20th century, when its operations reached into the Muskoka and Algoma districts.

James William Cook represented Dundas County in the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Canada, 1857–61 – as had his uncle John Cook in the assemblies of Upper Canada and the Province of Canada, 1830–45. Two of his brothers were also politicians: Simon Sephrenus (1831–92), MLA of Ontario for Dundas, 1867–75; and Hermon (Herman) Henry*, MP 1872–78 and 1882–91, MLA of Ontario 1879–82. The three brothers, as well as John Cook, were all Reform or Liberal politicians.

J. K. JOHNSON

PAC, Map division, S/420 (1862); RG 31, A1, 1851, Williamsburgh Township, Canada West; 1861, Williamsburgh Township, Canada West; 1871, Williamsburgh Township, Ontario. PAO, Legislative Assembly papers, biographical sketches of members of the assembly, 1792–1840, comp. J. S. Carstairs and W. D. Read. Can. biog. dict., I, 35–38. Lovell's Canadian dominion directory for 1871 ... (Montreal, [1871]). J. S. Carter, The story of Dundas, being a history of the county of Dundas from 1784 to 1904 (Iroquois, Ont., 1905). Cornell, Alignment of political groups. James Croil, Dundas; or, a sketch of Canadian history, and more particularly of the county of Dundas, one of the earliest settled counties in Upper Canada (Montreal, 1861), 280. J. E. Defebaugh, History of the lumber industry of America (2v., Chicago, 1906–7). J. G. Harkness, Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry: a history, 1784–1945 (Oshawa, Ont., 1946), 218. Hunter, Hist of Simcoe County.

COOPER, JAMES, HBC employee, master mariner, politician, and public servant; b. 1821 at Bilston, Wolverhampton, Staffordshire, Eng.; date and place of death unknown.

James Cooper joined the Hudson's Bay Company in August 1844, and in 1845 was appointed first officer on Vancouver, of the Columbia Shipping Department. In 1846 he was given a command, and in 1847 he sailed Mary Dare to Fort Victoria for the north Pacific trade. He took a cargo of flour and deals to the Sandwich Islands, and the opportunities in the expanding Pacific trade impressed him. In 1848 he became captain of Columbia, the annual supply ship for Fort Vancouver. On his first voyage he violated company regulations by carrying goods to trade on his own account at Honolulu.

Visiting Fort Victoria on 16 Oct. 1849, Cooper decided to leave the company and emigrate as a "free settler" to Vancouver Island, the new colony in which the company had proprietary rights. In England he obtained an appointment as Lloyd's agent on the island but could not raise capital for a sawmilling venture. With his wife, four children, and workmen, Cooper came supercargo on Tory, arriving at Victoria on 9 May 1851, and having met his future farm superintendent, Thomas Blinkhorn, on board.

An enterprising colonist, Cooper at first prospered. Then misfortunes, which he blamed on the HBC and James DOUGLAS, befell him. The 385-acre farm at Metchosin, on which he had paid a deposit to the company, was nine miles by water from Fort Victoria and the lack of a road became a grievance. He depleted his capital by purchasing two properties at Esquimalt and a part-interest in a tavern at Victoria. In 1852, his 45-ton iron schooner Alice, brought with him on Tory in sections, began to carry potatoes and cranberries to San Francisco. Douglas at first assisted him, but became less amiable when he learned that Cooper had not paid Fort Langley for the potatoes and that his cranberries were obtained from Indians of the Fraser River delta against the company's monopoly on the mainland.

Cooper, however, had won the trust of the island's first governor, Richard Blanshard*, and was named on 27 Aug. 1851, with Douglas and John Tod*, to the island's ruling council. On his departure, Blanshard carried a petition signed by Cooper and the other independent settlers opposing the selection of Douglas as the new governor. Even so Douglas obtained the appointment. When, in 1853, he and the council imposed licence fees for the sale of spirits, and Douglas forbade members of the council to sell liquor, Cooper, a man of "an irascible, grumbling disposition," complained bitterly. His business affected and his shipping restricted, he prepared an attack on Douglas.

His excuse came with Douglas' appointment of David CAMERON, the governor's brother-in-law, on 2 Dec. 1853 as judge of the Court of Common Pleas. Supported by the HBC chaplain, the Reverend Robert J. Staines*, and by Captain Edward Edwards Langford*, a disaffected Puget's Sound Agricultural Company bailiff, Cooper organized the settlers to petition London to revoke the company's grant and put the colony under imperial control. Two further petitions were presented to the two houses of parliament in March 1854.

In June 1856, "in circumstances of some [financial] embarrassment," Cooper returned to England to become a merchant at Bilston. In 1857 his testimony before the House of Commons Select Committee inquiring into the administration of the HBC corroborated that given by Blanshard, Rear Admiral Fairfax Moresby, and Charles W. Wentworth-Fitzwilliam, MP. Their evidence was so damaging that the company's crown grant to Vancouver Island was revoked in 1859.

Cooper was still in England in August 1858, when Douglas was appointed governor of the new colony of British Columbia. But on 25 Dec. 1858 Cooper returned to Victoria with a commission from Sir Edward Bulwer-Lytton appointing him harbour master at Esquimalt, "chiefly for the purposes of British Columbia." Douglas protested: "Mr Cooper's office is a sinecure, there is literally nothing for him to do."

Once again, Cooper became politically active. He allied himself with Amor De Cosmos* and, though a public servant, stood twice for election to the Assembly of Vancouver Island. On 12 Jan. 1860 he was elected as a "reformer" for Esquimalt and Metchosin district. The Colonial Office intervened: he was ordered on 17 March 1860 to reside at New Westminster, the capital of B.C. In October Cooper resigned his seat.

Douglas and Cooper engaged in a bitter dispute in 1861 when Cooper employed a coxswain without authorization. Cooper continued to make unwarranted appointments and expenditures and interfered with the duties of the collector of customs. He also associated with the element which pressed for Douglas' removal as governor, demanding representative government in the gold colony.

After Douglas' retirement in 1864, Cooper was less closely supervised, though the colonial secretary suspected him on occasion of sharp practice. With the union of the seaboard colonies, he returned to Victoria in 1867 to take on additional duties as harbour master of Victoria and Esquimalt. On 27 Jan. 1869 he resigned, with the promise of 18 months' salary in lieu of service. He became a hotel-keeper and wine merchant in Victoria. In 1870 he engaged briefly in a salmon fishing venture on the Fraser River six miles below New Westminster.

After B.C. entered confederation in 1871, Cooper was appointed on 17 Oct. 1872 dominion agent for the Department of Marine and Fisheries, inspector of lights, and inspector of steamboats. In 1876 a royal commission investigated charges that he had obtained money under false pretences while holding public office. Nothing was proven, and in December 1878 he won a lawsuit for slander against a lighthouse keeper who had branded him a "d---d old thief." His appointment, however, was cancelled by order in council on 25 June 1879 on evidence that he had been guilty of fraud. In October he was charged at Victoria with obtaining $95 unlawfully on 29 June 1876 while acting as dominion agent. Cooper failed to appear before a higher court in December. His bail was estreated and a bench warrant sworn out. Cooper then disappeared. He is believed to have drifted to California, though no proof has been obtained.

Cooper was the first political agitator in British Columbia and the first leader of a political faction. In part he was motivated by unsatisfied political and social ambitions, as well as by economic distress, but by conviction he was the foe of autocracy and privilege. He saw more clearly than the officers of the HBC the opportunity for trade created by the California gold boom and was prepared to challenge its trading privileges.

MARGARET A. ORMSBY

Bancroft Library, University of California, Berkeley, James Cooper, "Maritime matters on the northwest coast and other affairs of the Hudson's Bay Company in early times" (photocopy in PABC). HBC Arch. B.226/b, B.226/c, B.239/k. PABC, Edgar Crow Baker diary, 1879; British Columbia, Governor Frederick Seymour, Dispatches to London, 1864–69; David Cameron papers; James Cooper papers; Henry Pering Pellew Crease, Correspondence inward, 1869; James Douglas, "A confidential report upon the character and qualifications of the principal officers of this government," Douglas to the Duke of Newcastle, 18 June 1863; Governor James Douglas, Correspondence inward, 1830–68; Governor James Douglas, Dispatches to London, 1851–55, 1855–59 (letter book copies); Fort Vancouver, Correspondence outward (letter book copies); Fort Victoria, Correspondence outward to HBC, 1850–55, 1855–59 (letter book copies); Vancouver Island, Governors Richard Blanshard and James Douglas, Correspondence outward, 22 June 1850–5 March 1859 (letter book copies); Vancouver Island, Governor James Douglas, Correspondence outward, 27 May 1859–9 Jan. 1864 (letter book copies); J. S. Helmcken, "Reminiscences" (5v unpublished typescript, 1892), II. PRO, CO 60; CO 305.

Canada, Sessional papers, XIII (1880), PT.6, no.9. G.B., Parl., House of Commons paper, 1857 (Session II), XV, 224, 260 (whole volume), Report from the select committee on the Hudson's Bay Company; together with the proceedings of the committee, minutes of evidence, appendix and index; Parl., House of Commons paper, 1863, XXXVIII, 507, pp.487–540, Miscellaneous papers relating to Vancouver Island, 1848–1863. . . . Minutes of the Council of Vancouver Island, commencing August 30th, 1851, and terminating . . . February 6th, 1861, ed. E. O. S. Scholefield (Archives of British Columbia, Memoir no.2, Victoria, 1918). Colonist (Victoria), particularly 8 June 1859 – 10 Jan. 1860; 19 Dec. 1878 – 15 Oct. 1879. HBRS, XXII (Rich).

First Victoria directory . . . 1874, comp. Edward Mallandaine (Victoria, 1874). Walbran, B.C. coast names. H. H. Bancroft, History of British Columbia, 1792–1887 (San Francisco, 1890). Morton, History of the Canadian west. Ormsby, British Columbia. "The diary of Robert Melrose," ed. W. K. Lamb, BCHQ, VII (1943), 119–34, 199–218, 283–95. "Journal of Arthur Thomas Bushby" (Blakey Smith). W. K. Lamb, "Early lumbering on Vancouver Island. Part I: 1844–1855," BCHQ, II (1938), 31–53; "The governorship of Richard Blanshard," BCHQ, XIV (1950), 1–41. S. G. Pettit, "The trials and tribulations of Edward Edwards Langford," BCHQ, XVII (1953), 5–40. G. H. Slater, "Rev. Robert John Staines: pioneer priest, pedagogue, and political agitator," BCHQ, XIV (1950), 187–240.

CORNISH, FRANCIS EVANS, lawyer, legislator, civic official; b. 1 Feb. 1831 in London, U.C., son of William King Cornish; d. 28 Nov. 1878 in Winnipeg, Man.

The family of Francis Evans Cornish had settled in the London District of Upper Canada in 1819; he was educated at the London grammar school and called to the bar of Upper Canada in 1855. A conservative and a member of the Orange order, Francis Cornish was an alderman in London from 1858 to 1861, and was elected mayor of the city in 1861. Cornish had a popular following but gained a reputation as the "rowdy" mayor, being charged by opponents with bigamy, assault, drunkenness, and boisterous public disputes. He was defeated in 1864, it is said, when members of the city council called out the militia to ensure an honest election. In 1860 he had sought unsuccessfully a seat in the Legislative Assembly of Canada for the constituency of East Middlesex. He failed also in 1871 to win the city of London constituency in the Legislative Assembly of Ontario.

In 1872 Cornish moved to Winnipeg, where he set up a law practice and became active in civic and provincial politics. One of the leaders in the movement for the incorporation of the city of Winnipeg, he was elected its first mayor in 1874 and served for one year. The most important result of his administration was the enactment of a by-law providing for the beginning of municipal services. The same year he became a member of the provincial legislature for the constituency of Poplar Point, which he represented until his death.

Cornish was a genial and colourful figure, whose name both in London and in Winnipeg is associated with a series of flamboyant political antics. His success in mayoralty campaigns in London is attributed to smooth organization of the voters. He had even arranged, it is said, for British soldiers quartered in the area to take up residence for 24 hours at election time and vote for him. In Winnipeg in 1876 he was arrested and fined for stealing a poll-book on election day. On another occasion, the story goes, he kidnapped his opponent on the eve of an election, brought charges of corruption against him, and then stated that the failure of his opponent to come forward to answer the charges was tantamount to a confession of guilt.

In Winnipeg, Cornish was associated with the group opposed to the policy of reconciliation among the divisive forces engendered during the Red River disturbances of 1869–70. He assisted individuals seeking the arrest of Louis Riel*. He was partially instrumental in arranging for the arrest of Riel's adjutant-general, Ambroise-Dydime Lépine*, in 1873; the following year he assisted Stuart Macdonald, prosecutor, in the trial of Lépine. The judgement in this case allotted the reward offered by Ontario for the arrest of those responsible for the death of Thomas Scott*, and Cornish received $400 of it.

Cornish died at the age of 47 of cancer of the stomach. In the last year of his life he re-entered civic politics as an alderman in Winnipeg. On 31 Oct. 1853 he had married, in London, Victorine Clench, who survived him.

HARTWELL BOWSFIELD

Begg and Nursey, Ten years in Winnipeg. Manitoba Free Press (Winnipeg), 29 Nov. 1878. Dom. ann. reg., 1878. Orlo Miller, A century of western Ontario; the story of London, "The Free Press", and western Ontario, 1849–1949 (Toronto, [1949]). Stanley, Louis Riel, 187, 191, 193, 210–11.

COX, WILLIAM GEORGE, magistrate, justice of the peace, gold commissioner, and artist; b. in Ireland in 1821 or 1822, son of Charles Cox; d. in California, 6 Oct. 1878.

Late in 1857 William George Cox ended a 12-year banking career in Dublin and emigrated to New York with his bride, Sophia Elizabeth Webb, whom he had married in Donnybrook, Ireland, on 6 November. When his wife returned to Ireland in August 1858, Cox proceeded to British Columbia, arriving in December. He became a constable at Fort Yale the following February; three months later he was appointed a deputy collector of customs, and then, on 26 Oct. 1860, assistant gold commissioner and justice of the peace for the Rock Creek district. He continued to perform the functions of these offices in the Cariboo mines from 1863 until 1867, and in the Columbia and Kootenay district in 1867 and 1868. He was made a county court judge in 1866, and was appointed to the Legislative Council in 1867 and 1868.

In performing his official duties Cox was a capable, if unorthodox, public servant. Governor James DOUGLAS thought him "Peculiarly well adapted for frontier service, where tact and a resolute will are indispensable qualities in managing the rough characters met with there." Dr Walter Butler Cheadle* described him as a "Fat, tall, thick set fellow . . . delicately polite, gentlemanly and jolly." In 1864 he distinguished himself by leading a party of men from the Cariboo to capture some Chilcotin Indians who had massacred one of Alfred WADDINGTON's road parties and were threatening a widespread uprising. Among the miners themselves Cox was popular. His sometimes unconventional "legal" decisions added a lighter tone to the otherwise sombre official duties; on one occasion he required the disputants over a mining claim to settle their difference by a foot race from the court house to the disputed claim; on another he assisted in the ceremony of drumming out of Rock Creek an Englishman who had been robbing the sluice boxes. Court procedures he adapted as circumstances warranted; Chinese were sworn in by chopping off a cock's neck or breaking a plate.

But Cox had his problems. His wife, abandoned in Ireland while he enjoyed the attentions of an Indian woman, demanded support, through official channels; the reluctant Cox was obliged to comply. Governor Frederick Seymour* reported that Cox resented authority, and his glib admission that he had "omitted some entries [in an official return] through my usual carelessness" was met by the cold charge that he endeavour to perform his duties "with care and attention, and not with admitted 'Carelessness.' "

Unfortunately his most celebrated escapade was to contribute to his undoing. During the discussion in the Legislative Council over the site of the capital of the united colonies, Cox's neighbour, magistrate William Hayles Franklyn of Nanaimo, a supporter of New Westminster, read his opening words three times since Cox had shuffled his papers after each reading. Then, when the inebriated Franklyn laid his glasses on the desk, Cox pressed the lenses from them and poor Franklyn could not see to read his notes. Amid pandemonium a recess was called, and when the council reassembled Franklyn was prevented from making a second speech. A short time later Seymour, a strong advocate of New Westminster, abolished Cox's position and Cox angrily refused the new office offered to him. In 1869 he moved to San Francisco where he planned to earn his living as an artist, a calling which may, indeed, have been closer to his heart. He is reported to have had little financial success.

Cox was one of several Irishmen who played prominent roles in developing British Columbia and who, at the frontiers of the colony, helped to establish the nascent communities and to secure British institutions.

G. R. Newell

PABC, Sophia E. Cox correspondence; William George Cox correspondence; John C. Haynes correspondence; British Columbia, Colonial Secretary, correspondence outward, 1859–69; British Columbia, Dispatches to Colonial Office, 1859–69. St Mary's Church, Donnybrook, Ireland, marriage certificate of William George Cox and Sophia Elizabeth Webb (copy in PABC). Daily British Colonist (Victoria, B.C.), 13 Nov. 1878.

CRATE, WILLIAM FREDERICK, miller, millwright, and HBC employee; b. between 1807 and 1813 at London, Eng.; d. 1 Oct. 1871 at Cowichan, Vancouver Island, B.C.

William Frederick Crate was engaged by the Hudson's Bay Company at Lachine, Quebec, in April 1834 for three years at an annual salary of £150 Halifax currency. His contract was cancelled at York Factory in July 1834 and he spent the winter of 1834–35 in the Red River Settlement. He was then re-engaged at £100 sterling plus house and board for service in the Columbia Department, where he was placed in charge of the mills at Fort Vancouver, the company's headquarters for its operations west of the Rocky Mountains. By 1843 Crate had rebuilt and expanded the company's sawmills and supervised the construction of the first water-driven grist mill; all were built on streams to the east of Fort Vancouver. The grist mill, completed in 1839, could grind about 20,000 bushels of grain a year; from it came flour for the HBC's western posts and supply ships and for sale to the Russian American Company.

Crate did not renew his contract in 1843 but returned to England to marry on 29 Feb. 1844. He and his wife Sarah spent several years in Vermont where two of their four children were born. John Fenton, who had succeeded Crate as miller at Fort Vancouver, resigned in 1849 and Crate resumed his former duties. During his second employment at Fort Vancouver, Crate completed a new and larger grist mill and constructed a third sawmill which would cut between 3,000 and 4,000 feet of timber in 12 hours.

Following the Oregon Treaty of 1846, Fort Vancouver ceased to be the chief post of the HBC in the Pacific northwest. However, the fort continued as the major distribution and collecting point for the posts south of the 49th parallel, and Crate was in charge of the five-man crew which kept the buildings of the fort in repair. The Oregon Treaty confirmed the "possessory rights" of the HBC to its land and property north of the Columbia River. Nevertheless, the company had continuous trouble with Americans who took up claims to its lands surrounding Fort Vancouver. To protect the grist mill, Crate and his wife filed for a donation land claim of one square mile in 1849 and in 1850. Crate recognized that the mills still belonged to the company, and until 1860 he received wages for running them. But his claim did not include the site of the sawmills, which he also operated for the company. In 1853, Ervin J. Taylor and his wife filed a claim to the half-section of land on which the sawmills stood, and about 1856 Taylor took possession of the mills during Crate's absence. Despite an injunction drawn up by Dugald Mactavish, then in charge of Fort Vancouver, Taylor remained in possession.

In June 1860 the HBC finally abandoned Fort Vancouver, and employees and equipment were removed to Fort Victoria. Crate, however, chose to leave the company and remain on the Columbia River. He was ordered to send all of the milling machinery to Victoria, but he kept what was fixed to the mills and later sold it as his own before moving to Victoria in 1863.

Crate occupied a lot on Government Street near Fort Victoria until 1866 or 1867, when he took a farm in the Somenos District near Quamichan Lake in the Cowichan Valley. Denied permission to build a wharf at Maple Bay, he sought permission in July 1868 to build a small, water-powered grist mill on Somenos Creek on the Quamichan Indian Reserve. Officials of the colonial government were sympathetic to his application because such a mill would serve the Indians and would promote the sowing of cereals and grains by white settlers in the district. In August 1869, after consultation with the Indian owners, Crate was finally given a seven-year lease to two and a half acres for the mill site at an annual rent of $15. The government showed its support for Crate's mill by approving his request for free transport of machinery and building material on the government steamer Sir James Douglas. In return, Crate was to grind the chief's corn without charge, and all of the wheat required by the Quamichan Village Indians at half the price he charged other customers.

This mill proved to be the restless Crate's last effort to make a new life for himself and his family. Having outlived two of his four children, he died "in very indifferent circumstances."

William R. Sampson

British Columbia, Department of Lands, Forests, and Water Resources, Lands Administration Branch, Crown grants, XIV, 2713. PABC, William Frederick Crate correspondence. "Disposition of W. F. Crate, Victoria, V.I., 26 August 1865," Evidence on the part of the Hudson's Bay Company claimants (British and American Joint Commission for the settlement of claims of the Hudson's Bay and Puget's Sound Agricultural companies, [Papers] (14v., Washington, Montreal, 1865–69), II), 104–18, 229. HBRS, VI (Rich), 23, 157–58, 229; VII (Rich), 122–23, 199–200. National Archives (Washington), Microfilm Publications, Microcopy no.432, Population schedules of the seventh census of the United States, 1850, Roll 742, Oregon, Oregon Country (Washington, 1964), 73, f.37. J. A. Hussey, The history of Fort Vancouver and its physical structure ([Tacoma, Wash., 1957]), 110, 151, 198–206. W. E. Ireland, "Early flour-mills in British Columbia: part I – Vancouver Island and the lower mainland," BCHQ, V (1941), 89–109.

CRAWFORD, JOHN WILLOUGHBY, lawyer, businessman, and politician; b. at Manorhamilton, County Leitrim, Ireland, in 1817, son of George Crawford* (later a member of the Canadian Senate) and Margaret Brown; d. in Toronto, Ont., 13 May 1875.

John Willoughby Crawford came to Canada with his parents in 1824. He was raised in Brockville, Upper Canada, where the family had settled and prospered, but was educated at York (Toronto). Called to the bar in 1839, he practised in Toronto and identified himself with that community. In 1845 he married Helen, daughter of Judge Levius Peters Sherwood* of Brockville. They had one son and five daughters.

Although he was in partnership with Ernestus Crombie* in a law firm, Crawford's business activities were so broad that he is more accurately described as a businessman than as a lawyer. His legal specialty was the law of property, banking, and commerce. Associated with numerous business establishments, he served as president of the Royal Canadian Bank, the Imperial Building, Savings and Investment Society, and the Canadian Car Company. He became the first president of the Toronto and Nipissing Railway in 1868 and was a director of the Toronto, Grey and Bruce Railway; both lines were closely involved with Toronto's metropolitan thrust northward. Crawford was also a director of several other firms, and acted in parliament for the Dominion Express Company and the Empire Fire and Marine Insurance Company.

Relatives and business associates tied Crawford to the politically sensitive Grand Trunk Railway. His father was a director, and his brother James (also an MP, 1867–72) was a contractor to the railway; its long-time president – John Ross – was both a brother-in-law and a business associate; its chief engineer was James Keefer, half-brother of Samuel Keefer*, another brother-in-law; George Sherwood*, a third brother-in-law, was also connected with the line. During the 1860s Crawford served the Grand Trunk as a solicitor.

Crawford's family was also closely involved in politics. His father-in-law was an important eastern Ontario Conservative, and a brother-in-law, Henry Sherwood*, had been a leading Tory politician in the 1840s. Crawford himself entered politics and, although manifesting occasional signs of independence, was a reliable Conservative. His début in politics was dramatic: in 1861 he contested East Toronto against George Brown, arguing that he was an "independent": "I think it unworthy of the intelligence of an enlightened electoral body to require, as it is unworthy of the self-respect of the candidate entering political life to give, an express pledge of general opposition to or support of, any particular Government." Crawford wanted the seat of government moved to Toronto and promised that the headquarters of the Grand Trunk would be moved there. Like most people who lived west of Oshawa, however, he disclaimed, albeit disingenuously, any connection with the Grand Trunk. He also declared himself a supporter of representation by population. John Crawford was a powerful businessman, but George Brown was the editor of the Globe and the sitting member. Consequently there was considerable surprise when Crawford defeated Brown

1,135 to 944. He became a loyal and important backbencher.

In 1863 the most significant measure was Richard William Scott*'s bill codifying for the Roman Catholic minority in Canada West most of the educational rights later entrenched in Ontario's constitution by section 93 of the British North America Act. The bill was vehemently opposed by the bulk of the Canada West members, was a burning question during the 1863 election, and was the main issue in East Toronto. The act was especially important to John Crawford. Although himself a member of the Church of England, he was sensitive to Catholic interests in his constituency, and he supported the act with some courage, one of the few members from Canada West to do so. His associates, according to the Globe, constituted a "motley Catholic crowd," and his supporters were described as examples of "animal man" – "a credit to the ould sod." The phrases indicate the tenor of the campaign; Crawford was defeated by 489 votes.

Crawford was ready and anxious to run in the federal election of 1867. In South Leeds, where he had once lived, he won a narrow victory over Albert Norton Richards*. When Toronto was allotted a third seat before the election of 1872, Crawford left South Leeds and easily won West Toronto. Then, on 5 Nov. 1873, the day his government resigned, the prime minister, Sir John A. Macdonald*, announced the appointment of John Crawford as lieutenant governor of Ontario. His term was both short and uneventful, and he died at government house, Toronto, in 1875.

John Crawford combined business and public life. His contemporaries assumed that he was a wealthy man, the Ottawa Citizen commenting that "his ventures in landed speculation were very profitable, and at the age of forty [1857] he was independent financially. . . ." He made Toronto's concerns his own, championing that city even as a member of parliament for South Leeds, and zealously supported its economic interests. He also became a lieutenant-colonel in Toronto's 5th militia battalion. He was made a QC in 1867 and was elected a bencher of the Law Society of Upper Canada in 1871.

The openness and volatility of 19th century Ontario are illustrated by the Crawford family. In fewer than 50 years the Crawfords moved from the status of an immigrant family to the pinnacle of social leadership involving membership in a tightly knit élite. This was the achievement of a family, but also of an open and receptive society.

DONALD SWAINSON

PAC, MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), 228, 266; B (Mackenzie papers), ser.2, 1. PAO, Sir Alexander Campbell papers, 1872. Canada, Parliamentary debates, 1873. Globe (Toronto), 1861–75. Leader (Toronto), 1875. Mail (Toronto), 1875. Ottawa Citizen, 1875. PANS, Report, 1952, app. B. Can. biog. dict., I, 23–26. Can. parl. comp., 1873. D. B. Read, The lieutenant-governors of Upper Canada and Ontario, 1792–1899 (Toronto, 1900).

Careless, Brown. D. C. Masters, The rise of Toronto, 1850–1890 (Toronto, 1947). M. H. Small, "A study of the dominion and the provincial elections of 1867 in Ontario," unpublished MA thesis, Queen's University, 1968. F. A. Walker, Catholic education and politics in Upper Canada; a study of the documentation relative to the origin of Catholic elementary schools in the Ontario school system (Toronto, 1955). D. W. Swainson, "Business and politics: the career of John Willoughby Crawford," Ont. Hist., LXI (1969), 225–36.

CRÉMAZIE, JACQUES, lawyer, author of law-books, journalist; b. 10 Oct. 1810 at Quebec, of the marriage of Jacques Crémazie and Marie-Anne Miville; eldest brother of the poet Octave CRÉMAZIE whom he helped considerably with his financial difficulties and during his exile; d. 11 July 1872 at Quebec.

In 1818 Jacques Crémazie entered the Petit Séminaire of Quebec, where he completed his classical studies in 1828. After thinking for some time of becoming a priest, he studied law, and on 4 Feb. 1835 was called to the bar. He practised his profession for some years with Jean-Baptiste-Édouard Bacquet. On 26 April 1845 he was appointed inspector of the registry offices, in the districts of Quebec and Gaspé; these offices had been created in 1841, by a decree of the Special Council, for the registration of acts and particularly mortgages on real estate in Canada East, and government-appointed inspectors were responsible for maintaining efficient operation.

When the faculty of law was opened in 1854, shortly after the founding of the Université Laval, Jacques Crémazie became its first secretary and taught civil law there. In 1866 he succeeded Augustin-Norbert Morin* as dean of the faculty, a post which he held until his death and which made him a pioneer in French Canada in the teaching of law at a university. In 1860 he was appointed also recorder of Quebec City.

Having a keen interest in primary instruction, Crémazie submitted to the Legislative Assembly's committee on the state of education in Canada East, set up in 1853, an important document which prompted the committee's report and the educational reforms of 1856. Crémazie considered that the backwardness of education in Canada East resulted chiefly from "the failure to take any steps to train teachers, and to establish and fix at a proper rate the salary which should be granted to them." He called for the setting up of normal schools. Crémazie found other causes of backwardness, in the lack of uniformity in teaching, the endless variety of school texts, and the absence of any supervision of the schools. He asked that the state, through a ministry of public instruction, intervene to determine salaries, publish a journal, and concern itself with all problems of education. When the Council of Public Instruction was formed in 1859, he became a member of it. Ten years later the council was reorganized, and he was appointed chairman of the Catholic committee. He was also secretary of the Catholic School Commission of Quebec City. He was a man of great charity, and paid particular attention to the Asile du Bon-Pasteur at Quebec. He even gave lessons to the teaching sisters and to poor pupils, and acted without payment as the community's legal councillor.

Jacques Crémazie published three works: in 1842, Les lois criminelles anglaises . . ., the first compilation in French outlining criminal law as it applied in the Province of Canada; in 1852, Manuel des notions utiles sur les droits politiques, le droit civil, la loi criminelle, et municipale, les lois rurales, etc.; and in 1867, Notions élémentaires de cosmographie et de météorologie accompagnées de leçons sur l'usage des globes. The first two do not display great originality of thought, but they served a useful purpose at the time by diffusing legal knowledge among French-Canadian readers. The third work shows that the author was interested in all subjects; it was composed chiefly to be of assistance to teachers. Crémazie edited L'Ami de la religion et de la patrie, a paper published by Stanislas Drapeau* from 18 Dec. 1847 to 13 March 1850. It appeared weekly, then twice and finally three times weekly. It styled itself "ecclesiastical, political and commercial," and its aim was to help develop popular instruction. This newspaper was replaced by L'Ordre social, which appeared from 28 March to 26 Dec. 1850 and which was also directed by Crémazie. He wanted to complete as a journalist the work he was doing as an educator, by defending what he regarded as the "eternal values of civilization," religion, property, and family.

After an illness of several months, Jacques Crémazie, a bachelor, died on 11 July 1872. The next day Le Canadien wrote: "A great Christian and a distinguished citizen has just died."

J.-C. Bonenfant

Jacques Crémazie, Les lois criminelles anglaises, traduites et compilées de Blackstone, Chitty, Russell et autres criminalistes anglais, et telles que suivies en Canada: arrangées suivant les dispositions introduites dans le Code criminel de cette province par les statuts provinciaux 4 et 5 Victoria, chap. 24, 25, 26 et 27; comprenant aussi un précis des statuts pénaux de la ci-devant province du Bas-Canada (Québec, 1842); Manuel des notions utiles sur les droits politiques, le droit civil, la loi criminelle, et municipale, les lois rurales, etc. (Québec, 1852); [Jacques Crémazie], Notions élémentaires de cosmographie et de météorologie accompagnées de leçons sur l'usage des globes (Québec, 1867).

L'Asile du Bon-Pasteur de Québec d'après les annales de cet institut (Québec, 1896), 132–37. Canada, Province of, Legislative Assembly, Journals, 1852–53, app.J.J., "Education, Lower Canada: report of the superintendent of education. . . ." Le Canadien (Québec), 15 juill. 1872. Le Courrier du Canada (Québec), 12 juill. 1872. Annuaire de l'université Laval pour l'année académique 1873–74 (Québec, 1873), 51–55. Beaulieu et Hamelin, Journaux du Québec, 175–205. Audet, Histoire du conseil de l'Instruction publique, 40–41. André Labarrère-Paulé, Les instituteurs laïques au Canada français, 1836–1900 (Québec, 1965), 156–61. P.-G. Roy, A propos de Crémazie (Québec, 1945), 17–28.

CRÉMAZIE, OCTAVE (baptized Claude-Joseph-Olivier), bookseller, writer, and poet; b. 16 April 1827 at Quebec, 11th child of Jacques Crémazie and Marie-Anne Miville; d. 16 Jan. 1879 at Le Havre, France.

Of the 12 children born to Octave Crémazie's parents, eight died in infancy, so that Octave, the youngest of those who survived, spent his early years in the company of three brothers: Jacques, Joseph, and Louis. At the seminary of Quebec, where he was admitted as a day-pupil in 1836, Octave, under the influence of Abbé John Holmes*, acquired a liking for literature. Holmes introduced him particularly to the French romantics, who were subsequently a predominant influence on the poet, as the style of his poems shows and as he himself states. Musset and Lamartine were soon his literary gods, together with the Victor Hugo of the period prior to 1850.

When Octave had finished his studies in 1844, he went into partnership with his brother Joseph at the head of a small bookshop, which had been established in 1833, and which thenceforth bore the sign "J. et O. Crémazie." More venturesome than his elder brother, Octave worked to develop the business; in 1847 it was installed at 12 Rue de la Fabrique, and soon became one of the most important centres of French culture and refinement in Quebec City. Crémazie, a great reader, the first to use the classical and modern books he sold, quickly acquired a reputation as an intellectual and scholar. Thus on 2 Dec. 1847, at the age of 20, his name appeared among the founders at Quebec of the Institut Canadien, in which he subsequently held various positions on the governing body, including that of president in 1857–58. On the other hand, the company of ladies did not interest him; he was even perhaps a bit of a misogynist. The question of marriage was one he never entertained.

On 1 Jan. 1849 L'Ami de la religion et de la patrie, edited by his brother Jacques, published as a New Year's offering one of Octave Crémazie's first poems. From that time on, almost every year, at the same date and then on other occasions determined always by a particular event or circumstance, the papers of Quebec City published poems by Crémazie that earned him a certain fame until, in 1858, his Drapeau de Carillon established him as "national poet."

As 1860 approached, the back of the Crémazie bookstore became a kind of club, where those who took part in the literary movement later known under the rather too formal title of the Quebec school dropped in and sometimes assembled. Chance brought together there Étienne Parent, François-Xavier Garneau*, Abbé Jean-Baptiste-Antoine Ferland*, Pierre-Joseph-Olivier Chauveau*, Joseph-Charles Taché*, Antoine Gérin-Lajoie*, Abbé Henri-Raymond Casgrain*, François-Alexandre-Hubert La Rue*, Alfred Garneau, Léon-Pamphile Le May*, Louis-Honoré Fréchette*, and a number of others, all friends of books and of Crémazie. It was the initiative of some members of this group that brought about the launching of two literary magazines Les Soirées canadiennes and Le Foyer canadien.

To enhance the quality of his commercial imports, and no doubt also through a desire to go to the sources of culture, Crémazie felt a need to travel to France himself. He made his first trip at the end of 1850 and stayed the whole month of January 1851 in Paris, and he apparently returned there each year from 1853 to 1860. Even when his bookshop was growing in importance and approaching its zenith, and at the same time his popularity as a poet was becoming established, during the years 1855–57 and after, Crémazie had not changed his reserved and somewhat austere habits. At Quebec, where success seemed to smile on his every undertaking, people remarked on his modesty. But in Paris he appeared to be quite a different person. Perhaps despite himself, he played the comedy of the rich man of the world, so much so that he literally took leave of his senses. To maintain this absurd reputation, he placed extravagant orders with his suppliers for goods as costly as they were unusual: books, of course, of all kinds and prices, but also wines, cheeses, toys, religious objects, work boxes, and even umbrellas. A number of these articles, unsaleable because they were so expensive, could not even be displayed, for want of space.

Meanwhile, under its prosperous and opulent exterior, the Crémazie firm was already experiencing serious financial difficulties. To quiet his creditors the bookseller-poet first obtained bank loans, then had recourse to the reasonable security guaranteed to him by three of his friends in particular: Joseph-Édouard Cauchon*, Augustin Côté*, and François Évanturel*. But after some time, for lack of authentic notes properly endorsed, Crémazie began to forge bills on which he counterfeited his friends' signatures and which he went to usurers to get changed. In the long run sums were involved which are impossible to specify but which were certainly astronomical for the period. This incredible game – which constitutes the enigma of Crémazie's otherwise likeable personality – lasted several years, until catastrophe came in the autumn of 1862. In the evening of 10 November some ten friends, along with the poet's two brothers, met to try to save him. But Crémazie knew that salvation was materially impossible, and did not appear at the meeting. The next day he secretly fled his native town and his country for a destination that long remained unknown outside the limited circle of his family. He took refuge in France, concealing his identity under the assumed name of Jules Fontaine. We do not know what sum Crémazie's frauds totalled. At the time of proceedings instituted against the broker John R. Healey, who had put some of the former bookseller's notes into circulation, the figure of $100,000 was mentioned, but it was not certain that this was correct, for Crémazie had acted in an incredibly chaotic fashion. What was certain was that the notes were numerous, "as numerous," Judge Lewis Thomas Drummond* said, "as the waves of the St Lawrence breaking against the sidewalks of Rue Saint-Pierre."

Having been so happy on each of his preceding voyages, finding in France as it were the ideal country, the source and model of his cherished Canada, Crémazie lived all the more wretchedly when he saw himself stranded there as an exile and separated completely from his own country. He entered France with his health already impaired by the nightmare years he had endured. Despite the help and affection he received constantly from a few French friends – in particular the Bossange family – he fell prey to sickness, poverty, solitude, and boredom, and was reduced to complete apathy toward poetic creation. The modest position he held in the business house of Hector Bossange, then in the shipping agency of Gustave Bossange, required him to live in turn in Paris, Bordeaux, and Le Havre. In 1870–71, during the Franco-Prussian War, he experienced the siege of Paris, and he made a detailed account of it in the form of a diary; during the Commune he was at Orléans.

Except during the few weeks he spent in the company of his friend Abbé Casgrain, in 1873–74, and the short visits he received from the occasional Canadian traveller, Crémazie's contacts with his native land were maintained through correspondence with his mother and brothers, or, through the intermediary of his family, with a handful of old friends. Although he was the sole author of his misfortune, his reputation among his compatriots never lost its lustre. In 1862, at the very time when he disappeared from the local scene, he was at the height of his glory in Quebec as a poet. Les Soirées canadiennes had just published, at the end of October, the first part of a long poem entitled Promenade de trois morts, and promised for the next number a sequel, which was always hoped for and never written. The bankruptcy of the bookshop and the loss of the poet were a veritable thunder-clap in the Quebec sky. However guilty he might be, Crémazie, in the eyes of the public, appeared rather as an unfortunate victim. During the proceedings of 1864 he was never directly attacked. The tendentious pamphlet prepared by Louis-Michel DARVEAU which was published at that time, called Cause célèbre; procès de J.-R. Healey, en juillet 1864 . . . affaire Crémazie, questioned not the conduct of the poet but that of his alleged accomplices. In 1868, 75 prominent ecclesiastics and laymen addressed a petition to the Canadian government requesting royal pardon for Crémazie; from 1869 to 1872 a committee was engaged in seeking funds to pay off the exile's debts. But all these steps were futile, either because of the inextricable disorder in which Crémazie had kept his affairs, or because of the fatal powerlessness of the law: not only was the royal pardon not necessary, but it was legally impossible, for no proceedings had been instituted against the poet. Other efforts – those of Luc Letellier* de Saint-Just in 1874–75 and Gédéon Ouimet* in 1877 – not to repatriate Crémazie but to provide him with material assistance on a proper scale – could not be given concrete form because of the accidents of political life. Fate willed both that the poet should be the object of national veneration and that he should lead a tragic existence until the end. In profound isolation, after more than 16 years of exile, he died at Le Havre, and was buried in the cemetery of Ingouville, where there exists no trace even of his remains.

For a century Octave Crémazie's fame has been interpreted in diverse ways, but it has known no decline. His contemporaries and the generations following have long continued to admire and extol some of his ringing stanzas. But for the man of today, touched more by the exemplary misfortune of the poet and by the weaknesses of work brutally interrupted at a time when it should have begun to emerge from its stumbling beginnings, Crémazie is pre-eminently the literary symbol of French Canadian estrangement.

Whatever may be the variety and sometimes the exoticism of the subjects with which chance or circumstance inspired him, the basic incentive behind Crémazie's poetic writings is the expression of a certain national identity. To this is due the fact that he is considered the sonorous echo of his people. Indeed his most justly famous poems belong in a characteristic fashion to what the critic Gilles Marcotte calls the poetry of exile. Exile in time, for the poet, unable to accept fully the material conditions of a thankless, disappointing age, cultivates a longing for a glorious past, irretrievably gone. Like his Vieux soldat canadien, Crémazie compared "the happiness of yesteryear with the sorrows of today." He exclaimed: "Who will give us back that heroic age?" Exile also in space, for the spiritual country is France, with which one vainly tries to identify oneself through the bookish, poorly assimilated image one has of it. Like his hero in the Drapeau de Carillon, "he was exiled in his own native land." The Canadian reality, even the landscape, is described by means of commonplaces, in tones that betoken artificiality and contrivance. Thus, in this country where two centuries have established them, Crémazie and the Canadien of whom he is the voice lead only an illusory existence: their soul is elsewhere. It is therefore not surprising that the Promenade de trois morts, the longest and most original – although unfinished – poem of Crémazie should concern itself in morbid complacency with a macabre and tormenting obsession for death. With an expressive sincerity, and probably without realizing it, the poet grasps only the dark side of life or shadows that cannot endure.

Certainly the tribulations Crémazie experienced in his last years at Quebec must have aggravated his fundamental melancholia. He exercised his ingenuity to banish from his poetry any direct allusion to his personal sufferings – yet they are nevertheless to be found there. In any case his poems are truly a mirror held up to the generations who have recognized themselves in them. When he was in his beloved France, uprooted and withdrawn into his private drama, he wrote no more verses.

The 40 or so poems of unequal quality composed between 1849 and 1862, which constitute his work, reflect his somewhat chance apprenticeship to the poet's trade. The awkwardness and heaviness of the best pieces are due in part to the author's curious method: he would elaborate the poems at full length in his head and write them down only when they were complete. But it is clear also that Crémazie, imbued like his contemporaries with the most superficial rhetoric of French romanticism, could not, consciously or by instinct, conceive of poetry as being above all a creation in language. A sincere rimester visited by an eloquent muse, he remained throughout his active career as much exiled from true poetry as he was subsequently to be from his country. When, able to profit by sufficient perspective, he passed severe judgement on the Drapeau de Carillon, his most admired poem, no doubt he saw better what he should have done. But the sentence he wrote on 27 Jan. 1867 to his friend Abbé Casgrain, when the latter urged him to take up his pen again, expresses in the most poignant way the destiny that is acknowledged today to be his, that of the poète maudit, inevitably condemned to silence: "The finest poems are those that one dreams of but does not write."

On the other hand, his work in prose, fragmentary though it is, reveals an authentic writer. The Journal du siège de Paris is a spontaneous document of great psychological value, showing the quality of soul and intelligence of the person who kept it during those historic months. Without affectation – for these 200 pages were not in any way destined for publication – Crémazie succeeds in communicating in the most concrete and convincing fashion the distress and privations that a simple, lucid, and magnanimous man experienced in a daily tragedy. Furthermore, his correspondence with his family, which is only partially known and which one hopes will some day be discovered in its entirety, is direct, natural, moving, and touching. Finally, in his letters to Abbé Casgrain, Crémazie, engaging in lively and candid criticism of himself and others, or airing his views in random fashion on the cultural problems of his country, displayed a literary sensitivity unlike any other to be found in French Canada in the whole of the 19th century.

Thus Crémazie, a mythical figure among poets, remains for posterity a skilful prose-writer, living still despite his place in the span of time.

Réjean Robidoux

[Crémazie's poems, which first appeared in newspapers or as leaflets, were collected in two publications by the efforts of Abbé H.-R. Casgrain: 25 poems appear in the 2nd volume of La littérature canadienne de 1850 à 1860, publiée par la direction du "Foyer canadien" (2v., Québec, 1863–64), II, 9–122; and in the Œuvres complètes de Octave Crémazie publiées sous le patronage de l'Institut canadien de Québec (Montréal, 1882). The latter, prepared by Casgrain in collaboration with H.-J.-J.-B. Chouinard*, does not include all Crémazie's poems. In fact, P.-G. Roy*, in A propos de Crémazie (Québec, 1945), lists the titles and publication data of four pieces which appeared in newspapers and are not in La littérature canadienne or Œuvres complètes. In addition, Roy reproduces in full Le premier de l'an 1849, the first poem Crémazie published. To this list must be added the poem which serves as an epigraph to Les Anciens Canadiens by Philippe Aubert de Gaspé and which Casgrain maintains was written by Crémazie.

Crémazie's correspondence with his family is found in part in the Œuvres complètes, which includes 37 letters; in A propos de Crémazie, Roy adds to these certain others, including an important one from the poet to his mother, dated 6 Aug. 1872. The letters Octave Crémazie wrote to Casgrain and drafts of the latter's to Crémazie are found in the ASQ, Fonds Casgrain, Lettres, III, VII, IX. In his introduction to the Œuvres complètes, Casgrain published these letters, omitting some details. Finally, the last prose narrative by Crémazie, the Journal du siège de Paris is included in the Œuvres complètes. R.R.]

[H.-R. Casgrain], Œuvres complètes de l'abbé H.-R. Casgrain (4v., Montréal, 1896), I, 353–75. Cause célèbre; procès de J.-R. Healey, en juillet 1864, sous la présidence de l'hon. juge Drummond; affaire Crémazie ([Québec, 1864]). H.-R. Casgrain, Octave Crémazie (Bibliothèque canadienne, Collection Montcalm, Montréal, 1912). Michel Dassonville, Crémazie (Classiques canadiens, 6, Montréal et Paris, 1956). Gilles Marcotte, Une littérature qui se fait, essais critiques sur la littérature canadienne-française (Collection Constantes, 2, Montréal, 1962), 65–70, 71–83. Séraphin Marion, Les lettres canadiennes d'autrefois (9v., Hull et Ottawa, 1939–58), V. Fernand Rinfret, Études sur la littérature canadienne-française; première série, les poètes: Octave Crémazie (Saint-Jérôme, Qué., 1906). H.-R. Casgrain, "Le mouvement littéraire en Canada," Le Foyer canadien, recueil littéraire et historique (Québec), IV (1866), 1–31. Jeanne Le Ber, "L'amitié littéraire de Crémazie et de Casgrain," Archives des lettres canadiennes (Ottawa), I (1961), 184–208. Réjean Robidoux, "Les Soirées canadiennes et le Foyer Canadien dans le mouvement littéraire québécois de 1860, étude d'histoire littéraire," Revue de l'université d'Ottawa, XXVIII (1958), 411–52. G.-A. Vachon, "L'ère du silence et l'âge de la parole," Études françaises, revue des lettres françaises et canadiennes-françaises (Montréal), III (1967), 309–21.

CRONYN, BENJAMIN, Church of England clergyman and first bishop of Huron; b. at Kilkenny, Ireland, 11 July 1802, son of Thomas Cronyn, of Kilkenny, and Margaret Barton; d. at London, Ont., 21 Sept. 1871.

Benjamin Cronyn was educated at Kilkenny College, and at 15 entered Trinity College in Dublin where he received his BA in 1822, MA in 1825, and, later, DD in 1855. He was divinity prizeman in 1824. In 1825 he was ordained deacon and served as curate at Tunstall, Kirkby Lonsdale, in Lancashire, England, until 1827 when he was ordained priest. He was then curate until 1832 of Kilcommock, Longford, in the diocese of Ardagh, Ireland.

In 1832 the archbishop of Dublin wrote to Archdeacon John Strachan* in York (Toronto) inquiring about openings in Canada for Protestant clergymen who "are thinking of emigration from finding themselves destitute thro' the existing troubles of the Church." Cronyn and his family were among the many Irish Protestants who decided to emigrate to Upper Canada. They sailed in the summer of 1832 on the Anne of Halifax chartered by a group of friends. Among them were Anne Margaret Hume, widow of the Reverend Dominick Edward Blake of County Wicklow, with her two sons, the Reverend Dominick Edward and William Hume*, and her daughters Frances Mary and Wilhelmina, wife of the Reverend Charles Crosbie Brough.

Cronyn had married in Ireland Margaret Ann Bickerstaff of Lislea, Longford, in December 1826. Of their seven children, Margaret married Edward Blake*, son of William Hume Blake; Verschoyle married Edward's sister, Sophia; Rebecca married Edward's brother, Samuel Hume Blake*; Benjamin married Mary G. Goodhue, daughter of George Jervis Goodhue*. Margaret Ann Cronyn died 29 Oct. 1866, and Benjamin was married again at Dublin, Ireland, on 16 March 1868, to Martha Collins; there were no children from this marriage.

Arriving in York, Cronyn met Strachan and Bishop Charles James Stewart* of Quebec, who licensed him to Adelaide. This township was then being settled by many of Cronyn's Irish friends, and there had apparently been an understanding that Cronyn would minister to them. On their way to Adelaide in November, Cronyn and his family were overtaken by darkness in London. He preached there on the following day, and, so effective was his sermon, he was persuaded to remain. Stewart subsequently authorized the change, appointing Cronyn to London and parts adjacent and Dominick Blake to the Adelaide charge.

London at this time was a settlement six years old. The Reverend Benjamin Lundy*, a pioneer abolitionist, visited the village in 1832, and told of the recently finished court house, two houses of public worship being built, three hotels, and six general merchant stores; he enumerated its variety of craftsmen, who were necessary in a new community. He estimated that there were about 130 buildings, nearly all frame, in the village. There were two doctors and two lawyers, and one weekly newspaper, the Sun. By this time there were Methodist, Presbyterian, and Church of England congregations in the community, which had a population of about 300.

One of Cronyn's first actions was to move and complete, during the winter of 1832–33, the unfinished church building begun by his predecessor, the Reverend E. J. Boswell. This had been erected on an unsatisfactory site and he located St Paul's Church (which burned in 1844 but was rebuilt in 1846) where St Paul's Cathedral now stands. Cronyn held services in London and at various stations in London Township. His son, Verschoyle, wrote that he was a "fearless horseman" and "expert swimmer," necessary attainments for travelling in his extensive field.

Under the terms of the Canada Act of 1791, the British government had power to authorize the erection of rectories in the province endowed with glebe lands. Implementation was delayed until 1836 when Sir John Colborne*, acting on an 1832 dispatch from the colonial secretary, Lord Goderich, ordered the preparation of patents setting up 57 rectories (Colborne actually signed only 44 before leaving the colony). Both London and London Township were among the rectories established. Cronyn thus held and received the income from two rectories, the only clergyman in Upper Canada to do so. He gave up the township rectory (now St John's, Arva) in 1841. In 1838 he was able to augment his income by taking on the duties of chaplain at London: the War Office had deemed it expedient in 1832 to discontinue the appointment of chaplains to the forces at certain Canadian posts and to employ a resident "Clergyman of the Established Church." (When Archdeacon Alexander Neil BETHUNE preached in St Paul's in 1848, the military constituted most of the congregation.)

Support from overseas for the church in Upper Canada was vital in these years, and in January 1837 Cronyn accompanied William BETTRIDGE to England to solicit aid. They separated in July when Cronyn went to Ireland to deal with family affairs and to carry on there the campaign for men and money.

The population in the western parts of Upper Canada increased rapidly and by 1847 it was clear that the diocese of Toronto should be divided. Legal and financial obstacles stood in the way. Strachan took the lead in overcoming the former, by obtaining an act in 1857 which resolved any doubt as to the right of the Canadian church to meet in synods to elect bishops rather than having appointments made from England. Cronyn took care of finance. With other clergy and laity in the western part of the diocese, he organized an episcopal fund committee which raised the £10,000 endowment stipulated by the crown, and he must be given credit for the success of this campaign. With all barriers removed, the synod of Toronto met on 17 June 1857 to set up the present diocese of Huron (a name chosen and applied by Strachan in May), comprising the 13 counties in the southwestern part of the province.

The choice of a bishop precipitated an unseemly, if not scurrilous and libellous, controversy in the pages of the London Free Press and other newspapers of the region (the documents were reprinted in a pamphlet a few days before the election). The names of A. N. Bethune and Cronyn were put forward, and lines were drawn between high and low church. Bethune, the candidate favoured by Strachan, was challenged for his support of Puseyism and Tractarianism and tenets which led "downward to Rome"; Cronyn was identified with "Calvinistic cliqueism." The theological arguments degenerated into a personal attack on Cronyn, who was accused of neglect of his duties to his parishioners, to prisoners in the jail, and to the troops when he was chaplain. He was also accused of being a speculator in land and "an appropriator to his own use, of the property of his parish."

Cronyn had, it is true, taken on many responsibilities in his early days in London. He ministered to those who had been condemned to death for their part in the events of 1837–38, and the troops of the garrison attended his church while stationed in London. How far he carried out the other duties associated with the work of a chaplain cannot be shown. His land transactions were complicated, profitable, and, according to some, devious. In a letter to the London Free Press the churchwardens of St Paul's discussed the accusations, and strongly claimed that church welfare rather than speculation was his motive in negotiations over land which later became valuable.

On 8 July 1857 the delegates met in St Paul's Church. There were 42 clergy licensed in the 39 parishes in the new diocese, and two laymen from each parish (with one vote; if they did not agree they would not vote). Bishop Strachan presided over the election, which resulted in 22 of the clergy and 23 of the laity voting for Cronyn, and 20 clergymen and ten laymen for Bethune. Six parishes had not voted, presumably because the two lay delegates could not agree. Thus Cronyn was elected on the first ballot.

Many explanations of the result have been given. The clerical vote was greatly influenced by the number of Irish clergy serving in the new diocese. Of the 42 clergy voting, nine were Trinity College, Dublin, men, and at least another six had been born in Ireland or had an Irish background. The low church Irish clergy had more sympathy for Cronyn's religious views than those of Bethune. Furthermore, the endowment had been raised locally, and the lay contributors also preferred the churchmanship of Cronyn whom they knew and who had led the campaign for funds.

Cronyn was consecrated at Lambeth on 28 Oct. 1857 by the archbishop of Canterbury acting under Queen Victoria's mandate, the last Canadian bishop required to go to England for consecration. He also visited Ireland where he recruited Edward Sullivan*, later bishop of Algoma, James Carmichael*, later bishop of Montreal, and John Philip DuMoulin*, later bishop of Niagara. After his return he was enthroned in St Paul's Cathedral on 24 March 1858.

In his charge delivered to the clergy of the diocese at his first visitation in June 1859, Cronyn told something of his activities as bishop: "Since April, 1858, I have visited eighty-four congregations in the Diocese, and preached 130 sermons; I have confirmed 1,453 candidates, consecrated five churches and two burial grounds, ordained fifteen Deacons and three Priests, and travelled in the discharge of these duties 2,452 miles." At the same time he made clear his evangelical views. He emphasized the importance of preaching, saying that "Amongst the many means of grace which God has appointed in the Church . . . the preaching of the word stands pre-eminent. The pulpit is the Ministers' great battle-field." He condemned "auricular confession and priestly absolution," "penances and self-inflicted torments," and "purgatory, with its thousands of years of torment," stressing instead the need of conversion. The 39 Articles to him were the "ultima ratio in all questions of doctrine," and "where any of our formularies are expressed in ambiguous language and appear inconsistent with the plain statements of the articles, we are bound to interpret the former by the latter."

His evangelical views soon involved him in a serious difference of opinion with Strachan. In 1858 some graduates of Trinity College in Toronto, a college instituted by the bishop, expressed views concerning the character and doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church which disturbed Cronyn. He concluded that these views were traceable to the teaching they had received. In April 1860 he wrote to Strachan expressing his disapproval of the college "in many things" and declined to nominate the five councillors whom he had the right to name. At the June 1860 synod of Huron one of Cronyn's own clergy, the Reverend Adam

Townley* of Paris, proposed a resolution which stated in part: "this Synod respectfully requests the Lord Bishop [Cronyn] to adopt such means as in his wisdom he may see good as shall tend to secure the hearty co-operation of all Churchmen in support of Trinity College, Toronto." A lay representative asked Cronyn to give his opinion on the motion and he replied that he could not approve of it: "I think it dangerous to the young men educated there, more particularly if they are educated for the ministry." He also said that he would not for any consideration send a son of his to the institution nor could he see any prospect of effecting a change in the teaching there.

In a pastoral letter in July 1860 Cronyn gave his recollection of what he had said at the June synod of that year, and attacked "The Provost's Catechism" which he claimed was placed in the hands of every student entering Trinity College. The views put forth in the catechism were to him "unsound and un-Protestant" and dangerous in the extreme. This attack launched a lengthy controversy between Cronyn and Provost George Whitaker* of Trinity College, which was fully canvassed by the press and in many pamphlets. The Corporation of Trinity College eventually submitted the documents in the dispute to the bishops of the church in British North America, requesting them to declare whether they found any of the doctrines of the provost "unsound or unscriptural, contrary to the teaching of the Church of England, or dangerous in their tendency, or leading to the Church of Rome." The judgement of the bishops, with Cronyn dissenting, was that several of the points in the provost's teaching had reference to matters about which the church is silent, but which a theological professor might well discuss. Such statements, however, were private opinions.

Cronyn's distrust of Trinity College, as well as the urgent need for more clergy in his diocese, had suggested to him the desirability of establishing his own college in which young men might be trained for the ministry under his eye. In his charge to the synod in 1862 he admitted that he had entertained the idea for some time. In 1863 there were only 76 clergy in the diocese and more than 50 townships were without the ministrations of a clergyman. The need for a theological college was clear.

He had already secured in 1861 the services of Dr Isaac Hellmuth*, a man ideally suited for his purposes, to solicit aid in England for the erection of his projected school of theology. In 1862 Hellmuth persuaded the wealthy Reverend Alfred Peache of Downend, Bristol, to contribute £5,000 as an endowment for a divinity chair in the new college, to be called the "Peache chair." The appointee, the first being Hellmuth himself, was required to "be a Clergyman of the United Church of England and Ireland of strictly Protestant and Evangelical principles and of approved learning ability piety and holiness of life holding and continuing to hold the same as expressed in the Thirty-nine Articles interpreted in their plain and natural sense." The Colonial and Continental Church Society, with which Hellmuth had been associated, also proved to be a friend to the college from the first. The accent on "Protestant and Evangelical principles" produced financial support in England which almost certainly would not otherwise have come. Cronyn applied to the legislature for a charter and on 5 May 1863 the act to incorporate Huron College received royal assent. The college opened on 2 December.

Such was the uncompromising theology of Cronyn that when he received an invitation from the archbishop of Canterbury to attend the first Lambeth Conference in September 1867, he viewed it with suspicion. The conference had developed from a suggestion of the provincial synod of Canada, that a "Pan-Anglican Conference of Bishops" be called to discuss common problems [see James Beaven]. One was the privy council decision of 1865 in the case of Bishop Colenso, which had put the validity of all documents appointing the bishops in self-governing colonies in doubt; another was the effect of the publication in 1860 of the theologically controversial Essays and reviews.

Cronyn gave his opinion of the proposed gathering in no uncertain terms in his charge to synod in 1867: "It is evident that his Grace intends that all should understand that the meeting is to be regarded merely as a social gathering. . . . Of course, all shades of opinion, recognised or not recognised in the church, would be represented there, from the almost full-blown Romanism of those who boldly profess to celebrate the mass in our churches, with incense and the idolatrous worship of the consecrated elements, to the feeble, timid and dishonest efforts of incipient innovators, who are endeavoring, bit by bit, to introduce the exploded and condemned ritual of former days, and thus in time to effect the unprotestantizing of our church, by accustoming the people to the ritualism of Rome, and thus undoing the work of the Reformation." Nor was he alone in his opposition, for the archbishop of York and the dean of Westminster also would not cooperate.

The synod nevertheless requested Cronyn to attend the conference, which he did "with much diffidence and hesitation." He was not unhappy over the proceedings, and on the invitation of the Colonial and Continental Church Society he preached "in the two English Churches" in Paris. He visited the Paris exhibition of that year and was surprised to find that the "circulation of God's Holy Word, and of religious publications of various kinds" was being extensively carried on. He was not so happy with what he saw at St Alban's, Holborn, London. He left that church humiliated and grieved, and more than ever convinced of the necessity of guarding against the introduction "even of the smallest things savouring of those superstitious observances which can hardly be distinguished from the ceremonial of the Church of Rome."

While in England, Cronyn interviewed the secretary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, who told him that the society had decided to reduce its annual grant to the diocese from £1,200 to £800. The reduction meant that assistance to ten missionaries had been withdrawn. In order to make up the deficiency Cronyn suggested at the 1868 synod that a general appeal should be made throughout the diocese. The synod responded to the proposal by launching a "Sustentation Fund" appeal which by 1869 had reached nearly $30,000. Cronyn advocated making the fund sufficiently large to provide "a moderate endowment in the Diocese for all time to come," as the voluntary system had never been found sufficient to supply the spiritual wants of the people; by 1871 the fund had reached $68,000. Cronyn had again shown his ability for fund raising, as he had in 1854.

A measure of Cronyn's contribution to the diocese is provided by his report to his final synod in 1871. At that time there were 88 active clergymen and one superannuated. During the preceding year he had confirmed 1,371 candidates, preached 65 sermons, delivered 43 addresses to candidates, ordained seven priests and six deacons, consecrated six churches, opened two churches for divine worship, visited 67 congregations in ten counties, and travelled 3,355 miles.

Cronyn's evangelical views, maintained by the early Irish clergy in the diocese and by the many who followed them, were sustained by the teaching at Huron College. They coloured the theology of the diocese of Huron for many years after his death. He must not, however, be judged by his theological views alone. His practical contributions were lasting and incalculable. The number of clergymen in the newly formed diocese had more than doubled by 1871. He had opened no fewer than 101 churches. Parishes in the same period increased in number from 39 to 160. Of the latter 15 were vacant, suggesting a need for perhaps an additional eight clergy. Huron College, the institution which Cronyn had founded on his own initiative, supplied over the years many clergy not only for his own diocese but for the Canadian church at large and the mission field. From Huron College, through the efforts of Hellmuth, grew the present University of Western Ontario, which became non-denominational in 1908.

Cronyn was pre-eminent as a judge and recruiter of men. Six of the clergy he ordained during his episcopate (they numbered at least 83) were destined to become bishops: in addition to the three volunteers he brought from Ireland following his consecration he ordained John McLean*, Maurice Scollard Baldwin*, and William Cyprian Pinkham*. He was also a most indefatigable and successful raiser of funds. Philip Carrington was to say: "The new Diocese of Huron, under its energetic and forceful bishop, became a powerhouse for the whole Canadian Church. He was a great fighter, and a great fisher of men."

JAMES J. TALMAN

[The only collection of Cronyn papers is in the library of Huron College, London, Ontario. It is a small collection of documents and letters dealing with the every-day life and business of four generations of the family. The synod office of the diocese of Huron possesses a Cronyn letter book, covering the period 1858–67, which deals with diocesan matters. The John Strachan papers and letter books at PAO contain material from Cronyn between 1840 and 1865. Cronyn was a prolific pamphleteer, and his addresses to synod, although not always printed, give his views and describe his activities in great detail. J.J.T.]

Benjamin Cronyn, The bishop of Huron to the clerical and lay gentlemen composing the Executive Committee of the Synod of the Diocese of Huron (n.p., 1860); [ ], Bishop of Huron's objections to the theological teaching of Trinity College, as now set forth in the letters of Provost Whitaker . . . (London, C.W., 1862); A charge delivered to the clergy of the Diocese of Huron, in St. Paul's Cathedral, London, Canada West, at his primary visitation, in June, 1859 (Toronto, 1859).

The bishop of Huron and Trinity College, Toronto ([London, C.W., 1860]). The bishop of Huron's objections to the theological teaching of Trinity College, with the provost's reply (Toronto, 1862). James Bovell, Defence of doctrinal statements; addressed to the right rev. the lord bishop of Toronto, the right rev. the lord bishop of Huron, and the Corporation of Trinity College . . . (Toronto, 1860). The episcopal controversy; being a series of letters written by the respective friends of the Ven. Archdeacon Bethune, D.D., and Dr. Cronyn, rector of London; the two candidates for the bishopric of the western diocese (London, C.W., 1857). The gospel in Canada: and its relation to Huron College . . . (London, C.W., [1865?]). The judgments of the Canadian bishops, on the documents submitted to them by the Corporation of Trinity College, in relation to the theological teaching of the college (Toronto, 1863). [J. T. Lewis], A letter to the right rev. the lord bishop of Huron by the lord bishop of Ontario ([n.p., n.d.]). [A Presbyter], Strictures on the two letters of Provost Whitaker in answer to charges brought by the lord bishop of Huron against the teaching of Trinity College (London, C.W., 1861). The protest of the minority of the Corporation of Trinity College, against the resolution approving of the theological teaching of that institution (London, C.W., 1864). Adam Townley, A letter to the lord bishop of Huron: in personal vindication; and on the expediency of a new diocesan college (Brantford, C.W., 1862). George Whitaker, Two letters to the lord bishop of Toronto, in reply to charges brought by the lord bishop of Huron against the theological teaching of Trinity College, Toronto (Toronto, 1860).

Church of England, Synod of the Diocese of Huron, Minutes, 1858–71 (London, Ont., 1862–71). London Free Press, 8–10 July 1857, 23 Sept. 1871. Upper Canada, House of Assembly, Appendix to journal, 1836, app.106, p.60. R. T. Appleyard, "The origins of Huron College in relation to the religious questions of the period," unpublished MA thesis, University of Western Ontario, 1937. A. H. Crowfoot, Benjamin Cronyn, first bishop of Huron (London, Ont., 1957). C. H. Mockridge, The bishops of the Church of England in Canada and Newfoundland . . . (Toronto, 1896), 150–62. J. J. Talman, Huron College, 1863–1963 (London, Ont., 1963) J. J. and R. D. Talman, "Western" – 1878–1953 (London, Ont., 1953). Verschoyle Cronyn, "The first bishop of Huron," London and Middlesex Hist. Soc., Trans., III (1911), 53–62. S. W. Horrall, "The clergy and the election of Bishop Cronyn," Ont. Hist., LVIII (1966), 205–20.

CUNNINGHAM, ROBERT, journalist and politician; b. 12 May 1836 at Stewarton, near Kilmarnock, Ayrshire, Scotland, son of John Cunningham and Barbara Newlands; d. 4 July 1874 at St Paul, Minnesota.

Robert Cunningham grew up in Scotland and was educated there. He took a degree in arts at Glasgow College, and then proceeded to the University of London from which he graduated in science. In 1862 he married Annie Brown of Aberdeen, Scotland, and they were to have three daughters and one son. Six years after his marriage Cunningham decided to emigrate to Canada; he settled first in Toronto where he found employment as a journalist. In the winter of 1869 he was sent west as a special correspondent for the Toronto Globe, and subsequently the Toronto Telegraph, to cover the disturbances at Red River.

The new province of Manitoba seemed to offer ample opportunity to Cunningham, and he quickly determined to locate there permanently. With William Coldwell*, he became, and remained until his death, joint editor and proprietor of the independent Liberal Manitoban in Winnipeg; in 1870 he and his partner received the appointment of queen's printer, which may have helped their financial situation. In 1871 Cunningham was named a justice of the peace; he took an active and leading part in the Fenian excitement [see O'DONOGHUE], summarily ordering the arrest of two suspects without any real evidence.

Cunningham's newspaper supported the Liberals politically, and he formed a close association with Joseph Dubuc*, member of the Legislative Assembly for Baie de Saint-Paul, and other leaders of the French-speaking community; in this community he saw a reliable political base. At their urging, Cunningham stood for election, successfully, in the federal constituency of Marquette in 1872. One of his agents was Louis Riel*, who served as a returning officer in a poll that went solidly for Cunningham.

As a member of parliament, Cunningham assumed the obligation of representing the interests of the Manitoba Métis community. He assured Riel he would support a general amnesty for all those involved in the Red River disturbance of 1869–70. He was also instrumental in the settling of the Métis land claims; the old settlers were assured of 160 acres plus their rights to the hay privilege on the outer two miles of the river belts, under the terms of the Dominion Lands Act of 1874. That same year he was involved in the scheme to have Riel, elected for the constituency of Provencher, take his seat in the House of Commons despite the charges against him arising from the Red River disturbances.

Devoted as he was to the interests of his constituents, Cunningham was much less attached to the Liberal party. His tendency toward political independence was so obvious that Sir John A. Macdonald* invited him to the Conservative caucus in the autumn of 1873. Cunningham had no intention of being trapped in the aftermath of the Canadian Pacific Railway scandal, and ignored Macdonald's offer. He ran again as a Liberal in 1874, and was returned handily. With his party in power, Cunningham found it a distinct advantage to vote regularly with the Liberals. On 7 May 1874, Antoine-Aimé Dorion* announced Cunningham's appointment to the Council of the North-West Territories, but he did not take up his new appointment. He died in July of that year in St Paul, Minnesota, while returning to the west.

Cunningham's career reflected the instability of a new province. His tendency toward independent action, and his concern for the Métis community for which he spoke, made him a somewhat difficult colleague in his political party. His sudden death deprived Manitoba of an effective representative and journalist.

J. E. REA

PAM, Adams George Archibald, 1870–74; Alexander Morris, Ketcheson collection, correspondence, 1872–74; Louis Riel papers, correspondence and papers, 1870–74; Settlement and pioneers, Robert Cunningham, 1872–74. Begg and Nursey, Ten years in Winnipeg, 4, 6, 51–52, 56, 59, 68, 71, 96, 99. Manitoba Free Press (Winnipeg), 1872–74. Manitoban (Winnipeg), 1870–74. Can. parl. comp., 1874, 159–60.

CURRIE, DONALD, educator, journalist, and civil servant; b. between 1831 and 1834 at West River, P.E.I.; d. 9 March 1880 in Charlottetown, P.E.I.

After completing his education at the Central Academy, Charlottetown, and the Free Church Academy, Halifax, N.S., Donald Currie became a teacher in the public schools of rural Prince Edward Island. On 1 Feb. 1859 he was appointed assistant master of the Central Academy, a position he held until the new Conservative government replaced the academy with Prince of Wales College 16 months later. Currie then turned to journalism, first writing for James Barrett Cooper* of the Monitor, whom he left in 1861 for David Laird* of the Protestant and Evangelical Witness. The role of religion in education was a dominant issue in the early 1860s, and Laird's paper was the most strident of the Conservative and Protestant camp. Many years later, James Hayden Fletcher*, a fellow editor, recalled that at this time Currie was a rabid partisan, and "could see nothing good in a political opponent."

When controversies with less sectarian content arose, Laird changed the name of his paper to the Patriot, and placed more emphasis upon secular affairs. Currie became his associate editor in 1865, and after 18 months they were able to make the Patriot into the first successful semi-weekly journal on the Island in many years. By 1871 it was probably the leading newspaper in the colony; its editorial policy was strongly anti-confederation, and the two editors eventually left the Conservative party because of the strength of pro-confederate elements within it. They opposed the railway legislation of the premier, James Colledge Pope*, on the grounds that the consequent financial burden would force the colony into confederation.

In a by-election held on 5 July 1871, Laird defeated James Duncan, the newly appointed chairman of the Railway Commission. Currie's role became that of an aide to Laird both in politics and in journalism. When the latter was made by Alexander Mackenzie* federal minister of the interior in late 1873, Currie, who had occupied minor bureaucratic posts, was appointed collector of customs for Charlottetown. He continued to hold the office until a few months before his death from consumption in 1880. He was survived by a wife and several children.

Currie's main contribution to Island public life, particularly after the founding of the Patriot, was his work as a journalist. He was generally admitted to be an able writer, and was reputed to have played an indispensable role in the anti-railway campaign of 1871 and 1872 which propelled Laird into a successful political career. When Currie died, Henry Lawson, who was then editor and proprietor, wrote that "as editor of the Patriot he made this journal a power in the land."

Ian Ross Robertson

[PRO, CO 226/89, 212. Currie's editorials appeared regularly in the Monitor (Charlottetown), 1860–61, the Protestant and Evangelical Witness (Charlottetown), 1861–65, and the Patriot (Charlottetown) 1865–80. Unfortunately there is no way of knowing which commentaries were written by him and which by his associates. For particular details of his journalistic career see: Presbyterian and Evangelical Protestant Union (Charlottetown), 30 March, 20 April 1876, and Patriot, 21 April 1876. For obituaries see: Examiner (Charlottetown), 10 March 1880, and Patriot, 11, 13 March 1880. See also: J. H. Fletcher, "Newspaper life and newspaper men," Prince Edward Island Magazine (Charlottetown), II (May 1900), 74–75. Robertson, "Religion, politics, and education in PEI," especially 228–46. S. N. Robertson, "The public school system," in Past and present of Prince Edward Island . . ., ed. D. A. MacKinnon and A. B. Warburton (Charlottetown, [1906]), 370a. I.R.R.]

CUSHING, LEMUEL, pioneer of the Ottawa valley, businessman of Chatham, Que., volunteer militiaman during the 1837 insurrection; b. 29 April 1806 at Trois-Rivières, L.C., eighth child of Job Cushing and Sarah (Sally) Rice; d. 18 May 1875 at Montreal, Que., and was buried in Chatham.

Lemuel Cushing belonged to an illustrious English family which crossed to America in the 17th century, in the wake of the Mayflower. On 10 Aug. 1638 Matthew Cushing had taken up residence at Hingham in Massachusetts, not far from Boston. His descendants emigrated to Canada when the government of Lower Canada opened the Eastern Townships to settlement. In the autumn of 1798 Elmer and Job Cushing received uncleared land in Shipton Township, which today forms part of Richmond County. Six years later Job moved to Trois-Rivières, where Lemuel was born.

Lemuel was eight years old when his family went to live in Montreal. On his father's death, 21 Jan. 1821, he set out for the United States, where he apparently lived for some months at Peacham, Vermont. But at the time of the American infiltration into the Ottawa valley he returned to Canada, to take part in the settling of Chatham Township. Although he was only 16 and had little capital, Lemuel Cushing started a retail business on his own account, at the very place where the municipality of Cushing is today, between Carillon and Grenville. Thanks to his energy, perseverance, and strong constitution, he triumphed over seemingly insurmountable odds and became very rich. On three occasions he was the owner of the famous Caledonia Springs. In 1859 he bought an island in the country of his ancestors, in the harbour of Portland, Maine; Cushing Island became a renowned tourist centre because of Ottawa House, which Cushing built there.

As a rich businessman, Cushing naturally enjoyed great prestige in Chatham Township. For more than 40 years he was one of its justices of the peace, with a jurisdiction extending for a time to the town of Montreal. He was successively mayor of the municipality of Chatham Township, from 1861 to 1872, and warden of the electoral constituency of Argenteuil until his death.

At the time of the 1837 insurrection Cushing had armed a group of volunteers, and with them went to the defence of the English flag. His intervention prevented the pillaging of Saint-Eustache and the destruction of the registry office of Saint-Benoît, where precious documents were held.

On 25 Aug. 1836 Lemuel Cushing had married Catherine Hutchins, of Lachute. Thirteen children were born of this marriage, among them eight sons, who were all active and powerful businessmen. Moreover, one of these sons, Lemuel Cushing (1842–81), won distinction in the parliament of Canada and at the bar of Montreal.

Lemuel Cushing died on 18 May 1875; he had contributed substantially to the development of the Ottawa valley, and the considerable influence that this development has had on the economic destiny of the province of Quebec is well known.

ANDRÉE DÉSILETS

AJTR, Registre d'état civil. Archives de la municipalité du canton de Chatham (Saint-Philippe-d'Argenteuil, Qué.). Private Archives, Bruce Wright (Fredericton, N.B.), 30, pp.13327, 13333; 37, pp.17127–28 (microfilm at PAC). PAC, MG 30, D62 (Audet papers), 9, pp.400–4; RG 1, L3, C bundle 3, no.110; L3^{L}, pp.66528, 66556; L1, 42, p.423. Argenteuil Advertiser (Lachute, Que.), 9 June 1875. Montreal Herald, 20 May 1875. P.-G. Roy, Les noms géographiques de la province de Québec (Lévis, Qué., 1906), 142–43. Lemuel Cushing, The genealogy of the Cushing family (Montreal, 1877). Cyrus Thomas, History of the counties of Argenteuil, Que., and Prescott, Ont., from the earliest settlement to the present (Montreal, 1896), 297–99.

D

DALY, JOHN CORRY WILSON, merchant, office-holder, and politician; b. in Liverpool, Eng., 24 March 1796; d. at Stratford, Ont., 1 April 1878.

John Corry Wilson Daly, born into "the better class of Irish society" (his birth occurred in Liverpool while his parents were visiting that city), received a sound education in Ireland before serving in the Royal Navy as a surgeon's assistant. He then emigrated to Cooperstown, New York, and, in 1826, to Hamilton, Upper Canada. There he began a 30-year association with the Canada Company, in 1831 acting as its land agent in what later became the Huron District. In 1833 he moved to Stratford where the Canada Company had already built some shanties; his house was the second frame building in the settlement. He opened the town's first store, and became its first postmaster. By 1841 he had purchased for himself the Canada Company's mill dam and sawmills in the area. Daly also became agent for the Bank of Upper Canada in Stratford.

A Conservative, Daly was much involved in public life. Prior to 1842, Daly was a member of the local Board of Magistrates for the London District. He was elected in 1842 to the Huron District Council as the representative for Downie, Blanshard, and Fullarton townships for a term of three years. In 1845 he decided not to seek another term. His departure from the council was part of a dramatic incident, the "Stratford Riot." The new councillors were chosen on 6 Jan. 1845 at a township meeting attended heavily by both Catholics and Orangemen. Daly, a member of the Church of England, was popular with the Roman Catholic minority in the district, where political and religious animosities had become acute, and, without his knowledge or consent, he was nominated for another term by his Catholic supporters. He was defeated. As justice of the peace, Daly had attempted to ensure order at the meeting by appointing special constables, but after the vote members of the two sides withdrew and began to drink. The result was a riot involving some 80 men, the majority of them Irish Catholics. Daly, summoned to restore order, arrested several rioters and one-month prison terms were eventually meted out to five of the Catholics. Religious tension persisted, but riot was avoided at later township meetings.

Daly was Stratford's first mayor; indeed he held "all the important offices of honour and trust in the town: mayor, coroner, magistrate, militia officer." In 1849 he was instrumental in the establishment of Perth County. He was a lieutenant-colonel in the militia and he helped to set up the first school district in the county. Though often regarded as "the founder of Stratford, Ontario," he was not the first to arrive: the first known settler in Perth County itself was Sebastian Fryfogle. Nonetheless, J. C. W. Daly was a Huron District pioneer whose biography indicates the opportunities available to a man of ability and drive in early settlement days.

Daly married three times. A son, Thomas Mayne*, born to his wife Leonora Mayne, and a grandson, also Thomas Mayne*, were politicians.

DONALD SWAINSON

Illustrated historical atlas of county Perth, Ont. (Toronto, 1879). Dom. ann. reg., 1878, 339–40. Wallace, Macmillan dictionary. H. F. Gardiner, Nothing but names: an inquiry into the origin of the names of the counties and townships of Ontario (Toronto, 1899), 349–50. William Johnston, History of the county of Perth from 1825 to 1902 (Stratford, Ont., 1903). Robina and K. M. Lizars, In the days of the Canada Company: the story of the settlement of the Huron tract and a view of the social life of the period, 1825–1850 (Toronto, Montreal, 1896). Swainson, "Personnel of politics." P. E. Lewis, "When orange and green united – the Stratford riot of 1845," Western Ontario Historical Notes (London), XX (September 1964), 1–5.

DARVEAU, LOUIS-MICHEL, notary, journalist, and literary critic, b. 29 Sept. 1833 at Quebec, son of Grégoire Darveau and Marie Simpson; d. 24 Aug. 1875 in his native city.

Louis-Michel Darveau entered the Petit Séminaire of Quebec in 1845 and finished his classical education six years later. On 5 May 1856 he became a notary. He seldom acted in this capacity, preferring the more exciting career of a journalist. On 9 March 1858, at Quebec, he started a weekly L'Observateur, which had as its motto: "I observe everything; I support the good; I fight the bad and with a laugh I tell each person the truth about himself." Darveau regularly used banter as an antidote for the ridiculous in his contemplation of the world and the life of men. He published the last number of L'Observateur on 17 May 1860, and 33 days later started a more moderate weekly La Réforme, in which he undertook the defence of the Rouge party.

In May 1863, a new political team headed by John Sandfield MACDONALD and Antoine-Aimé Dorion* came into power; the Liberals were seeking an organ to represent their ideas and approached Darveau with a view to making La Réforme a party newspaper. As they considered the weekly a little too radical, Antoine-Aimé Dorion and Luc Letellier* de Saint-Just, the minister of agriculture, negotiated with its owner to get him to change his attitude. They asked him to let them choose another name for the journal, as well as a new editor. Darveau accepted these two conditions, but refused a third: that of allowing the name of a figure-head to appear as owner in place of his. An agreement was finally reached in August: Darveau assumed all the costs of publication in exchange for a promise of political patronage. The last number of La Réforme appeared on 18 August, and the first issue of La Tribune seven days later. But contrary to the promises they had made, the governing party did not reimburse the owner for the sums spent in maintaining the Liberal paper. This situation irritated Darveau. On 19 September, to force the government's hand, he announced the discontinuance of La Tribune as a daily paper speaking for the party in power. He resumed publication five days later, however, after reaching an understanding with Napoléon Aubin*. Aubin induced Darveau to sign an agreement to sell, which was realized on 9 Nov. 1863. Frustrated, the Quebec journalist left for Montreal, where he wrote for a number of papers. He contributed in particular to Le National, a paper with liberal and democratic leanings.

In 1864, at the time of an action brought against the broker John R. Healy [see Octave CRÉMAZIE], Darveau prepared a pamphlet, Cause célèbre; procès de J.-R. Healy, en juillet 1864 . . . affaire Crémazie, in which he attempted to disparage Joseph-Édouard Cauchon*, François Évanturel*, and Augustin Côté*, his political enemies; these three had stood surety for loans contracted by Octave Crémazie.

Darveau belonged to the school of Louis-Joseph PAPINEAU, Antoine-Aimé Dorion, and Louis-Antoine Dessaulles*. He was a Rouge: an idealist, a patriot, and a democrat. He had close ties with the nationalists of the Saint-Jean-Baptiste societies and the radical liberals of the Institut Canadien of Montreal. He even delivered lectures to these associations, and L'Observateur published two of them. In the first, given before the Société Saint-Jean-Baptiste of Quebec on 15 Jan. 1858, he declared his nationalist and democratic stand: "we are Catholics and French; we must always be so. We have two principles to defend: Catholicism and democracy; they constitute our nationality. We cannot defend one and deny the other: they are identical." On the national level, Darveau considered the independence of the United Canadas as "the supreme end towards which the destiny of the country is bent." As a French Canadian nationalist, he propagated a veritable mystique of the Patriotes of 1837–38. But, for him, the real value of a people is revealed in its literary accomplishments.

Afflicted with partial paralysis in 1867, Darveau was unable to walk and remained tied to an armchair until his death. Despite his illness, he found the courage to become a literary critic and to write several biographies. He published the first portion of them in 1873 in his volume Nos hommes de lettres. Although he put into it all his talent and effort, this work is not a masterpiece of literary criticism; he accepted or rejected an author's opinion to the extent that it resembled his own patriotic and democratic ideal. Death struck him down on 24 Aug. 1875 and prevented him from publishing a second volume. On 7 Jan. 1857, at Saint-Roch in Quebec, he had married Henriette Giguère; they had no children.

Louis-Michel Darveau was above all a radical journalist, a supporter of democratic ideas and freedom of expression. Unfortunately, at that period there was no place for independent journalism. Papers that wished to survive had to remain strictly tied to political parties.

PIERRE LANDRY

AJM, Greffe de Louis-Michel Darveau, 1871–1874. AJQ, Greffe de Louis-Michel Darveau, 1856–1868. Archives paroissiales de Saint-Roch (Québec), Registre des baptêmes, mariages et sépultures. ASQ, Fichier des anciens du séminaire. L.-M. Darveau, Nos hommes de lettres (Montréal, 1873). L'Observateur (Québec), 9 mars 1858–21 mars 1860. La Réforme (Québec), 9 juin 1860–18 août 1863. La Tribune (Québec), 25 août–15 sept. 1863. Beaulieu et Hamelin, Journaux du Québec, 204, 215, 223–24. P.-G. Roy, Fils de Québec, IV, 133–35. Lareau, Hist. de la littérature canadienne. J.-P. Tremblay, A la recherche de Napoléon Aubin (Vie des Lettres canadiennes, 7, Québec, 1969).

DAVIS, JOHN, Baptist minister and author; b. 7 or 8 Nov. 1802 at Liverpool, Eng., son of Richard Davis (or Davies); d. 14 Aug. 1875 at Charlottetown, P.E.I.

John Davis' father was a prominent Baptist clergyman and four of his sons followed in his footsteps. John received his theological education at Horton College, Bradford, Yorkshire, and was ordained at Portsea, Hampshire, probably in 1829. When Richard Davis died in 1832, John wrote A brief memorial of the Reverend Richard Davis of Walworth (1833), his first published work.

After serving in several English churches, Davis came to North America, probably in 1845. Following a brief ministry in New Jersey, he became an agent for the American and Foreign Bible Society, which shared his belief in the folly of infant baptism. This belief he later developed in Circumcision and baptism, published in Charlottetown in 1867. His work with the society brought him to Yarmouth, N.S., in 1852; he was eventually persuaded to become co-pastor there with the aging Harris Harding*. During his pastorate two additional churches were established in Yarmouth when he sent his own members out to form "colonies" of his church.

In 1855, the year after Harding's death, John Davis resigned to move to New Brunswick. He visited Prince Edward Island as a representative of the New Brunswick Home Mission Board, and was invited to become pastor of the First Baptist Church in Charlottetown. At first he declined, but in 1858 he was persuaded to accept the position to represent both the Nova Scotia and the New Brunswick Home Mission boards on the Island. There he continued his work of colonization by establishing at least two more churches – St Peter's Road and one called North River (West and Clyde River). Davis published The patriarch of western Nova Scotia: life and times of the late Rev. Harris Harding . . . in Charlottetown in 1866. He was instrumental in separating the churches in P.E.I. from those of Nova Scotia – a split designed to make work more effective and probably to provide some financial relief to Nova Scotia churches.

John Davis was noted among his contemporaries as a man of vigorous intellect, more interested in truth than in feeling; his preaching was instructive rather than emotional. He was described as an enthusiastic friend of liberty, of conscience, of trade, of the constitution, and of the press. A prominent member of Maritime Baptist circles, he was awarded an honorary MA by Acadia University in 1870. He resigned his pastorate in 1873 and died two years later, having outlived all his children.

MINERVA TRACY

Acadia University Library, "Historical sketch (1836–1874) of the Charlottetown Baptist Church," W. B. Haynes MS; Zion United Baptist Church, Yarmouth, N.S., Notes from the records, 1814–56. John Davis, Circumcision and baptism (Charlottetown, 1867); The patriarch of western Nova Scotia: life and times of the late Rev. Harris Harding, Yarmouth, N.S., intro.

J. W. Nutting (Charlottetown, 1866). I. E. Bill, Fifty years with the Baptist ministers and churches of the Maritime provinces of Canada (Saint John, N.B., 1880), 330–32. J. A. Clark, A history of the First Baptist Church, Charlottetown ([Charlottetown, 1959]). W. E. McIntyre, Baptist authors, a manual of bibliography, 1500–1914 (3v., Montreal and Toronto, [1914]), III, 190. One hundred and fiftieth anniversary, Zion Baptist Church, Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, 1797–1947 ([Yarmouth, N.S., 1947]). A short history of the Baptist Church of Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island (Sunnyside (Charlottetown), [1904]), 9, 10.

DAVIS, MATHILDA, teacher; b. c. 1820 in the parish of St Andrews, Red River Settlement, daughter of John Davis, a retired officer of the Hudson's Bay Company; d. 1873 at St Andrews, Man., and buried on 10 December.

Mathilda Davis' parents sent her to England to be educated and upon her return to Red River she devoted her life to teaching. The settlers and HBC families were at this time obliged to have their daughters educated in England as she herself had been. Now, through the efforts of influential citizens, HBC families, and Dr John Bunn*, physician for the company, a young ladies school was started at Red River about 1840, with Mathilda Davis as the teacher. The company provided some assistance and students paid fees: full board and instruction in English, French, and music, $132 per annum; weekly board and instruction, $105; day pupils (who received lunch at the school), $50.

The school was first located in a frame house in St Andrews, the property of Mathilda Davis' brother, an HBC employee at Lower Fort Garry. A stone house (still standing) was completed in front of the wooden one around 1858 and provided living quarters for the staff and students; the latter numbered about 40 in the mid-1850s.

Some letters from pupils to their parents in Red River have been preserved. They show that the students "like school very much, particularly geography, music and French," and that they were using Pinnock's History of England and Reid's Dictionary since they ask their parents to bring these books when they next visit the school. In addition to music, drawing and dancing were taught.

Miss Davis was assisted in her teaching by several women prominent in the colony and by her sister Nancy (d. 1893) who also helped with the arduous household chores. These chores necessitated rising every morning at 4:00 AM to light the inevitable Carron stove, carry water, and milk the cows.

After Mathilda Davis' death, education in the new province of Manitoba was supported mainly by ecclesiastical bodies. The name Mathilda Davis will long be remembered in Red River for the pioneer educational work she did and loved so well.

MARJORIE G. MORLEY

PAM, Church of England registers, St Andrews Church, burials, 1870–84, no.154; Miss Davis' school, Correspondence, accounts and miscellaneous papers, 1837–76; Miss Davis' school, note books, 1840–72; Red River Settlement, Red River Census, 1870, no.1125, 1127; Red River Settlement, Samuel Taylor diary, II; Alexander Ross family papers, 284, 474, 476, 477. W. J. Healy, Women of Red River: being a book written down from the recollections of women surviving from the Red River era (Winnipeg, 1923), 159. Lillian Gibbons, "Early Red River homes," HSSM, Papers, 3rd ser., [no.2] (1945–46), 26–42.

D'AVRAY. See MARSHALL

DAY, SAMUEL STEARNS, Baptist clergyman and missionary; b. in 1808 on a farm in Leeds County, U.C., near the village of Delta, son of Captain Jeremiah Day; d. at Homer, N.Y., in 1871.

In his early twenties Samuel Stearns Day decided to study for the ministry and entered the Hamilton Literary and Theological Institution in Hamilton, New York (later Colgate University). Before graduating he volunteered for foreign mission work, and after his ordination at Cortland, N.Y., on 3 Aug. 1835, the American Baptist Missionary Union sent him and his wife to India. They arrived in February 1836 and went first to Chicacole to study the Telugu language. In 1837 Day became the pastor of a small mixed English-speaking congregation in Madras. He moved from Madras to Vellore in February 1840, to minister solely to the Telugu people. Illness forced the Days to return to their home at Homer, N.Y., in 1845. After recovery, Day went back to Vellore, arriving in April 1849, but this time he left his wife and small family in the United States. In 1853 sickness required him to leave India again.

The growth of the mission in Vellore was painfully slow, and the American board had considered abandoning it. However, it was kept alive until the first Canadian-supported missionaries, the Reverend A. V. Timpany and his wife, were sent to the Telugu mission in 1867.

In his later years, Day travelled among churches in the United States and Canada as an advocate for foreign missions. His influence played an important role in inspiring Canadian Baptists to support the work in India, which evolved into the principal foreign mission endeavour of Canadian Baptist churches.

F. T. Rosser

S. S. Day was the author of "Extracts from a letter of Mr. Day ...," and "Another letter from Mr. Day ...," in Baptist Missionary Magazine (Boston), XXI (1841), 297–99 and 299–301 respectively. It also published an obituary of Day in LII (1872), 22–24. A. V. Timpany, "The Gospel to the outcasts," Canadian Baptist (Toronto), 15 Feb. 1872. The Baptist encyclopædia ..., ed. William Cathcart (Philadelphia, 1881), 319. G. W. Hervey, The story of Baptist missions in foreign lands, from the time of Carey to the present date (St Louis, Mo., 1892). Stuart Ivison and F. T. Rosser, The Baptists in Upper and Lower Canada before 1820 (Toronto, 1956).

DEAS, JOHN SULLIVAN, tinsmith and salmon canner; b.c. 1838 in South Carolina; m. 4 Sept. 1862 at Victoria, Vancouver Island, to Fanny Harris by whom he had at least eight children; d. 22 July 1880 in Portland, Ore.

John Sullivan Deas, described as a mulatto, was a tinsmith in Charleston and San Francisco before moving to Victoria, Vancouver Island, probably in 1861 or 1862. He may have come to Vancouver Island to work for Martin Prag, a hardware and tinware dealer, who had previously employed him in San Francisco. By 1866 Deas was a manufacturing tinsmith and hardware dealer in Yale, and from about September 1868 he was established in his trade in Victoria under the name Birmingham House.

In Victoria Deas joined a black community of several hundred, started in 1858 by organized migration from San Francisco. The black migrants were spurred by fear of attempts by the California legislature and judiciary to worsen their already unequal position in the state, and by the attraction of the Fraser River gold rush. In British territory they did not find the equality they sought, although discrimination was social rather than legal, private rather than official. Deas, for instance, was able to carry on several businesses, to buy property, and eventually to exercise the rights and privileges of a natural-born British subject, including obtaining a crown grant of land and becoming a registered voter. But he and his family were on one occasion held up to ridicule in a Victoria newspaper as stereotype members of their race.

Deas started in salmon canning in 1871 by making the tins for Captain Edward Stamp. In 1872, after Stamp's death, Deas canned salmon on his own, leasing the saltery built in 1870 for Captain James Cooper. In 1873 he pre-empted near this site on what is now Deas Island. By 1874 his cannery on the island consisted of three substantial buildings, surrounded by a dyke which enclosed about seven acres, together with smaller buildings, a wharf, and sheds. Deas operated it until the end of the 1878 season, marketing the product under the label "Fresh Salmon, John S. Deas, Frazer [sic] River, British Columbia." He then sold to his Victoria agents, commission merchants Findlay, Durham and Brodie, his interest in the plant which was shortly thereafter valued at between $13,000 and $15,000. After the sale, Deas settled in Portland, Oregon, where his wife had bought a rooming house in November 1877.

During the first years of his operation, Deas could claim to be the largest canner on the river. But in 1877 vigorous new competitors entered the business. Deas felt that the salmon potential of the Fraser was limited, as compared with that of the Columbia River, by irregular runs and the scarcity of good salmon "drifts" in the main channel. When another cannery was planned close to his plant, he applied for an exclusive lease of the drifts near Deas Island, thus provoking opposition in both the provincial and the federal legislatures. Yet his fear of competition seems justified; in 1878 the new cannery put up twice as many cases as Deas, whose pack in his last season was the smallest of the eight canneries operating on the Fraser River that year. Nevertheless, seven seasons in salmon canning during the first decade of continuous operation on the Fraser River entitle John Sullivan Deas to a prominent place among the founders of the canning industry in British Columbia.

H. Keith Ralston

British Columbia, Central Microfilm Bureau (Department of the Provincial Secretary), Chief commissioner of lands and works, Correspondence inward, 3116/74, 3117/74. British Columbia, Department of Finance, Assessment rolls for New Westminster District, September–December 1879, 26–27. British Columbia, Department of Lands, Crown grant records, no.1381 G, v.3; 1556/3; Original field survey book, 37/74, P.H. 2, group 2, New Westminster District. Multnomah County Department of Records and Elections (County Courthouse, Portland, Ore.), Multnomah County, Deed records. National Archives (Washington), United States, 10th Census, Oregon, Multnomah County, Original enumerator's sheets, 425 (microfilm available).

PABC holds copies of two books which published samples of the labels used by British Columbia canners. They are: Salmon labels ... (n.p., n.d.) and Specimens, label printing, Victoria, B.C. (n.p., n.d.). British Columbia Examiner (New Westminster, B.C.), 4 April 1868. British Columbia Examiner (Yale, B.C.), 17 Aug. 1868. British Columbia Tribune (Yale, B.C.), 16 April 1866. Daily British Colonist and Victoria Chronicle, 8 Sept. 1868; 20, 21, 22 Oct. 1870; 3 March 1871; 25 July 1872; 6 May 1874. Mainland Guardian

(New Westminster, B.C.), 18 June 1870; 20 June 1871; 21, 28 Aug. 1878. Morning Oregonian (Portland, Ore.), 23 July 1880. Pacific Appeal (San Francisco, Cal.), 27 Sept. 1862. Victoria Daily Standard, 15 Sept. 1870; 6 March, 9 June 1871. British Columbia, Legislative Assembly, Journals, 1878; Sessional papers, 1878, 210. Canada, Senate, Debates, 1878, 287–92; Sessional papers, X (1877), PT.5, no.5, supp.4, 339–40; XI (1878), PT.3, no.1, supp.5, 287, 306–7; XII (1879), PT.4, no.3, supp.4, 292, 302; XV (1882), PT.4, no.5, supp.2, 223.

Charleston city directory ... for 1856, comp. R. S. Purse (New York, 1856). First Victoria directory . . . 1871, comp. Edward Mullandaine (Victoria, 1871). List of voters in the several electoral districts in British Columbia in force on the first August 1874 (Victoria, 1874). Portland directory for 1879 . . . ; 1880; 1881; 1882 (Portland, Ore., [1879], 1880, 1881, 1882). The San Francisco directory for . . . 1860 . . . ; 1861; comp. H. G. Langley (San Francisco, 1860, 1861). "Victoria assessment roll, 1868," Daily British Colonist, Supplement (Victoria), 14 Nov. 1868. F.W. Howay and E. O. S. Scholefield, British Columbia from the earliest times to the present (4v., Vancouver, B.C., 1914), II, 585. James Pilton, "Negro settlement in British Columbia, 1858–1871," unpublished MA thesis, University of British Columbia, 1951. R. M. Lapp, "Negro rights activities in gold rush California," California Hist. Soc. Q., XLV (1966), 11–15.

DEIGHTON, JOHN, steamer captain and hotel-keeper; b. in November 1830 at Hull, Yorkshire, Eng.; d. 29 May 1875 at Burrard Inlet, B.C.

Information on John Deighton's early life is scanty but he probably began his career as a merchant seaman. He came to California in 1849, but soon returned to the sea, sailing between London, the British colonies, and China. In 1858, the year of the Fraser River gold rush, Deighton arrived in British Columbia. After trying prospecting, he entered the river steamer services, piloting vessels and sometimes commanding steamers that ran between Victoria, New Westminster, and Fraser River points. There is substantial evidence that in 1862 Deighton was briefly captain of James Irvine Bramley's ship, Union.

After a lengthy illness and with the decline in traffic on the Fraser, Deighton turned to hotel-keeping. In September 1867 he moved to Burrard Inlet where Captain Edward STAMP had recently opened a sawmill. Although the population of the area was sparse, thirsty mill-workers and visiting sailors provided a steady trade for Deighton's Globe Saloon, the first enterprise of its kind on Burrard Inlet. Two other public houses were soon established in the area but Deighton, who was "celebrated for his good table and his warm hospitality," did most of the business. In 1870 he replaced the original saloon with the more spacious Deighton House. In 1873 he was able to open the commodious Deighton's Hotel which he placed under the management of his brother and sister-in-law, Thomas and Emma Deighton. The hotel was advertised as a resort for invalids and sportsmen.

Deighton's success is explained by the increasing activity in the area's lumber mills and by his affectionate and generous personality. He was well respected for his political opinions although his language was occasionally uncouth. According to local legend, the townsite of Granville, later Vancouver, received its unofficial but well-known name of Gastown from Deighton's sobriquet, "Gassy Jack," a tribute to his loquacity.

Deighton's prosperity was short-lived. He quarrelled with his brother and sister-in-law, probably as a result of complications caused by his "klootchman," an Indian woman, Qua-hail-ya, known as Madeline or Matrine, the mother of his illegitimate son. In 1874 Deighton returned briefly to steamboating on the Fraser as captain of John Irving*'s steamer, Onward. When his brother and sister-in-law left his employ he returned to hotel-keeping. He began to expand Deighton House but took ill and died. His son, and sole heir, died before the estate, which yielded little more than $300, was probated.

PATRICIA E. ROY

PABC, John Deighton correspondence. Mainland Guardian (New Westminster, B.C.), 9 June 1875. F. W. Howay, "Early settlement on Burrard Inlet," BCHQ, I (1937), 101–14. Raymond Hull, "Sailor at the bar," British Columbia Library Quarterly, XXVII (January 1964), 22–26.

DELAGRAVE, CYRILLE, lawyer, member of the Council of Public Instruction for Lower Canada; b. 25 Nov. 1812 at Sainte-Marie-de-Monnoir (Rouville County), L.C., of the marriage of François Delagrave and Geneviève Amiot; d. 15 Sept. 1877 at Quebec.

Cyrille Delagrave was educated at the Petit Séminaire of Quebec and received his legal training in the office of René-Édouard CARON. He was called to the bar on 8 Aug. 1838, and practised in partnership with the future judge Jean Chabot*. In 1854 he was appointed secretary of the commission responsible for applying the law that abolished seigneurial rights in Lower Canada; he became a member of this commission in 1859, and shared in its activities until its dissolution [see Edward SHORT]. In 1868 he was offered the opportunity of succeeding Judge John Gawler Thompson on the bench of the Superior Court for the Gaspé district, but he declined for reasons of health. However, on 22 Oct. 1872 he agreed to replace Jacques CRÉMAZIE as recorder of the town of Quebec, a post he held until his death.

Cyrille Delagrave had always an intense interest in the education of the young; it is one of the remarkable aspects of his career. On 26 May 1862 he was appointed a member of the Council of Public Instruction for Lower Canada (or Canada East), in place of François-Xavier Garneau*. He took his task seriously, attending 17 of the 20 sessions of that body from 1862 to 1869. On 11 Nov. 1862 he supported the superintendent, Pierre-Joseph-Olivier Chauveau*, who proposed holding sessions of the council only twice a year (in May and November). At the same meeting Delagrave was appointed inspector of the Board of Examiners [see Jean-Baptiste MEILLEUR], with the duty of submitting reports. The ensuing accounts, which appeared in the Journal de l'instruction publique, show that he performed his task conscientiously.

In 1869, when the Council of Public Instruction was reorganized and divided into two committees, Cyrille Delagrave was nominated to the Catholic committee. In 1871 Bishop Jean-Pierre-François Laforce* Langevin suggested forming a commission, with Cyrille Delagrave as a member, which would be responsible for preparing a series of French reading texts for schools. Final approval of five books written by André-Napoléon Montpetit* was granted by the council on 12 May 1875.

On 9 June 1875 the prime minister, Charles-Eugène Boucher* de Boucherville, consulted Cyrille Delagrave about reorganization of the Ministry of Public Instruction and changes to be made in the composition of the denominational committees of the council. The 1875 law implemented the suggestions formulated by the bishops of Quebec and the members of the council. Once more Cyrille Delagrave was named as a member of the reorganized Catholic committee, which included all the bishops whose dioceses were situated entirely or partly in the province, and an equal number of laymen. He was still a member of it at the time of his death on 15 Sept. 1877 at Quebec. It was at Quebec that on 6 Nov. 1844 he had married Louise Mason, by whom he had at least three children.

LOUIS-PHILIPPE AUDET

AJM, Registre d'état civil (notes biographiques fournies par J.-J. Lefebvre). ANQ, PQ, Éducation, Registre de copies de lettres envoyées 1868–1919, XVI, 506. PAC, MG 30, D62 (Audet papers), 10, pp.277–81. JIP (Montréal), nov. 1862, 190; oct. 1863, 153. Le Courrier du Canada (Québec), 15 sept. 1877. P.-G. Roy, Les avocats de la région de Québec, 121–22. Audet, Histoire du conseil de l'Instruction publique. Pierre Boucher de La Bruère, Le conseil de l'Instruction publique et le comité catholique (Montréal, 1918).

DELANEY, PATRICK, teacher; b. 1829 in County Armagh, Ireland; d. 18 Sept. 1874 at Montreal, Que.

We know nothing about Patrick Delaney's life before 1857, the date at which he was appointed schoolmaster at the model school for boys [see Jean-Baptiste MEILLEUR], as well as assistant master and usher at the École Normale Jacques-Cartier, at Montreal. This French normal school was primarily intended to train teachers for the Roman Catholic population of the districts of Montreal, the Ottawa valley, and Saint-François, and of the town of Trois-Rivières and the part of the district of Trois-Rivières to the west of the town.

Since 1826 the organizers of the normal schools, conscious of the two ethnic groups in Lower Canada, had maintained as an essential part of the curriculum the teaching of the mother tongue and of the second language, English or French, as the case might be. To make clear the seriousness of such a decision, Pierre-Joseph-Olivier Chauveau*, the superintendent of public instruction, and Abbé Hospice-Anthelme Verreau*, the principal of the École Normale Jacques-Cartier, decided that "English literature, and elocution and declamation in that language, shall be entrusted to Mr. Delaney, who has studied in the national schools of Ireland." It was considered desirable, therefore, that future teachers should know French, their native language, but also English, the second language, of which the French-speaking milieu of Montreal realized the full importance.

On 16 June 1857, at the time of the first prize-giving at the École Normale Jacques-Cartier, Delaney made a speech in English, stressing "the difficulties that had to be surmounted last spring to organize the school and, taking into account each one's level of instruction, to place the young pupils of the model school, who came for the most part from the different schools of the town."

In November 1860, the principal, Verreau, solemnized the marriage of Patrick Delaney and Mary Ann Kennedy at Montreal. From 1857 on, Delaney had been a member of the Association des Instituteurs for the École Normale Jacques-Cartier district. He does not seem to have attended the meetings of this association with much regularity, since his name is mentioned only twice in the minutes.

On 23 July 1867, Delaney was appointed English language secretary to the minister of public instruction and assistant editor of the Journal of Education, in place of James Julien Theodore Phelan, a lawyer, who had been called on to undertake other duties.

Delaney died seven years later, and was buried in the cemetery at Côte-des-Neiges.

LOUIS-PHILIPPE AUDET

AJM, Registre d'état civil. JIP, 1857–1874 (Procès-verbaux de l'Association des instituteurs de la circonscription de l'école normale Jacques-Cartier de Montréal); mars 1857, 31; juin 1857. Adélard Desrosiers, Les écoles normales primaires de la province de Québec et leurs œuvres complémentaires, 1857–1907 (Montréal, 1909).

DELISLE (DeLisle), ALEXANDRE-MAURICE, public servant, member of the assembly, and businessman; baptized 21 April 1810 at Montreal, L.C., third son of Jean-Baptiste Delisle, a public servant, and Mary Robinson; d. 13 Feb. 1880 at Montreal, Que.

After studying at Montreal, Alexandre-Maurice Delisle was admitted to the bar in 1832, and on 29 April the following year he married Marie-Angélique Cuvillier, daughter of Augustin Cuvillier*, member of the assembly, merchant, and well-known financier. In 1833 also Delisle had begun his cursus honorum in the public service at Montreal. First a clerk of the peace (8 Jan. 1833), then clerk of the crown (February 1833), he was nominated as commissioner (April 1838) to receive the oath of members of the Special Council. Shortly afterwards he again became clerk of the peace (25 May 1838), and then, on 13 April 1843, clerk of the crown. He was appointed harbour commissioner on 27 May 1859, and also accepted the post of sheriff in March 1862. It was in this last capacity that he presided over the reorganization of the Montreal prison; but it was during this year that he suffered the worst setback in his career.

In February 1863 he was publicly accused, by his brother Michel-Charles, of having perpetrated sizeable frauds when he was clerk of the crown. The investigators, Pierre-Richard Lafrenaye and Marcus Doherty, appointed by the ministry of John Sandfield MACDONALD and Louis-Victor Sicotte*, concluded that Delisle, his fellow clerk William-Henry Bréhaut, and their deputy Charles Schiller, had obtained considerable sums by means of false returns and overcharges on the cost of subpoenas, which had permitted them to carry through some attractive speculations. On 19 Dec. 1863 Delisle was therefore relieved of his duties as sheriff, and in January 1864 of his post at the harbour commission. The inquiry had produced lively excitement in Montreal, and as it was directed by Delisle's political enemies, it brought him the warmest sympathy from Conservatives. The procession of witnesses who had come forward to support him comprised almost the entire élite of the party: Henry Hague Judah*, Charles-Elzéar MONDELET, William Badgley*, Lewis Thomas Drummond*, Charles-Joseph Coursol*, Louis-Siméon MORIN, William WORKMAN, Jean-Louis Beaudry*, Thomas Cushing AYLWIN, and Sir Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine*. Delisle claimed that the whole inquiry was a plot organized by Joseph Doutre*, a rabid Liberal. In any case, after the Conservatives had regained power, he was reinstated on the harbour commission (22 Aug. 1866), and later became its president. On 20 Aug. 1866 he had already accepted the post of collector of customs at Montreal, an office he held until 1874, the year of another Liberal victory. He then resigned; at the same time the ministry of Alexander Mackenzie* requested him to relinquish his presidency of the harbour commission.

Clearly the vicissitudes of Delisle's career in public administration had a direct relation to the role he played in political circles. Even before the birth of the Bleus he behaved like a Conservative. In 1841, yielding to the request made by Lord Sydenham [Thomson*], he had stood against James LESLIE in Montreal County. The better to ensure his victory, and the more readily to command the electors' respect, he had had himself appointed a police magistrate a few days before. It was an unnecessary precaution, for after a few scenes of violence in the course of which two of his Irish supporters were killed, a riot broke out and Delisle was proclaimed elected. At Kingston he regularly gave his support to the governor's party, and on 23 June 1841, when John Neilson* made his famous motion condemning the Union, he was one of the two French Canadians who refused to support him. In July 1843 he resigned when he became clerk of the crown. He never returned to active politics, but none the less continued to show himself a person of strong views.

In March 1844 Delisle was a returning officer for a Montreal by-election, a violent election during which Lewis Thomas Drummond won against William MOLSON, the candidate of the governor Charles Theophilus Metcalfe*, to whom Delisle had given his unqualified support. After that, and until his death, he was one of the most prominent figures in the Bleus. He subscribed regularly to the party treasury, and in the counties where he owned property he exercised an influence on the electors that was often decisive. For example, in Argenteuil County in 1854 he paid out several thousands of dollars to get his friend Sydney Robert Bellingham* elected. Furthermore, he always kept the close and devoted friendship of George-Étienne Cartier, who is said to have set great store by his judgement and his discerning and practical advice. At the time of his death, rumour had it that he would soon have been appointed a senator.

It was particularly as an entrepreneur and a businessman that Delisle made his mark – and his fortune. According to an obituary in La Minerve of 16 Feb. 1880, "he was the practical man par excellence, always ready to meet and solve a difficulty, always equal to a situation. . . . He was therefore always able to achieve his aim, through his enlightened will and the inexhaustible resources of a subtle, sharp, and shrewd mind." For example, he made several successful speculations in land in the Rimouski and Pointe-au-Père areas, and notably, in 1864, in partnership with William Workman, he bought an expanse of 78 acres which in a few years became the flourishing town of Sainte-Cunégonde (later annexed to Montreal). He was appointed in 1850 one of the directors, and later the president, of the Montreal City and District Savings Bank. He was likewise a director of the City Bank. During the 1840s, working with Wilfrid-Antoine Masson, Henry Hague Judah, and 35 other associates, of whom 22 were French Canadians, he became one of the most enthusiastic promoters of the Montreal and Bytown Railway, to which he subscribed £1,000. This company, of which he was president in 1854, went bankrupt in 1859, but not before the completion of the portion of line from Carillon to Grenville, which particularly concerned Delisle and his partner Bellingham. He was also a director, then president, of the Champlain and St Lawrence Railway Company, until it was combined with the Grand Trunk in 1872. In 1857 he joined with 32 of the principal capitalists of Montreal to place at the disposal of this company, and of the Montreal and New York Railway Company, a sum amounting to £40,000. At his death he was still a director of the Gulf of St Lawrence Steamship Company, and it was to extend the operations of this undertaking that he had visited the West Indies during the summer of 1878. In 1865 he had, moreover, been a member of the commission responsible for establishing commercial relations with Latin America, and in 1866 he had gone to the West Indies for the first time, before visiting Mexico, Brazil, and several other countries of South America. He also owned bridges over the Rivière des Prairies and several toll-roads on Île Jésus.

Delisle's will, of which the last codicil is dated 24 Jan. 1880, gives an idea of the extent of his fortune. After bequeathing $2,000 to a priest of Saint-Sulpice for charitable works, and some $300 to religious foundations, he gave instructions that following the death of his wife his assets should be divided in equal parts among his children, and that the sum of £70,000 should be deducted from the portion allotted to his two sons, Maurice-Nolan and Charles-Alexandre; they had had interests in the iron trade and in their collapse (before 1862) their father had lost this sum.

Influential, well-to-do, and always very much in evidence because of his social connections, Alexandre-Maurice Delisle was naturally called upon to assume many honorary positions. On 11 Dec. 1837 he was elected churchwarden of the parish council of Notre-Dame, and in 1841 he was credited with having induced Lord Sydenham – a remarkable feat at the time – to be present at the sermons of Bishop Charles-Auguste-Marie-Joseph de Forbin-Janson*. On 21 Oct. 1854 he was appointed a member of the provincial committee responsible for seeing that the industry and resources of the province were properly represented at the universal exposition in Paris. Finally, in 1860, the city council of Montreal appointed him president of the committee entrusted with arranging the decorations and preparing for the reception of the Prince of Wales in the capital. Such positions, which brought him consideration and respect, no doubt compensated for the insults, political persecutions, and denunciations to which he was exposed. These passions, current at that time in the worlds of politics and business, never succeeded in bringing him down.

Delisle was a man of sturdy build and tall stature; he had keen eyes that sparkled with intelligence; a staunch defender of his nationality, he knew himself to be respected by his friends, and, because of his resources and successes, to be above the common level. He was one of the most remarkable French Canadians of the second third of the 19th century, both because of the social position that his spirit of enterprise and great political activity earned for him and because of the fortune he was able to acquire. He lies at the top end of the cemetery at Côte-des-Neiges, beside Louis-Adélard Sénécal* and Sir George-Étienne Cartier.

Jacques Monet

A.-M. Delisle, General rules and regulations for the interior order and police of the common gaol of the district of Montreal ([Montreal?], 1864).

PAC, MG 24, B103 (Delisle papers); MG 30, D62 (Audet papers), 10, p.286–88. Archives de l'université de Montréal, Collection Baby, 108, 114. BNQ, Société historique de Montréal, Collection La Fontaine, Lettres, 237, 276, 652, 656, 660, 663, 665, 666, 667, 669, 670, 678, 682, 685, 686, 689. Correspondance, documents, témoignages et procédés dans l'enquête de Messrs Lafrenaye et Doherty, commissaires, dans le bureau du greffier de la couronne et greffier de la paix, Montréal, suivis des remarques de Messrs Delisle et Schiller sur cette partie du rapport des commissaires qui a pu être connue et les remarques de Mr. Bréhaut sur la lettre annonçant les causes de sa démission (Montréal, 1864). Railroad between Quebec, Montreal, Bytown and Georgian Bay; great public demonstration; presentation by A.-M. Delisle of the petition of the citizens of Montreal to the common council of Montreal, praying for aid to said railroad . . . (Montreal, 1853). La Minerve (Montréal), 1864, 16 févr. 1880. Montreal Gazette, Dec. 1863. Dom. ann. reg., 1880–81, 405. Cornell, Alignment of political groups. Monet, Last cannon shot. T. T. Smyth, The first hundred years; history of the Montreal City and District Savings Bank 1846–1946 (n.p., n.d.). G. R Stevens, Canadian National Railways (2v., Toronto, 1960), I, 39–43. F.-J. Audet, “1842,” Cahiers des Dix, VII (1942), 216–18. É.-Z. Massicotte, “La famille de Jean De Lisle de La Cailleterie,” BRH, XXV (1919), 175–86. Jacques Monet, “La crise Metcalfe and the Montreal election, 1843–1844,” CHR, XLIV (1963), 1–19.

DEMERS, MODESTE, Roman Catholic priest and missionary, bishop of Vancouver Island; b. 11 Oct. 1809 at Saint-Nicholas-de-Lévis, L.C., son of Michel Demers, farmer, and Rosalie Foucher; d. 28 July 1871 at Victoria, B.C.

Modeste Demers was educated at the seminary of Quebec and ordained priest in 1836 by Bishop Joseph Signay*. After serving briefly as priest at Trois-Pistoles, Demers was accepted by Signay in 1837 as a missionary and sent to work under Bishop Joseph-Norbert Provencher* at the Red River Settlement. The following year he was selected by Signay to accompany the Reverend François-Norbert Blanchet* in answer to the calls of the Roman Catholics of Oregon for their own missionaries and priests.

Demers and Blanchet found much work to occupy them among the settlers and the French Canadian servants of the Hudson’s Bay Company in the Oregon country posts. But Signay had indicated that their primary duty was to be to the Indians and had instructed them to learn the native languages as quickly as possible. Demers’ facility with languages had already attracted attention at Red River, and after 12 months on the Pacific coast he had compiled a dictionary, a catechism, a prayer book, and hymns in the Chinook jargon and had acquired an elementary knowledge of more than one of the Indian languages of the area. His good knowledge of English was also useful, particularly in dealing with the HBC which held the economic and political power in the Oregon country and whose patronage was essential to any missionary who hoped to travel beyond the confines of their main post, Fort Vancouver.

Demers’ work in the Oregon country was characterized by arduous and extensive travel, large scale baptisms, and elementary religious instruction of the Indians, often using Blanchet’s Catholic ladder, a graphic representation of the historic progress of Catholic Christianity. He was particularly active in the establishment of a mission at Cowlitz and later made two notable missionary journeys to the north. He was the first Christian missionary to reach the mainland of the present British Columbia. In September 1841 he visited Fort Langley in the Fraser Valley and made contact with and baptized many of the Indians assembled there. The following year, Demers extended his mission to the Carrier Indians of New Caledonia, travelling with the HBC caravan to Fort Alexandria. Here he wintered, built a small chapel, and made several expeditions to Fort George, to Stuart Lake, and to the Atnan people.

Returning to the Oregon country, Demers, after 1844, served as pastor in Oregon City under Bishop Norbert Blanchet. With the elevation of Oregon to an ecclesiastical province in 1846, Blanchet became the first metropolitan, and his fellow missionary from Quebec, Modeste Demers, who had retained his interest in and concern for the northern Indians, was appointed bishop of Vancouver Island and administrator of the diocese of the Princess Charlotte Islands (Queen Charlotte Islands) and New Caledonia, being consecrated as such on 30 Nov. 1847. The new bishop of Vancouver Island was reluctant to accept his burden, feeling that Blanchet had been too hasty in recommending the establishment of a bishopric in a region with apparently such sparse resources and so little touched by Christianity. Vancouver Island itself had been visited briefly by Spanish priests in the late 18th century and in 1843 by Father Jean-Baptiste-Zacharie Bolduc*, who had accompanied James DOUGLAS to the site of Fort Victoria as the HBC began its withdrawal from the Columbia. On the mainland of British Columbia only Demers himself, Father Pierre-Jean DE SMET SJ, and Father John Nobili* SJ had visited the Indians. Outside the fur-trading posts of the HBC virtually no white settlement existed.

Before taking up residence in his new diocese, Demers directed his energies towards acquiring funds and mission personnel to help cope with the vast task that lay before him. Travelling extensively in Europe, particularly in France, Demers managed to find several missionaries for his diocese, but was sadly disappointed with the response to his appeal for funds. Arriving at his episcopal seat in 1852, Demers confessed that “now I am the village priest, I sing mass on Sundays and feast-days, and also preach from time to time [and] as for resources, you know that I do not hold them in my hand." The slender means of his diocese, his dependence upon unpredictable sources of financial aid from Quebec and Europe, and his at times desperate need for competent English-speaking priests were problems which were to remain with Demers until his death.

During the Fraser River gold rush of 1858, greater attention was focused on the distant Pacific colonies and Demers was able to persuade the relatively new order of the Sisters of St Ann of Montreal, led by Sœur Marie du Sacré-Cœur [Salomé Valois*], to commit themselves to work in his diocese, and to convince the missionary order of the Oblates of Mary Immaculate to establish their headquarters at Esquimalt under the Reverend Father Louis d'Herbomez*. A girls' school, orphanage, and later a hospital were established for the population of Victoria under the aegis of the sisters. The Oblates established a school for boys in Victoria and continued Demers' own work of missions to the Indians both on Vancouver Island and on the Fraser River. The bishop himself was thus able to begin construction of his cathedral in Victoria, to give more attention to the organization and supply of his diocese, to extend his charitable works, and to visit the miners and others in the distant parts of his diocese.

The departure of the Oblates for the mainland in 1865, with the appointment of d'Herbomez as vicar apostolic of British Columbia, was a serious loss to Demers' work, in spite of the fact that relations between the bishop and the order had never been smooth. Since 1863, however, Demers had been applying to the American College at Louvain, Belgium, for English-speaking priests, and it was fortunate that this institution was now able to fill the void left by the withdrawal of the Oblates.

Demers himself was becoming increasingly sickly, and in 1865 retired temporarily to San Francisco for medical care. The following year he again left Victoria for a three-year extended tour of South America, the eastern United States, Quebec, and France, soliciting men and money for his diocese. He came back to Victoria briefly in 1869, only to return to Europe with Father Charles John Seghers* to attend the œcumenical council at the Vatican in 1870. In France en route to Rome the bishop was badly injured in a train accident, from which he never fully recovered. He died a year later at his residence in Victoria, only a few days after British Columbia entered the Canadian confederation.

The days of the fur trade empire and of the crown colony had ended, and the character of the Pacific province was soon to be radically changed. It was perhaps fitting that during his last illness Bishop Demers "frequently expressed a desire to see and converse with Sir James Douglas, who was often found at his bedside." It was Douglas who had first greeted the young Demers at Fort Vancouver, and whose role in the fur trade and as a colonial governor had brought him into continuous contact with the bishop for over 30 years. It was their world of trading posts and Indians, of civilization in the wilderness, of company government, and of the close contacts of a small colonial society which had now passed.

JEAN USHER

AAQ, Colombie anglaise, I–III (letters from Modeste Demers to the archbishopric). Archives de la Congrégation pour l'évangélisation des peuples (Vatican City), Lettere e Decreti; Udienze di Nostro Signore; Lettere della S. Congregazione e Biglietti di Monsignore Segretario, Scritture riferite nelle Congregatzioni, America Centrale. Archives de la Propagation de la Foi de Paris (France), F.202 (Vancouver, reports of the missions, 1847–1922). Archives de l'archevêché de Rimouski, Lettres de Mgr Modeste Demers à l'abbé Edmond Langevin, 1848–1866. Archives Deschâtelets (Scholasticat Saint-Joseph, Ottawa), Dossier Orégon, I, A–XI, 1–3 (Modeste Demers to Father Pascal Ricard, O.M.I., Superior, St Joseph Mission, Olympia, W.T., 1853–56); B–IX, 2 (Miscellaneous correspondence of Modeste Demers with Father Louis d'Herbomez, O.M.I., 1860–65). Archives générales O.M.I. (Rome), Dossier Modeste Demers (microfilm at the Archives Deschâtelets, Scholasticat Saint-Joseph, Ottawa). Archives of the Archdiocese of Portland (Portland, Ore.), Letters of Modeste Demers to Mgr N. Blanchet. PABC, Modeste Demers correspondence, 1860–71.

Modeste Demers, J.M.J. Chinook dictionary, catechism, prayers and hymns. Composed in 1838 & 1839 by Rt. Rev. Modeste Demers. Revised, corrected and completed, in 1867 by most Rev. F. N. Blanchet. With modifications and additions by Rev. L. N. St. Onge . . . (Montreal, 1871). P. M. Hanley, "The Catholic ladder and missionary activity in the Pacific northwest," unpublished MA thesis, University of Ottawa, 1965; "Frs. Blanchet and Demers and missionary preaching in Oregon," unpublished PHD thesis, Pontifical Georgian University, Rome, 1965. Morice, History of northern interior of B.C. M. L. Nichols, The mantle of Elias; the story of Fathers Blanchet and Demers in early Oregon (Portland, Ore., 1941). A. E. Oksness, "Reverend Modeste Demers, missionary in the northwest," unpublished MA thesis, University of Washington, Seattle, 1934. J. M. Hill, "The most Reverend Modeste Demers, D.D., first bishop of Vancouver Island," CCHA Report, 1953, 29–35. Émilien Lamirande, "L'implantation de l'Église catholique en Colombie-Britannique 1838–1848," Revue de l'université d'Ottawa, XXVIII (1958), 213–25, 323–63, 453–89.

DE MILLE, JAMES (the family used DeMill, but he wrote under De Mille, and used this name after 1865), author and professor; b. at Saint John, N.B., probably on 23 Aug. 1833, third child of loyalists Nathan Smith DeMill and Elizabeth Budd; d. at Halifax, N.S., 28 Jan. 1880, at the age of 47.

Nathan DeMill was a prosperous merchant, ship-owner, and lumberman in Saint John, N.B. He was a man of strong principles and a strict abstainer, called "cold-water DeMill" by his contemporaries. He left the Church of England to become a Baptist, and was active on the board of governors of Acadia College which was chartered in 1841. James De Mille and his brothers were educated at Horton Academy, Wolfville, before continuing at Acadia. Their adventures at the academy, real or imaginary, form the substance of an excellent set of boys' books, The "B.O.W.C." Series. Taking place in and around Minas Basin or celebrating great Maritime events such as the Miramichi fire, these adventures of the Brothers of the White Cross were published between 1869 and 1873.

James matriculated at Acadia College in 1849. The following year he and his elder brother Elisha Budd DeMill set off on a year's travel, going by boat to Boston, overland to Quebec, and there boarding one of their father's ships for England. They went on a walking trip in England and Scotland, crossed to France, and spent several months in Italy. The experiences of this year profoundly affected James – most of his many novels reflect a knowledge of places, people, and languages not his own – and left him with a lifelong love of Italy.

On his return to North America he transferred to Brown University, Providence, Rhode Island, and graduated with an MA in 1854. Then followed some eventful but frustrating years. He travelled to Cincinnati to wind up a wildcat mining concern in which Acadia College money was involved; in 1856 in Saint John he and a partner started a book business, which failed leaving many debts; his father, too, suffered business reverses.

In 1859 James De Mille married Elizabeth Ann Pryor, daughter of Dr John Pryor*, first president of Acadia College. He was appointed professor of classics at Acadia in 1860, thus beginning a career as an outstanding teacher and scholar. He instituted the classical honours course and is supposed to have encouraged his students to use Latin as a language of conversation. He also taught Italian to interested students. The first of his books, Martyrs of the Catacombs, about first-century Rome, which he had written in 1858, was published in 1864.

In 1865 he moved to Halifax to become professor of history and rhetoric at Dalhousie College, having in the same year refused an appointment as superintendent of education for Nova Scotia. After moving to Halifax, he returned to his father's first affiliation, the Church of England, and published a pamphlet on its early history. He spent the rest of his life in Halifax, enhancing his reputation as a teacher and publishing, at the rate of about two a year, a long series of books. Obviously he wrote his novels under tremendous pressure, perhaps driven by the debts incurred during his business venture. During this time he also wrote The elements of rhetoric (1878), a well-planned and gracefully executed textbook.

His novels originally appeared serially in American magazines before being published as books in New York or Boston by Harper, Appleton, and other publishers. The majority of the novels show signs of haste and of a desire to satisfy the demand of readers of popular fiction for mystery and high adventure. Helena's household, an early novel that De Mille had the leisure to write with care, was much admired as giving an accurate picture of Roman family life. Almost all his novels show a delightful sense of humour and parody and a good eye for national absurdities as well as national characteristics. His merry story, The Dodge Club, published in 1869, and anticipating Mark Twain's Innocents abroad, splendidly caricatures a group of American travellers (the Dodge Club of the title), exposed to stock continental situations; a scene in which a senator woos a countess by reading Isaac Watts' poetry is magnificent. De Mille's second series of boys' books, The young Dodge Club, also exploited this vein. In Lady of the ice he enjoys equally the foibles of the young officer class stationed in Quebec. The posthumous, anonymously published, and probably unfinished book, A strange manuscript found in a copper cylinder, has been much admired as a Swiftian satire. A long mystical poem called Behind the veil was edited by Archibald MacMechan* and published in 1893.

James De Mille must have been a delightful person: extremely intelligent with artistic and literary abilities of a high order. The story told of his fishing trips with another Dalhousie professor on which they conversed in Latin as the only language that would not "profane the mysteries" of fishing, is typical of the reminiscences of students and friends. His interests were varied: he wrote and delightfully illustrated a translation of Homer for his four children; he owned books printed in nearly a dozen languages, from Sanskrit to Icelandic; and he expressed a deep concern for the future of higher education in his community.

De Mille has been generally too much forgotten. During his lifetime he was one of Canada's few well-known writers, but today he is perhaps best known for a poem, "Sweet maiden of Passamaquoddy," that first appeared in a serialized story, "Minnehaha Mines," and has since been reprinted in many anthologies. Although many of his writings are of little interest except as examples of 19th-century adventure stories, a few – The Dodge Club, for example – deserve to be reprinted and read. His books for boys would still delight a young reader.

MINERVA TRACY

[James De Mille's birth date has been the subject of disagreement among various authors. The year 1833 was chosen for several reasons: 1836, the year usually used, would have made De Mille too young to matriculate from Acadia in 1849 since the college required a minimum age of 15; 1833 is quoted on De Mille's tombstone; Archibald MacMechan, who knew the De Mille family, used 1833. M.T.]

Some of James De Mille's works include: The "B.O.W.C.": a book for boys (Boston, 1869); Behind the veil, a poem (Halifax, 1893); The boys of Grand Pré School (Boston, 1871); A comedy of terrors (Boston, 1872); The Dodge Club; or, Italy in 1859 (New York, 1869); The early English church (Halifax, 1877); The elements of rhetoric (New York, 1878); The lady of the ice (New York, 1870); "Minnehaha Mines," The Dominion: True Humorist (Saint John, N.B.), 16 April 1870; An open question, a novel (New York, 1873); A strange manuscript found in a copper cylinder (New York, 1889; Toronto, 1910); "Professor De Mille's inaugural address," Dalhousie Gazette (Halifax), 15 Nov. 1873.

Dalhousie University Library (Halifax), Special Collections, James De Mille, Family correspondence and business papers, 1856–80; Journal of Elisha B. De Mille, 1850–51; Notebook of James De Mille when attending Brown University; manuscripts of several of James De Mille's works. Acadia College (Wolfville, N.S.), Catalogue of the officers and students (Halifax), 1861–62, 3–4, 9, 20; 1863–64, 11. L. J. Burpee, "Who's who in Canadian literature, James De Mille," Canadian Bookman (Toronto), VIII (1926), 203–6. R. W. Douglas, "James De Mille," Canadian Bookman (Toronto), IV (1922), 39–44. A. M. MacMechan, "De Mille, the man and the writer," Canadian Magazine (Toronto), XXVII (1906), 404–16. George Patterson, More studies in Nova Scotian history (Halifax, 1941), 120–48.

DENISON, GEORGE TAYLOR (sometimes designated as George T. Denison Jr, George T. Denison II, or George T. Denison of Rusholme, to avoid confusion with his father and eldest son), lawyer, landowner, farmer, and militia officer; b. 17 July 1816 at York (Toronto), U.C., second son of George Taylor Denison* and Esther Borden Lippincott, loyalist; m. Mary Anne Dewson of West Gwillimbury Township and had nine children, the eldest being George Taylor Denison* of Heydon Villa; d. 30 May 1873 at Toronto, Ont., and was buried with military honours in the family's private cemetery, St John's-on-the-Humber, Weston, Ont.

George Taylor Denison's grandfather, John*, was among the first inhabitants of York. He established the family's position as minor landed gentry, a status that was enhanced by his son G. T. Denison of Bellevue who, at his death in 1853, was reputedly the wealthiest private landholder in Canada West. G. T. Denison I also secured the family's place among Tories influential in Toronto affairs. A vigorous proponent of the loyalist ideal of creating a British nation in North America, he had used his wealth and position to promote the growth of the volunteer militia as a necessary adjunct of Tory social and political leadership and as Upper Canada's first line of defence against both external and internal threats. In 1822 he created the York Dragoons, one of the first cavalry troops attached to the York militia.

George Taylor Denison of Rusholme was cast in the mould established by his father and grandfather. After receiving his formal education at Upper Canada College, he articled under George Cartwright Strachan, son of John Strachan*, and was admitted to the bar of Upper Canada in 1839. He was actively engaged in legal practice only until 1856, however, having amassed extensive landholdings which required all his energies. Rusholme, his estate in west Toronto, was itself a farm where Denison raised field crops and tobacco for export, cattle, swine, and thoroughbred horses. Surrounding Rusholme were the farms of Denison's tenants whose rents were partially commuted into labour on the estate. In addition, Denison leased land from the city of Toronto for development as residential sites, and as Toronto spread westward to the edge of his estates he subdivided much of his land into fashionable "park lots." These and other commercial ventures (such as contracts for the resurfacing of Toronto's major thoroughfares) provided Denison with a fortune of almost $200,000 at middle age, and an income permitting him to accept the heavy social, political, and military responsibilities that were assumed by his family.

Denison represented Saint Patrick's ward as alderman from 1843 until 1853 when he led seven other councillors in resigning over the admitted complicity of Toronto's mayor, John G. Bowes*, in Francis Hincks*' "£10,000 job," which involved many public officials who profited privately from the Northern Railway scheme. A member of the Toronto Turf Club, Denison was among those men responsible for establishing the "Queen's Plate" racing classic. He was also a founder of the Upper Canadian (later Dominion) Rifle Association in 1861 and was an officer of the St George's Society. In every respect Denison was characteristic of the generation of vigorous young businessmen whose enthusiasm propelled Toronto into commercial and cultural rivalry with Montreal.

But it was Denison's commitment to his family's adopted function as soldiers dedicated to the survival of the loyalist ideal in North America that led to his most lasting contribution. First gazetted as an officer in the 1st Regiment of West York militia in 1834, Denison joined his father's cavalry troop in 1838. He rose to the rank of full colonel and commandant of the 5th and 10th military districts in 1860, and at his death was the senior militia officer in Ontario. He saw action at the battle of Gallows Hill in 1837 when William Lyon Mackenzie*'s rebels were routed, and was later attached to Sir Allan MacNab*'s force which pursued the insurgents in the London area and which laid seige to Navy Island in the Niagara River. During the Fenian invasions of 1866 Denison was in command of the Toronto garrison.

His main contribution, however, was his activity on behalf of an indigenous Canadian military establishment during the critical period of responsible government in Canada when the institutions of nationhood were being forged. A viable native defensive force was one of the prerequisites of self-determination in British North America after 1846. Nevertheless, successive governments in the Province of Canada, especially during the troubled years between 1854 and 1866, consistently refused to provide adequately for local defence in spite of the dangers of open Anglo-American hostilities. The militia was in a state of stagnation, offset partially by the volunteers who maintained themselves in readiness. George Denison and his brothers Richard Lippincott and Robert Brittain set an early precedent in 1839 when the disbandment of the active force threatened the demise of the Queen's Light Dragoons (an honorary designation conferred on the York Dragoons during the campaigns of 1837–39); their equipment was to be returned to imperial stores. The Denisons purchased all of the necessary equipment themselves, renamed the troop "Denison's Horse," and continued to drill the men. When the Militia Act of 1846 failed to provide funds for the maintenance of troops of volunteer cavalry, considered by the Denisons to be the crucial element in local defence strategy, George Denison of Rusholme, now commanding officer of Denison's Horse, regazetted the troop as the 1st Toronto Independent Troop of Cavalry (it became the York Light Dragoons in 1853 and was designated the Governor-General's Body Guard in 1866) and thereafter maintained it out of his private fortune. In 1853 he also organized the first field battery to be integrated with the Mounted Force of the York militia (9th Field Battery), and he reorganized several independent infantry companies to create the 2nd battalion, Queen's Own Rifles. Meanwhile, Denison and his son, George Taylor, campaigned by pamphlet, letter, and personal pressure on senior officials and officers to promote more vigorous policies in support of the militia as the mainstay of provincial and, ultimately, national defence.

It is impossible to assess with accuracy the impact of Denison's individual effort, but it is clear that, with others like him, he aided the development of a Canadian military tradition, especially the volunteering spirit, through difficult and trying times.

DAVID GAGAN

G. T. Denison II was the author of "The burning of the Caroline," Canadian Monthly and National Review (Toronto), III (1873), 289–92; Chronicle of St. John's Cemetery on the Humber (Toronto, 1868).

MTCL, Denison family papers. PAC, MG 29, F13 (George Taylor Denison III papers); RG 7, G12, 74; RG 9, I, C1, 291, 292. PAO, MS 58, Percy C. Band collection (microfilm copy). F. C. Denison, Historical record of the Governor-General's Body Guard and its standing orders (Toronto, 1876). G. T. Denison III, The national defences; or, observations on the best defensive force for Canada (Toronto, 1861); Soldiering in Canada (Toronto, 1900). Globe (Toronto), 31 May 1873. Leader (Toronto), 31 May 1873. Chadwick, Ontarian families, I, 108–10.

E. J. Chambers, The Governor-General's Body Guard: a history of the origin, development and services of the senior cavalry regiment in the militia service of the Dominion of Canada (Toronto, 1902). R. L. Denison, The Canadian pioneer Denison family of county York, England and county York, Ontario (4v., Toronto, [c.1951–c.1953]), IV. Scadding, Toronto of old (Armstrong). C. P. Stacey, Canada and the British Army, 1846–1871 (2nd ed., Toronto, 1963). G. F. G. Stanley, Canada's soldiers: the military history of an unmilitary people (Toronto, 1960). Samuel Thompson, Reminiscences of a Canadian pioneer for the last fifty years; an autobiography (Toronto, 1884). C. F. Hamilton, "Defence, 1812–1912," Canada and its provinces (Shortt and Doughty), VII, 379–468.

DEROME, FRANÇOIS-MAGLOIRE, lawyer, writer, journalist, protonotary, and clerk of the crown and of the peace; b. 1821 at Montreal, L.C., son of François Derome and Éléonore Pagé; d. 30 July 1880 at Rimouski, Que.

From 1830 to 1835 François-Magloire Derome was a brilliant student at the college of Sainte-Anne-de-la-Pocatière, and already showed his literary talents by winning French essay prizes and writing for newspapers. On 19 Oct. 1842, after studying law under Augustin-Norbert Morin*, he was called to the bar; he carried on his profession at Montreal and at the same time contributed to newspapers.

As a writer Derome first attracted attention by his poetry. Particularly during his youth, he published poems in the press; with its nationalist themes, this poetry placed him among the French Canadian pre-romantics, and, though somewhat dull, it won him the honour of appearing in the Répertoire national. . . . One of his poems, "Le Lendemain," published in Le Canadien in 1841, caused a certain stir, especially among the Anglophones, when it was translated in the Quebec Mercury. In it Derome denounced the loss of liberty:

> Non, le bonheur, ni les chants qu'il inspire,
> N'existe point où meurt la liberté
>
> No, neither happiness nor the songs that from it spring,
> Can exist where liberty is no more,

and in particular he heralded a resurgence of the Canadiens:

> Le peuple un jour aura son lendemain!
>
> The people one day will have its tomorrow!

His career as a journalist was longer and more brilliant. After writing several articles for various journals while he was studying law, Derome was editor of the Mélanges religieux in 1851 and 1852; in 1854 he replaced Ronald MacDonald* at the head of Le Canadien, and remained in this post until 1857. He accepted and continued the paper's moderate tendency, and supported the Liberal-Conservative coalition of 1854. When introducing Derome to its readers, Le Canadien portrayed him accurately as a well-informed man of rare talent, who wrote his language with an elegance and purity uncommon in Canada.

In 1857 Derome gave up active journalism to become protonotary of the crown and clerk of the peace at Rimouski. He continued to contribute to the Foyer canadien and the Revue canadienne, but he gave more of his time to the study of law, and was of great service to his colleagues at the bar on difficult questions. He left this post only in 1878.

On 30 July 1880 François-Magloire Derome died of pneumonia at his residence at Rimouski. He had been married twice: first to Théotiste Labadie, in September 1848; secondly, in 1869, to Malvina Langevin, sister of Jean-Pierre-François Laforce* Langevin, bishop of Rimouski, and of Sir Hector-Louis Langevin*. In 1876 his daughter Malvina married Louis-Napoléon Asselin, who was the father of a "dynasty" of Rimouski lawyers.

NIVE VOISINE

Le Canadien (Québec), 1854–57. Le Courrier du Canada (Québec), 9 août 1880. Le Nouvelliste de Rimouski, 1876–80. Catalogue des anciens élèves du collège de Sainte-Anne-de-la-Pocatière, 1827–1927 (Québec, 1927). Morgan, Bibliotheca Canadensis, 101–2. Tanguay, Dictionnaire, III, 355. Le répertoire national, ou recueil de littérature canadienne, James Huston, édit. (4v., Montréal, 1848–50), II, 205.

DE SMET, PIERRE-JEAN, priest, Jesuit, missionary; b. 30 Jan. 1801 at Dendermonde, diocese of Ghent, Belgium, fifth child and second son of Josse De Smet and his second wife, Marie-Jeanne Buydens; d. 23 May 1873 in St Louis, Missouri.

Pierre-Jean De Smet's father, primarily a chandler, was a merchant of considerable means. De Smet's early education was at home and in various colleges; in his 19th year he entered the Petit Séminaire at Mechlin. In August 1821 he sailed for the United States to begin his noviciate at White Marsh, a Jesuit estate near Baltimore. Eighteen months later he was transferred to Florissant, just north of St Louis, Missouri, where he was ordained on 23 Sept. 1827. As a prefect in St Regis Seminary, a school for Indian boys, 1824–30, he learned something of Indian customs and ways before he was sent to St Louis as treasurer of the college in that city (now St Louis University).

Father De Smet was for some years plagued with an irritating skin infection, and he was advised by local physicians to visit his native country for a period. Accordingly, he left the United States for Belgium in September 1833 and did not return to St Louis until November 1837. While abroad he found his true métier – as a recruiter of men, supplies, and money for the Missouri mission. Soon after his return to America he was sent as a missionary to the Potawatomi Indians at Council Bluffs (Iowa); he also visited the Yankton and Santee Sioux with a view to negotiating peace between these tribes.

De Smet returned to St Louis from Council Bluffs in February 1840, and between 30 April and 31 December of that year made his first journey to the Rocky Mountains to spy out the land, that is to ascertain the prospects for missions among the Indians in those parts, especially among the Flatheads. His plan, a chimerical one, was to establish a reduction such as the Jesuit fathers of the 17th century had established in Paraguay, a mission wherein a white man would never set foot. In 1841, with two fathers and three brothers, he reached the Bitterroot Valley where he founded the mission of Sainte-Marie (Stevensville, Mont.) 35 miles south of present-day Missoula. In the following spring he visited the missionaries at Fort Vancouver (in present-day Vancouver, Wash.), François-Norbert Blanchet* and Modeste Demers, to concert plans for the propagation of the faith in the Oregon country. Between them it was decided that, since assistance in personnel and material was necessary for the success of the mission, Father De Smet should return to the central states and seek permission to visit Europe to obtain these ends. Accordingly, before the close of that year he again crossed the Atlantic, and he returned to the Pacific northwest via Cape Horn, reaching the Columbia River on 31 July 1844 with five additional Jesuits and a group of sisters of Notre-Dame de Namur. The following 12 months were spent in founding new missions and in visiting Sainte-Marie. But, convinced that the very existence of these new missions depended upon a permanent peace with the Blackfeet, the traditional enemies of the Flatheads, he determined to visit the country of the former.

In August 1845 he began a momentous journey which was to take him into Hudson's Bay Company territory. From the north end of Pend d'Oreille Lake he cut across country to the valley of the Kootenay River, followed along it to la haute traverse, whence he crossed over to the sources of the Columbia River. Moving down this valley he entered Sinclair Pass, recrossed the Kootenay and by White Man's Pass reached the Bow River valley near the site of present-day Canmore, Alberta. Thence he travelled northward to Rocky Mountain House which he reached on 4 October. He was there until the end of the month. Here it was that he met bands of Crees, Chippewas, and Blackfeet. He then set out to visit other Blackfoot bands, wandered aimlessly for days – apparently to the east of the area he had just passed through – and was fortunate to get back to Rocky Mountain House, whence he was conducted to Fort Edmonton, where he spent the winter of 1845–46 as a guest of the HBC. This long trek in the wilderness constitutes De Smet's significant connection with Canadian history. He had, however, not succeeded in his purpose inasmuch as he had met only one small band of Blackfeet.

In the spring he set out with a party over the company trail via the upper North Saskatchewan River to Jasper House, where they spent Easter Sunday, 12 April 1846. From there by way of the Wood River they reached the Columbia after terrible sufferings. Three weeks later, on 29 May, they were at Fort Colvile (near present-day Kettle Falls, Wash.) and before the end of June arrived at Fort Vancouver. After a quick visit to the religious houses on the Willamette River, De Smet set out for the upper country with supplies for the missions there; he was back at his first foundation, Sainte-Marie on the Bitterroot, on or about 8 August. He then returned to St Louis. These long journeys of 1845–46 had been made at about the same time and over much of the same territory as the travels of the artist Paul Kane in search of Indians of the west. De Smet did some sketching himself as he journeyed.

De Smet's days as a missionary to the Rocky Mountains were over. During the years that were left to him, he made numerous trips to Europe (in all he crossed the Atlantic Ocean 19 times) and, though he was not actually serving on missions, he was deeply involved with them. Between 1851 and 1870 he also journeyed to the upper Missouri River many times in the interest of the American government. Perhaps his finest hour was in 1868 when, accompanied only by a squaw-man as interpreter and a few friendly chiefs and braves, he entered the camp of Sitting Bull* and persuaded him to accept the subsequent treaty of Fort Rice, "the most complete and wisest thus far concluded with the Indians of this country." De Smet visited the Sioux for the last time in 1870. He died three years later and was buried at Florissant where he had completed his noviciate 50 years before.

Wm. L. Davis

[The following depositories hold De Smet's papers: General Archives of the Society of Jesus in Rome. ASJ, Province belge du nord (Bruxelles), papiers De Smet; Missouri Province (St Louis University), Pius XII Library, Desmetiana section. Holland Library (Washington State University, Pullman), De Smet family papers.

Although there is no complete bibliography of Father De Smet's published works in one place, two are useful: Augustin et Alois de Backer, Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus; première partie: bibliographie, par les Pères Augustin et Aloys de Backer; seconde partie: histoire, par le Père Auguste Carayon, ed. Carlos Sommervogel (11v., Bruxelles, Paris, 1890–1932), VII, 1307–10; and Bibliographie nationale: dictionnaire des écrivains belges et catalogue de leurs publications, 1830–1880 (4v., Bruxelles, 1886–1910), I, 536–37. To date, only two biographies of De Smet have been published and neither of these is adequate: Eugène Laveille, Le P. De Smet (1801–1873) (1re éd., Liège, Belgique, et Arras, France, 1912; 2^{e} éd., Liège et Lille, France, 1913); [P.-J. De Smet], Life, letters, and travels of Father Pierre-Jean De Smet, S.J., 1801–1873 . . ., ed. H. M. Chittenden and A. T.

Richardson (4v., New York, 1905). In the latter, facing p.150, is a youthful portrait of Father De Smet; another, done after he was made a chevalier of the Order of Leopold on 18 June 1865, faces p.839. He himself prepared the most exact map of his travels in Alberta and British Columbia, and it is reproduced in his Missions de l'Orégon et voyages aux montagnes Rocheuses aux sources de la Colombie, de l'Athabasca et du Sascatshawin en 1845–1846 (Gand, [1848]). W.L.D.]

DESSANE, MARIE-HIPPOLYTE-ANTOINE, musician; b. Forcalquier (Basses-Alpes, France), 10 Dec. 1826; son of Louis Dessane and Marie Maurel; m. in 1847 Irma Trunel de la Croix-Nord by whom he had nine children, with three boys and four girls surviving infancy; d. Quebec, 8 June 1873.

Marie-Hippolyte-Antoine Dessane's father was a music teacher, and two of his brothers became musicians. They moved to Billom, Auvergne, in 1828, and the father gave Antoine his first music lessons. In 1837 the family went to Paris where Antoine studied at the Conservatoire until October 1841. He is said to have had the sympathy of Luigi Cherubini, the director, who was ordinarily a gruff person. Cherubini called him his "Benjamin" as Dessane was one of the youngest students. Dessane had contact with such fellow students as César Franck and Jacques Offenbach. He studied piano, organ, and violoncello and on two occasions was one of the few successful applicants for classes with limited enrolment. However, he did not graduate or obtain a prize from the Conservatoire. About 1842 Dessane, his father, and his eldest brother set out on a concert tour which lasted a year and a half. It began in France, continued through northern Italy to Trieste, and through Austria and southern Germany. Dessane then taught for a year at the Jesuit college in Billom and in 1845 moved to Clermont-Ferrand. There he associated with a friend of his family, the composer Georges Onslow. In an informal workshop atmosphere they tried out and discussed each other's compositions and performed music. In Clermont-Ferrand Dessane also taught piano; one of his pupils became his wife.

Living conditions for artists in France after the revolution of 1848 influenced his decision to accept a position as organist and choirmaster at the Quebec basilica, offered to him through a friend of his wife's and Abbé Pierre-Henri Bouchy of the college of Sainte-Anne-de-la-Pocatière. The Dessanes arrived in Quebec in July 1849. About 18 months later Antoine and his wife, a soprano or mezzo-soprano, took part in a Quebec concert for the first time. He soon rose to a leading role in musical circles and in the mid-1850s led the Société Harmonique. Operatic music was emphasized in its concerts. In 1855 Dessane conducted the first act of La Dame blanche by Boieldieu. In 1857 and 1858 he participated in concerts of the Septette Club featuring excerpts from several Beethoven symphonies and music by Haydn, Rossini, Schubert, Weber, and others. In 1860 Dessane briefly engaged in polemics with Ernest Gagnon* on the theory of plain-chant accompaniment, provoked by the publication of P.-M. Lagacé*'s Chants liturgiques, based on the ideas of Louis Niedermeyer, a prominent church musician in France. Niedermeyer's views did not win much acceptance, but partly as a result of the controversy Dessane resigned from the cathedral a few years later. About 1861 he formed an orchestra of some 60 players, including regimental musicians, but this proved a financial failure.

In September 1865 the Dessanes moved to New York where Antoine became organist at St Francis Xavier Church, connected with a Jesuit institution. In New York he participated as cellist in a series of string quartet recitals but also appeared as conductor and pianist. A highlight was the performance of his Mass no.4. The decline of his health influenced a decision to return to Quebec where Dessane became organist at Saint-Roch Church in November 1869. Once again he assumed a central position in musical life. He founded the choral Société Sainte-Cécile in 1869 and together with Frederick W. Mills served as conductor of the newly revived Société Harmonique.

In 1870 Dessane announced plans for a Conservatoire National de Musique, scheduled to open in November 1871. The school was to offer courses in orchestral playing, theory, and voice and present six concerts each season. It does not appear to have become a reality, but on 28 June 1871 Dessane conducted a concert demonstrating what the conservatory might accomplish. The program was mostly operatic but also included the funeral march from Beethoven's Eroica and Berlioz' Les Francs Juges overture. In May and November of that year Dessane presented Adam's one-act operetta Farfadet and in June 1872 Boisselot's opéra-comique Ne touchez pas à la reine. Already a sick man, he had to curtail his activities, making a single return to the Saint-Roch organ on 1 June 1873, a week before his death. On 7 Oct. 1872 the leading citizens of Quebec had organized a concert to pay homage to Dessane.

Dessane's motto was "Alterius non honoris." A product of the strictly disciplined training of the Paris Conservatoire, he was himself a strict teacher and a hard worker. According to Gustave Smith he raised the level of musical instruction and established the study of solfège in the Quebec convents. Nazaire Le Vasseur* has stated that in contrast to his organist predecessors, who knew little besides plain-chant and operatic music, Dessane introduced the great classical tradition. This view is open to doubt. Dessane's predecessor as organist of the basilica, Theodore Frederic Molt*, was familiar with classical music and had even paid a visit to Beethoven. On the other hand Dessane's performances themselves were heavily slanted towards opera. The few pieces of his church music available for inspection appear to be rooted entirely in the early 19th century and reflect little of tradition. All his music examined, whether sacred or secular, shows a theatrical quality, for example, strong dynamic contrasts. The harmonies are euphonious. Within a basically homophonic style the composer knew how to give each vocal part independence. His dance music, for example Le Galop de Pégase, conveys a genuine sense of fun.

Dessane's more than 50 compositions include about equal amounts of sacred and secular music. The former category includes four settings of the mass (at least two of these with orchestra), several settings each of the Regina Cœli, Dominum Salvum, Ave Maria, and Tantum Ergo as well as other choral settings to Latin words and sacred songs with French texts. The larger instrumental works include a symphony in C, a Suite for orchestra (1863) and a Fantaisie-Sonate for flute and strings (1858). The titles of his instrumental music often refer to Canada: Quadrille sur des airs canadiens (1854), La Québecoise (polka), La berceuse indienne (rêverie for violoncello) and the same is true of such songs as La Mère canadienne (chant patriotique, by Emmanuel Blain de Saint-Aubin) and three to words by Octave Crémazie: Le chant des voyageurs, Chant du vieux soldat canadien, Hommage à la France (chant canadien). Some of these songs enjoyed a measure of popularity. To the list of compositions should be added a didactic work on the theory of orchestration, written in 1869. Dessane set up his own lithographic workshop in which he prepared reproductions of some of his works.

Dessane's contribution was reinforced by his wife, who is said to have introduced the French romance to Quebec ("ou pour mieux le dire le chansonette de bon ton," G. Smith), and at least three of their children became musicians.

HELMUT KALLMANN

Catalogue of Canadian composers, ed. Helmut Kallmann (Toronto, 1952). Sœurs de Sainte-Anne, Dictionnaire biographique des musiciens canadiens (2ᵉ éd., Lachine, Qué., 1934). Helmut Kallmann, A history of music in Canada, 1534–1914 (Toronto and London, 1960), 91–92, 93, 106, 124, 126, 181, 188. Nazaire Le Vasseur, "Musique et musiciens à Québec," La Musique (Québec), I (1919), 126 – II (1920), 123. Irma Michaud, "Antonin Dessane — 1826–1873," BRH, XXXIX (1933), 73–76; "Madame Dessane, née Irma Trunel de la Croix-Nord, 1828–1899," BRH, XXXIX (1933), 76–79. Gustave Smith, "Du mouvement musical en Canada," L'Album musical (Montréal), 1882.

DEVLIN, BERNARD, lawyer and politician; b. 15 Dec. 1824 at Roscommon, in Ireland, son of Owen Devlin, a rich landowner, and of Catherine Mellany; d. 8 Feb. 1880 at Denver, Colorado.

Bernard Devlin began his medical studies under the direction of his uncle, Dr Charles Devlin, a famous practitioner of Ballina, County Mayo, and he went to Dublin to complete them. In 1844 he arrived at Quebec with his father, who was emigrating as a result of financial misfortunes. Since he was still a minor, the medical board at Quebec refused to allow him to practise medicine, and he founded a weekly paper with a liberal bias, the Freeman's Journal and Commercial Advertiser, which survived from 1844 to 1847, and which he directed until he left for Montreal, where he continued his activity as a journalist and studied law with Edward Carter. He was called to the bar of Lower Canada in October 1847. He rapidly acquired a large clientele, particularly as a criminal jurist. For some years he was also one of the lawyers of the municipal corporation of Montreal, and, from 1863 to 1870, councillor and alderman; it was partly through him that Mount Royal Park was created. In 1868 he was called to the bar of Ontario.

In 1864 the United States government engaged his services in the legal action taken at Montreal against the Confederates who had been involved in the St Albans raid. Bernard Devlin was an officer of the militia for 15 years, and in June 1866 commanded the 1st regiment of the Prince of Wales Rifles against the Fenians. He was active in Irish circles, taking part in a meeting advocating the repeal of the union of England and Ireland in 1848, and being on several occasions president of the St Patrick's Society of Montreal, the patriotic centre of a group which had become powerful.

In 1867 Bernard Devlin stood in the federal election as Liberal candidate against Thomas D'Arcy McGee* in the riding of Montreal West. He was unsuccessful. The struggle was a violent one among Irishmen. McGee and his supporters represented the moderates, who were afraid of the Fenians, whereas Devlin was accused of being secretly well disposed towards them. Devlin managed to reduce his adversary's majority to a handful of votes. He was defeated in Montreal Centre in 1874 by Michael Patrick Ryan*, but the latter's election was annulled and Devlin was elected in 1875 by acclamation. He sat in the House of Commons until the 1878 election, when he was defeated by his former opponent, Ryan. An excellent speaker, popular with crowds, he addressed the house on a number of occasions. His first speech was delivered on 12 Feb. 1875 in support of the amnesty for Louis Riel* and Ambroise-Dydime Lépine*. On 8 March 1875 he took an important part in the debate on a motion by John Costigan* in favour of the separate schools of New Brunswick, and he was specially thanked by the Catholic bishop of Saint John, John Sweeney*. One of his most famous speeches was given on 19 March 1877; in it he proposed that a study be made of the feasibility of giving better representation to minorities through a transformation of the electoral system. He died on 8 Feb. 1880 at Denver in Colorado, where he was staying because of his failing health.

In 1848 Bernard Devlin had married Anna Eliza Hickey, of Brooklyn, New York. At his death he left two daughters and one son. His funeral, which was held at Montreal, attracted thousands of people, and the burial took place on 16 Feb. 1880 at the cemetery of Côte-des-Neiges.

J.-C. BONENFANT

[Bruce and Grey], Elgin-Grey papers (Doughty), I, 163–64. Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1875, 108–11; 1877, 814–34. Canada, Sessional papers, I (1867–68), PT.8, no.41; VI (1873), PT. 6, no.60; VII (1874), PT.6, no.59; XII (1879), PT.9, no.88. True Witness and Catholic Chronicle (Montreal), 11, 18 Feb. 1880. Can. parl. comp., 1875, 207–8. Dom. ann. reg., 1880–81, 405–6. T. P. Slattery, The assassination of D'Arcy McGee (Toronto and New York, 1968).

DIAMOND, ABRAHAM, lawyer, journalist, and police magistrate; b. 7 May 1828, Fredericksburgh Township (in present-day South Fredericksburgh Township), U.C., second son of John Diamond and Elizabeth Jeffers; m. Louisa Coleman in 1860, by whom he had several children; d. 24 July 1880, Belleville, Ont.

Abraham Diamond, a Wesleyan Methodist of loyalist descent, graduated from Victoria College in Cobourg and was a governor general's prize winner at the Toronto Normal School. He taught school in Thornhill, Bloomfield, and Belleville before beginning the study of law in the office of Caleb P. Simpson in 1858. He was admitted to the bar in 1859 and began practising with W. W. Dean's firm. He was called to the bar in 1862 and was later in partnership with George D. Dickson; he eventually formed a partnership in 1868 with a brother, Wellington Jeffers, later mayor of Belleville.

From 1856 to 1868 Abraham Diamond edited Elijah Miles' Reform paper, the Belleville Hastings Chronicle. An effective speaker and writer, Diamond's reasoned pragmatic approach made him seem less forcible but also less erratic than many of his better known journalist contemporaries. An enthusiastic supporter of constitutional change in Canada, Diamond was active in the Reform Convention of 1859. Besides being a member of the credentials committee, he moved the key fifth resolution, speaking in favour of a practicable, efficient, and beneficial federal union of the two sections of the Province of Canada. In the election of 1867 Diamond made a sharp and effective break with Reform leader George BROWN by actively supporting in West Hastings two Conservative candidates, James Brown in the federal election and Ketchum Graham in the provincial.

Diamond was police magistrate of Belleville from 1868 until his sudden death, from an overdose of hydrate of chloral. He was active in community life as a town councillor, school trustee, notary public, and militia officer. He was a director of the Grand Junction Railway Company. A mason and the secretary of the Literary Association in Belleville, he was also the first president of the town's Native Canadian Association.

ELWOOD JONES

Hastings County Museum (Belleville, Ont.), files on Abraham Diamond and on the Belleville Printing and Publishing Company. PAC, MG 24, K19 (Peter Robertson papers), James Ross to Robertson, 28 Feb. 1854; RG 31, A1, 1861, no.43, f.99. Canada Gazette (Quebec), 1 March 1862, 15 May 1863. Globe (Toronto), 9–11 Nov. 1859, September 1867. Hastings Chronicle (Belleville), 1859, 1867. Intelligencer (Belleville), 26 July 1880. London Free Press, 14 Nov. 1859. Canada directory, 1857–58, 55. The Canadian legal directory: a guide to the bench and bar of the Dominion of Canada, ed. H. J. Morgan (Toronto, 1878). Directory of the county of Hastings . . . 1860–61 (Belleville, 1860), 118, 160. William Canniff, History of the settlement of Upper Canada (Ontario), with special reference to the bay Quinté (Toronto, 1869). City of Belleville history, comp. W. C. Mikel (Picton, Ont., 1943). Pioneer life on the Bay of Quinte including genealogies of old families and biographical sketches of representative citizens (Toronto, n.d.). E. H. Jones, "Ephemeral compromise: the Great Reform Convention revisited," J. of Canadian Studies (Peterborough, Ont.), III (February 1968), 21–28.

DICK, THOMAS, shipbuilder, shipowner and captain, and hotelier; b. 1809 in Scotland; d. 7 Nov. 1874 in Toronto, Ont.

Thomas Dick went to sea as a youth and earned his master's certificate. He emigrated to Upper Canada about 1833 and took employment in Niagara-on-the-Lake at the Niagara Harbour and Dock Company, which commenced operations in that year. Dick was sailing the schooner Fanny by 1835, and he commanded HMS Experiment at the battle of the Windmill, 12 Nov. 1838.

During the 1840s and 1850s Dick had command of several popular passenger steamers, some of which are said to have been built under his supervision. In 1850 he purchased the City of Toronto, the first of a number of ships he was to own and command in a day when steamboat skippers enjoyed considerable prestige in the community. He and his brother James are said to have inaugurated in 1858, with the steamer Rescue, the first mail service between Collingwood and Fort William (Thunder Bay).

Dick also built a contiguous row of four large houses in 1844 on property now the site of the Royal York Hotel in Toronto. These were occupied by Knox College and the Toronto Academy before becoming Sword's Hotel and, later, the Revere House. Famous in its time, the row was further enlarged and, in 1862, opened under Dick's management as the Queen's Hotel, which became one of Canada's leading hostelries.

Dick served as alderman for St George ward, 1871–72, and as a director of the St Lawrence Bank and the Toronto, Grey and Bruce Railway. He died in 1874 at the Queen's Hotel.

K. R. MACPHERSON

Canada, Province of, Statutes, 1853, c.148; 1857, c.168; 1858, c.122. Globe (Toronto), 7 Nov. 1874. Mail (Toronto), 7 Nov. 1874. Patriot (Toronto), 25 July 1837, 6 April 1838. Weekly Leader (Toronto), 13 Nov. 1874. Cherrier, Kirwin & McGown's Toronto directory for 1873 . . . (Toronto, 1873), 291. Fisher & Taylor's Toronto directory for the year 1874 . . . (Toronto, 1874), 374. Rowsell's city of Toronto and county of York directory for 1850–1 . . . ed. J. Armstrong (Toronto, 1850), 37.

Landmarks of Toronto (Robertson), II. Middleton, Municipality of Toronto, I, 212, 487; II, 742, 802. Scadding, Toronto of old. A. G. Young, Great Lakes' saga; the influence of one family on the development of Canadian shipping on the Great Lakes, 1816–1913 (Owen Sound, Ont., Toronto, and Montreal, 1965), 96–98.

DIXON, WILLIAM, public servant; b. in Ireland c. 1825, second son of Alexander Dixon and Esther O'Dwyer; m. Clara Rowsell by whom he had several children; d. London, Eng., 27/28 Oct. 1873.

William Dixon was brought to Canada in 1830, and in 1835 the family settled in Toronto where his father opened the British Saddlery Warehouse. William was educated at Upper Canada College in Toronto, but nothing else is known of his early career. About 1859 he went to England where he travelled widely and engaged in business.

In February 1862, on the recommendation of Philip Michael Matthew Scott Vankoughnet*, the chief commissioner of crown lands in Canada, Dixon was put in charge of exhibits arriving from Canada for the London International Exhibition. Because of his efficient discharge of his duties he was kept on as curator of the Canadian court at the exhibition later that year.

It is as Canada's chief emigration agent in England that Dixon is mainly known. In 1859 the Canadian Bureau (later Department) of Agriculture had begun sending Canadian agents to Europe on temporary missions to promote emigration, a policy which received its most enthusiastic support from Vankoughnet and Thomas D'Arcy McGee*. In January 1866 McGee, as minister of agriculture, appointed Dixon temporarily Canada's emigration agent for the United Kingdom. The agency proved so useful and Dixon so capable that McGee continued the office on a temporary basis and Dixon was stationed in Liverpool, then in Wolverhampton (1867–68). Finally, in January 1869, Dixon went to London to establish a permanent office. His duties as emigration agent included distributing publicity, supervising the work and accounts of other Canadian emigration agents throughout Europe, cooperating with provincial emigration agents, and reporting to Canada on the conditions affecting European emigration. He also undertook such general duties as providing information about Canada and assisting Canadian visitors.

Dixon was agent until his death in 1873, and during his tenure was established the basic framework for the Canadian emigration agency, which lasted until the appointment of Alexander Tilloch Galt* as high commissioner in 1880. Dixon advocated strengthening the agent's authority, particularly as regards the agents in the dominion, a reform achieved under his successor, John Edward Jenkins*, who was also given the title of agent general. Dixon was frequently recalled to Canada for consultation with the Canadian government, and had official contact with McGee, and with the deputy minister of agriculture, Joseph-Charles Taché*. He did not, however, have the influence on Canadian government policies enjoyed by the chief agent at Quebec until 1868, Alexander Carlisle Buchanan*.

From 1869 to 1873 there was a considerable increase in emigration to Canada from the British Isles and western Europe over the previous years.

Economic and political conditions in Europe and North America were chiefly responsible for the increase but Dixon deserves some credit because of his vigorous efforts in the promotion of emigration. His honesty, courtesy, and competence helped ensure the permanence of the Canadian agency in London and set a high standard for future agents.

WESLEY B. TURNER

PAC, MG 24, B19 (Brown Chamberlin papers), 7, 10; MG 29, B13 (John Lowe papers), 4, 13; RG 2, ser.1, 14, 17, 20, 54; RG 7, G1, 172; RG 17, AI, ser.1, 3, 8, 11, 12, 17–19, 21, 26, 46, 96, 97, 103, 105; ser.2, 4, 6, 8, 10, 13, 14, 16, 18; ser.4, 1, 2; ser.5, 2, 5; ser.6, 1. Canada, Province of, Sessional papers, 1866. Canada, House of Commons, Journals, 1867–74; Debates, 1875; Sessional papers, 1867–74. Ontario, Sessional Papers, III (1870–71), PT.2, no.28, "Annual report of the commissioner of agriculture and public works for the province of Ontario, on immigration, for the year 1870." Daily Colonist (Toronto), 29 June 1855. Gazette (Montreal), 30 Oct. 1873. Mail (Toronto), 30 Oct. 1873. Times (London), 30 Oct. 1873. Commemorative biog. record, county York, 26. Cyclopædia of Can. biog. (Rose, 1886), 428–29.

W. A. Carrothers, Emigration from the British Isles, with special reference to the development of the overseas dominions (London, 1929). H. I. Cowan, British emigration to British North America; the first hundred years (Toronto, 1961). D. C. Harvey, The colonization of Canada (Toronto, 1936). S. C. Johnson, A history of emigration from the United Kingdom to North America, 1763–1912 (London, 1966). Norman Macdonald, Canada: immigration and colonization, 1841–1903 (Aberdeen, Scot., and Toronto, 1966). H. G. Skilling, Canadian representation abroad from agency to embassy (Toronto, 1945). Samuel Thompson, Reminiscences of a Canadian pioneer for the last fifty years; an autobiography (Toronto, 1884). P. W. Gates, "Official encouragement to immigration by the Province of Canada," CHR, XV (1934), 24–38. Hugh Morrison, "The secret passenger warrant system of 1872," CHR, XVIII (1937), 406–13. Roland Wilson, "Migration movements in Canada, 1868–1925," CHR, XIII (1932), 157–82.

DODD, EDMUND MURRAY, lawyer, politician, and judge; b. at Sydney, Cape Breton, 9 Jan. 1797, son of Archibald Charles Dodd and Susannah Gibbons; d. at Cow Bay (Port Morien), N.S., 27 July 1876.

Edmund Murray Dodd served as a midshipman in the British navy during the War of 1812 and was a prisoner of war for a time. During the 1820s he practised law in Sydney. In 1826 he married Mary Ann Sarah Weeks, who died within a few years, and in 1830 he was married again, to Caroline Maria Ritchie, by whom he had several children.

Dodd was elected to the Legislative Assembly of Nova Scotia in 1832 as the first member for Sydney Township. He soon joined Tories James William JOHNSTON, Mather Byles ALMON, Alexander Stewart*, and Simon Bradstreet Robie* in their opposition to the attempts of Joseph HOWE and Herbert Huntington* to introduce a system of party government. Despite their political differences Dodd and Howe appear to have been personal friends. Howe sought his advice when threatened with a duel in 1838 – perhaps because Dodd had taken part in a bloodless duel in Halifax not long before.

Dodd's appointment to the Executive Council in 1838, and his elevation to the post of solicitor general six years later, cemented his alliance with the Tories. During the ill-fated coalition government of Lieutenant Governor Falkland [Lucius B. Cary*], Dodd's relations with Howe and the Reformers deteriorated steadily. In 1842 Dodd attempted to heal the breach between the Tories and Reformers in the Executive Council when he declared that the council was responsible to both the governor and the assembly. In spite of this "Confession of Faith," as the Reformers labelled it, Dodd was soon leading the Tory attack on the Reformers whom he regarded as a group of place-hunting trouble-makers. With savage humour Howe returned the attack, lampooning Dodd as an obsequious lackey of the governor and as one of the "geese" whose "cackling" had wrecked the coalition.

From 1842 to 1848 Dodd was a judge of probate as well as solicitor general. With his elevation in 1848 to puisne judge of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, he left the political arena. Despite his acknowledged ability as a lawyer, he was not a particularly successful judge. Increasing deafness combined with a tendency toward tedious and verbose explanation handicapped him on the bench. His family life was marred with tragedy: a lawyer son was shot to death in Sydney by the father of a girl whom he had raped but refused to marry. The physical infirmities of old age hampered Dodd's activity during his last five years in the Supreme Court. The Liberal legislature, resenting the pro-confederation stand taken by most of the province's judges and lawyers, refused to appoint new judges. Dodd remained on the bench until 1873 when he was finally allowed to retire.

A. A. MACKENZIE

[Joseph Howe], Speeches and letters (Chisholm), II, 160, 210, 387, 456–59, 467–68, 515–17, 522. Directory of N.S. MLAs (Fergusson). David Allison, History of Nova Scotia (3v., Halifax, 1916), II, 704. Beck, Government of N.S., 288. [Joseph Howe], Joseph Howe, voice of Nova Scotia, ed. and intro. J. M. Beck (Toronto, 1964), 87. George Patterson, Studies in Nova Scotian history (Halifax, 1940), 78; More studies in Nova Scotian history (Halifax, 1941), 65, 87. Benjamin Russell, "Reminiscences of the Nova Scotia judiciary," Dal. Rev., V (1925–26), 499, 509.

DOEL, JOHN, brewer, businessman, and politician; b. in 1790 in Wiltshire, Eng.; d. in Toronto, Ont., 9 Feb. 1871.

John Doel emigrated about 1817 to Philadelphia, where he may have become a bookseller. He had married Hannah Huntly in England three years earlier, and they were to have five children. The family arrived in York, Upper Canada, on 5 Nov. 1818. For a time Doel was employed to deliver uncalled-for letters but he soon established a brewery at the rear of his home. This, along with profitable investments in real estate, provided him with a comfortable living.

A radical Reformer in politics, Doel was a critic of Sir Peregrine Maitland*'s administration of 1818–28 and in 1828 was a supporter of Judge John Walpole Willis in the controversy surrounding him. St Andrew's ward elected him in 1834 to the Toronto City Council, where he voted for William Lyon Mackenzie* as mayor; he was re-elected in 1835. Doel refused to sign the council's complimentary address presented to Lieutenant Governor Sir John Colborne* when Colborne retired the next year, and he did sign a sarcastic protest delivered to Lieutenant Governor Francis Bond Head in 1836 after the latter had replied in an insulting manner to an address from the House of Assembly.

Doel was a close associate of Mackenzie. When the latter needed to borrow from the Bank of the People to sustain his second newspaper, the Constitution, Doel endorsed one of his notes and subsequently lent him other sums. On the eve of the rebellion, the Reformers held several important meetings at Doel's home and at his brewery. There he signed the declaration of the Toronto Reformers drawn up on 28 July 1837, and moved the resolution that Reformers refrain from the consumption of dutiable imports so as to diminish the government's revenue. He was a member of the vigilance committee named on 31 July. It is usually stated that when, in October, Mackenzie presented his plans for seizing the lieutenant governor and establishing a provisional government, Doel would not assent to them and took no part in the uprising. There is some evidence, however, that Mackenzie's supporters in Toronto used Doel's brewery as a gathering place as late as 5 December. Doel was arrested three times, and on each occasion imprisoned for several days; his home was subjected to repeated searches and soldiers were billeted with the family.

After Mackenzie's flight from the province, Doel had to make good on his note held by the Bank of the People. Mackenzie's property was attainted, but the crown permitted his creditors to make good their claims against him. In 1839 James Lesslie*, on behalf of himself and other creditors, obtained a judgement in the Court of Queen's Bench against Mackenzie. In 1845, after the crown granted Mackenzie's lands to Lesslie in trust to sell so that the proceeds could liquidate the judgement, Doel bought Mackenzie's two town lots in Dundas and his lot in Garafraxa Township (now East and West Garafraxa) for £81. When Mackenzie returned to Canada in 1850, Doel sold him the property back for £200. This was a generous settlement, being less than the total sum Doel had spent for the property, interest, and taxes, as well as the original loan and the debts to other creditors of Mackenzie which he had paid. Doel indeed accepted £50 in cash and a note on the balance. He thus helped Mackenzie meet the property qualifications for a member of the Legislative Assembly.

Doel remained a Reformer after the rebellion although he did not take an active part in politics. He did, however, sign the resolutions critical of Sir Charles Metcalfe*'s administration drawn up by the Reform Association of Canada in 1844. He continued to operate his brewery until it was burned on 11 April 1847. He had been a member of the first Methodist Episcopal church erected in York in 1818, and he was a trustee of the Toronto General Hospital. When he died in 1871 his funeral was attended in a body by the York Pioneer Society of which he had been a member.

Lillian Francis Gates

PAO, Mackenzie-Lindsey collection, especially f.2540; Misc. 1896, "Rev. John Doel's recollections of the rebellion of 1837 and '38." Globe (Toronto), 10 Feb. 1871. Charles Lindsey, The life and times of William Lyon Mackenzie; with an account of the Canadian rebellion of 1837, and the subsequent frontier disturbances, chiefly from unpublished documents (2v., Toronto, 1862), II, 52. Town of York, 1815–1834 (Firth), 118. T. E. Champion, The Methodist churches of Toronto (Toronto, 1899). Dent, Upper Canadian rebellion, I. E. C. Guillet, The lives and times of the Patriots; an account of the rebellion in Upper Canada, 1837–1838, and the Patriot agitation in the United States, 1837–1842 (Toronto, 1938), 192. Landmarks of Toronto (Robertson), I, 50–55. Scadding, Toronto of old, 309–10. Sissons, Ryerson, II, 59. Bruce West, Toronto (Toronto, 1967), 111, 113.

DOHERTY, PATRICK J., secular priest, teacher, writer; b. 2 June 1838 at Quebec, L.C., son of Patrick Doherty, gardener, and Bridget Byrns;

d. 21 May 1872 in Quebec in the parish of Saint-Roch.

The son of Catholic Irish immigrants, Patrick J. Doherty received his education first from an English tutor, Patrick Kennedy, then from the Brothers of the Christian Schools at Quebec. He entered the Petit Séminaire in 1852, and completed his classical education in 1861. In the same year he began his theological studies at the seminary, and on 11 March 1865 was ordained priest.

In 1861 Doherty had started work as a teacher and supervisor at the Petit Séminaire; he taught chiefly the English language. He had a good mastery of French and a talent for oratory, and even in his school days had delivered speeches in public and also contributed to the student journal L'Abeille. After he became a priest, he preached at the cathedral and elsewhere on various occasions, in French or in English. Witty, jovial, and voluble, he was popular with students, but his poor health forced him to leave the seminary for a parish ministry. In the autumn of 1869, before receiving a parish, Doherty undertook a six months' trip to Europe and the Holy Land. At Rome, he struck up a friendship with the Canadian Zouaves [see Hugh MURRAY], and in April 1870 returned to Canada via New York with their first detachment.

After 10 months as curate at Sainte-Catherine (Portneuf County), he was assigned by his bishop to the large parish of Saint-Roch and the chaplaincy of the Marine and Emigrant Hospital [see Joseph PAINCHAUD]. This assignment asked too much of him, despite his exuberant temperament, and his health suffered. On 16 March 1871 he left for Georgia and spent three months there resting. He returned to Saint-Roch but was unable to complete another full year of active ministry, and after a short relapse he died on 20 May 1872. Since he had celebrated his first mass at the convent of the Ursulines, where he had a sister, he was buried there, and in the following autumn a marble tablet was placed in the chapel in his memory.

"Mr. Doherty was a man of great talent and tremendous wit." He left "some remarkable writings, particularly from the point of view of style and composition; they bear the stamp of the most piquant originality."

HONORIUS PROVOST

ASQ, Journal du séminaire, XI, 90, 119, 128, 130, 139, 210, 437, 490; M 211; M 775; MSS, 26; MSS, 611; MSS, 626; MSS, 627; MSS, 651; MSS, 676; MSS, 677; Université, LXXXIV, 24. [P. J. Doherty], L'abbé Doherty; ses principaux écrits en français, précédés d'un portrait et d'une notice biographique, par un ami, [L.-H. Paquet] édit. (Québec, 1872); Principal English writings of the late Rev. P. J. Doherty, prefaced by a sketch of his life, ed. [L.-H. Paquet] (Québec, 1873).

DONNELLY, JAMES, farmer; b. 7 March 1816 in County Tipperary, Ireland; murdered 4 Feb. 1880, near Lucan, in Biddulph Township, Ont.

James Donnelly emigrated from Ireland in 1844 and settled with his family in Biddulph Township, Canada West, in 1847. By 1857 Donnelly and his wife Johannah Magee had a family of seven boys, but had been able to purchase only half of the 100 acres they had been living on; in 1856 they had been ejected from the south 50 acres. Somewhere at the bottom of what later came to be known as the "Biddulph Tragedy" lies this divided farm; it may also lie behind Donnelly's quarrel with neighbour Patrick Farrell at a logging bee on 25 June 1857, when he threw "a certain wooden handspike of the value of one penny" at Farrell and killed him. After hiding out for a year, Donnelly was eventually tried and on 5 Aug. 1858 for this "unlucky stroke" given "in liquor" was sent down to Kingston Penitentiary for seven years.

But the "Roman Line" where Donnelly lived was already notorious for darker, more premeditated crimes than his. And in contrast too, unsolved and unpunished. Arson, a secret society with a hate target, faction fighting, and assassination are in evidence, some as early as the mid-1840s. Tipperary had been like this for years; it was once written that its inhabitants "look with indifference upon the most atrocious acts of violence, and by screening the criminal, abet and encourage the crime." The Roman Line settlers had come from County Tipperary; the trouble was they still dreamed there. All this made the Roman Line a very dangerous community to live in; when Donnelly came back from prison in 1865 he was to survive its growing hatred and violence for only 15 more years.

But the rest of Donnelly's story is really that of his seven sons and their defiance, sometimes of the law, frequently, some would say, of the neighbourhood's secret power structure. In 1867 the Donnelly barn is burnt down; in 1874, since the Thompsons would not let her marry him, Will Donnelly twice attempts to abduct Maggie Thompson; in 1875 the Donnelly stage coach line is in such fierce competition with a rival line that stables on both sides eventually go up in flames; at the beginning of the next year Will's elopement with Norah Kennedy makes for himself and his family one more determined enemy – the girl's brother John who develops a mania about Will disinheriting him. To a community that was dangerous to live in, the Donnelly boys (some of them dangerous enough already) replied by being dangerous themselves, and extremely independent.

For, in the federal election of 1878, the family voted against their Conservative Catholic candidate; after this action their ability to hold their own on the Roman Line seems to weaken, partly because two sons are dead, partly because their opponents suddenly become well organized. In 1879 the Donnellys are denounced by the new parish priest and a mob riots at the homestead in daylight. January 1880 brings charges of incendiarism against the Donnelly parents, charges intended to climax a long and skillful campaign of dignity-erosion and slander. After the harassment and boycotting the Donnellys had suffered, any other family would have left the community; the Donnellys would not and so, on 4 Feb. 1880, with a well-planned attack, another mob, at night this time, effected a final solution. For this date a diarist noted "... news of a most atrocious murder ... perpetrated last night at Lucan 17 miles from London the victims were the Donnelly family. Father Mother two sons and one niece and then their house had been set afire to cover the crime four of the bodies were burnt to a cinder. The people in the city were terrified to hear of such a diabolical and lawless crime."

But "Others again go so far as to say that the Donnellys were so bad that it would be better to leave things alone; that it was a good riddance...." Prejudice such as this probably influenced a jury to acquit their alleged murderers even in the face of strong evidence. As one notes, however, the large amounts of hearsay behind the evidence of this prejudice, perhaps one should hear Will Donnelly: "My mother told him [the parish priest] that there were worse than her sons in the neighbourhood, but that the biggest crowd was against them, and that herself and her family was persecuted."

In any case one would still have to admit the magnetism of the love the Donnellys showed for each other and the typical aplomb old Donnelly displayed early one September morning in 1879 when he awoke to find his yard filled with a mob carrying clubs: "I told them I would be there if the devil would burn the whole of them, I was not in the least afraid of them."

James Reaney

Middlesex County Registry Office (London, Ont.), land records, 1800–48 (copies at PAO). PAC, RG 5, C1, 529, no.1653. PAO, Sir Aemilius Irving papers, package 25, no.12. University of Western Ontario Library, Huron County, Ont., clerk of the peace, assessment rolls for Huron District, 1843–45, 1847–48; 13–15 (Huron County, Ont., clerk of the peace, coroner's inquests, 1841–1904); 25 (John B. Cox diaries, 1878, 1880); 28 (Donnelly family papers); 49–72 (Huron County, Ont., clerk of the peace, criminal cases, 1841–1933); 73–79 (Huron County, Ont., clerk of the peace, criminal justice accounts, 1840–1928); 292–331 (Middlesex County, Ont., clerk of the peace, criminal records, 1844–1919); 368–405 (Middlesex County, Ont., Court of Chancery, cases); ULM 56–44 (Biddulph Township, Ont., assessment rolls), collectors' rolls for 1853.

The Biddulph tragedy (London, Ont., 1880). London Advertiser, 17 May 1880. Weekly Globe (Toronto), 20 Feb., 12 March 1880. City of London and county of Middlesex general directory for 1868–9 ..., ed. James Sutherland (Toronto, 1868), 8. Thomas Laffan, Tipperary's families: being the hearth money records for 1665–6–7 (Dublin, 1911). W. P. Burke, History of Clonmel (Waterford, Ire., 1907). T. P. Kelley, The black Donnellys (Winnipeg, 1954). Orlo Miller, The Donnellys must die (Toronto, 1962).

DORION, EUGÈNE-PHILIPPE, lawyer, translator, and man of letters; b. 6 Aug. 1830 at Saint-Ours, of the marriage of Dr Jacques Dorion and Catherine-Louise Lovell; d. 1 July 1872 at Ottawa and was buried at Saint-Ours.

Eugène-Philippe Dorion completed his secondary education at the seminary of Saint-Hyacinthe, which he had entered in 1841. He was called to the bar on 5 Dec. 1853, and two years later was appointed a translator to the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Canada. In 1859 he was invited to direct its office of French translators, a post he afterwards held at Ottawa in the House of Commons. His contemporaries spoke highly of his knowledge of classical languages, English, French, and some Indian languages. Dorion considerably improved the French text of laws, but he sometimes had to bow to the wishes of the politicians. Thus George-Étienne Cartier is said to have compelled him to translate the word "dominion," in the British North America Act of 1867 as "puissance" (power).

In 1862 Dorion had published at Quebec a pamphlet entitled Historique des fonds de retraite en Europe et en Canada, in which he asked that a pension fund be set up for civil servants. After describing the pension systems in France and England, the author analysed the schemes that had been submitted to the parliament of the Province of Canada in 1860 and 1861, and concluded that it was in the interest of the state to create a pension fund rather than to continue to pay old and inefficient civil servants.

In the last years of his life in Ottawa, he was president of the Société Saint-Jean-Baptiste and of the Institut Canadien-Français. He was a tall man, eloquent, and much admired for his impromptu speeches.

In 1855 he had married Marie Panet, daughter of Charles Panet, a lawyer and MLA for Portneuf. In 1876 their daughter Eugénie married Alfred Duclos* de Celles, parliamentary librarian at Ottawa.

J.-C. BONENFANT

E.-P. Dorion, Historique des fonds de retraite en Europe et en Canada (Québec, 1862). La Minerve (Montréal), 3 juill. 1872. P.-G. Roy, Les avocats de la région de Québec, 136. C.-P. Choquette, Histoire du séminaire de Saint-Hyacinthe depuis sa fondation jusqu'à nos jours (2v., Montréal, 1911–12), II, 280. [Azarie Couillard-Després], Histoire de la seigneurie de Saint-Ours (2v., Montréal, 1915–17), II, 426–31. Fauteux, Patriotes, 217–18.

DORION, JACQUES, doctor, MHA, Patriote; b.c. 1797 at Quebec, son of Pierre Dorion, butcher, and Jane Clarke; d. 29 Dec. 1877 at Saint-Ours, Richelieu County, Que.

Researchers place Jacques Dorion's birth around 1797, although only one son of Pierre, born on 18 Sept. 1796 and baptized Pierre, is entered in the registers of the parish of Notre-Dame at Quebec. Jacques Dorion began his studies at the Petit Séminaire of Quebec in 1810 and abandoned them in 1816 after completing the fourth year of his classical course, as was common at the time. According to written tradition he studied medicine in Paris under Guillaume Dupuytren and Marie-François-Xavier Bichat, but his name appears neither in the registration book nor in the list of doctors of the faculty of the Université de Paris. No doubt he was one of the 15 Canadians who studied medicine in Paris between 1816 and 1822. On his return to Canada he took up residence at Saint-Ours, where he practised his profession competently and with dedication for more than 55 years. In 1835 he founded the Société Saint-Jean-Baptiste of Saint-Ours.

As MHA for Richelieu County from 26 Oct. 1830 to 27 March 1838, he was associated with the Patriotes; he took part in the great assembly of the six counties, signed the Ninety-two Resolutions, and played an active role in the 1837 rebellion. He was arrested on 12 December for high treason by the sheriff Édouard-Louis-Antoine Juchereau Duchesnay, and imprisoned at Montreal, during which time Charles Stephen Gore* had Dorion's house ransacked. Dorion was accused of having given orders to fire on the boat Varennes between Saint-Denis and Saint-Ours; it may have been bringing supplies to Gore's troops. Thanks to the influence of his friends, notably François-Roch de Saint-Ours, sheriff of Montreal and his wife's cousin, he was set free on 3 March 1838 after paying bail of £1,000.

Jacques Dorion offers a fine example of social advancement in the 19th century. A butcher's son, he was nonetheless able to get a classical education, and even to travel to France to learn medicine. Having gone to live in the prosperous Richelieu region, he married, on 30 Jan. 1824, Catherine-Louise Lovell, niece of the seigneur Charles-Louis-Roch de Saint-Ours*, was elected a member of the assembly, and led his children to the top of the social and professional hierarchy. Edmond-Jacques was a doctor and journalist; EUGÈNE-PHILIPPE was head of the French translators in the House of Commons; Joseph-Adolphe, married to Henriette-Amélie de Saint-Ours, was a notary, coroner, justice of the peace, MHA, and legislative councillor; Charles was a lawyer at Sorel and a district judge.

CLAUDE GALARNEAU

Archives de l'université de Paris, Faculté de médecine, Catalogue des docteurs en médecine, I; Faculté de médecine, Registre des inscriptions, 1816–1822. Archives paroissiales de Notre-Dame (Québec), Registres des baptêmes, mariages et sépultures, 1795–1796, 1797–1798, 1799–1800. ASQ, Fichier des anciens du séminaire; Séminaire CIII, 56, 61; Séminaire CIV, 3, 6. Desjardins, Guide parlementaire. [Azarie Couillard-Després], Histoire de la seigneurie de Saint-Ours (2v., Montréal, 1915–17), II, 285–94. Fauteux, Patriotes, 217–18. [L.-O. David], "Les hommes de 37–38, le Dr Jacques Dorion," L'Opinion publique (Montréal), 7 févr. 1878.

DORION, VINCISLAS-PAUL-WILFRID, lawyer, journalist, politician, and judge; b. 2 Oct. 1827 at Sainte-Anne-de-la-Pérade, L.C., son of Pierre-Antoine Dorion* and Geneviève Bureau; d. 2 June 1878 at Montreal, Que.

Vincislas-Paul-Wilfrid Dorion's father was a merchant, a member of the assembly in 1829–38 for Champlain County, and a staunch supporter of Louis-Joseph PAPINEAU. His remarkable family included Antoine-Aimé*; Hercule*, destined to die as parish priest of Yamachiche; Louis-Eugène; Nérée; Jean-Baptiste-Éric*, nicknamed "l'enfant terrible"; Edmond; Célina; and Cyphise, who became Sœur Amable, superior general of the convent of La Providence at Montreal.

Because the financial situation of the family had seriously deteriorated, Wilfrid, unlike his elder brothers Antoine-Aimé and Hercule, did not have the advantage of a regular classical education at the college of Nicolet. After attending the primary school in his parish, he became a clerk at age 13 in a small country store. In 1842 he went to Montreal, where he found employment in the bookstore of Édouard-Raymond Fabre* and J.-A. Gravel. Eager for knowledge, he utilized the leisure left him in his work to satisfy his passion for reading. Soon he began to study law under the direction of Côme-Séraphin Cherrier* and his eldest brother Antoine-Aimé Dorion, who were in a law partnership. In the words of Laurent-Olivier David*, "Never was a clerk more studious and diligent."

Wilfrid qualified as a lawyer in 1850 and soon joined the Cherrier-Dorion partnership. He was launched. It was not long before he was commanding attention at the bar. His success was due to his obvious natural gifts, but also to an unremitting effort designed to develop his talents as a speaker and journalist. He was one of the founders of the Institut Canadien, and he contributed to L'Avenir. His confrères of the institute recognized this young man's worth by appointing him their librarian in August 1845, and by electing him their president for the period November 1848 to November 1849. It was on behalf of Louis-Joseph Papineau that Wilfrid Dorion first appeared on the political stage: in 1851 he went to Saint-Eustache to support the candidature of the great leader in the county of Deux-Montagnes. From then on he was the favourite speaker of the Rouge party.

Of medium height, with a large head joined by a short neck to a thick chest and with an inexhaustible supply of breath, Dorion possessed "a sonorous and indefatigable voice which dominated every noise and triumphed over every hubbub," wrote David, who characterized his oratorical talent thus: "His eloquence, essentially popular, lacked the polish and the correctness conferred by a study of the classics, but it was vigorous, practical, and solid, devoid of the ornaments and flowers of rhetoric, of philosophical considerations or literary digressions, but full of facts and clear, formidable arguments, of warm appeals to the intelligence and reason of his listeners. A little embarrassed in a gathering of men of letters, and even within the precincts of the Palais de Justice, it needed air and space, the liberty and independence of the forum."

As well as helping the Rouge party by his oratory, Wilfrid Dorion continued a participation in journalism that had begun with his collaboration in L'Avenir. When this paper temporarily ceased to appear in 1852, he helped to start Le Pays and became one of its owners in June 1858; its printer, Jacques-Alexis Plinguet*, had resigned from the Institut Canadien on 22 April of that year to found with 135 of his confrères the Institut Canadien-Français [see Francis CASSIDY], and had made over his rights in the journal to Dorion et Cie. Wilfrid Dorion was a director of Le Pays with his brother Edmond until the latter's death on 8 June 1862; he engaged the services of two eminent liberal journalists, Charles Daoust* and Henri-Émile CHEVALIER, and subsequently secured the collaboration of Louis-Antoine Dessaulles* from 1 March 1861 to the end of December 1863. He wrote to his cousin Napoléon Bureau* of Trois-Rivières, a few days after Dessaulles' acceptance: "I think you will be pleased to learn that Mr. Dessaules has undertaken the editorship."

When Dessaulles declared himself for Italian unification, the greatest concrete realization of political liberalism in the 19th century, Le Pays incurred the censure of the ultramontanes, and especially of Bishop Ignace Bourget*, who, to refute the liberal arguments, composed seven lengthy letters, which he demanded should appear in the paper. Wilfrid Dorion and his partners vigorously claimed the right of journalists and politicians to dissociate religion and politics. In a letter – one of the essential documents of French Canadian liberalism – that Dorion et Cie, owners and directors of the journal Le Pays, addressed to Bishop Bourget on 4 March 1862, they set forth their position without restraint: " 'Le Pays' represents in the Canadian press a political party formed apart from any religious controversy, and its sphere of action embraces only the material and moral concerns of the country to which we all belong. Never has it presumed to set itself up as being a tribunal for dogma; it leaves to the competent authorities the entire domain of faith and religious doctrines, it addresses itself solely to the intelligence, reason, and conscience of the people in matters concerning the conduct and administration of their temporal affairs. The liberal institutions we enjoy, the form of our government, authorize and justify this attitude, whatever may be the political direction in which this freedom of examination and discussion, one of the most precious attributes of constitutional governments, finds expression. We have always believed and we continue to believe that this position is completely compatible with the status of a Christian, a Catholic, and a good citizen." Bishop Bourget finally desisted, and called no longer for the insertion of his letters in Le Pays. On 15 August Wilfrid Dorion reported to Napoléon Bureau: "There is nothing new here. Politics are a matter of course. Our former adversaries leave us a clear field."

Following the example of his brothers Antoine-Aimé and Jean-Baptiste-Éric, Wilfrid vehemently opposed the projected confederation of the provinces of North America. Writing to Napoléon Bureau on 11 June 1866, he branded as infamous the "scourge" of "Confederation": "It appears that we must submit to it willy-nilly. Our people are so demoralized that they no longer feel anything." He attributed this lethargy in great part to the clergy, who had shown themselves favourable to the government bill and who supported the candidates of the Conservative party. Consequently he had published in Le Pays, from mid-September 1867 to mid-January 1868, a series of articles intended to prove that in the various counties of the province the clergy had made every effort to prevent the election of Liberal candidates. On 12 Oct. 1867 he thanked Napoléon Bureau for the "electoral documents" he had just received: "Some of them are excellent. We want to publish enough of them to put the clergy to shame and kill their political influence in the future." Delighted with the success of these articles, he thought of putting them together into a pamphlet. He wrote to the same correspondent on 14 November: "The clergy must bitterly regret having drawn such a broadside on themselves, the more because people are avidly reading it. The number of our subscribers is increasing daily in extraordinary fashion. The bishops in council at Toronto have decided to wage war against unholy journals. I suppose that Le Pays will come in for its share. It is up to those who are determined not to let themselves be hoodwinked not to abandon us. It will be hard for the clergy to make us lose subscribers now, for over a number of years they have taken away from us all those upon whom they exerted some influence."

Dorion never relented in his opposition to confederation, which he regarded as a political system with little prospect of surviving: "I cannot believe," he wrote on 10 Feb. 1870 to Napoléon Bureau, "that it is possible for us to remain long in the state of humiliation in which we find ourselves." The Liberal party's victory in the federal elections of 1874, despite opposition from the clergy, gave him a satisfaction which he communicated on 2 Feb. 1874 to his habitual correspondent: "The clergy has waged war on our candidates while accepting the government. Happily we have been successful on the whole. It is true that we have lost some good soldiers, but one does not go to war without its costing something."

In 1875, at the age of 48, Wilfrid Dorion was appointed judge of the Superior Court; he no doubt owed this appointment to the fact that the Liberal party was in power. According to Laurent-Olivier David, he "had all the qualities necessary for him to become one of the most distinguished judges in the country": "less scholarly and less studious" than his eldest brother Antoine-Aimé, "with an intelligence and character not so finely moulded, he was superior in the clarity and alertness of his mind, the vigour of his thought, and the power of his oratory."

Wilfrid Dorion had married a Miss Trestler, sister of his eldest brother's wife. Seven children, three boys and four girls, were born of this marriage. He died suddenly on Sunday, 2 June 1878, at Montreal.

PHILIPPE SYLVAIN

ASTR, Papiers Napoléon Bureau, Correspondance. L'Opinion publique (Montréal), 13 juin 1878. Le Pays (Montréal), 1852–71. J.-B.-É. Dorion, Institut canadien en 1852 (Montréal, 1852). Sylvain, "Libéralisme et ultramontanisme," Shield of Achilles (Morton), 111–38, 220–55.

DOUGLAS, Sir JAMES, HBC officer and governor of Vancouver Island and of the crown colony of British Columbia; b. 5 June or 15 Aug. 1803; d. at Victoria, B.C., 2 Aug. 1877.

A "Scotch West Indian," as he was known in the fur trade, James Douglas was the son of John Douglas and nephew of Lieutenant-General Sir Neill Douglas. John Douglas and his three brothers, merchants in Glasgow, held interests in sugar plantations in British Guiana. At Demerara John Douglas seems to have entered into a liaison with a "Creole," possibly a Miss Ritchie, by whom he had three children, Alexander, b. 1801 or 1802, James, b. 1803, and Cecilia Eliza, b. 1812. John Douglas' second family were the children of Jessie Hamilton whom he married in Glasgow in 1809. For one of these, Jane Hamilton Douglas, James Douglas developed an affectionate regard.

Placed at an early age in a preparatory school in Scotland, James Douglas learned "to fight [his] own way with all sorts of boys, and to get on by dint of whip and spur." He received a good education at Lanark, and probably further training from a French Huguenot tutor at Chester, England. During his early years in the fur trade he was singled out for having a sound knowledge of the French language and "possessing a clear and distinct pronunciation."

At the age of 16 both Alexander and James Douglas were apprenticed to the North West Company. After sailing on 7 May 1819 on the brig Matthews from Liverpool, bound for Quebec, James Douglas proceeded to Fort William, arriving on 6 August. That winter he applied himself to accounting, learning business methods, and studying the Indian character. It is not unlikely that he already displayed those characteristics for which he became noted: industry, punctuality, observance of the smallest detail, and a determination amidst the most pressing business to acquire knowledge of literature and history, politics and public affairs.

In the summer of 1820 he was transferred to

Île-à-la-Crosse. There he threw himself into the struggle between the North Westers and the Hudson's Bay Company men, fighting a duel with Patrick Cunningham and engaging in military manoeuvres and threatening appearances. He was one of four Nor' Westers specifically warned on 12 April 1821 to desist from parading within gunshot of the neighbouring HBC post with "Guns, Swords, Flags, Drums, Fifes, etc., etc."

On the union of the two companies in 1821, Douglas entered the employ of the HBC as a second class clerk. In 1822, though only 18 years old, he was regarded as "a very sensible young man" and a good Indian trader, who could be trusted to take charge that summer of the Island Lake post.

On 15 April 1825, Douglas left Île-à-la-Crosse by way of Lake Athabasca to take charge of Fort Vermilion in Peace River during the summer. He wintered at McLeod's Lake on the east side of the Rocky Mountains with John Tod*. The next spring he was at Fort St James, Stuart Lake, headquarters of the New Caledonia district. Douglas had now completed the first of seven crossings of the Rocky Mountains, and the experience had left an imperishable memory "of fresh scenes, of perilous travel, of fatigue, excitement and of adventures by mountain and flood."

That spring (1826) he visited the Pacific seaboard for the first time. It had been decided to supply New Caledonia from Fort Vancouver, built in 1824 on the north bank of the Columbia River, and to ship its returns round Cape Horn to England. Chief Factor William Connolly*, finding Douglas a "Fine steady active fellow good clerk & Trader, well adapted for a new country," chose him to assist in opening the overland brigade route for pack-horses from Fort Alexandria on the upper Fraser to Fort Okanagan at the junction of the Okanogan and Columbia rivers. The brigade left Stuart Lake on 5 May, and, travelling 1,000 miles, reached Fort Vancouver on 16 June. With the outfit in nine boats, Connolly started the return journey on 5 July. Douglas, who had been sent with John Work* and Archibald McDonald* to obtain horses from the Nez Percés Indians, joined him at Fort Okanagan. They arrived back at Fort St James on 23 September. In October Douglas was sent on a trading mission to the Secanni Indians, and with its success he was dispatched on 15 May 1827 to establish Fort Connolly on Bear Lake.

During the winter of 1827, at Fort St James, Douglas decided to retire from the fur trade at the end of his three-year contract. By March 1828, discouraged by the isolation of his life, the lack of companionship and of good books, the hostility of the Indians, and the danger of starvation after the salmon run failed, he was "bent on leaving the country." His employers, however, were willing to renew his contract and increase his salary from £60 to £100.

On 27 April, according to the custom of the country (confirmed in a Church of England ceremony at Fort Vancouver in 1837), Douglas took Amelia Connolly, half-Indian daughter of the chief factor, as his wife.

During the time Connolly left him in charge of Fort St James while he himself took out the 1828 returns to Fort Vancouver, a "tumult" with the Indians erupted. Following the execution of an Indian who had been involved in a murder at Fort George in 1823, Carriers invaded the fort to avenge his death and threaten Douglas' life. James Douglas could be "furiously violent when aroused," and the Indians had taken an inveterate dislike to him. In November he was again assaulted, near Fraser Lake. There was further trouble at Fort St James on New Year's Day, 1829. "Douglas's life is much exposed among these Carriers," Connolly reported to Governor George Simpson* in February 1829, "he would readily face a hundred of them, but he does not much like the idea of being assassinated."

Connolly's recommendation that Douglas be transferred to Fort Vancouver, where extensive coastal trading and farming operations were under way, was accepted by the Council of the Northern Department. On 30 Jan. 1830 Douglas left Stuart Lake to become accountant under Dr John McLoughlin*, superintendent of the vast Columbia Department.

"James Douglas is at Vancouver and is rising fast in favour," a fur-trader reported in 1831. Simpson, who had met Douglas at Île-à-la-Crosse in 1822 and at Fort St James in 1828, was convinced that Douglas "is a likely man to fill a place at our Council board in course of time." McLoughlin entrusted him in 1832 and 1833 with taking the accounts to York Factory. In 1835, as McLoughlin's chief assistant, he attended the council meeting at Red River Settlement. There, on 3 June, he was given his commission as chief trader. During McLoughlin's absence in England in 1838–39, Douglas had charge of Fort Vancouver, the coastal posts, the trapping expeditions, and the shipping. Finally, in November 1839, he was advanced to chief factor.

Douglas' promotion gave him financial security. As chief trader he had earned 1/85 of the company's net profits, about £400 annually. As chief factor he was entitled to 2/85. Totally dependent on his salary, he practised frugality. As a young clerk earning £60 a year, he had put aside half that amount; as chief trader in 1835, when he received £406 in annual dividends, he kept his expenses at a little over £30. That year he began to support his sister Cecilia, and pay his mite to charity – the Bible Society and the Christian missions in Oregon. By the spring of 1850 he had accumulated savings of nearly £5000.

As the officer responsible in McLoughlin's absence for the Columbia headquarters, Douglas sought to elevate moral standards. He was disturbed by the presence of slavery. "With the Natives, I have hitherto endeavoured to discourage the practice by the exertion of moral influence alone," he informed the company in London. "Against our own people I took a more active part, and denounced slavery as a state contrary to law; tendering to all unfortunate persons held as slaves, by British subjects, the fullest protection in the enjoyment of their natural rights." In 1849 he ransomed a slave with goods worth 14 shillings. He entrusted the moral and religious improvement "of our own little community" to the fort's Church of England chaplain, but his support was withdrawn when the Reverend Herbert Beaver* proved to be a religious fanatic. "A clergyman in this country must quit the closet & live a life of beneficent activity, devoted to the support of principles, rather than of forms; he must shun discord, avoid uncharitable feelings, temper zeal with discretion, [and] illustrate precept by example." These standards of behaviour had, in fact, become his own.

During this period, when McLoughlin was working to eliminate American competition on the northwest coast and Simpson was expanding the company's activities in the whole Pacific area, Douglas was adjudged the most reliable man for important missions. In April 1840 he was sent north to Sitka, where he was received with "the most polite attention" by the Russian authorities and where he arranged to take over Stikine under the agreement of 1839 with the Russian American Company. He also selected the site for, and commenced building, Fort Taku in Alaska. In December he went to California to investigate trade prospects, buy cattle, and negotiate with the Mexican authorities for the opening of trade with California. On his advice, the HBC built the post of Yerba Buena at San Francisco.

On these delicate missions, Douglas displayed his talent as negotiator. Like Simpson, he had learned to take the measure of a man with whom he dealt; like McLoughlin, he presented a dignified and self-confident appearance. No detail of government policy, business practice, or social value escaped his attention. The officers and men of the Russian American Company lived in what he considered idleness, and the naval officers employed by the company were "the most unqualified men to manage commercial undertakings." In Spanish California, in contrast to John Bull's territories, he found the government arbitrary and the law feebly administered.

At Sitka, treating the Russian governor with firmness, tact, and concession, Douglas negotiated the boundary between Russian and British posts. In their daily conferences he spoke "in a frank and open manner so as to dissipate all semblance of reserve and establish our intercourse on a basis of mutual confidence." For the Indian trade he obtained an equal tariff at every post. Implementing the 1839 agreement, Douglas promised to supply articles needed by the Russians in this trade, and a quantity of butter and other provisions from Fort Langley. "Honesty is found to be in all cases ultimately the best policy," he wrote, "but in our intercourse with our Russian neighbours, it will be found so from the first day to the last of our intercourse."

In California, Douglas found himself received "with a sort of reserved courtesy" by Governor Juan B. Alvarado. His first impulse was to resent such behaviour, but knowing that "second thoughts are best," he restrained himself and, again making concessions, succeeded in obtaining permission for trapping expeditions, commercial rights, and the right to purchase at a fair price sheep and cattle needed for the HBC farms on the Columbia.

In August 1841 Douglas welcomed Simpson to Fort Vancouver in the absence of McLoughlin and travelled with him to Sitka to negotiate once more with the Russians. Simpson arrived at decisions which were to anger McLoughlin: the far northern posts were to be abandoned, the trading operations of the steamboat Beaver expanded, and a new port was to be established at the southern end of Vancouver Island. Douglas made a reconnaissance of the tip of Vancouver Island in July 1842 and in March 1843 started the construction of Fort Victoria.

The building of Fort Victoria signalled the approach of the last great days of the Columbia District. Though Americans and Britons had enjoyed equal rights west of the mountains since 1827, the great company had virtually eliminated competition in the fur trade between 54°40′ and 42°. Its provisions contract with the Russians, however, had necessitated diversification of operations. Farming at Fort Vancouver and in the Cowlitz Valley had been expanded, and settlers brought in from Red River. In the 1840s American settlers began to trickle into the area, and in 1843 people, according to Douglas "of a class hostile to British interests," arrived in such numbers that a provisional government was set up in Oregon. Faced with the presence of the American immigrants led into the Willamette Valley in 1842 by Dr Elijah White and by the arrival in 1843 of 120 wagon-loads of settlers, McLoughlin made a virtue of necessity. The new settlers were well armed but they lacked money and supplies. McLoughlin provided seeds and other necessities, and also extended credit at the company's stores.

Douglas knew that McLoughlin and Simpson were now moving towards a complete break in their personal relations. He remained loyal to the doctor. He agreed with McLoughlin that the Americans might be induced to move to California, but he was alarmed at the sacrifice of the company's commercial rights, and was convinced that American pressure would increase. He viewed with grave concern the interest of the United States government in additional good ports on the Pacific coast. "An American population will never willingly submit to British domination," he wrote to Simpson, "and it would be ruinous and hopeless to enforce obedience, on a disaffected people; our Government would not attempt it, and the consequence will be the accession of a new State to the Union." If the United States gained an advantage on the coast, "Every sea port will be converted into a naval arsenal and the Pacific covered with swarms of Privateers, to the destruction of British commerce in those seas."

As American immigration swelled the white population in Oregon to 6,000 in 1845, the provisional government extended its jurisdiction north of the Columbia River. The British government showed little concern about defending its claim to the river. With foresight, Douglas put forward the idea of "possessory rights" to permit the company to occupy its posts and farms north of the river, should British territorial claims be surrendered.

In 1845 the company, recognizing that the situation in Oregon had reached a critical stage, replaced McLoughlin's rule with a board of management consisting of Dr McLoughlin, Peter Skene Ogden*, and James Douglas. On McLoughlin's retirement in 1846, Douglas was selected as the senior member, and John Work was added. McLoughlin and Douglas would now go their separate ways: McLoughlin had decided to throw in his lot with the Americans; without wavering for a moment, Douglas remained loyal to the company and to Britain.

When, in 1846, the British government relinquished its claims to the north bank of the Columbia River and accepted the 49th parallel as the boundary, Douglas reorganized the brigade routes from New Caledonia to make them converge at Fort Langley on the lower Fraser River. In 1848 he investigated the market at Honolulu for salmon and lumber. At last, in 1849, he moved the company's headquarters, shipping depot, and provisioning centre from the Columbia to Fort Victoria.

To prevent American expansion northward, the company on 13 Jan. 1849 accepted a royal grant to Vancouver Island for ten years. A colony was to be set up within five years, and Douglas expected to be chosen governor of "the real ultima thule of the British Empire." But to avert "the jealousy of some parties, and the interested motives of others," he was passed over in favour of Richard Blanshard*. Preparations for the governor, the colonists, and the farm bailiffs sent from England were incomplete when Blanshard arrived at Fort Victoria in March 1850. Workmen were deserting for the California goldfields. "The affairs of our nascent Colony on Vancouver's Island are not making much progress," Douglas admitted in November. Blanshard had already sent in his resignation. Awaiting its acceptance, the governor became attentive to complaints that too much power was vested in Douglas, that land prices were too high, and that prices at the company store were exorbitant. Settlement was so impeded by the selective immigration policy of the Colonial Office that when Blanshard set up a council on 27 Aug. 1851, he was forced to appoint Douglas and Tod, company men, and Captain James COOPER, a former HBC employee.

On 16 May 1851 Douglas had been appointed governor and vice-admiral of Vancouver Island and its dependencies. The news did not reach him until 30 October. "I am again appointed Governor pro tempore" he had complained on Blanshard's departure in September, "this is too much of a good thing. I am getting tired of Vancouver's Island." His appointment confirmed, however, he entered into his dual capacity of governor and chief factor with enthusiasm. The gold discovered on Queen Charlotte Islands was protected from the American grasp, the company was advised to purchase the Nanaimo coalfield, Indian lands near Fort Victoria were bought and reserves laid out, roads were built, and schools established.

No matter concerned Douglas more than Indian policy. Towards the Indians, his attitude was one of benevolent paternalism, though he followed the HBC rule that outrages must be speedily punished. To hunt a Cowichan murderer in 1853, he organized among the company servants the Victoria Voltigeurs – a small group of volunteer militiamen – enlisted the services of the Royal Navy, and, for the trial, empanelled a jury on board the Beaver. The same year he had the bastion built at Nanaimo.

In laying out reserves, he left the choice of the land and the size to the Indians. Surveyors were instructed to meet their wishes and "to include in each reserve the permanent Village sites, the fishing stations, and Burial grounds, cultivated land and all the favorite resorts of the Tribes, and in short to include every piece of ground to which they had acquired an equitable title through continuous occupation, tillage or other investment of their labour." At first the Indians' requests were moderate, not exceeding ten acres per family, but later in the pastoral country in the interior, where they needed range land for their cattle and horses, the reserves were much larger. Title remained vested in the crown "as a safeguard and protection to these Indian Communities who might, in their primal state of ignorance and natural improvidence, have made away with the land." As his total land policy evolved, Douglas, certain that the time would arrive "when they might aspire to a higher rank in the social scale and feel the essential wants of and claims of a better condition," permitted the Indians as individuals to acquire property by direct purchase from government officers or through pre-emption, "on precisely the same terms and considerations in all respects, as other classes of Her Majesty's subjects."

As senior company officer west of the mountains, Douglas encouraged the traders at Fort Langley to supplement fur exports with farm produce and other commodities. Knowing that the innovations on Vancouver Island would in time destroy the fur trade, he jealously guarded the company's rights in New Caledonia, on the mainland. He scrutinized the company's civil and military expenditures in the island colony, and paid into a trust fund all revenues from sales of land, timber, and mines.

In his new authority as governor, he experienced resentment. Colonists expected more than he could provide in the way of improvements, and accused him, when he appointed two old associates to the council, of desiring oligarchic control. In 1853 his old friends, Tod, Dr William Fraser Tolmie*, and Roderick Finlayson*, influenced by the views of Captain Cooper, the Reverend Robert J. Staines*, company chaplain, and Edward E. Langford*, farm bailiff, permitted representations against him to be made to a visiting English MP, C. W. Wentworth-Fitzwilliam. At Lachine, Sir George Simpson, hearing complaints about neglect of the fur trade from Tod and Ogden, questioned his loyalty to the company, and spread a report that Douglas was "always personally vain and ambitious of late years. His advancement to the prominent position he now fills, has, I understand, rendered him imperious in his bearing towards his colleagues and subordinates – assuming the Governor not only in tone but issuing orders which no one is allowed to question." "Douglas appears anxious to keep us in the dark relative to affairs in Vancouver Island," Ogden informed Simpson. "From what I can learn some of the Settlers say Cooper and Tod speak the words of truth which he does not find very palatable and very soon the Fur Trade will find an advocate to speak the truth also. The present system will never answer, too much power placed in the hands of one Man must and will cause a clashing of Interests. . . ."

Settlers like Cooper claimed that neither the company nor Douglas had carried out the obligation to settle the island. They demanded that the colony revert to the crown and a governor be chosen who would be independent of the company and who would not rely on company officers for advice and the enforcement of governmental policies.

The basic grievance, Douglas felt, was the land policy. Neither the company nor the Colonial Office had accepted his advice that free grants of 200 or 300 acres be allowed. Instead, the price of land was set at £1 an acre, the minimum holding was 20 acres, and settlers who bought 100 acres were required to bring out labourers. In addition, the company, by setting aside an HBC reserve of nearly six square miles near the fort, and by locating its farms in the other good agricultural areas, had caused the settlers to disperse to inferior farming districts.

Douglas himself was convinced that a settlement was being effected and that the colony had a future. Though other company men were, he said, "scared at the high price charged," he commenced in December 1851 to purchase land at the regular price as an investment. To 12 acres he acquired adjacent to the fort, he soon added other properties: at Esquimalt, 418 acres in 1852, 247 acres in 1855, and 240 acres in 1858. At Metchosin he bought 319 acres. His most valuable properties were at Victoria – Fairfield Farm and a large holding at James Bay adjoining the government reserve.

Memorials prepared in the colony in 1854 were brought before both houses of parliament through Fitzwilliam's efforts. To previous complaints was added the charge of nepotism – Governor Douglas, having found his magistrates, E. E. Langford, Thomas Blinkhorn, Kenneth McKenzie, and Thomas James Skinner*, ignorant and unreliable, had appointed David Cameron, who arrived from Demerara in 1853 with his wife Cecilia Eliza

Douglas Cowan, to the position of chief justice of the new Supreme Court of Justice.

Before parliament made any decision about renewing the monopolistic trading rights on the Pacific slope granted to the company for 21 years in 1838, it would have to examine its record. Its performance as colonizing agent would also be assessed. In the interval, the Colonial Office retained Douglas in his position, but curtailed his executive power. On 22 May 1856 he was ordered to establish an assembly. He complied, though, as he said, he had "a very slender knowledge of legislation, and was without legal advice or intelligent assistance of any kind."

A fur preserve boasting a single stockaded fort only a few years before, Vancouver Island was now a colony with limited representative government. Compared with neighbouring Washington Territory where land was free, the colony's population was small, but it lived in peace without Indian warfare. Through Douglas' efforts, large-scale farming, saw-milling, coal-mining, and salmon fishing had been established. He had plans for government buildings for his diminutive capital, and was endeavouring to have Esquimalt become a naval base. His accomplishments offset the criticism of his rule by Blanshard, Cooper, and Admiral Fairfax Moresby before the select committee of the British House of Commons in 1857. When the government converted Vancouver Island into a crown colony in 1859, the governor it chose was James Douglas. It was already known in London in 1857 that gold had been discovered on the mainland, still under HBC control. A colonial officer of Douglas' experience would be a good man to have standing by.

In July 1857 Douglas had reported to London that Americans were mining on the Thompson River and an officer was needed to maintain law and order. By December a rush impended. Left without instructions, he seized the initiative as he had done at the time of the Queen Charlotte Islands' gold discovery. As the nearest representative of British authority, on 28 Dec. 1857 he proclaimed the crown's control of mineral rights and required miners to take out licences. He was still without instructions when the first shipload of California miners landed at Victoria on 25 April 1858. "If the Country be thrown open to indiscriminate immigration, the interests of the empire may suffer," he warned London. Equally concerned about the company's private trading rights, he enlisted the aid of Captain James Charles Prevost* of the British Boundary Commission, and had him station his gunboat at the mouth of the Fraser to collect licences from all ships and boats entering the river.

Once before Douglas had experienced the results of American penetration. Now he saw danger of repetition of the Oregon story. American squatters were on San Juan Island, close to Victoria and the sandheads of the Fraser River, and 8,000 miners had travelled the old brigade trail up the Okanagan valley. The English hamlet of Victoria, transformed into a tent-city, was filled with American merchants, brokers and jobbers, land agents, and speculators. In the wild and empty country across the Gulf of Georgia, foreign prospectors had made the Indians restive and were threatening to take the law into their own hands. As Douglas saw it, Victoria, rather than San Francisco, must become the supply centre for the mines; the Fraser, rather than the Columbia, the artery of commerce and traffic. To protect British sovereignty, a military and a naval force were needed. The British rule of law would have to be imposed on "the lawless crowds."

Twice during the summer of 1858 he visited the diggings. Some miners, discouraged by the high waters of the spring freshet, had already abandoned the river-bars and left the country. But between Fort Langley and Fort Yale over 10,000 men were panning gold. A few had pushed along the precipitous river banks beyond Yale and the big canyon to Lytton. River transportation and roads were required. So were mining regulations and policing. In July Douglas permitted two American stern-wheelers to supplement the company boats on the navigable 100 miles to Yale. Volunteers were called for to build a road by the Harrison River route to Lillooet and a mule track from Yale to Lytton. Mining regulations were drawn up, constables were hired, and Indians were appointed as magistrates to bring forward natives who broke the law. To prevent squatting Douglas had townsites surveyed near the company posts at Langley and Hope and lots were offered for sale.

"I spoke with great plainness of speech to the white miners who were nearly all foreigners representing almost every nation in Europe," he reported to the Colonial Office on 15 June 1858 after his first visit to the goldfields. "I refused to grant them any rights of occupation to the soil and told them distinctly that Her Majesty's Government ignored their very existence in that part of the country, which was not open for the purpose of settlement, and they were permitted to remain there merely on sufferance, that no abuses would be tolerated, and that the Laws would protect the rights of the Indians no less than those of the white men."

After his authority had been confirmed in August he vested title to land in the crown. It was opened to settlement slowly, and, in the hope of attracting British immigrants, it was priced low. Only British subjects could purchase land, but all those who applied for naturalization could obtain it.

Douglas' initiative had at first aroused enthusiasm in London. Then a new colonial secretary, Sir Edward Bulwer-Lytton, a severe critic of the HBC monopoly, read into his preliminary measures an intention to keep the whole trade of the country for "the HBCo's people as far as possible." He reprimanded Douglas, then took steps to terminate the company's rights and to open the Pacific slope to settlement. On 2 Aug. 1858 parliament, on his advice, converted the territory of New Caledonia into the crown colony of British Columbia.

Douglas was offered the governorship of the new colony on condition that he sever his connection with his old company. In Simpson's opinion, he was unquestionably the best man for the office, and his salary would help "to carry him through his difficulties, aided by personal vanity of which he has a fair store combined however with a good deal of determination and tact." The two interests Douglas represented had become antagonistic, and although there would be general regret at his quitting his old concern, his "ostentatious style of living" as governor and his liberality in entertaining all comers had been saddled on the fur trade "whose interests benefitted very little by it."

The salary offered Douglas as dual governor was only £1,800, but he obtained solace from a Companionship of the Order of the Bath, conferred for his administration of the company-sponsored colony of Vancouver Island. At Fort Langley on 19 Nov. 1858, divested of his commission and supposedly of his interests in the HBC, James Douglas, CB, took the oath of office as governor of British Columbia.

By the spring of 1859 Douglas had not succeeded in persuading the company to purchase his retiring rights. The company was pressing its own claims for compensation for expenditures in the colony of Vancouver Island, and its headquarters was disturbed by reports from Alexander G. Dallas* in Victoria who was investigating Douglas' accounts. Instances had been found when "fur trade" funds had been used for colonial purposes. In addition, £17,000 had been taken from the fur trade account in 1858 "under the pressure of the moment" to buy provisions for the miners flocking into British Columbia. Simpson confided in Dallas that "the conviction has been most unwillingly forced upon me, that Mr. Douglas has been making an unjustifiable use of the authority with which he is invested for the promotion of his private interests and the benefit of his Family and retainers. . . . I presume there will be difficulty in putting a detainer on his funds in the Company's hands; but his retired interest is under their control, and I think it might very fairly be held in suspense until the Colonial account is settled." The company shared this view. No action was taken when in May 1859 Douglas tendered his rights for the sum of £3,500.

His legitimate expectations destroyed, and his salary as governor inadequate, Douglas threatened to resign. "As a private individual I can live in a style befitting the fortune I possess," he informed the Colonial Office, "but as Governor for the Crown there is no choice, one must live in a manner becoming the representative of the Crown." Though the government regarded him as the indispensable man, all it would give was a vague promise that his salary would be augmented as proceeds from land sales in British Columbia increased.

Until the crown decided to establish a legislature in British Columbia, absolute power had been given to the governor to administer justice and to establish laws and ordinances. It would not be fair to the grand principle of free institutions, Lytton had declared in July 1858, "to risk at once the experiment of self-government among settlers so wild, so miscellaneous, and perhaps so transitory, and in a form of society so crude." The plan satisfied Douglas, who believed that "the best form of government, if attainable, is that of a wise and good despotism," and that "representative Governments cannot be carried on without recourse directly or indirectly to bribery and corrupting influences." He took the opportunity to determine policy and announce it in the form of proclamations.

Because the gold colony was richly endowed by nature, the British government, other than bearing military costs, intended only to provide a tiny civil list for a judge and a few officials. It did instruct Rear-Admiral Robert Lambert Baynes of the Pacific fleet to assist Douglas, but his flagship, the 84-gun Ganges, did not reach Esquimalt until October 1858, after most of the miners had left to winter in California. In February 1859 a frigate and a corvette with 164 supernumerary marines arrived from the China waters. A detachment of 165 Royal Engineers was also sent from England; the main body arrived in April 1859.

During the critical period of the first mining season there had thus been neither civil power nor military aid. Unarmed with political authority, Douglas was accompanied only by a bodyguard of 20 sailors and 16 Royal Engineers seconded from the boundary commission when in August 1858 he had made his sortie to the mining camps to suppress disorder and announce his intention to consolidate the goldfields as an integral part of the British empire. He wrote to Herman Merivale on 29 Oct. 1858 that he had never before seen "a crowd of more ruffianly looking men," but at his command they gave three cheers, "with a bad grace," for the queen.

Nothing like the 1858 influx of 25,000 prospectors occurred in 1859. Some of the miners preferred the freer atmosphere of the American mining-fields; others followed rumours of fresh finds on American soil. The Royal Engineers, sent to plan a communications system, survey townsites, and provide military protection, could concentrate on these tasks. Colonel Richard Clement Moody*, officer commanding the troops and commissioner of lands and works, selected, with defence against the Americans in mind, a site near the mouth of the Fraser River for a colonial capital, later called New Westminster. The sappers and the marines were put to work to cut down the giant timbers on the steep hillside.

The governor, too, was concerned about security. When an American military force landed on San Juan Island on 27 July, it took both the Legislative Assembly of Vancouver Island and Rear-Admiral Baynes to restrain him from using force to expel it. Until its sovereignty could be decided, the island was put under joint military occupation. When he heard of the Trent incident in 1861, Douglas longed to use the naval force in the north Pacific, the Royal Engineers, and the Royal Marines stationed on San Juan Island to seize San Juan, take possession of Puget Sound, and push overland to the Columbia: "With Puget Sound, and the line of the Columbia in our hands, we should hold the only navigable outlets of the country – command its trade, and soon compel it to submit to Her Majesty's rule." To his disappointment a damper was put on this proposal by the British government.

In 1860 the provisioning of the inland mines became an acute problem. To encourage importers, Victoria was declared a free port, and, to stimulate farming in the interior, a pre-emption system was introduced. When rich strikes were made at distant Antler Creek in 1860, it became evident another rush was impending. Wagon-trains would have to replace pack-trains, and the cost of transporting goods through the rugged mountain passes would have to be reduced. For improving roads Douglas employed civilians as well as sappers, and when the British government refused financial assistance, he raised funds by tonnage duties, road tolls, mining licences, and, in 1861, a bank loan of £50,000.

In 1862 the Cariboo goldrush attracted 5,000 miners. On this occasion, Governor Douglas produced his plan for a major wagon road, 18 feet wide, to run 400 miles from Yale, beyond the river's gorge northward to Quesnel, and eastward to Williams Creek. The Great North Road, to be built by Royal Engineers and civilian contractors, was to end the threat of American economic domination by making the Fraser River, despite its obstacles, the commercial and arterial highway of British Columbia. He hoped that the road could be extended to link British Columbia with Canada. "Who can foresee what the next ten years may bring forth," he wrote in 1863, "an overland Telegraph, surely, and a Railroad on British Territory, probably, the whole way from the Gulf of Georgia to the Atlantic."

Since the discovery of the first heavy gold nuggets at Williams Creek in Cariboo in 1861, the population had changed. On his visits in 1862 to Barkerville and the other towns along the creek, it seemed to Chief Justice Matthew Baillie Begbie*, the stern and haughty judge sent from England, "as though every good family of the east and of Great Britain had sent the best son they possessed for the development of the gold mines of Cariboo." In the overland party from Canada in 1862 were farmers who intended to reside permanently in the colony. At last there was that infusion of "the British element" so much desired by Douglas.

New Westminster, the gold colony's capital city, already had its full complement of Canadians. Many of them were merchants and speculators who became malcontents as their hopes for prosperity dwindled. Business languished in New Westminster with Victoria emerging as the commercial and banking centre, and with Yale becoming the river-landing for transshipment to the inland mines. A bitter jealousy of the island colony developed, and Douglas came under criticism for continuing to reside, along with his officials, at Victoria. His unpopularity grew as he became increasingly dependent on assistants sent from England and as John Robson*, the fiery editor of the British Columbian, disseminated evidence of his authoritarianism.

To the first request for popular government at New Westminster, Douglas had responded by granting on 16 July 1860 incorporation as a city and the election of a municipal council. In forwarding the demand for an assembly made in 1860 he had expressed the opinion that the British element in the gold colony was still too small to justify this concession. Four later memorials requesting popular government were forwarded to the Colonial Office; three of these remained unacknowledged by the Duke of Newcastle [Henry Pelham Clinton].

The calling of a convention at Hope in September 1861 to demand responsible government aroused the governor's ire: "The term is associated with revolution and holds out a menace – the subject has an undoubted right to petition his sovereign, but the term 'convention' seems something more, it means coercion." The principle of representative government he recognized: in 1862, anticipating the reorganization of the colony's government in 1863, for which provision had been made in the founding act, Douglas recommended a small chamber, one-third nominated by the crown and two-thirds elected.

Douglas was aware that "the New Westminster radicals" had enlisted the support of a Canadian politician, Malcolm CAMERON, and that Cameron had been applying pressure on Newcastle since 1861 for his removal. After a visit to New Westminster in 1862, Cameron called on Douglas to show him a petition he intended to present to the queen. Douglas dismissed him, curtly informing him that he himself was the proper guardian of the people's rights and liberties, and that if he could not grant relief, he would lay the grievances "in a proper manner" before her majesty's government. In reporting the incident to the Colonial Office, he insisted that the community in British Columbia was prosperous and content. "A petty Californian-Canadian clique about New Westminster, the authors of all the clamour about 'Responsible Government,' form the only exception. That party is composed of men utterly ignorant of the wants and conditions of the Country; who never have done anything, and never will do anything for it, but complain; and who are, not unjustly, the objects of its derision."

In London, in February 1863, Cameron presented to the authorities the memorial signed by "certain inhabitants of British Columbia." "I cannot help thinking," Newcastle told him, "that they are a little unreasonable in complaining of their appeals for a complete change of their present form of Government. . . . They call that form 'Anti-British' and 'anomalous' but they forget that their Colony is hardly five years old, – that the form was established by Act of Parliament in 1858, and that this year, – 1863 – was fixed in that act as the period at which the question of any change of government should again come under consideration."

One month later the Duke sent a dispatch to Douglas: "As you have now ruled over Vancouver Island for twelve years – twice the usual period of Governorship – and as I do not think it would be desirable to replace you by a new Governor there and leave you to take up your abode in New Westminster as Governor of British Columbia alone, I intend to relieve you of both Governments. . . . It may be assumed however that I shall not carry out this decision in any way that can be disagreeable to you or shall give a triumph to those who have desired your recall. . . . I have now recommended to the Queen your Successor in the two Governments, and I have accompanied the recommendation with one that you shall be raised to the second rank in the Order of the Bath."

In order to finance his great arterial highway, Douglas had not waited for formal authorization before borrowing £100,000. On this score he had been criticized in London. Newcastle had learned that somehow Douglas had increased his salary from £1,800 to £3,800. Old and new enemies made in the course of a long career had also turned up at Whitehall; one was Langford who long ago had attacked Douglas for creating on Vancouver Island a "Family-Company Compact"; another was Captain William Driscoll Gosset, an officer in the Royal Engineers who had proved incompetent as treasurer of British Columbia. It was known that Douglas' relations with Colonel Moody, who with the Royal Engineers was recalled in 1863 from the colony, had not been cordial, and some credence was put in the assertions of the newspaper editors, Amor De Cosmos* in Victoria and John Robson in New Westminster, that he was despotic.

As he prepared to step down from office in the spring of 1864, Sir James Douglas had the satisfaction of knowing that he had ended the alien threat and protected the British foothold on the Pacific seaboard. His road was built, Cariboo was at the height of gold production, towns were laid out in the interior, and law and order prevailed in the mining fields. In 1864 the colonial revenues rose to £110,000; Victoria was a city of 6,000 persons, and Barkerville almost as large. Douglas' last task for British Columbia, now a stable community, was to set up a legislative council. "Sir James Douglas's career as governor has been a remarkable one," an official at the Colonial Office acknowledged. "He now quits his two Govts. leaving them in a state of prosperity, with every prospect of greater advancement."

To Douglas, it seemed that, whatever the character of his administration, the queen's grace in knighting him and the honours tendered him by the colonists on his retirement left only one opinion: his driving purpose had been "to promote the public good and to advance the material interests of the colonies." He continued to urge on Newcastle the building of a practicable road to connect British Columbia and Canada: if this step were taken, "trade would find an outlet, population and settlement would follow."

During his long service in the fur trade Douglas had never taken a furlough nor been absent one day from duty. As colonial governor, he had dedicated himself to responsibility and toil. His manner was singular and pompous, but he could never consent "to represent her Majesty in a shabby way." "All people speak with great admiration of the Governor's intellect – and a remarkable man he must be to be thus fit to govern a Colony," Sophia Cracroft, the travelling companion of Lady Franklin [Jane GRIFFIN], noted in 1861. "He has read enormously we are told & is in fact a self educated man, to a point very seldom attained. His manner is singular, and you see in it the traces of long residence in an unsettled country, where the white men are rare & the Indians many. There is a gravity, & a something besides, which some might & do mistake for pomposity, but which is the result of long service in the H.B. Co's service, under the above circumstances. . . ." The governor's wife they found to be a woman with a gentle, simple, and kindly manner. "Have I explained that her mother was an Indian woman & that she keeps very much (far too much) in the background, indeed it is only lately that she has been persuaded to see visitors, partly because she speaks English with some difficulty, the usual language being either the Indian, or Canadian French wh. is a corrupt dialect."

The British government allowed Sir James the usual perquisite of office and paid his passage "home." On 14 May 1864, after welcoming his successors, he set out on a voyage to London. His sickly son James had already been sent home to be educated, and living in Scotland was his daughter Jane, wife of A. G. Dallas. He would also make the acquaintance of his half-sisters and others of his father's relatives.

Sir James was in Paris in 1865, returning from a grand tour of Europe, when he received news that his daughter Cecilia, wife of Dr John Sebastian Helmcken*, had died. It was the first break in a family circle which had included six children (seven of the 13 children born to Douglas' wife at a fur trade post had not lived to maturity).

A devoted family man, and one with strong puritanical instincts, Douglas treated his wife with the same respect and affection he had seen Dr McLoughlin display for his half-Indian wife. "I have no objection to your telling the old stories about 'Hyass'," he gently reprimanded his youngest child, Martha, "but pray do not tell the world they are Mammas." Perhaps because of their background, he had watched the development of his children with the greatest solicitude. His son James, too delicate to live long, died in 1883. Of Sir James' three remaining daughters, Agnes was married to Arthur T. BUSHBY, an officer in the colonial service of B.C., and Alice to Charles Good, another of the young men who had arrived during the first gold-rush seeking employment. Alice's marriage, an unhappy one, ended in separation in 1869 and there was a divorce after her father's death. Martha would eventually marry Dennis Harris.

Except for his grand tour of 1864–65 and another brief trip abroad, Douglas spent his retirement years in Victoria. Martha was the consolation of his last days. He and Lady Douglas could hardly bear to part with her when she was sent to England for schooling in 1872. Martha was to be his "learned daughter – the veritable Blue-stocking of the family," and she responded dutifully to his admonitions: "You have plenty to say, and you must learn to say it well, for that is a necessary accomplishment to young Ladies as to others – therefore study to express your meaning with ease, without prolixity and without Tautology." "You must be very careful about your personal expenses, studying a proper economy in every way. Sheer extravagance is a sure road to poverty and ruin."

In his retirement Sir James seldom commented on political affairs to anyone but Martha, or to his sons-in-law, Dr J. S. Helmcken, one of the three delegates who negotiated British Columbia's entry into confederation, and A. G. Dallas, by this time well known in London financial circles. Bemoaning the union of the seaboard colonies in 1866 and the loss of Victoria's free port, Douglas inscribed in Martha's diary: "The Ships of war fired a salute on the occasion – A funeral procession with minute guns would have been more appropriate to the sad melancholy event." In 1872 he lamented to her: "The Island of San Juan is gone at last. I cannot trust myself to speak about it and will be silent." "We are now in hourly expectation of hearing how Sir John [Macdonald*'s] Ministry are faring at Ottawa," he wrote at the time of the Pacific Scandal, "if the want of confidence is carried against him by the Grits, Sir John will have to resign and there will be no end of trouble and delay about the construction of the Railway. The Grits as the opposition faction is termed are a low set and nothing good is to be expected from them."

His little family, with his respectable connections in England and Scotland, had grown dearer to him with the passing of the years. His visits abroad seemed to increase his determination to leave his children "a competence" so that they could take their place in society. "Friend Douglas . . . ," old John Tod wrote in 1870, "as he gets older, seems more and more engrossed with the affairs of this world notwithstanding his ample means, he is as eager and grasping after money as ever, and, I am told, at times seized with gloomy apprehensions of dying a beggar at last. . . ." Douglas practised economy to the end of his days: in 1869, when his income from land and investments was $27,300, his expenses were only $5,000. In addition to establishing a trust fund and annuity for Lady Douglas, his will amply provided for his son James, as well as for legacies for his small family circle amounting to nearly $70,000. His valuable properties remained almost intact during Lady Douglas' lifetime. (Her death occurred on 8 Jan. 1890.)

As the result of a heart attack Sir James Douglas died at Victoria on 2 Aug. 1877. His funeral was public; in Victoria and throughout B.C. there was a great outpouring of grief, affection, and respect for the man who had become known as "The Father of British Columbia."

A man of iron nerve and physical prowess, great force of character, keen intelligence, and unusual resourcefulness, Douglas had had a notable career in the fur trade. As colonial governor his career was even more distinguished. Against overwhelming odds, with indifferent backing from the British government, the aid of a few Royal Navy ships, and a small force of Royal Engineers, he was able to establish British rule on the Pacific Coast and lay the foundation for Canada's extension to the Pacific seaboard. Single-handed in the midst of a gold-rush he had forged policies for land, mining, and water rights which were just and endurable. He had kept the respect of the individualistic, competitive, and wasteful miners. His great Cariboo road had served their purpose, but it had served a still greater purpose: it permitted trade and commerce to be kept in British hands and British law and justice to be more easily upheld. As the gold of Cariboo flowed into British coffers, the links with the mother country were strengthened; as travel on the Cariboo road increased, the possibility seemed less remote that transcontinental travel routes could be practicable.

A practical man, but yet a visionary, Sir James Douglas was also humanitarian. He treated individuals, including Negro slaves and Indians, with a respect that few of his contemporaries showed. The majesty of his bearing aroused criticism, but that same bearing made him the symbol, in the motley crowd attracted to the two British seaboard colonies, of the fact that the British presence was firmly established on the northwest coast.

Margaret A. Ormsby

Archives of the ecclesiastical province of British Columbia (Vancouver, B.C.), George Hills diary, 27 June 1838–17 Nov. 1895. Gregg M. Sinclair Library, University of Hawaii, Hawaiian coll., Sophia Cracroft journal, 15 Feb.–3 April 1861. HBC Arch. A.7/2 (London locked private letter book, 1823–70); A.8/8; B.89/a, B.89/b, B.223/b, B.226/a, B.226/b, B.226/c; D.5/30, D.5/32, D.5/36 (George Simpson, Correspondence inward, 1822–60). PABC, Fort Vancouver, Correspondence outward to HBC, 1832–49 (letter book copies); Fort Vancouver, Correspondence outward, 1840–41 (letter book copies); Fort Victoria, Correspondence outward to HBC, 1850–55, 1855–59 (letter book copies); Vancouver Island, Governors Richard Blanshard and James Douglas, Correspondence outward, 22 June 1850–5 March 1859 (letter book copies); Vancouver Island, Governor James Douglas, Correspondence outward, 27 May 1859–9 Jan. 1864 (letter book copies); British Columbia, Governor James Douglas, Correspondence outward, 27 May 1859–9 Jan. 1864 (letter book copies); Governor James Douglas, Dispatches to London, 1851–55, 1855–59 (letter book copies); Governor James Douglas, Correspondence inward, 1830–68; James Douglas, Account and correspondence book, 1825–72; James Douglas, Correspondence outward, private, 22 May 1867–11 Oct. 1870 (letter book copies); James Douglas, Diary of a trip to the northwest coast, 22 April–2 Oct. 1840; James Douglas, Diary of a trip to California, 2 Dec. 1840–23 Jan. 1841; James Douglas, Diary of a trip to Sitka, 6 Oct.–21 Oct. 1841; James Douglas, Diary of a trip to Europe, 14 May 1864–16 May 1865; James Douglas, Letters to Martha Douglas, 30 Oct. 1871–27 May 1874; David Cameron papers; Jane Dallas letters; J. S. Helmcken papers; J. S. Helmcken, "Reminiscences" (5v. unpublished typescript, 1892); Archibald Macdonald, Correspondence outward, *c.*1830–1849; John McLeod, Correspondence inward, 1826–37; Donald Ross papers. PRO, CO 60, CO 305. University of Nottingham Library, Newcastle MSS, Letter books, 1859–64 (microfilm in PAC).

G.B., Parl., Command paper, 1859, XVII, [2476], pp.15–108, Papers relative to the affairs of British Columbia, May to November 1858; Parl., Command paper, 1859 (Session II), XXII, [2578], pp.297–408, Further papers relative to the affairs of British Columbia, October 1858 to May 1859; Parl., Command paper, 1860, XLIV, [2724], pp.279–396, Further papers relative to the affairs of British Columbia, April 1859 to April 1860; Parl., Command paper, 1862, XXXVI, [2952], pp.469–562, Further papers relative to the affairs of British Columbia, February 1860 to November 1861; Parl., House of Commons paper, 1849, XXXV, 103, pp.629–50, Papers relating to Vancouver Island and the grant of it to the HBC . . .; Parl., House of Commons paper, 1857 (Session II), XV, 224, 260 (whole volume), Report from the select committee on the Hudson's Bay Company; together with the proceedings of the committee, minutes of evidence, appendix and index; Parl., House of Commons paper, 1863, XXXVIII, 507, pp.487–540, Miscellaneous papers relating to Vancouver Island, 1848–1863. . . . British Columbian (New Westminster, B.C.), 1861–77. Colonist (Victoria), 1858–77. Victoria Gazette, 1859–60. HBRS, IV (Rich); VI (Rich); VII (Rich); XXII (Rich). James Douglas in California, 1841: being the journal of a voyage from the Columbia to California, ed. Dorothy Blakey Smith (Vancouver, B.C., 1965).

H. H. Bancroft, History of British Columbia, 1792–1887 (San Francisco, 1890). Coats and Gosnell, Douglas. F. W. Howay, The work of the Royal Engineers in British Columbia, 1858 to 1863 . . . (Victoria, 1910). F. W. Howay and E. O. S. Scholefield, British Columbia from the earliest times to the present (4v., Vancouver, B.C., 1914). J. S. Galbraith, The Hudson's Bay Company as an imperial factor, 1821–1869 (Toronto, 1957). Morton, History of the Canadian west. Ormsby, British Columbia. W. N. Sage, Sir James Douglas and British Columbia (Toronto, 1930). W. E. Ireland, "James Douglas and the Russian American Company, 1840," BCHQ, V (1941), 53–66. "Journal of Arthur Thomas Bushby" (Blakey Smith). W. K. Lamb, "The founding of Fort Victoria," BCHQ, VII (1943), 71–92; "The governorship of Richard Blanshard," BCHQ, XIV (1950), 1–41; "Sir James Douglas goes abroad," BCHQ, III (1939), 283–92; "Some notes on the Douglas family," BCHQ, XVII (1953), 41–51. W. N. Sage, "The gold colony of British Columbia," CHR, II (1921), 340–59; "Sir James Douglas, K.C.B.: the father of British Columbia," BCHQ, XI (1947), 211–27.

DOUTRE, GONZALVE, lawyer, professor, author of literary, historical, and legal works, and president of the Institut Canadien; b. in Montreal, L.C., 12 July 1842, son of François Doutre and Élisabeth Dandurand; m. Laura Brunelle, by whom he had at least one son; d. 28 Feb. 1880 in Montreal.

The first years of Gonzalve Doutre's life remain obscure. The youngest son of an illustrious family, he was also the brother-in-law of two distinguished men, Charles Daoust* and Médéric LANCTOT. In 1861 he obtained his baccalaureate in law at McGill University. As he had not yet attained his majority, he had to wait two years before being called to the bar (August 1863). Meanwhile he spent his leisure time frequenting the literary and legal organizations of Montreal. In April 1862 he gave a lecture at the Institut des Lois, an association where law students got together, on "the utility of a course in civil procedure" for law students; the following month his confrères elected him their president.

Gonzalve Doutre still had no more than his baccalaureate when he started a movement that resulted in an important reform of the Canadian bar. In February 1863, at the young candidate's suggestion, the Institut des Lois discussed a petition to be presented to the council of the bar for the purpose of "changing the present type of examinations for those aspiring to the study and practice of the profession of lawyer." Three years later (1 May 1866), Gonzalve Doutre laid a series of concrete proposals before a general meeting of lawyers; the latter entrusted the study of them to a committee made up of George Washington Stephens, Robert Mackay*, Charles-André LEBLANC, Thomas Weston Ritchie, Pierre-Richard Lafrenaye, and Gonzalve Doutre. "It is not the first time that I take the trouble to ask for reforms within the bar," he wrote in La Minerve of 29 May 1866. "In a period when I had everything to gain from the present system I wanted to try to have it changed, at the risk of suffering myself as a result. I hope therefore that no one will reproach me with waiting until I cleared the obstacles in order to pull up the ladder behind me." On 9 June Doutre submitted the committee's report to the assembled lawyers "in the form of a precise and detailed bill"; this bill became law on 15 Aug. 1866.

In the course of a meeting on 5 Oct. 1866, the lawyers' association elected Gonzalve Doutre secretary-treasurer of the general council, whose president was then William Locker Pickmore FELTON. At the end of his mandate, on 30 May 1868, the council presented Doutre with a silver inkwell as a tangible sign of its gratitude. It was a significant gesture, for already this young man of 25 had a remarkable achievement to his credit: he had initiated a reorganization of the Quebec bar, shepherded through parliament the 1866 law, watched over the application of this law, prepared rules governing the profession, and begun the publication of his principal legal works: all this despite failing health.

On 6 June 1867, wanting "to put an end to the permanent violation of the law that was occurring at the Jesuit College," where diplomas were conferred sometimes without due regard for the requirements of the law and for the proper duration of the course, the Institut Canadien set up a law faculty, affiliated to Victoria University at Cobourg; Gonzalve Doutre taught civil procedure for it. The new faculty conferred its first diploma on Jean-Baptiste Doutre, who subsequently entered the law office of his two brothers.

McGill University engaged Gonzalve Doutre in September 1871 as professor "of civil procedure, legal medicine, and forensic logic." On 28 March 1873 he received his doctorate in law from the same university, and on 3 Jan. 1879 the Quebec Liberal government made him a queen's counsel; finally, on 1 May 1879 he was elected a member of the council of the Montreal bar.

Gonzalve Doutre already belonged to the Institut Canadien when on 30 April 1858 Bishop Ignace Bourget*, the promoter of religious restoration and revival, issued his comminatory decree censuring the institute and instructing confessors to refuse the sacraments to its members [see Charles-Joseph Laberge]. At its elections of 5 May 1859 the institute entrusted him with the office of secretary-archivist, a duty he was to take on several times until he became treasurer in 1863; in 1865 he became corresponding secretary, and finally president in 1871 and 1872.

Within the institute itself, Gonzalve Doutre's great activity was evident in his regular attendance at meetings and his numerous lectures. As a member of the governing body, he placed at the disposal of the association his eagerness and his intelligent zeal. It was in large measure thanks to the approaches he made to Canadian and foreign authorities that the museum of the institute, founded in 1864, was enriched with objects of art of real value; he himself, on 17 March 1866, gave to the museum a precious collection of coins and medals.

Gonzalve Doutre had a likeable personality, he was sincere and deeply religious, and during the disturbed years from 1858 to 1866 he had the benefit of the clergy's benevolence and indulgence. Bearing a note delivered to him on 3 April 1865 by the administrator of the diocese, Alexis-Frédéric Truteau, he made his Easter communion. In December 1865 he received absolution from Léon-Alfred Sentenne, and was admitted to the special jubilee communion decreed by Pius IX. An event occurred, however, which upset everything. On 16 Oct. 1865, 17 members of the institute decided to appeal to the pope, "less in order to complain than to ask the common father of the faithful for a reconciliation with their bishop," as Louis-Antoine Dessaulles* wrote in 1868. When Bishop Bourget, who had just returned from Rome, was informed of this move, he stormed more than ever. He called the action "a sham appeal," and assured Rome that "the so-called sentence of excommunication" was, when all was said and done, "only a pastoral letter to the people to forewarn them against the dangers to which this evil institution exposed their faith." But on 1 Dec. 1865 the bishop none the less asked confessors to apply rigorously the rules concerning the institute and secret societies.

On 25 March 1866 Gonzalve Doutre followed the exercises of a retreat held by the Jesuits. When he presented himself before Abbé Sentenne to receive absolution, the latter insisted upon a formal authorization from Bishop Bourget. Forthwith, Doutre asked the bishop for this "permission to receive absolution and be admitted to the paschal communion." A letter dated 28 March, from Joseph-Octave Paré, informed him that Bishop Bourget, in the discharge of a "rigorous duty," found himself obliged to refuse Doutre access to the sacraments so long as he remained a member of the censured institution. Then came news that Bishop Bourget had allowed a member to receive the sacraments without requiring him to leave the institute. Doutre therefore took up his pen again on 12 April 1866. The bishop's severity towards him, he wrote, had not prevented him from performing his religious duties punctually, even if he regretted "being excluded from the number of Catholics admitted to the paschal communion"; however, he was anxious to know the particular reasons that excluded him "from the favours that Your Excellency extends to other members of the Institut Canadien." The next day, Bishop Bourget gave an answer to Doutre's question: the bishop had indeed authorized a member of the institute to receive the sacraments, but on the express condition that he would use his influence to turn his associates away from this dangerous organization.

In an exchange of letters that went on until 22 May 1866, Gonzalve Doutre undertook the defence of the institute in a plea characterized by unusual deference and pained sincerity. He had never thought, he said, of casting doubt on the obedience he owed his bishop; but for all that he did not accept his harshness and injustice. In the first place, Doutre rejected the term "rebel," which had been applied to him as one of the signatories of the petition sent to the pope to ask him to intervene between the bishop of Montreal and the members of the institute, who in Doutre's opinion had been victims of an unjust censure. Furthermore, he disapproved of the bishop's conduct, which was a cause of vexation to an institute that brought together Catholics and Protestants. "Certain Catholics," he noted, "are members of associations composed of a majority of Protestants and possessing libraries that are worse than ours; we observe that they have not come under censure." In the matter of the institute's library, which had been condemned more than once, Doutre reminded the bishop of the directors' promise to put offending books under lock and key; as for himself, he had not read a single book from the banned library for more than two years.

What were the reasons behind this special intransigence towards the institute? Doutre asked. "That Your Excellency is not strictly obliged [to give the reasons], I admit; but it also seems to me that a small gesture of graciousness, on behalf of those whose salvation may be in question, would not be out of place on the part of a bishop, and that this would have a better effect on the institute's members than an unbending rigour." Doutre ended his last letter with these severe words: "I shall never be convinced that in order to be a Catholic one must strip off the inalienable attributes of man, and be nothing but a kind of jelly-fish, delivered to the whims of a man who has not become God just because he has been consecrated bishop."

Gonzalve Doutre was living out a painful drama. On the one hand, he revolted against the bishop's arbitrariness and injustice, on the other his soul was wracked by agony and dread. Consequently, on 11 Nov. 1866 he confided his personal case to Charles-François Baillargeon*, administrator of the archdiocese of Quebec. Because of the danger in which he would find himself in the event of unexpected death, he entreated the archbishop, who had "jurisdiction over the bishop," to allow him to receive the sacraments in spite of the episcopal censures. Archbishop Baillargeon confessed his helplessness; he could only advise a reconciliation "with your worthy bishop. The bishop, and yours in particular, is a father. And such a father is always ready to give the kiss of peace to his child. . . . Why should you fear to go and cast yourself in his arms?" The letters received from Bishop Bourget, Doutre wrote subsequently, "scarcely allowed me to maintain this great confidence in the goodness and charity of the bishop of Montreal, who has never required from me anything less than a blind submission to his wishes, whether or not they have any connection with his episcopal powers."

On 1 Jan. 1868, in the hope of learning the opinion of the Roman authorities, Gonzalve Doutre sent a letter to the vicar general of Montreal, Abbé Truteau, who had just returned from Rome: "I anxiously await the final decision, and I assure you that I for one am desirous of seeing a prompt settlement of these difficulties, one way or the other." To Doutre's profound consternation, Abbé Truteau replied that the matter had never been discussed. "I believed until now that the mission of a priest was to work for harmony and concord among Catholics, and to seize the slightest opportunity to end any cause of dispute or hatred. Unfortunately this has not been the case with His Excellency and his vicar general. Each time one of them has been in Rome, he has taken care to make no mention to anyone of the affairs of the institute, hoping to drag the question out so that the bishop may harass the institute with fresh censures, more threats, excommunications, or refusals of burial."

In 1869 disasters beset the Institut Canadien: on 7 July, a decree by the Inquisition condemned the doctrines "contained in a certain year-book"; on 14 July, a decree by the Index banned the Annuaire de l'Institut Canadien pour 1868. . . . Gonzalve Doutre reassured the members of the institute. According to him, the aim of the decree by the Index was merely to withdraw the 1868 year-book from circulation; it was no more an attack upon the institute than upon "the person of the writer whose work is often condemned with so much thoughtlessness." Furthermore, he went on, the court of the Inquisition, which "has judged without us, unknown to us and without consulting us," has not passed any judgement on the merit of our appeal: "our appeal has never been heard by the Inquisition, and only the year-book has served as grounds for the decree." The bishop of Montreal did not see the situation this way. On 29 August a statement was read in the churches of the diocese, requiring members to leave the institute under pain of being refused sacraments even at the point of death. But, having submitted purely and simply to the decrees, the institute came up against the intransigence of the religious authorities of Montreal, who demanded in particular that its constitutions and regulations be revised by the ordinary, in order that the latter might eradicate from them "false principles." Four members, including Gonzalve Doutre, then had recourse to Cardinal Alessandro Barnabo, and on 12 Oct. 1869 complained bitterly to him about the stiffness and inflexibility of the bishop of Montreal, "a man of great piety, but somewhat lacking in enlightenment, and consequently ill equipped for debate."

On 16 October Gonzalve Doutre left Canada to go to plead the institute's case before the authorities in Rome. He arrived there on 6 December. He met the prefect of the Sacred Congregation of the Propaganda, and then Lorenzo Nina, the assessor to the Holy Office, with whom he entered into "a long conversation" on the whole issue. Bishop Nina declared that one must not expect "censure to be passed on the bishop of Montreal; for to censure him would be a cause of scandal." He therefore recommended that Doutre prepare for him a "concise report with conclusions embodying an acceptable method of settlement." On 20 December Doutre submitted his report. After relating the salient facts in the painful dispute, the author proposed in conclusion that the bishop of Montreal's jurisdiction should be exercised only over the Catholic members of the institute, and that equally Catholics should be allowed to belong to it provided they submitted to the church's directives.

Subsequently Gonzalve Doutre made two attempts to smooth away the difficulties "without anyone making unworthy concessions." The first was on 18 Oct. 1873, when Canon Édouard-Charles Fabre* became coadjutor to Bishop Bourget; the second was on 2 June 1879. A plan took shape: to create a literary and scientific institution grouping together "all Canadian and Catholic youth." Gonzalve Doutre was not to see his project through: he died on 28 Feb. 1880, fortified with the last sacraments and assisted by Bishop Fabre and the parish priest Sentenne.

The originator of a major reform of the bar, the author of important legal works, a dedicated teacher respected by his students, Gonzalve Doutre lived through a grievous spiritual experience that commands the highest respect. The painful battle between ultramontanism and liberalism in Canada, which began in 1848 and occupied the remainder of the century, reached its climax around 1870. Bishop Bourget and his clergy wanted to build a kingdom with a theocratic emphasis, and did not shrink from means to crush the opposing camp: accusations of malicious intent, insinuations, and invectives were mingled with condemnations and excommunications. More adept in hurling anathema than in refuting the boldest arguments of the liberals, and ill adjusted to the times, the ecclesiastics stirred up confused currents within the liberal bourgeoisie. Some people submitted uncomprehendingly, others preferred to revolt, for example, Jean-Baptiste-Éric Dorion*, Pierre Blanchet, Toussaint-Antoine-Rodolphe Laflamme*, and Doutre's brother Joseph*, who could not "pardon the clergy for the harm it has done us." Were they, as their opponents claimed, ungodly men? To probe the intimate lives of human beings in an endeavour to determine what they are, or to interpret incidents and statements that put their deepest beliefs in question, is not easy. One fact stands out, however: in the period that concerns us, the most uncompromising of the liberals still remained attached to the Catholic religion.

Amongst these harried liberals, Gonzalve Doutre appears as a unique case. He entered the institute at the moment when the struggle was approaching its decisive phase, and lost no time in measuring himself against the leader of ultramontanism in person. To blind obedience, even to easy and fruitless revolt, he preferred combat, conducted with moderation, courtesy, and sincerity. As a profoundly religious man he would no doubt not have sacrificed his faith; but neither was he in any way disposed to submit blindly. He waited for a decision which never came, and even when death was drawing nigh he was at grips with an internal drama whose intensity is difficult to estimate.

More than once Doutre betrayed his impatience, and that is understandable. "There is hatred in the bishop's heart towards us," he wrote in 1870. Indeed, at Rome Doutre tried three times to meet the bishop of Montreal, who avoided him; at Rome, Bishop Bourget refused to support a Canadian's request to attend a papal audience because Gonzalve Doutre was one of those applying; again at Rome, a single Canadian was excluded from a celebration organized in honour of a friend, the Chevalier Joseph-Édouard Lefebvre de Bellefeuille* – that Canadian bore the name of Gonzalve Doutre.

It is difficult to resist the feeling of sympathy this man inspired. He died very young, without having time to give full development to his great talent.

JEAN-ROCH RIOUX

Gonzalve Doutre, Conseil général du Barreau du Bas-Canada; assemblée annuelle tenue à Québec le 28 mai 1867; rapport officiel (Québec, 1867); Loi du Barreau du Bas-Canada, suivie des règlements du conseil général et des sections de Montréal, Québec, Trois-Rivières (Montréal, 1867); Les lois de la procédure civile; savoir: texte du code, rapport des codifacteurs, autorités par eux citées, lois de faillite, règles de pratique des différents tribunaux, principes et formules de procédure, etc., etc., etc. (2v., Montréal, 1867); Règles de la profession d'avocat (Montréal, 1868); Tableau des avocats du Bas-Canada pour 1867 (Montréal, 1867); Gonzalve Doutre et Edmond Lareau, Le droit civil canadien suivant l'ordre établi par les codes; précédé d'une histoire générale du droit canadien (1v. paru, Montréal, 1872).

Gonzalve Doutre, "Cours d'histoire du Canada; cours donné à l'institut à partir du 13 octobre 1870," Le Pays (Montréal), 12 oct., 20 oct. 1870 and later numbers; [ ] "Discours de M. Gonzalve Doutre; sur les affaires de l'Institut canadien à Rome, prononcé à l'institut le 14 avril 1870," Le Pays (Montréal), 14 juin, 15 juin, 17 juin, 18 juin 1870; "Du principe des nationalités; lecture faite à l'Institut canadien, le 1er décembre 1864," Le Pays (Montréal), 15 déc., 17 déc., 20 déc. 1864; "Étude critique médico-légale: procès Provencher-Joutras," La Minerve (Montréal), 2 mars–31 mars 1868; "Musée de l'Institut canadien; lettre destinée à Alphonse Lusignan," Le Pays (Montréal), 20 mars, 22 mars, 24 mars, 30 mars 1866; "Procès Ruel-Boulet: étude critique médico-légale: conférence prononcée devant les membres de l'Institut médical de la faculté de médecine de l'université du collège Victoria, le 23 janvier 1869," Le Pays (Montréal), 10 févr.–18 févr. 1869; "Profession d'avocat," La Minerve (Montréal), 29 mai 1866; "Recherches dans les vieilles archives françaises appartenant à l'État; conférence prononcée à l'institut, le 23 février 1871," Le Pays (Montréal), 22 févr., 28 févr. 1871; "Vaccination," Le National (Montréal), 16 juill. 1872.

Gonzalve Doutre, "Administration de la justice," Revue canadienne (Montréal), X (1873), 762–70; "Code des curés, marguilliers et paroissiens, par l'Hon. J.-U. Beaudry, un des juges de la Cour supérieure, 1870," La Revue légale (Montréal), II (1870), 473–89; [ ], "Discours prononcé par M. Gonzalve Doutre, D.C.L., professeur de procédure à l'université McGill de Montréal, lors de la distribution des diplômes le 30 mars 1874," Revue canadienne (Montréal), XI (1874), 280–85; "La profession d'avocat et de notaire en Canada," Revue canadienne (Montréal), X (1873), 840–48; XI (1874), 58–68, 134–42; "Québec: la législation de la session 1869–1870," La Revue légale (Montréal), II (1870), 78–90.

Gonzalve Doutre gave many speeches on the most varied subjects; the texts of many do not seem to be extant, and in some cases all that remains is the announcement made in the newspapers at the time: "Un avocat plaidant sa propre cause, a-t-il droit à des honoraires contre la partie adverse qui a perdu sa cause? Conférence prononcée à l'Institut des lois, en février 1862," Le Pays (Montréal), 12 févr. 1862; "Considérations sur le procès Connol jugé le 13 janvier 1860; essai prononcé à l'institut, le 15 mars 1860," Le Pays (Montréal), 26 déc. 1860; "Les dîmes, essai donné à l'institut, le 22 septembre 1859," Le Pays (Montréal), 11 oct. 1859; "L'encombrement des professions; conférence prononcée à l'institut, le 30 janvier 1862," Le Pays (Montréal), 6 févr. 1862; "Essai sur les romans et les romanciers; conférence prononcée à l'institut, le 9 février 1860," Le Pays (Montréal), 17 avril 1860; "La guerre américaine; conférence donnée en avril 1863," Le Pays (Montréal), 18 avril 1863; "L'influence des maisons d'éducation et des institutions littéraires sur la jeunesse; conférence prononcée à l'Institut canadien, le 26 novembre 1863," Le Pays (Montréal), 28 nov. 1863; "L'Institut canadien en 1859; conférence prononcée à l'institut, le 30 mars 1859," Le Pays (Montréal), 31 mars 1859; "Le passé, le présent et l'avenir de l'Institut des lois; conférence prononcée en novembre 1862," Le Pays (Montréal), 8 nov. 1862; "L'utilité d'un cours de procédure civile; conférence prononcée à l'Institut des lois, en avril 1862," Le Pays (Montréal), 8 avril 1862.

ACAM, 901.135, pp.866–901. Bibliothèque municipale de Montréal, Fonds Gagnon, Institut canadien. Pierre Beullac et É.-F. Surveyer, Le centenaire du Barreau de Montréal, 1849–1949 (Montréal, 1949). Lareau, Hist. de la littérature canadienne; Histoire du droit canadien depuis les origines de la colonie jusqu'a nos jours (2v., Montréal, 1888–89). Sylvain, "Libéralisme et ultramontanisme," Shield of Achilles (Morton), 111–38, 220–55. Maréchal Nantel, "Les avocats à Montréal," Cahiers des Dix, VII (1942), 185–213; "L'étude du droit et le barreau," Cahiers des Dix, XIV (1949), 11–40. Léon Pouliot, "Le cas de conscience de Gonzalve Doutre," RHAF, XXIII (1969–70), 231–45. É.-F. Surveyer, "Une école de droit à Montréal avant le code civil," Revue trimestrielle canadienne (Montréal), VI (1920), 140–50.

DRAPER, WILLIAM HENRY, politician, lawyer, and judge; b. near London, Eng., 11 March 1801, son of the Reverend Henry Draper; d. at Yorkville (Toronto), Ont., on 3 Nov. 1877.

Educated by private tuition, William Henry Draper ran away to sea at age 15. He made at least two voyages to India with the East India Company, and in the spring of 1820 emigrated to Upper Canada. Settling in Hamilton Township, he lived with John Covert*, a prominent Orangeman of the Cobourg area. He appears to have intended at one point to return to England, but he moved to Port Hope, taught school briefly, then began to study law. After a period in the office of George Strange Boulton*, Draper was called to the bar in 1828. He was also for a time assistant registrar for Durham and Northumberland. In 1829 he was given a position in the York (Toronto) office of John Beverley Robinson*, who was soon to be chief justice, then entered into a legal partnership with Solicitor General Christopher Hagerman*. He was also appointed reporter for the Court of King's Bench and named a bencher of the Law Society of Upper Canada. His reputation as a particularly fluent Tory barrister grew rapidly. He early achieved considerable success in the courtroom, and his eloquence gained him the sobriquet "Sweet William."

Good fortune, ability, and a pleasing personality thus brought Draper quickly into the society of the group so influential in governing the colony – the "Family Compact." He was soon also acquainted with the most formidable man of them all – John Strachan*, later the first Church of England bishop of Toronto. It was Robinson, however, who actively persuaded Draper to enter politics; this course was directly against the young lawyer's wishes, but it was no doubt suggested to him as the quickest route to the judiciary where his ambitions lay.

Draper's political début was made in the election of 1836 when he handily defeated the Reform candidate in Toronto, James Edward Small*. He took his position among the Tory majority gained in Upper Canada that year through the unprecedented intervention in party politics of the governor, Sir Francis Bond HEAD. In his first session in the House of Assembly, Draper was active, and his position on such thorny problems as the clergy reserves and the charter of King's College early indicated a man less intransigent than the majority of his Tory colleagues. In matters pertaining to the Upper Canada Academy (later Victoria College) in Cobourg his favourable report gained him the friendship of Egerton Ryerson* and the Wesleyan Methodists, which was to be one of the constants of his political career. Yet Draper was by no means alienated from his Family Compact friends, and because of their influence with Head his rise was swift. In December 1836 he was made a member of the Executive Council, and in the following March, solicitor general. Shortly afterwards, Head dispatched him to London to present the governor's position in the acute financial crisis of 1836–37. This, however, was a painful episode: Draper's awkward reception by the Colonial Office officials possibly reflected their dislike of Head.

Shortly after Draper's return, the colony was immersed in the rebellion of 1837. It was to his house, on the night of 4 December, that Head brought his wife and other women and children of the little colonial élite to seek refuge from the expected assault of William Lyon Mackenzie*'s "army." After the failure of the rebellion Draper organized many of the prosecutions which took place in the next two years when raids by rebels kept the border in constant turmoil. The internal political situation of Upper and Lower Canada was going through an even more basic upheaval with the arrival of Lord Durham [Lambton*] and the British government's decision to implement that part of his Report recommending a union of the two Canadas, the appointment of Charles Poulett Thomson* to make that union a reality, and Lord John Russell's dispatch of 16 Oct. 1839 which meant in effect that executive councillors could be removed at the will of the governor.

It was during this period of trouble that Draper first began, consciously or not, to tread the pathway towards what was to be the cherished, though unfulfilled, goal of his political career – the formation of a new political party. A conservative party, it would stand ideologically between the old Family Compact Tories, whose system was failing, and the Reformers under Robert Baldwin*, whom Draper believed were endangering the connection with Britain. It was a course that would lead to much vilification. Most of it was undeserved, but Draper soon found himself in an undoubtedly compromising position.

He supported the union of the two Canadas in the Upper Canadian assembly on economic grounds. This action alienated many Tories, but he defended his position by pledging himself to the resolutions introduced by John Solomon Cartwright* in March 1839 which would have heavily weighted the union against the French Lower Canadians and assured a loyal and probably Tory majority in the assembly. Draper ultimately gave up his adherence to the resolutions in the face of Thomson's determination to force through the union without any such restrictions. However, the publication soon afterwards of Russell's dispatch of 16 October led most of Draper's enemies, Tory and Reformer, to look upon it as an explanation of his conduct in changing his position – he was now simply a placeman of the governor. Draper's denials were not particularly convincing. Though never politically ambitious, he did hope to preserve his place in the government as a route to the judiciary and there seems little doubt that he bent his principles under Thomson's iron pressure.

Yet Draper, who succeeded Hagerman as attorney general for Upper Canada in February 1840, did not gain real credit with the governor for his performance. Once Thomson had pushed through the union of the Canadas by February 1841 (and been created Baron Sydenham), he was determined to act as his own prime minister and to destroy the old political groupings, forming a "moderate" party devoted to himself. In the election held in March and April (in which Draper was returned for Russell) Sydenham was successful. The French Canadians stood out against him, but in Canada West (still popularly called Upper Canada) both the old Tories and Baldwin's Reformers were reduced to a handful of seats by the Moderates committed to the governor. Draper continued as attorney general west and, as head of the conservative Moderates, was co-government leader with Samuel Harrison* in the assembly. But Draper had only four or five real followers, and Sydenham privately considered him a "poor creature." It was in Harrison, provincial secretary and leader of the liberal Moderates, that the governor placed his confidence. Unable to comprehend Sydenham's curious blend of liberalism and autocracy, Draper felt baffled and isolated; he had just written a letter of resignation in the autumn of 1841 when he was informed of the governor's death.

The arrival of Sir Charles Bagot* as governor in January 1842 marked a new phase in Draper's career. The two men found both their political views and their personalities compatible, and Draper rapidly replaced Harrison as the governor's chief Canadian adviser. Also, Draper's own political philosophy had clarified, and his appreciation of political realities sharpened.

In September 1841, Baldwin had moved resolutions calling for responsible government. These had been parried by Sydenham when Harrison had moved counter-resolutions, ostensibly promising responsible government, in a much vaguer form. It was the Harrison resolutions that were passed, and Draper had supported them. Though he would not have argued that a governor was ever bound to take the advice of his councillors, he now felt himself committed to the principle that executive councillors must have the confidence of a majority of the assembly. This did not necessarily mean a two-party system in the way that Baldwin foresaw; it could also mean a multi-party or a no-party government, and there is no doubt that Draper favoured the last. Now, however, as he began to realize that party government was inevitable, he hoped for a great, loyal Conservative party embracing both French- and English-speaking Canadians – for by now he believed the French to be naturally conservative. He was becoming more convinced that if government were not to founder completely, the French must be brought quickly into it even if they stood by their alliance with Baldwin and the price was a Reform ministry.

It was Bagot who eventually took responsibility for the generous offer to the French that led to the formation of the first Baldwin–Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine* government in September 1842. Acclaim for the governor from the French and Reformers, and disapproval from the British government and the Canadian Tories, resulted. Draper's role in this upheaval was critical: in July he had begun urging Bagot that La Fontaine's French bloc must be brought into the ministry if the governor were not to be placed in an untenable position by being unable to maintain a council acceptable to the assembly. Other councillors, such as Harrison and Robert Baldwin Sullivan*, were urging this course, but Draper's advice was the most persuasive. Draper knew that if the French remained committed to Baldwin their accession to power would necessitate his own resignation. This he magnanimously offered, and advised as well that other Tory councillors be forced out. When Bagot still wavered, Draper and Harrison led the Executive Council in forcing his hand by threatening a mass resignation on 12 September. The following day, to La Fontaine, Bagot made his ultimate offer, to place four French Canadians and Baldwin on the council and to retire councillors in whom they did not have confidence. When Baldwin caused further difficulties, Bagot empowered Draper to read out in the assembly the extent of this offer. Most of the French members had not previously known of the magnitude of the concessions, and La Fontaine's hold on his party was briefly shaken. A compromise was worked out and the new Baldwin–La Fontaine ministry formed in a way least damaging to the governor's prestige. Draper resigned from the Executive Council (on 15 September) and from the assembly, and was promised a seat on the judiciary by Bagot.

Draper retired from active politics altogether, taking no great interest in the Legislative Council, to which Bagot appointed him shortly before he died in 1843. Late the same year, however, a crisis erupted under Bagot's successor, Charles Metcalfe*, and, led by Baldwin and La Fontaine, the whole of the Executive Council, except Dominick Daly*, resigned. When Metcalfe could not form an administration that had a majority in the assembly he summoned Draper and gave him a seat in the Executive Council. With only Daly and Denis-Benjamin Viger*, he carried on the administration for nearly a year though he did not hold any portfolio. The non-responsible government of this "triumvirate" was loudly condemned as autocratic, yet Draper was working towards a broadly based "Ministry of Moderates," like the one that had worked under Sydenham. He failed. In Lower Canada, Viger brought over a few individuals, including Denis-Benjamin Papineau*, to his cause, but no mass support. In Upper Canada, Draper's appeals to such prominent moderates as Harrison, William Hamilton Merritt*, and Ryerson all foundered, and William Morris*, who wielded great influence with the Presbyterians, was the only notable accession to the Executive Council (as receiver general) that Draper was able to secure.

Yet a government was somehow patched together in time for the general election in the autumn of 1844. A number of factors – the removal of the seat of government from Kingston to Montreal, the secret societies bill, which had outraged the Orangemen under Ogle Robert GOWAN, and a general feeling that the French Canadians were being pandered to – had turned much public opinion in Upper Canada against the Reformers before their resignation and Metcalfe was able to capitalize on this discontent when he entered the campaign and denounced the Reformers as traitors. The result was that, though defeated in the lower half of the province, the government triumphed in Upper Canada and Draper's ministry had a small majority of four or five.

Draper was now in a curious position for one who had resisted so long the doctrines of Baldwin. From late 1844 until his resignation in May 1847 he was virtually prime minister of Canada, and as he had a majority in the assembly, the Reformers could no longer term his administration irresponsible. At the same time, the rapidly failing health of Metcalfe and the lack of interest in domestic politics shown by Lord Cathcart [Charles Murray Cathcart*] who succeeded him, meant that Draper saw hardly any interference from above. Yet this was not the greatest anomaly in his situation. He was also a party leader without a party, a prime minister without a following.

His majority in the assembly was made up mainly of Tories who had little love for Draper but had been elected to support the governor, and who were largely excluded from the Executive Council. They endured the attorney general as leader because there was no one else to take his place – he had the support of the governors, and the Tories themselves were split into factions led by Henry Sherwood* and Sir Allan MacNab*.

Under the circumstances, Draper envisaged a period of retrenchment with few controversial issues. In fact, despite the weakness of his position, the last two sessions of the assembly he faced as attorney general saw several important measures. A schools act for Lower Canada drafted by Augustin-Norbert Morin* was passed in 1845. The Upper Canada common school act of 1846, drawn up by Ryerson at Draper's behest, has been termed the first really workable settlement of that troublesome problem. The voting of a permanent civil list firmly established the principle that it was the Canadian legislature only that had the right to tax Canadians. Perhaps more significant were Draper's efforts to lay the spectre of the rebellion of 1837. On 17 Dec. 1844 the house addressed the queen, unanimously asking her to pardon all former rebels; two months later, an amnesty was granted. Early in 1845 D.-B. Papineau moved a successful rebellion losses bill for Upper Canada, although the more controversial subject of indemnifying Lower Canadians was not solved until later. Nevertheless, the French Canadians welcomed the repeal of restrictions on the French language, moved by Papineau on behalf of the government, in February 1845. It proved a coup for Draper who had persuaded Metcalfe to disobey his instructions on the subject in order to forestall an address the Reformers were planning to make on the subject of the French language.

Despite such successes, Draper's government gave an appearance of chronic weakness. It was defeated frequently on minor issues and retreated ignominiously over the university bill. This measure, which Draper considered important enough to warrant his leaving the Legislative Council and seeking a seat in the assembly (for London), was introduced by him on 4 March 1845. It called for a University of Upper Canada to which Queen's College at Kingston and Victoria College would be affiliated, as well as the Church of England King's College (which later became the University of Toronto). Acceptable to the Methodists and the Church of Scotland, the bill aroused the ire of the Church of England, and Strachan managed to rally many of the Tory assembly members against it. Draper persisted, saying he would stand or fall by the measure, and he forced the resignation of his own recently named inspector general, William Benjamin Robinson, on the floor of the house when the latter supported Strachan. Perhaps Draper was hoping for aid from Baldwin's Reformers who had previously framed a similar bill; it was not forthcoming. In the end, a group of Tories, led by Sherwood, threatened to bring down the government if the bill had a third reading. This was too much for the ailing Metcalfe who felt that he would not be able to form a new ministry. Following a plea from the governor, Draper's measure was withdrawn.

From an administrative or legislative point of view, Draper's ministry could hardly be termed more than a limited success. Politically, it seemed to be a complete failure. Yet the attorney general was working towards something important which would bear fruit after his own political retirement: a modern Victorian conservative party. His plan was twofold – to placate the leading English-speaking Tories while he replaced them with Moderates, and to win the French bloc, or a substantial part of it, away from its alliance with the Reformers.

In this last task Draper came remarkably near to success. There was no longer any hope that Viger or D.-B. Papineau would bring in any mass support, so Draper struck shrewdly at the weakest link of La Fontaine's supporters, the Quebec City wing, which felt neglected by their Montreal leaders. Negotiations with René Caron, the mayor of Quebec and speaker in the Legislative Council, broke down when Metcalfe refused to eject Daly from the Executive Council and when the correspondence fell into the hands of La Fontaine who read it in the assembly in April 1846. Further negotiations conducted in the autumn of 1846 again came to nothing, but on this occasion Draper managed to drive a wedge between La Fontaine and his chief lieutenant, Morin. In the spring of 1847 approaches were again made to Caron and the Quebec wing of the party, which in turn applied pressure on Morin; in his last approach Draper came closest to success. A substantial section of the French bypassed La Fontaine and empowered Caron to enter the administration if the "double majority" principle was offered. Acceptance, however, would have given four out of the seven seats on the council to the French, and it seemed a prohibitive demand. Draper was well content to wait.

The negotiations were never again to be taken up. Draper's failure to break the French bloc was matched by a more disastrous failure to contain rising Tory opposition to himself. The departure in 1845 of Metcalfe, whom the Tories had pledged to support and who had himself fully supported Draper, was a serious blow. Nevertheless, factions led by Sherwood and MacNab kept the Tories disunited and provided Draper with the opportunity to pursue his hope of filling the Upper Canadian section of his Executive Council with moderate Conservatives. William Morris, John Hillyard CAMERON, John A. Macdonald* – these were the stamp of men Draper wanted and ultimately brought into his ministry. William Badgley* became attorney general east. But they were too few. Attempts to placate the Tories with positions failed. Sherwood and W. B. Robinson had been brought into office but both had to be ejected, and dealings with MacNab proved disastrous. Only a few men such as William Cayley* were acceptable to both right and left wings of the party. The Tory members of the assembly increasingly chafed under the leadership of men many of them despised.

That Draper, who had always disliked politics, should begin to look towards retirement under such discouraging conditions was natural. A further inducement came with the appointment of Lord Elgin [Bruce*] as governor in 1847. Since Draper had answered Metcalfe's desperate summons to office in 1843 he had assumed that British governors would be interested, above all, in avoiding a Baldwin administration. But Elgin and Lord Grey in the Colonial Office were quite willing to accept both responsible government and Baldwin. It was becoming apparent to Draper that he was in the way of everyone – governor, Tory, and Reformer. On 28 May, following the death of Christopher Hagerman, Draper resigned as attorney general and became puisne judge of the Court of Queen's Bench of Upper Canada. His ministry fell into the hands of Sherwood until the subsequent election returned Baldwin and La Fontaine.

Draper's legislative accomplishments were real but modest, his efforts to form a moderate Conservative party in alliance with French Canadians failed, and he swam clearly, if obliquely, against the historical tide of responsible government and reformism. Yet it was he, along with Baldwin and La Fontaine, who really dominated the 1840s. Moreover, the formation of a Conservative party linked to the French Canadians was to become a reality in 1854. It was the creation of Draper's ablest follower, Macdonald, who clearly had the political gift in which Draper was most lacking – the ability to organize a national party with wide popular support.

There are other important aspects to Draper's political career that have rarely been appreciated. Following the racial conflicts of the 1830s, the 1840s were comparatively quiet, owing partly to a reaction against the rebellion, partly to the Baldwin–La Fontaine alliance. Giving the French Canadians their fair share of political power was a factor and Draper's critical part in that episode is clear. Similarly his efforts to form a coalition with the French Canadians between 1844 and 1847 undoubtedly helped to convince them that their claims for office would eventually be met.

Draper's role in the evolution of responsible government was an unwitting one, but perhaps his most important. After the rebellions and the era of Durham and Sydenham, the tide was moving towards acceptance of responsible government. But between 1841 and 1846, when Sir Robert Peel's Conservative ministry was in power in England, particularly when Stanley held sway in the Colonial Office, a different view prevailed there. An unremitting clash between a Canadian legislature championing responsible government and a British Colonial Office and governor could have had serious consequences in this period, and such a clash appeared about to develop in December 1843 with the resignation of Baldwin and La Fontaine. Draper stepped into the breach, first by supporting Metcalfe with his temporary government, and then from 1844 to 1847 by carrying on a full administration which stood on a majority in the assembly after the election of 1844. Thus he neatly bridged the transition between the era of Metcalfe and Stanley and that of Elgin and Grey. In doing so he helped allow responsible government to evolve peacefully, and was thus one of the many architects in the development of commonwealth from empire.

Following his retirement from politics, Draper was at last given the opportunity to advance in what had always been his chosen field of endeavour – the judiciary. After sitting on the Court of Queen's Bench for nine years, he was created chief justice of the Court of Common Pleas of Upper Canada in 1856, succeeding James Macaulay*. In 1863 he was named chief justice of the Court of Queen's Bench for Upper Canada; in 1868 he was appointed presiding judge of the Court of Error and Appeal in Ontario, succeeding Archibald McLean*, and the next year became its chief justice.

Though eminently distinguished, Draper's later career saw none of the turbulence, nor indeed of the constructive innovations that had marked his political life. To Draper himself it was the consummation of a personal preference for a tranquil and ordered existence. He did, however, make two brief reappearances in the public eye in the 1850s – in the question of transferring the Hudson's Bay Company territories, and as presiding judge over the "double shuffle" trials.

The HBC question arose when problems concerning the colony of Vancouver Island prompted Henry Labouchere, colonial secretary in Lord Palmerston's administration, to undertake an investigation in 1857 of the company's charter by a select committee of the British House of Commons. In the Canadas, the Macdonald–George-Étienne CARTIER government was weak, and the Clear Grit opposition, led by George BROWN, had just hammered "western expansion" into its platform. Though Macdonald was happy to preempt an attractive Grit policy, he knew the difficulties of occupying and defending the lands, and therefore had to pursue a policy combining aggressive expansionism with prudent realism. He chose Draper to represent Canada before the select committee, with no powers to commit the province but with wide latitude of argument. It was a task suited to Draper's broad legal knowledge and persuasive powers of argument. Labouchere claimed that Draper, who favourably impressed the committee, was one of the ablest men he had ever met. Concentrating on the necessity of preserving the west from American encroachments, Draper argued that only settlement could achieve this but that the company's interests were inimical to settlement. He suggested that an appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council might be the best way to test the company's chartered territorial rights.

The work of the select committee bore no immediate fruit, but Draper's arguments had made their mark and the principle that Canada would likely be the ultimate legatee of the HBC's territorial rights became more and more taken for granted.

Draper's next appearance on the political scene in 1858 was a good deal more controversial. In August the Cartier–Macdonald ministry came back into power after a defeat which had resulted in the famous two-day Brown–Antoine-Aimé Dorion* administration. The new ministers did not resign their seats and face by-elections as was normal procedure. Instead they swore the oaths for one office, resigned, and swore again for another office. The manœuvre was soon dubbed the "double shuffle," and Brown bitterly attacked both the governor, Sir Edmund Head*, who had accepted it, and the government. Another Reformer, Adam Wilson*, tested the legality of the issue by starting proceedings against Macdonald and two of his colleagues, and the case was heard before Draper. Despite the fact that all the judges involved in the hearings were Conservatives, the Grits appear to have hoped for victory. However, it was on the letter of the law that Draper stood in giving judgement for the defendants on 18 Dec. 1858. Yet, though disclaiming any right of the judiciary to guess what the legislators intended in framing the original act [see HARRISON], Draper did interpret what they had "meant" in dealing with another, more minor point in the issue. This lent some credence to the charges Brown and his allies soon made that both the governor and the judiciary were in an unholy alliance to subvert the constitution at the behest of the corrupt Macdonald. Draper was singled out for particular contempt, and the Globe expounded: "Mr. Draper has mistaken his place and age. He would have made a very fair Jeffreys and might have served for the Bloody Assize." The charges by the Grits of a conscious conspiracy were unfounded and unfair, but the whole episode of the "double shuffle" was hardly edifying. The bias in Macdonald's favour and against Brown must, unconsciously at least, have influenced Head and Draper in making their otherwise unexceptionable decisions.

If the remainder of his years on the bench were quiet, Draper was active in many civic and religious organizations, being at one time president of the St George's Society in Toronto, of the Canadian Institute (from 1856 to 1858), of the Toronto Cricket Club, and of the Philharmonic Society. He was president of the Church Association of the Diocese of Toronto, formed in 1873 and including as members William Hume Blake*, Casimir Stanislaus Gzowski*, and Daniel Wilson*, which led to the founding of Wycliffe College in Toronto. In 1854, he was made a CB. He maintained a lifelong passion for exercise but became increasingly infirm in the last decade of his life, and he died on 3 Nov. 1877. He had married Mary White in 1827. They had several children, one of whom, William George*, became well known as a lawyer.

GEORGE METCALF

MTCL, Baldwin papers. PAC, MG 24, A13 (Bagot papers); E1 (Merritt papers); MG 26, A (Macdonald papers). PAO, John George Hodgins collection; John Strachan letter books; John Strachan papers. PRO, CO 42/437–42/550; CO 537/140–537/143.

Arthur papers (Sanderson). [Bruce and Grey], Elgin-Grey papers (Doughty). Canada, Province of, Legislative Assembly, Journals, 1841–47. Correspondence between the Hon. W. H. Draper & the Hon. R. E. Caron; and between the Hon. R. E. Caron, and the Honbles. L. H. Lafontaine & A. N. Morin (Montreal, 1846). [C. T. Metcalfe], The life and correspondence of Charles, Lord Metcalfe, late governor-general of India, governor of Jamaica, and governor-general of Canada . . ., ed. J. W. Kaye (2v., London, 1854). [Ryerson], Story of my life (Hodgins). [C. E. P. Thomson], Letters from Lord Sydenham, governor general of Canada, 1839–1841, to Lord John Russell, ed. Paul Knaplund (London, 1931). Upper Canada, House of Assembly, Journals, 1836–40. British Colonist

(Toronto), 1838–47. Christian Guardian (Toronto), 1836–47. Examiner (Toronto), 1838–47. Globe (Toronto), 1844–47.

Cyclopædia of Can. biog. (Rose, 1886). Dent, Canadian portrait gallery, II. Careless, Union of the Canadas. Creighton, Macdonald, young politician. G. P. de T. Glazebrook, Sir Charles Bagot in Canada; a study in British colonial government ([London], 1929). George Metcalf, "The political career of William Henry Draper," unpublished MA thesis, University of Toronto, 1959. Moir, Church and state in Canada West. Monet, Last cannon shot. Ormsby, Emergence of the federal concept. D. B. Read, The lives of the judges of Upper Canada and Ontario, from 1791 to the present time (Toronto, 1888). Sissons, Ryerson. George Metcalf, "Draper Conservatism and responsible government in the Canadas, 1836–1847," CHR, XLII (1961), 300–24.

DREW, ANDREW, naval officer; b. at London, Eng., 27 Nov. 1792, son of John and Mary Drew; m. in 1832 Mary Henderson by whom he had five sons and one daughter; d. in England, 19 Dec. 1878.

Andrew Drew entered the Royal Navy as a first class volunteer in May 1806. He took part in operations at Boulogne, Copenhagen, and Walcheren Island and was promoted lieutenant in 1814. He remained on active duty until 1824, when he was promoted commander for distinguished service during the Ashanti War and placed on half-pay.

In 1832 Drew entered into a partnership with Vice-Admiral Henry Vansittart* to develop a farming estate in Upper Canada. Under the terms of the partnership Vansittart supplied capital of £1,800, one half on his own account and one half as an interest-free loan for Drew's share of the capital. Drew took up land in Blandford Township in July and played a leading part in developing the district. His efforts led to the laying out of the town of Woodstock, which he had Charles Rankin* survey; he erected the first church, with money supplied by Vansittart, and built some of the first houses.

When Vansittart arrived in 1834, he and Drew quarrelled. There were several reasons for Vansittart's dissatisfaction: all the land was held in Drew's name; Drew refused to hand the church over to the parish because, he claimed, there was money owing to him for construction costs; and certain investments made by Drew on Vansittart's behalf did not meet the latter's approval. As a result the partnership was dissolved, on terms arbitrated by Christopher A. Hagerman*.

Drew devoted himself to improving the land he retained – about 350 of the 700 acres originally granted, including 40 in the town plot – until the outbreak of the rebellion in Upper Canada. He was appointed to command a naval brigade attached to the force raised and led by Allan MacNab* to expel William Lyon Mackenzie* and a party of Americans from Navy Island in the Niagara River. Mackenzie's supporters hired a steamer, Caroline, to carry supplies to the island, and on 29 Dec. 1837 MacNab ordered Drew to cut out the vessel. That night he led a naval expedition to Fort Schlosser on the American side of the river, seized the ship after a fight in which one of her crew was killed, set her on fire, and cut her adrift to burn in the river.

This affair embittered relations between England and the United States for many years. The Americans regarded the deliberate attack on an American ship in an American port and the death of an American citizen as acts of piracy and murder. In Upper Canada the attack was regarded as proper punishment for bandits who were trying to overthrow the government of the province and who should have been restrained by the American authorities. An American jury indicted Drew for murder. The American government demanded compensation for the loss of the ship, and the incident formed the excuse for the outrages of the Patriot Hunters.

Drew remained on duty during the winter of 1838, and, when Captain Williams Sandom* was sent to command the naval forces in the province, acted as naval adviser to the lieutenant governor, Sir George Arthur*. In the summer of 1838 he was ordered to prepare plans for a provincial marine which Arthur intended to use, if needed, to defend the upper lakes in the event of an American invasion of the province. In November Drew was asked to raise the force and proceed to Amherstburg to help repel a threatened attack. Damage to his two ships as a result of a fire stopped him, however, and he spent the winter at Dunnville.

He continued to serve until the summer of 1839, during which time he was employed by Arthur in various other matters, including preparations to capture Fort Niagara in the event of war with the United States. In July he was relieved of his command by Sandom on charges of being absent without leave and of signing a false muster roll. Drew requested a court martial and was acquitted but was not employed again in Canada.

In 1842 Drew left Canada, as a result, he claimed, of attempts to murder him for his part in the Caroline affair, and he never returned. In England he went back to active duty in the navy, serving in the West Indies. In 1843 he was promoted captain on half-pay and at his death was an admiral.

M. L. MAGILL

Andrew Drew, A narrative of the capture and destruction of the steamer 'Caroline' and her descent over the falls of Niagara on the night of the 29th of December, 1837 (London, 1864).

MTCL, Robert John Turner papers. PAO, Marston collection, Andrew Drew papers, 1836–1839; RG 1, A–IV, 44 (Blandford); RG 1, C–IV, Oxford East Township, Vansittart family papers. PRO, CO 42/459, 144; 42/465, 160, 166; 42/473, 41; 42/474, 134, 138. Arthur papers (Sanderson). O'Byrne, Naval biog. dict. John Ireland, "Andrew Drew and the founding of Woodstock," Ont. Hist., LX (1968), 229–45; "Andrew Drew: the man who burned the Caroline," Ont. Hist., LIX (1967), 137–56.

DRIARD, SOSTHENES MAXIMILIAN, hotelier; b. 1819 at Chapelle-la-Reine (Department of Seine et Marne), France; d., probably a bachelor, on 15 Feb. 1873 at Victoria, B.C.

Sosthenes Maximilian Driard was one of those Frenchmen who, as a result of the revolution of 1848, the downfall of Louis-Philippe, and the ensuing economic depression in France, decided to emigrate to the "New World." Driard is said to have settled initially in New Orleans but in 1853 he was certainly in San Francisco. At that time, in association with Jules Rueff and others, Driard founded a charitable organization called Maison d'Asile, designed to assist Frenchmen not eligible for help from the French Benevolent Society. Driard, and also Rueff (who later moved to Victoria, B.C.), were among its first directors.

Driard, according to his obituaries, was attracted to British Columbia in 1858 by news of the Fraser River gold rush; the first mention of his presence in Victoria is in 1859 when he advertised the Colonial Restaurant in the Victoria Gazette. Edgar Fawcett, a well-known pioneer, described the Colonial Hotel in the 1860s as "one of the swell places of that day" and its owner as "very corpulent and asthmatic." In 1871 Driard purchased the St George Hotel on View Street. With two additional storeys, numerous alterations, and new furnishings, the hotel, renamed Driard House, was opened in May 1872, advertising accommodation for 100. Driard died nine months later at the age of 54; the hotel, luxurious and with a fine cuisine, was subsequently owned by his nephew Louis Lucas and a partner, Louis Redon, eventually passing to the Hartnagles.

Driard was a member of the French Benevolent Society of Victoria, formed early in 1860. The society founded a hospital in Victoria and initiated a system of medical benefits at a low monthly fee. There were no restrictions as to the nationality of its subscribers. Driard was also a member of Victoria Lodge, Free and Ancient Masons (an unusual proceeding for a Roman Catholic), probably drawn to freemasonry by his benevolent and charitable disposition. He was also one of the charter members and a director of the British Columbia Pioneer Society. In his will he remembered relatives (most of whom were in France), the sisters of St Ann, and the French Benevolent Society; if he died in B.C., four baskets of champagne were to be given to his brother masons. At his death he was described in one account as "intelligent and assiduous at his business," in another as "much esteemed and respected for his charitable nature and many other good qualities."

Madge Wolfenden

British Columbia Law Courts (Victoria), will of Sosthenes Driard (no. 1804). PABC, letter of S. Driard to the governor, 27 Oct. [1868]. Daily British Colonist and Victoria Chronicle, 10 Aug. 1870; 4 May 1872; 16, 17, 18 Feb. 1873. Victoria Daily Standard, 15, 17, 18 Feb. 1873. Victoria Gazette, 3 Sept. 1858, 29 Oct. 1859. Daniel Lévy, Les Français en Californie (San Francisco, Calif., 1884), 201. A. P. Nasatir, French activities in California, an archival calendar-guide (Stanford, Calif., London, [1945]), 37. W. E. Ireland, "The French in British Columbia," BCHQ, XIII (1949), 67–89.

DROLET, CHARLES, lawyer, politician, office-holder; b. in Quebec, 8 May 1795, son of Charles Drolet and Angélique Hill; d. in Quebec, 22 Sept. 1873.

Charles Drolet was admitted to the bar of Lower Canada on 28 April 1827 and practised at Quebec. There on 27 July 1830 he married Marguerite Quirouet; they do not seem to have had any children. In February 1836, Drolet, assisted by Louis-Joseph Papineau, defeated Robert-Shore-Milnes Bouchette, who was a Patriote friend, in a by-election for Saguenay County. As a member of the Association des Frères-Chasseurs, Drolet was in favour of armed rebellion but he did not participate in the first uprising. On 1 July 1838, just before the exiles to Bermuda sailed from Quebec, Drolet smuggled supplies to their ship. After Lord Durham [Lambton*] resigned in October 1838, Drolet disturbed the authorities by calling a public meeting in Saint-Roch, Quebec City, to thank Lord Henry Peter Brougham and John Temple Leader, the British politicians believed responsible for the resignation.

On 16 Nov. 1838, Drolet executed his boldest scheme, the escape from the Citadel of two prominent Patriote prisoners, Edward Alexander Theller* and William W. Dodge [see John G. Heath]. Sir John Colborne* issued a warrant for his arrest, and Drolet fled Quebec for the United States border. He stopped for a night in Saint-Gervais with his first cousin (also his wife's uncle), legislative councillor François Quirouet, and was arrested there by a militia squad on an order signed by his host. Near Quebec, Drolet cleverly persuaded a guard to permit him to visit his mother, and he escaped to the United States. At Rouses Point, Drolet joined Patriote friends and on 5 December Robert NELSON named him one of 12 councillors of the proposed republic of Lower Canada.

When the Patriote cause, in which Drolet had played a useful but limited part, collapsed in 1839, Drolet was admitted to the bar of New York at Buffalo, then moved to Detroit where he practised for eight years. After the general amnesty of 1849 Drolet returned to Montreal. In August 1850 he moved to Quebec where, upon the recommendation of Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine*, Drolet, an unpopular choice among many government supporters, received a minor imperial judicial appointment, clerk of the Court of Vice-Admiralty, Quebec. Soon after La Fontaine moved to the Court of Appeal in July 1854, Drolet received his second appointment, deputy clerk of the Court of Appeal. He retained both positions until his death.

CARMAN MILLER

[R.-S.-M. Bouchette], Mémoires de Robert-S.-M. Bouchette, 1805–1840; recueillis par son fils Errol Bouchette et annotés par A.-D. de Celles (Montréal, [1903]), 40, 85. "Papiers de Ludger Duvernay," Canadian Antiquarian and Numismatic J. (Montreal), 3rd ser., VII (1910), no.2, 94. Le Canadien (Québec), janv., mars 1836; janv., mai 1850. Mélanges religieux (Montréal), 27 août 1850. Montreal Gazette, 1 Jan., 16 Feb., 15 March 1836; 10, 16 Oct., 15 Nov. 1838. Le Nouveau Monde (Montréal), 4 sept., 27 sept. 1873. L'Opinion publique (Montréal), août, 3 oct. 1873. Canada directory, 1857–58. Desjardins, Guide parlementaire.

L.-N. Carrier, Les événements de 1837–1838 (Beauceville, Qué., 1914). Christie, History of Lower Canada. Fauteux, Patriotes, 220–21. E. C. Guillet, The lives and times of the Patriots; an account of the rebellion in Upper Canada, 1837–1838, and the Patriot agitation in the United States, 1837–1842 (Toronto, 1938), 128. P.-G. Roy, Fils de Québec, III, 70. Télesphore St-Pierre, Histoire des Canadiens du Michigan et du comté d'Essex, Ontario (Montréal, 1895). E. A. Theller, Canada in 1837–1838, showing by historical facts, the causes of the late attempted revolution, and of its failure; the present condition of the people, and their future prospects, together with the personal adventures of the author, and others connected with the revolution (2v., Philadelphia, 1841). Tremblay, Histoire du Saguenay. [J.-.B.-H. Brien], "Un document inédit sur les événements assez obscurs de l'insurrection de 1837–1838," Canadian Antiquarian and Numismatic J. (Montreal), 3rd ser., V (1908), no.1, 13. Victor Morin, "La 'république canadienne' de 1838," RHAF, II (1948–49), 483–512. Antoine Roy, "Les Patriotes de la région de Québec pendant la rébellion de 1837–1838," Cahiers des Dix, XXIV (1959), 247–48. P.-G. Roy, "L'évasion de Dodge et Theller de la citadelle de Québec," Cahiers des Dix, V (1940), 121–44.

DUBORD, HIPPOLYTE, shipbuilder, politician, and justice of the peace; b. 25 Nov. 1801 at Bonaventure, L.C., son of Louis Dubord and Marie-Antoinette Bourdages; d. 9 Oct. 1872 at Quebec.

The son and grandson of a navigator, Hippolyte Dubord seems to have developed early a liking for things of the sea. When he was quite young he came to Quebec with his parents, and was initiated in shipbuilding. In 1827 he launched a brig of 133 tons, the Bonaparte: it was a time when the Napoleonic legend, long repressed, was finding its way into French Canada. Nine years later he built two barks christened Papineau and Jean-Baptiste; patriotic fever was at its height, and Dubord seems to have associated himself with the demands then being made. He launched a ship again in 1840, but it was particularly after 1845 that his reputation as a shipbuilder became established. In ten years he built some 23 ships, including brigantines, brigs, and barks. From 1856 to 1869 he launched 25 others, 12 of them in 1864 and 1865. Among his most important ships may be mentioned the Pemberton, 1,253 tons (1846), the Crown, 1,284 tons (1851), the Julia, 1,070 tons (1852), the Stambord, 1,272 tons (1853), the Maldon, 1,187 tons (1855), the Québec, 1,257 tons (1860), the Calumet, 1,628 tons (1863), the François Dumas, 1,208 tons (1864), the Steward Lane, 1,180 tons (1864), the Lena, 1,061 tons (1865), and the Algonquin, 1,499 tons (1867).

Setbacks and the generally bad state of his business made him give up shipbuilding around 1869. This industry had been the most important economic activity in Quebec since the end of the 18th century. More than 5,000 vessels had been built there, and during the good years, between 1842 and 1876, more than 5,000 workers were employed. Competition from iron ships, a rise in production costs, due in large measure to an upward movement of salaries, a fall in the prices of ships on the British markets, the lack of capital on the part of Quebec contractors, who operated on a family basis: all these are reasons that help to explain the decline of shipbuilding, and no doubt Dubord's difficulties at the end of his career.

Dubord had taken part in the political life of Quebec on the municipal and provincial levels. In 1836 he was active as one of the justices of the peace responsible for the administration of the town of Quebec. Five years earlier the city had received a charter by a law passed by the House of Assembly, and therefore the right to administer itself through an electoral body. From 1833 to 1836 the charter had been applied, but when it expired at the end of three years it had not been renewed. The town was then governed by justices of the peace, a regime that had existed between 1764 and 1833. The jurisdiction of the justices of the peace extended in principle to all that concerned the peace and good order of the citizens; it applied to areas as diverse as trade, public works, protective services against fire and disease, and police forces. In 1840 the town reverted to government according to the terms of the charter of 1833, amended.

Dubord represented Quebec Lower Town in the House of Assembly from 1834 to 1838. In 1836 he voted in favour of the famous motion calling for an elected Legislative Council. In 1851 he was MLA for the town of Quebec, which he represented until 1854. He returned to the assembly in 1857 and remained there until 1860; at the election of 16 April 1860 Dubord, who contested the election as a Liberal-Conservative, had to yield to a Liberal, Pierre-Gabriel Huot*. In the house Dubord kept his distance from the Rouges, and seems to have been concerned above all with local interests, which led him to adopt a line of action that was scarcely partisan. It is, of course, true that all political life in this period was characterized by the absence of party discipline and consequent ministerial instability.

On 31 Jan. 1870, at Quebec, Dubord married Bridget Furlong from Neuville, where he lived at least from then on. He died in dramatic circumstances less than two years later. On a brief visit to Quebec, where he was brought by a lawsuit that could not help but worry him, he put up at the Hôtel Fréchette on the Côte de la Montagne. During the night he fell from his fourth floor window and succumbed as a result of multiple fractures. It appears that Dubord, who was accustomed at home to take the air at night, wanted to step out of his room, thinking he was in his own house where the window of his room gave on to a gallery. At the coroner's inquest the jury returned a verdict of accidental death.

The reporter of the Journal de Québec praised his excellent spirit and great generosity. The reporter of L'Événement (perhaps Hector Fabre*) described him as "a man whom one could not approach without taking a strong liking to him. To an individual turn of mind, as original as it was piquant, was allied an excellent heart. His conversation was full of quips, a mixture of amusing anecdotes and half jocular, half serious admissions.... Like all sincere people he did not spare himself any more than he did others, and when he acknowledged his own mistakes and commented on his contemporaries it was something worth hearing: he was able to etch with one stroke the things in his memory."

PIERRE SAVARD

AJQ, Registre d'état civil, paroisse Notre-Dame, paroisse Sainte-Jeanne de Neuville. Le Canadien (Québec), 11 oct. 1872. L'Événement (Québec), 10 oct. 1872. Journal de Québec, 10 oct. 1872. Morning Chronicle (Quebec), 10 Oct. 1872. Desjardins, Guide parlementaire, 152, 163, 178. Chapais, Histoire du Canada, IV. Cornell, Alignment of political groups. Drolet, Ville de Québec, II, III. Fernand Ouellet, Histoire de la Chambre de commerce de Québec (Publ. du Centre de recherche de la faculté de commerce de l'université Laval, série: histoire économique, 1, Québec, [1959]). Narcisse Rosa, La construction des navires à Québec et ses environs; grèves et naufrages (Québec, 1897).

DUCHESNAY. See JUCHEREAU

DUGGAN, GEORGE, lawyer, judge, and politician; b. August 1812, at Mallow, County Cork, Ireland, son of John and Mary Duggan; d. at Toronto, Ont., 14 June 1876.

George Duggan came to Canada as an infant with his parents. They joined John's brother George*, in York (Toronto), Upper Canada, then settled in Hamilton. The younger George went to York about 1828 and studied law in the office of Simon Washburn. He was licensed attorney and notary public in 1833, and called to the bar in 1837 after an unusually lengthy apprenticeship. On 19 Nov. 1839 he married Phoebe Anne, daughter of James Rogers ARMSTRONG and sister of Mary, wife of Egerton Ryerson*. When his brother John was admitted to the bar in 1840 they formed the partnership of Duggan and Duggan.

The Duggan family was exuberant in its opposition to the rebels of 1837, and George Jr more than the others; he succeeded in being captured by William Lyon Mackenzie*'s men. His uncle George, a Tory and office-seeker of long standing, had risen in Toronto from carpenter to coroner and the younger George, his protégé, showed similar ambition. He must early have been an Orangeman, and was district master by 1840. He sat as alderman in Toronto twice, 1838–40 and 1843–50. In 1840, 1848, 1849, and 1850, he aspired unsuccessfully to the mayoralty.

In January 1838 Duggan attempted to fill the vacant assembly seat in the 1st riding of York, and polled strongly behind John William GAMBLE, a Tory. A full year before the election of March 1841 his electoral address was out for the 2nd riding of York. The other five seats within the county fell to candidates of Lord Sydenham [Charles Poulett Thomson*]. Duggan sought but did not receive Sydenham's backing; nevertheless his boisterous loyalism, his Orange order ties, his links with the Methodists through his marriage, and the Roman Catholicism of his opponent gave him an easy victory, and he immediately assured the administration of his goodwill. Election irregularities compelled him to fight the seat again in 1842; this time he decisively defeated Robert Baldwin* himself. In November 1844 he won again as a supporter of Sir Charles Metcalfe* "for British Hearts and Liberal Measures" against the low, scheming, Reform "oligarchy." His most conspicuous parliamentary activity was in opposition to the bill, directed against the Orange order, outlawing party processions. Conservatives in the riding jockeyed for the nomination in December 1847. Duggan, the city lawyer, was thrust aside. Provincial party leaders then entered him belatedly in Durham against the county's leading Reformer, James Smith, but he lost decisively.

Duggan hoped to be appointed recorder of Toronto through the offices of the city council and a Tory government, but the incoming Reformers in 1848 refused him patronage despite his assurance, made in confidence, that his lodge membership had lapsed three years before. He made an identical assurance, of his membership having lapsed three years earlier, when he again applied in 1850, even though he had been deputy county master for East York in 1848–49, and junior deputy grand master for British North America in 1849–50. Nevertheless, the Reform government, on the city council's recommendation, and perhaps trying to buy Orange neutrality if not support, grudgingly appointed him recorder from January 1851.

The recorder tried minor civil cases. In fine judicial tradition Duggan shed much of the partisanship which petitioners had claimed disqualified him for the post. As one of Toronto's police commissioners ex officio from 1858, he helped to enforce a new policy of refusing employment to all members of secret societies (such as the Orange order), and during the Fenian scares of the 1860s he worked to contain Protestant animus. In 1868 he was promoted judge of the York county court, and he remained in this post until his death in 1876.

By learning effacement and observing decorum in routine magisterial tasks George Duggan reached the lower level of the judiciary, and the two sons who survived him were lawyers. He had not attained the mayor's chair and could not ensure his renomination as a parliamentary candidate. He was only a makeweight on a number of company boards and was not a member of synod (though churchwarden of St James' in Toronto, 1862–69). His funeral nevertheless brought out the city's dignitaries and 70 carriages, and encomiums from newspapers of all political leanings on a man "not brilliant but kind and conscientious."

Barrie Dyster

City of Toronto Archives, Toronto city council, Minutes, 1838–50. MTCL, Baldwin papers, index entries for Duggan and Gurnett; George Duggan Jr, a.l.s. to J. C. Morrison, 20 March 1848. PAC, MG 26 A (Macdonald papers), 237, G. McMicken to Macdonald, 18 March 1866; RG 5, A1, 30 Sept. 1837; C1, 1850, no.2167. PAO, Toronto city council papers, 1838–50. PRO, CO 42/456, 417–21. Christian Guardian (Toronto), 9–23 Nov. 1842; 9 Oct., 6 Nov. 1844. Evening Telegram (Toronto), 15, 16 July 1876. Globe (Toronto), January 1848; 15 July 1876. Mail (Toronto), 15–17 July 1876. Patriot (Toronto), 30 Jan. 1838.

Arthur papers (Sanderson). British American League, Minutes of the proceedings of a convention of delegates . . . (Kingston, 1849); Minutes of the proceedings of the second convention . . . (Toronto, 1849). Loyal Orange Association of British North America, Grand Lodge, Annual Reports, 1849–50. Town of York, 1815–1834 (Firth). Commemorative biog. record, county York, 397–98. Landmarks of Toronto (Robertson), III, 469. Middleton, Municipality of Toronto.

DUNCANSON, ROBERT STUART, artist; b. in 1817 or 1822 in New York State of a Scottish-Canadian father and Negro mother; d. on 21 Dec. 1872 in Detroit, Mich., leaving a wife.

Robert Stuart Duncanson, who was given at least a primary school educaton by his father, spent his childhood in Montreal. He was sent abroad to study by the Anti-Slavery Society. In 1842 he joined his mother in Cincinnati, working as a daguerreotypist, and there also painted and exhibited some works. Duncanson went to Europe in 1853 for the customary tour of art centres in Italy, France, and England, in the company of William Sonntag, a painter of the Hudson River school. He returned the following year: "I was disgusted with our Artists in Europe. They were mere copyists." He was living in Montreal in 1861 (and possibly earlier), but went abroad late in 1861 or 1862, spending much of his time in Scotland; he was evidently greeted with enthusiasm abroad. Two of his landscapes in oil, "The Lotus Eaters" and "Chaudière Falls," were in the Canadian display at the Dublin exhibition, 1865. The date of his return to America is unknown. It seems probable that he again spent some time in Montreal and associated with artists connected with William Notman*'s photographic studios. He was in Detroit from 1871 until his death. In Detroit he exhibited with considerable success, one of his best known canvases, "Ellen's Isle, Loch Katrine," going into the possession of Charles Sumner, a prominent abolitionist senator. Before his death, Duncanson suffered a mental breakdown.

The subject-matter of Duncanson's paintings was varied. His earlier works included portraits of leading citizens of Cincinnati and Detroit, and genre paintings. Later he had affinities with the romantic realists of the Midwest who were linked with the Hudson River school of landscape painting. Noteworthy among his landscapes in this manner were murals commissioned by Nicholas Longworth I for his home in Cincinnati (now the Taft Museum). Exotic subjects with lakes and palm trees appear in his canvases. He was most eclectic in his later years. Among his works are a number of Canadian landscapes showing scenes of autumn and of winter snow somewhat in the manner of Cornelius KRIEGHOFF. His painting is represented in the collection of the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts as well as in American galleries.

J. RUSSELL HARPER

Canada, an encyclopædia, IV, 357. G. C. Groce and D. H. Wallace, The New York Historical Society's dictionary of artists in America, 1564–1860 (New Haven, 1957). J. R. Harper, Early painters and engravers in Canada (Toronto, [1971]), 98. The Negro in art; a pictorial record of the Negro artist and of the Negro theme in art, ed. A. L. Locke (Washington, 1940). Ten Afro-American artists of the nineteenth century, an exhibition commemorating the centennial of Howard University (Washington, 1967). A. S. Cavalla, "Uncle Tom and Little Eva, a painting by Robert S. Duncanson," Detroit Institute of Arts, Bull., 30 (1950–51), 21–25. E. G. Porter, "Robert S. Duncanson, midwestern romantic-realist," Art in America; an illustrated magazine (New York), XXXIX (Oct. 1951), 99–154.

DUNDAS, GEORGE, army officer, politician, and colonial administrator; b. 12 Nov. 1819 in England, first son of James Dundas of Dundas, Scotland, and Mary Tufton Duncan; d. 18 March 1880 on St Vincent in the Windward Islands.

Following completion of his education, George Dundas entered the British army in 1839. He served for five years and during that time was posted to Bermuda and Nova Scotia. After resigning his commission, he was elected as a Tory to the British House of Commons where he sat for Linlithgow from 1847 to 1858. He married Mary Clark in April 1859 (they did not have children), and in the same year embarked upon a new career, as colonial administrator.

When Dundas arrived in Prince Edward Island on 7 June 1859 to take up his duties as lieutenant governor, he was stepping into a delicate position. His four predecessors in office had become openly identified with one party or the other in local politics, with the result that they had been unreservedly abused by whatever section of the factious Island press felt itself to be out of favour. A few months before Dundas' arrival, the Tories under Edward Palmer* had defeated the Liberals led by George COLES. In his early dispatches to the Colonial Office, the new governor sometimes betrayed a partiality towards the Palmer government and a corresponding irritation with the opposition. He confidently described the Tories as having the support of "far the greatest proportion of the educated and the most respectable classes." In contrast, he portrayed the Liberal legislative councillors as "obscure, uneducated, and ignorant, selected from the lower classes, irresponsible for their actions."

In late 1860 Dundas became embroiled in a public controversy with William McGill, a militia officer and former Liberal assemblyman. A group of Roman Catholic volunteers had resigned from their company because of a dispute with their commanding officer, a Captain Murphy, also a Catholic, and had requested that McGill, a Presbyterian, command a new company. Dundas refused to give arms to the new company. McGill took the issue to the public, and chaired a meeting at which Dundas was censured. When the governor, through his adjutant general, Lieutenant-Colonel P. D. Stewart, asked for a retraction, and was refused, he stripped McGill of his rank. McGill responded by publicly accusing Dundas, as an Anglican and a former Tory member of parliament, of having acted out of religious prejudice and political partisanship. Dundas then struck McGill's name from the list of justices of the peace. In taking these actions, Dundas was widely considered to have exceeded his authority; whether he had done so or not, the whole affair was unfortunate for him, as he subsequently became a target for abuse in the Liberal press.

Edward Whelan*'s Examiner and Edward REILLY's Vindicator were especially critical of Dundas in 1862 and 1863, when he was caught in the middle of polemical battles between William Henry POPE, the colonial secretary, and Father Angus MacDonald*, the rector of St Dunstan's College. In June 1862 MacDonald wrote to Dundas and demanded that he dismiss Pope from office for his offensive writings on the Roman Catholic religion. When Dundas, a personal friend of Pope, refused, the rector sent the same request to the secretary of state for the colonies, the Duke of Newcastle [Henry Pelham Clinton]. The latter also declined to intervene officially but did, however, write a private letter to Dundas referring to Pope's conduct as "disgraceful" and asking the governor to "do all in your power" to terminate the controversy. The vendetta was renewed in early 1863, when MacDonald wrote two more letters to Newcastle, in which he attacked both Pope and Dundas; the secretary of state, weary of the "quarrelsome priest," again refused to become involved. Although these differences with MacDonald, and related episodes, apparently did not affect Dundas' standing with the Colonial Office, they led to an intensification of the attacks upon him in the Examiner and the Vindicator. These did not slacken until a general political calm descended late in 1863.

Dundas took an active part in attempts to settle the Island's land question. In his first year as governor, he intervened personally to ensure that the Selkirk estate was sold to the government rather than to private individuals. George Coles stated in 1869 that "Mr. Dundas had more influence with the proprietors in inducing them to sell, than any Lieut. Governor we ever had." Nonetheless, in the mid-1860s Dundas was repelled by the radicalism of the Tenant League whose members were pledged to refuse payment of rents. He called the league a "contemptible" organization, led by "senseless demagogues." He was on leave in Britain when in 1865 the administrator, Robert HODGSON, called in troops to deal with disorders caused by the league. Dundas heartily approved of this vigorous action, and wrote to Edward Cardwell, the secretary of state for the colonies, telling him that he had more than once urged his constitutional advisers to take legal action against Ross's Weekly, the organ of the league.

When the confederation issue arose, Dundas privately urged the Quebec resolutions upon Island politicians. He fully agreed with his superiors in London in their hope that Prince Edward Island would join the other British North American colonies, and in May 1866 he reported to Cardwell that "at one time I even indulged in the hope that if the other Colonies agreed to terms of Union, I should be able to form a Party [on the Island] to carry it." This was a vain hope, for in the election of 1867 the Island population strongly supported the anti-confederate candidates running for assembly seats.

George Dundas returned to Britain in October 1868. He never came back to Prince Edward Island, although the decision to transfer him to another posting was not finally taken until the end of 1869. Dundas died in 1880 on the Island of St Vincent where he had been governor for several years.

Dundas' decade as governor of Prince Edward Island was eventful. He was the object of much criticism, and even abuse, in the early 1860s. This may have been inevitable, considering the verbal violence of Island public life at that time, and the role which his predecessors in office had played in local politics. He failed in his efforts to further the cause of confederation, but public opinion was almost totally opposed to the measure. Despite his hysterical reaction to the challenge of the Tenant League to established authority, he nevertheless appears to have been genuinely concerned with the plight of the tenantry. The judgement rendered in 1863 by Arthur Hamilton Gordon*, then lieutenant governor of New Brunswick, that "Dundas though no Solomon has some quiet sense" seems valid; by the time he left the Island, he had few enemies. Placed in a difficult position, with many pitfalls, Dundas had done a competent job and had won the respect of both Liberals and Conservatives.

IAN ROSS ROBERTSON

University of Nottingham Library, Newcastle MSS, Letter books, Colonial correspondence, 1859–64 (microfilm in PAC). PAC, MG 27, I, F2 (Pope papers), George Dundas to James Dundas, 1 Sept. 1863. PRO, CO 226/91–226/104, especially 226/91, 156–63; 226/100, 153–55, 463–66; 226/101, 664–67; 226/102, 160–63; 226/103, 138–39; 226/105, 513–14. Prince Edward Island, House of Assembly, Debates and proceedings, 1869, 131–38, 142–46, 154, 160–61. Examiner (Charlottetown), 13 April 1880. Vindicator (Charlottetown), 1863 – especially important are 6, 13, 20 March, 3, 17, 24 April, 22 May. Bernard Burke, A genealogical and heraldic history of the landed gentry of Great Britain (12th ed., London, 1914), 572. Bolger, PEI and confederation. MacKinnon, Government of PEI. MacMillan, Catholic Church in PEI, 193–206, 231–33. Robertson, "Religion, politics, and education in PEI," 78–91, 94–143, 150–54, 157–60.

DUPUIS, NAZAIRE, founder of one of the great Montreal business undertakings; b. 1843 at Saint-Jacques-de-l'Achigan (Saint-Jacques, Montcalm County), L.C., son of Joseph Dupuis, a merchant, and Euphrasie Richard, of Acadian ancestry; d. 24 Aug. 1876 at Montreal, Que.

On his father's death in 1864, Nazaire Dupuis came to Montreal with his family in order to try his fortune there and support his dependants. In 1868, after acquiring a working knowledge of business as an employee for four years, he opened a fancy goods shop at the corner of Sainte-Catherine and Montcalm streets, in the east end of town. The business, a modest one, occupied a building 25 feet by 50. Two years later, success obliged him to enlarge his undertaking, and he established himself on the corner of Sainte-Catherine and Amherst streets.

At this period the population of Montreal was nearing 100,000. Full of initiative, Nazaire Dupuis crossed the Atlantic no less than five times for his business affairs, and established profitable contacts with European industrialists, particularly with those of Lancashire, England. He had gradually got his numerous brothers interested in his firm, which, despite the economic crisis that struck the continent after 1872, continued to prosper. But in August 1876 Nazaire Dupuis died prematurely. He was only 32.

The legal proceedings which ensued nonetheless indicated that, thanks to his shrewdness, Nazaire Dupuis had already acquired substantial assets, valued at more than $215,000. Fortunately his estate, properly administered, ensured the continuation of the firm. It was reconstituted shortly afterwards as a limited liability company, and in 1882 was moved to the spot occupied today by the large store known as Dupuis Frères Ltée. With varying fortunes, the company remained under the management of the brothers, the nephews, and a great-nephew of the founder until 1961.

In 1870, at Montreal, Nazaire Dupuis had married Alphonsine Saint-Onge. She survived him by 40 years. At his death he left several children, the eldest being Joseph-Nazaire-Odilon Dupuis*, who became parish priest of Saint-Eusèbe-de-Verceil and a distinguished personality in Montreal life during the first third of the 20th century. The name of Nazaire Dupuis has its place on the list of those creative spirits who, in each generation, make an appearance in the economic and social history of Canada.

Jean-Jacques Lefebvre

AJM, Greffe de J.-L. Coutlée, succession Nazaire Dupuis, 7 sept., 16 sept. 1876; Procédures non-contentieuses, sept.–déc. 1876; Registre d'état civil. Guy Courteau et François Lanoue, Une nouvelle Acadie, Saint-Jacques de l'Achigan, 1772–1947 ([Montréal, 1947]), 321–24. Roger Duhamel, Une grande aventure commerciale (Montréal, [1963]). "Canadian Chamber's executive faces year of surging growth and activity," Canadian Business (Montreal), XXIX, no.11 (1956), 18–19. Noella Desjardins, "Dupuis et Frères un centenaire canadien-français," Le Magazine de La Presse (Montréal), 24 févr. 1968.

DUPUY, JEAN-BAPTISTE, Catholic priest, editor, and educator; b. 15 Sept. 1804 at Contrecœur (Verchères County), L.C., son of Joseph Dupuy, militia captain, and Françoise Richard; d. 13 Oct. 1879 at Saint-Antoine-sur-Richelieu, Que.

While continuing his studies at the college of Montreal, Jean-Baptiste Dupuy taught there from 1829 to 1832. He was ordained priest on 2 Sept. 1832, and was first a curate in different parishes for about four years. On 28 Oct. 1836 he was appointed first parish priest of Saint-Aimé (Richelieu County), and held this post until 1841. Then he was made responsible for the parish of Saint-Jean-Baptiste (Rouville County) until 1843. In that year Bishop Ignace Bourget* entrusted him with the editorship of the periodical Mélanges religieux, which was then the organ of the bishopric of Montreal. He carried out this duty for two years and then again became a parish priest.

During the many years he devoted to ministering to a parish, Dupuy liked to bring together the poorest and most intelligent of the children, in order to teach them and prepare them for classical studies. He had stayed for a short time at the college of Chambly in September 1836; in 1846 he was appointed director of the college of L'Assomption. Founded by Dr Jean-Baptiste Meilleur, Dr Louis-Joseph Cazeneuve, and the parish priest François Labelle, this college had opened its doors in 1833. In 1846 it offered two programmes: a preparatory course which emphasized practical subjects, and the classical course proper. Two years after Dupuy's arrival the only teaching staff left were priests and seminarists. The lay teachers assigned to the French and English classes had been let go, for it was considered that only ecclesiastics could be good educators, with the qualities and the special grace necessary for training youth. In addition, the laymen had to be paid much more than the churchmen; the latter received board and lodging at the college, and their salaries were paltry.

In 1850 the college and its director were the victims of a somewhat curious occurrence. A group of pupils formed a kind of secret society, adopting a code language, dressing in a weird fashion, and playing at being revolutionaries. They were called the "Flambards." They started a clandestine paper, part playful, part scientific, and uniformly mocking and disrespectful towards the authority of the institution. Dupuy had to take the blame for this affair, whose echoes penetrated to the ears of Bishop Bourget of Montreal.

At the college of L'Assomption, Dupuy preserved and established a number of customs relating to piety, studies, hygiene, and festivals. In his Histoire du collège, Anastase Forget sums up Dupuy's work, saying that he understood young people, re-established authority, and made himself well liked. The pupils he trained remembered him with extraordinary affection.

Another incident is a good example of Jean-Baptiste Dupuy's zeal for education. In 1849 the parish of L'Assomption, with the authorization of the superintendent, Meilleur, decided to open a bilingual school and to stress the teaching of English; the commissioners went further, and asked for two schools to be opened, one English and the other French. Dupuy then offered to set up a French model school free of charge. The aim of the programme was "to teach, within three years, gradually and as the children [acquired] ability, French grammar, arithmetic, double entry bookkeeping, Canadian history, Biblical history, geography, the art of letter-writing, a little zoology and ornithology, particularly the part that [might] be helpful for domestic economy and agriculture, a small manual of agriculture, the understanding of [A. Gérin-Lajoie*'s] political catechism, and even, if it [were] possible, as an experiment, a small manual of the humanities and rhetoric."

Dupuy became a parish priest again in 1852, and was appointed to the parish of Saint-Antoine-sur-Richelieu in 1858. Always held in high esteem by the bishops of the diocese of Saint-Hyacinthe, he accompanied them on their pastoral visits in 1856, 1859, and 1861. In 1866 he was appointed a member of the diocesan council, and in 1873 went with Bishop Charles LA ROCQUE as a theologian to the Quebec council.

In an obituary article, La Minerve testified eloquently in Jean-Baptiste Dupuy's favour: it stressed his extraordinarily honest judgement, his enlightened mind, his warm heart, his detachment from earthly possessions, his spirit of charity, and his love and generosity towards the poor, whom he assisted to the extent of being continually in want. Study was always one of the passions of his life, and this enabled him to be a preacher as serious as he was interesting, and a theologian whose counsel and opinions were always received with profit.

LOUIS-PHILIPPE AUDET

Mélanges religieux (Montréal), 1843–1845. Allaire, Dictionnaire. Alexis de Barbezieux, Histoire de la province ecclésiastique d'Ottawa et la colonisation dans la vallée de l'Ottawa . . . (2v., Ottawa, 1897), I, 187–89. Anastase Forget, Histoire du collège de L'Assomption (Montréal, [1933]), 95–98, 151–56, 251–52. J.-B. Meilleur, Mémorial de l'éducation du Bas-Canada (2^{e} éd., Québec, 1876), 156, 171.

DUROCHER, FLAVIEN, Sulpician, Oblate of Mary Immaculate, missionary, parish priest; b. 7 Sept. 1800 at Saint-Antoine-sur-Richelieu (Verchères County), L.C., son of Olivier-Amable Durocher and Geneviève Durocher; d. 6 Dec. 1876 at Quebec.

After studying at the college of Montreal from 1818 to 1820, Flavien Durocher taught there until 1823; on 20 September of that year he was ordained priest. He was appointed assistant priest at Notre-Dame de Montréal, then at Trois-Rivières, and in 1827 he joined the Sulpicians, who received him as a member the following year. He resumed teaching at Montreal (1827–29), then became assistant priest on the Indian reserve of Lac-des-Deux-Montagnes (Oka); there until 1843 he gave his services to the Algonkins, for whom he had some religious works printed.

As he wanted to devote his efforts more completely to spreading the gospel among the Indians, he entered the noviciate of the Oblates at Longueuil (Chambly County) in 1843, and was sent a year later to the residence of Saint-Alexis in Grande-Baie (Grande-Baie, Chicoutimi County). Appointed superior in 1849, he was entrusted with the supervision of 14 missions among the whites and eight among the Montagnais at Chicoutimi, at Lac-Saint-Jean, and at the king's posts on the banks of the St Lawrence and as far as Labrador. He had thus to cover a territory of more than 200 leagues. For these Indians he composed books of prayer and built chapels, particularly at Bersimis.

At this time the Oblates considered that they would be better situated at Quebec, even for spreading the gospel among the Indians. They left their Saguenay residence in 1853 and took over the Saint-Sauveur chapel, which had been built by Abbé Zéphirin CHAREST and which was inaugurated on 29 June 1853. Durocher was appointed director of the new residence (1853–73). Following the fire of 14 Oct. 1866 the mission of Saint-Sauveur was made into a parish, and by the efforts of Flavien Durocher, who was nominated parish priest, the church and the schools rose once more from their ashes.

This work did not prevent him from retaining his interest in the Indian missions – the residence of Escoumains, and that of Bersimis, which was controlled by Quebec. Almost every year he visited the Lac-Saint-Jean mission, and worked towards the establishment of missions among the Naskapis in the interior of Labrador and on Ungava Bay.

Durocher was a high-spirited, persistent, and devout man, and was regarded as a zealous minister by several generations of worshippers at Saint-Sauveur, of which he was parish priest from 1867 to 1876. A lake and township in the province of Quebec bear his name, and a monument has been erected in his honour in the city of Quebec.

GASTON CARRIÈRE

[The AHO hold several works by Father Flavien Durocher; the main manuscripts are: "Anicinâbe aiamie Kikkinwa' amigusi kiwek'amang Kanactogeng," 1842; "Dictionnaire français-montagnais," [1846–47]; "Instructions sur le sacrement de pénitence," [algonquin], 1834; "Kikijeb gaie onaguci aimaianiwang. Manadji'ata K.M.," 82–121; "Tebeniminang Jezos ka iji-pimâtisigubanen akking ij onbiwinitagogubanen wakwing Kikkinawâcijikâtêm ka on dimikâtênik o miniwadjimowiniwang Kwa Mattieu, Kwa Mark, Kwa Luk, Kwa Jan"; Pierre Cholenec, "Vie de Catherine Tekakwita appelée en algonquin Mitakwenibekwe, morte en odeur de sainteté au Sault St Louis en 1680, à l'âge de 24 ans," traduit de l'algonquin par Flavien Durocher. The main printed works are: Aiamie kushkushkutu mishinaigan ([Québec], 1847); Ir mishiniigin. Eku omeru tshe apatstats Ishkuamishkornuts, Uiapokornuts, Uashaornuts, Mashkuarornuts, Shikotimiornuts kie Piokuakmiornuts ([Montréal], 1852). [Pierre Cholenec], Catherine Tekakouita (traduit de l'algonquin par Flavien Durocher, [Montréal], 1876). G.C.]

AAQ, PP. Oblats; Registres des lettres des évêques de Québec. Archives générales des O.M.I. (Rome), Dossier Flavien Durocher (copie aux AHO). Archives provinciales O.M.I. (Montréal), Dossier Flavien Durocher; Dossier Québec; Dossier Saguenay (copies aux AHO). Marcel Bernad, Bibliographie des missionnaires Oblats de Marie-Immaculée; I: Écrits des missionnaires Oblats, 1816–1915 (1v. paru, Liège, 1922). Notices nécrologiques des O.M.I., III, 301–31. A.-L. Bertrand, Bibliothèque sulpicienne ou histoire littéraire de la Compagnie de Saint-Sulpice (3v., Paris, 1900), II, 376–77. Gaston Carrière, Un apôtre à Québec; le père Flavien Durocher, o.m.i. (1800–1876), premier curé de Saint-Sauveur (Montréal, 1960). Adrien Valiquette, Biographie du révérend père Flavien Durocher, premier curé de Saint-Saveur de Québec (Québec, 1911).

DUVAL, EDMUND HILLYER, educator and philanthropist; b. February 1805 at London, Eng., third child of Peter Duval and Elizabeth Wood; m. 28 Sept. 1828 to Sarah Turner by whom he had eight children although only four lived to maturity; d. 17 Sept. 1879 at Saint John, N.B.

During most of his life Edmund Hillyer Duval was a teacher. Between 1835 and 1845 he was in charge of a large school at Bristol, England, sponsored by the British School Society. The society founded such schools to bring at least a rudimentary education to the working classes. The teaching method consisted of gathering a large number of pupils together with one teacher and several of the better students acting as sub-teachers. In 1845, upon invitation, Duval came to Saint John and established a "British School," the first classes apparently being held in the Mechanics' Institute. Conscious of the extreme shortage of teachers, Duval promoted his school to a model school for the training of teachers. In 1849 he visited teacher-training schools in New England and Toronto; his report of the trip stressed the need to raise substantially the miserable wages paid New Brunswick teachers. As master of the model school (after the Fredericton normal school was destroyed by fire in 1850, it was for almost two decades the sole institution for the training of teachers) and as inspector of schools after 1858, Duval returned repeatedly to the wage issue in his official reports. He was also author of a pamphlet published in 1858 which advocated reforms in New Brunswick education.

Duval's efforts to raise the standards of life were not limited to formal education. As a young man he is said to have worked for the benefit of the Jews of East London. He was an active Christian, gaining a licence to preach from the Germain Street Baptist Church of Saint John in 1870. In the last years of his life he worked hard to improve the deplorable lot of the Negroes in Saint John, not through missionary zeal, as might have been expected, but by trying to induce the spirit and practice of self-help.

RICHARD RICE

N.B. Museum, Edmund Hillyer Duval papers, transcripts, and genealogy; Tilley Papers, Edmund Hillyer Duval to S. L. Tilley, 16 June 1860. E. H. Duval, Suggestions on the improvement of our common schools (Saint John, N.B., 1858). Daily Telegraph (Saint John, N.B.), 19 Sept. 1878. New Brunswick, Chief superintendent of schools, Fourth annual report (Fredericton, 1855), Sixth annual report (1857), Seventh annual report (1859), Reports, 1861–68 (1862–69). New Brunswick, House of Assembly, Journals, 1847–50. I. E. Bill, Fifty years with the Baptist ministers and churches of the Maritime provinces of Canada (Saint John, N.B., 1880). K. F. C. MacNaughton, The development of the theory and practice of education in New Brunswick, 1784–1900: a study in historical background, ed. with intro. by A. G. Bailey (University of New Brunswick Hist. studies, I, Fredericton, 1947), 129, 130, 137, 139–42, 173, 174.

E

EARLY, MAY AGNES (Fleming), novelist; b. 15 Nov. 1840 in Saint John, N.B., daughter of Bernard and Mary Early; d. 26 March 1880 in New York, N.Y.

May Agnes Early was educated in Saint John at the Convent of the Sacred Heart. While still a school girl, and an avid reader of fiction, she sold her first story to the New York Mercury; she then devoted herself to the writing of short stories and serial novels. These, published for some years under the name of Cousin May Carleton, appeared in such papers as the Western Recorder and Weekly Herald (Saint John), the Mercury, the Pilot (Boston), and the Metropolitan Record (New York). She appears to have taught school for a short time near Saint John, and on 24 Aug. 1865, after an acquaintance of three weeks, she married a machinist, William John Fleming. Her fiction from then on appeared under the name by which she is best known, May Agnes Fleming.

A prolific and popular writer, Mrs Fleming was offered exclusive contracts, first with Saturday Night (Philadelphia), and then with the New York Weekly and the London Journal. Her serials for periodicals later appeared in book form, running to a long list of novels. From all sources her yearly income in the depressed 1870s was in excess of $10,000 a year, making her Canada's first outstanding success as a professional novelist. In the Maritimes at that time this term could be applied accurately only to one other writer, James DE MILLE. Indeed so valuable was the name May Agnes Fleming on a title-page that after her death it was given not only to her own writing but to the work of others with the approval of her publishers, the most active of them being Street and Smith.

Mrs Fleming and her family went to the United States about 1875, living briefly in Boston apparently and then in Brooklyn (New York). At her death from Bright's disease at the age of 40, she and her husband were estranged, and she left a controversial will drawn up in 1876 which was intended to ensure that her children – two sons and two daughters – should be brought up as Roman Catholics and that her husband should have as little as possible to do with them or their inheritance.

May Agnes Fleming was a master of the minor convention in which she wrote: the suspense-laden serial tale of high life in England and America. Her characters and incidents were simple and stereotyped, but her plots were as ingenious and satisfying as those of Wilkie Collins, and her writing style was vigorous and direct. Typical of her work published in the 1870s are Guy Earlscourt's wife, A terrible secret, A wonderful woman, A mad marriage, Kate Danton, One night's mystery, The rival brothers, The heir of Charlton. Although her fiction was primarily designed for a British and American audience, Mrs Fleming remembered her Canadian readers and took pains to introduce Canadian episodes and characters into most of her novels, at times with considerable ingenuity. The fact that her novels were written for and published by firms in the United States and Britain is to be explained, not only by the larger market in those countries whose literary fashion she followed, but also by the state of copyright law at the time, which gave scant protection to works by Canadian authors published in Canada.

FRED COGSWELL

For a listing of May Agnes Early's books see: W. G. MacFarlane, New Brunswick bibliography: the books and writers of the province (Saint John, N.B., 1895), 31–32 and Watters, Check list, 207–8.

N.B. Museum, Macbeath papers, E. T. C. Knowles scrapbook, assorted newspaper clippings. Daily Sun (Saint John, N.B.), 1880. Daily Telegraph (Saint John, N.B.), 13 Dec. 1878. H. P. Gundy, Book publishing and publishers in Canada before 1900 (Toronto, 1965). Lit. hist. of Can. (Klinck), 111.

ELLIOT, ADAM, (Elliott), Church of England clergyman; b. at Nicholforest, Cumberland, England, baptized 19 Dec. 1802, son of Adam Elliot and Margaret Little; d. at Grand River (Tuscarora) Reserve, Ont., 4 June 1878.

The Elliot family came to Upper Canada and settled in York (Toronto). Adam Elliot Jr presented himself to Archdeacon John Strachan* in 1828 asking for help in pursuing studies for the ministry. Strachan was impressed with Elliot's earnestness and directed his reading until his ordination to the diaconate in November 1832. Adam Elliot then immediately began a five-year term of service as a travelling missionary in the Home District north and east of York. He received financial support from a local missionary society in Upper Canada and from the Reverend William James Darley Waddilove* in England.

Elliot's journals describe vividly the pioneer conditions of the time, and his registers of baptisms and marriages reflect the faithfulness and untiring energy of the young missionary. He ministered to the Ojibwa Indians, who had been concentrated in 1830 by the government at Coldwater and The Narrows (Orillia) under the charge of Captain Thomas Gummersall ANDERSON. A proposal by Anderson in 1835 to settle the scattered tribes of the north shore of Lake Huron on Manitoulin Island was approved by the lieutenant-governor, Sir John Colborne*, and Elliot obtained the consent of Bishop Charles James Stewart* of Quebec to be the resident missionary in the infant establishment in 1836. When the plan was temporarily shelved in 1837, Elliot returned to the Home District but was soon stationed for a short time at Beckwith in the Bathurst District (now in Lanark County).

Elliot accepted a request in 1838 to work at the New England Company station near Brantford.

The company had begun to take an interest in the Six Nations Indians on the Grand River in 1827. They appointed Robert Lugger* their first missionary at Brantford in that year, and he was later joined by Abraham Nelles*. Lugger died in 1837 and in March 1838 Elliot took over at Tuscarora, where he carried on pastoral and educational work until his resignation in 1875. He died 4 June 1878 and was buried in the cemetery of Holy Trinity Church, Onondaga, Ontario.

Shortly after moving to the Tuscarora mission Adam Elliot married Eliza Beulah Howells. Four children were born to them but none survived their parents. Emily Susanna Howells, Eliza's sister, came to live with the Elliots in 1845 and helped to care for the children; that same year she married George Johnson*, Elliot's Indian interpreter who also lived at the parsonage. Their daughter was Pauline Johnson*, the poetess. Eliza Howells died in 1849 and Adam Elliot married Charlotte Racey in 1856.

Adam Elliot enjoyed the confidence of the New England Company throughout his long service with them. He retained the approving friendship of his former instructor John Strachan and was highly regarded by the first bishop of Huron, Benjamin Cronyn, in whose diocese the Tuscarora mission was located after 1857. His quiet and effective labours among the Indians never ceased to arouse interest among visitors, one of whom, James Beaven, wrote of Elliot in his Recreations of a long vacation: "I was gratified to observe his peculiar adaptation of character to the simple people amongst whom he dwells, and the entire confidence which subsists between him and his flock."

T. R. Millman

The Elliot family papers are in the possession of Mrs Lawrence Crumb, Nashotah, Wisconsin. James Beaven, Recreations of a long vacation; or a visit to Indian missions in Upper Canada (London, Toronto, 1846), 30–55. New England Company, Report, 1840 (London, 1840); Report, 1868 (1869); History and report, 1869–70 (1871); Report, 1871–72 (1874); Six years' summary, 1873–78 (1879). Dominion Churchman (Toronto), 23 June 1878. The Stewart missions; a series of letters and journals, calculated to exhibit to British Christians, the spiritual destitution of the emigrants settled in the remote parts of Upper Canada ..., ed. W. J. D. Waddilove (London, 1838), 29–96. W. P. Bull, From Strachan to Owen; how the Church of England was planted and tended in British North America (Toronto, 1937). A sketch of the origin and the recent history of the New England Company by the senior member of the company (London, 1884). Dorothy Keen and Martha McKeon, "The story of Pauline Johnson, Canada's passionate poet," as told to Mollie Gillen, Chatelaine (Toronto), XXXIX (February, March 1966), 25f, 39f.

ELLIS, JOHN, printer and musician; baptized 21 Jan. 1795, at Cley-next-the-Sea, Norfolk, Eng., son of Anne Ellis; d. 19 Nov. 1877, near Toronto, Ont.

John Ellis was apparently comfortably established in London, England, by 1836. He had a business in the City in Old Broad Street and was a freeman of the Goldsmiths' Company; he owned two country properties in Essex; his wife of eight years, Rhoda Anne Benton, had just had their first child. But in that year he sold the London property and in August the family sailed for British North America, reaching Toronto in October. For a year or two Ellis "bushed it" west of the city on land adjoining that of John George Howard*.

In the early 1840s Ellis opened an office in Toronto as an engraver, eventually extending into lithographic printing of substantial projects, including the Plan of Toronto in about 1858. Probably the main line of business was stationery. In 1867 the firm was bought by Joseph T. Rolph and, with mergers, has since grown into the modern lithographic house of Rolph-Clark-Stone, Limited.

Ellis was an enthusiastic, and reportedly an accomplished, amateur cellist, prominent in the city's young musical life. With the Reverend John McCaul* he organized the Toronto Philharmonic Society in 1845 and served on its committee for many years. He was also a founder, and the orchestra leader, of the Toronto Vocal Music Society.

Ellis was Anglican, Conservative, and an early member of the St George's Society in Toronto. After retiring from business he lived at his old home overlooking Humber Bay, where he died in 1877.

Ian Montagnes

MTCL, Plan of Toronto, surveyed and compiled by W. S. and H. C. Boulton, Toronto, 1858(?). A xerox of a manuscript, "R.C.S. LTD," with additional comments by Arthur Alder can be found at Rolph-Clark-Stone, Limited, Toronto. Globe (Toronto), 21 Nov. 1877. The Toronto directory and street guide for 1843–4, ed. Francis Lewis (Toronto, 1843), 35. Brown's Toronto city and Home District directory, 1846–7 (Toronto, 1846), 23. City of Toronto directory for 1867–8 (Toronto, 1867), 380. W. C. Chewett & Co's Toronto city directory for 1868–9 (Toronto, 1868), 399. Commemorative biog. record, county York, 519–20. Helmut Kallmann, A history of music in Canada, 1534–1914 (Toronto and London, 1960), 98. Middleton, Municipality of Toronto, I, 525. W. H. Pearson, Recollections and records of Toronto of old, with references to Brantford, Kingston and other Canadian towns (Toronto, 1914), 213–14.

END, WILLIAM, lawyer, politican, magistrate; b.c. 1800 in Limerick, Ireland; m. in 1827 to Lucy Morse in Amherst, N.S.; assassinated on 14 Dec. 1872 at Bathurst, N.B.

Nothing is known of the circumstances under which William End immigrated to New Brunswick, or the date. He studied law with William Botsford* in Dorchester and became an attorney on 20 Feb. 1823. He worked first in Saint John; following his admission to the bar on 17 Feb. 1825, he moved to Newcastle. End served as clerk of the peace for Gloucester County from 1827 to 1847, and as registrar from 1837 to 1841, the year he was appointed queen's counsel. He was appointed prosecuting officer for Gloucester in 1848.

William End was elected to the New Brunswick assembly in 1830. He represented Gloucester County until 1850, and again from 1854 to 1861. End's notoriety as "a loquacious and impetuous partisan of the common people" arose from his first campaign, during which he made astute use of the religious and patriotic emotions of the county's Acadian and Irish population. End allegedly called the powerful magistrates' courts "a scandalous, corrupt and rotten system packed up by Mr. [Hugh] Munro," his opponent and the leading magistrate. He likewise "foamed and raged in the most furious manner" against the tyranny of such influential merchants as Robert Ferguson* and Alexander Rankin* who, in league with the justices, were inclined to trample on the susceptibilities of Gloucester's indigent majority.

In the assembly, however, End generally "worked and voted with the 'compact' side of the House," prompting the liberal James Hannay* to see in him "a man of no principle, who took the side of those in authority because he thought it would be to his own personal advantage." Thus End supported the administration on the explosive crown lands issue and William Colebrooke*'s rash appointment of his son-in-law Alfred Reade as provincial secretary in 1845, and he strongly sustained the prerogative of John Henry Thomas MANNERS-SUTTON to dissolve the assembly in 1856.

Though in 1846 End enthusiastically supported the appropriation of £1,000 for a loyalist monument, he had protested the fanfare bestowed in 1833 upon the 50th anniversary of the loyalist arrivals, reminding people of the labours of the English, Scots, and Irish. It is perhaps indicative of the over-all climate of New Brunswick that it did not occur to the member for Gloucester to include the Acadians, who comprised the majority of his own constituents. Before the 1860s, the Acadians as a group virtually never came up in debates on the politics of New Brunswick. Indeed, it was only when End's career was near its end that this group ventured their first timid steps on the main road of provincial life.

End suffered defeat in 1850, but ran again in 1854. Despite his strong conservatism (he was vehemently opposed to the transfer of money grants to the executive), End kept in mind his recent defeat, supported the return to power of Charles FISHER, and was himself elected. In the "Rum" election of 1856, End, who supported the repeal of prohibition, was returned, but lost his seat when his opponents successfully contested the result. He returned to the assembly in the election of 1857, and sat until dissolution in 1861. In all, William End represented Gloucester for 26 years. In 1862 former colleagues appointed him law clerk to the House of Assembly.

Little information is available about End's private life. There seems to be no record of children of his own (his wife had a daughter from a previous marriage). The details of his law practice are vague. It is known that he had profitable property holdings and other investments, and that he lived in Saint John from 1841 to 1843, and in the United States from 1850 to 1854. At confederation he became the first county clerk, and at the time of his death he was a stipendiary magistrate and a director of the Bathurst grammar school.

William End died tragically in his burning office in Bathurst at the hands of a young man, James Meahan Jr, whom he had recently sentenced to four months in the county jail. Though the incident outraged the public, newspaper commentary suggests that by 1872 End's political career had been all but forgotten. Sir Howard Douglas* had felt End, though "very clever," was "disposed to be troublesome and factious. . . ." George Edward Fenety* saw in him "a man of superior parts . . . who seemed to want judgment at the right time."

BERNARD POTHIER

Gloucester County Court (Bathurst, N.B.), Gloucester County records, 1–21. N.B Museum, Folder 58, deeds to land in Westmorland County, 1784–1828; Folder 64, item 37 (William End to Sir John Harvey, 25 June 1838); Folder 90, original appointments; New Brunswick, Gloucester County land grants; "Linking the past with the present," a series of articles by E. S. Carter which began in the Saint John Telegraph-Journal, 6 Nov. 1929; New Brunswick Historical Society papers, Packet 4 (Steeves coll.), item 10; Howard P. Robinson papers, "History of Albert County," typescript by W. C. Milner, *c.*1933. PAC, MG, 24, A17 (Harvey papers), ser.1, 1; ser.2, 6. PRO, CO 188/41, 188/43, 188/71, 188/72, 188/91, 188/104.

Fenety, Political notes and observations. New Brunswick, House of Assembly, Journals, 1831–62. New Brunswick Courier (Saint John, N.B.), 1830–65. New Brunswick Royal Gazette (Fredericton), 1830–70. Morning Freeman (Saint John, N.B.), 17 Dec. 1872, 15 Feb. 1873. Saint John Daily Telegraph and Morning Journal, 16, 26 Dec. 1872; 15 Feb. 1873. Telegraph-Journal (Saint John, N.B.), 17 March, 16 June 1931. An almanack for the year of our Lord, 1828 ... for ... Saint John, N.B. ... (Saint John, N.B.). Lovell's province of New Brunswick directory for 1871 (n.p., n.d.). The New Brunswick almanac and register for ... 1849 (Saint John, N.B., 1848). Hannay, History of New Brunswick, II. Lawrence, Judges of New Brunswick (Stockton). MacNutt, New Brunswick.

ERLANDSON, ERLAND, HBC clerk and the first European to travel overland from Hudson Strait to the Atlantic coast; b. c. 1790 in Denmark; d. at Port Hope, Ont., 23 Jan. 1875.

Erland Erlandson was "bred a ship carpenter in the dock yard of Copenhagen." In December 1813, while apparently serving as a Danish seaman, he was taken prisoner by the English in the Kattegat and sent to a prison ship at Chatham, Kent. Early in the following year, at the end of the war between Great Britain and Denmark, the Hudson's Bay Company recruited a number of Scandinavians, including Erlandson, for service in Hudson Bay. At this time he was described as a stoutly built man of 5 feet 9½ inches, with a pale, oval, pock-marked face, hazel eyes, and light brown hair.

Erlandson began work in 1814 as a sailor attached to Eastmain House on the east shore of James Bay. He had then only a slight knowledge of English, but his correspondence and journals of a later date show that he gained a good command of the language. He quickly earned the reputation of being "an excellent servant . . . strictly honest, sober, and active, and very intelligent," and was rewarded with promotion. In 1817 he was transferred to the Moose Factory district where he was in charge of workmen engaged in carpentry and various routine duties. Two years later he became a clerk, and in 1822 took charge of Eastmain House. He remained there until 1830 when he accompanied Nicol FINLAYSON as second in command "on dangerous service" to Ungava.

After an overland journey from Richmond Gulf (Lac Guillaume-Delisle) to Ungava Bay, they built Fort Chimo about 27 miles from the mouth of the South (Koksoak) River and near an anchorage for the vessels which were to bring supplies to this most isolated of all HBC posts. An early breakdown of the sea-link with Hudson Bay emphasized their hazardous position in an inhospitable country and this, coupled with their concern about the meagre trade, caused Finlayson, in February 1831, to send Erlandson overland with letters to Governor George Simpson*. These were lost, however, when Erlandson's canoe was wrecked near the head of Michipicoten River. But he reported to Simpson in person at York Factory and arrived back at Fort Chimo in the sloop Beaver in the following September.

In 1832 Erlandson built South River House on the Kaniapiskau River about 130 miles south of Fort Chimo. After suffering great hardship and gaining only a small trade at the expense of Finlayson's, he abandoned his post in 1833 and returned to Fort Chimo. His experience convinced both Finlayson and himself that any post inland from Fort Chimo should be situated near the height of land, and that communication with the company posts on the Gulf of St Lawrence was essential. Erlandson, therefore, under instructions from Finlayson, prepared to travel overland to Mingan and eventually five somewhat reluctant Indians agreed to guide him. The party left Fort Chimo on 6 April 1834 and travelled south via Whale River to Lake Petitsikapau (near present-day Schefferville, Que.). There Erlandson realized that the Indians' firm intention, suspect from the start, was to travel towards the Atlantic coast. The party crossed Lake Michikamau and continued east, following a chain of small lakes to Naskaupi River and Grand Lake. On 22 June they reached the western end of tidal Lake Melville (in the area of present-day Goose Bay, Labrador) and Erlandson thus became the first European to travel overland from Hudson Strait to the Atlantic coast. On the return journey, beyond the height of land, he used a more westerly route through Lakes Wakuach and Chakonipau to reach Kaniapiskau River and Fort Chimo, where he arrived on 17 July. His report on the promising fur country of the interior led Simpson to adopt a new policy for Ungava. In future Fort Chimo and interior posts were to be linked with a depot on Esquimaux Bay (Hamilton Inlet) which would be supplied by ship from Quebec.

On Finlayson's departure in 1836, Erlandson had charge of Fort Chimo until John McLean* arrived in the following year. In spite of his undoubted abilities Erlandson had not been promoted and he was now a disappointed man. Simpson recognized his claims, but thought that the vote-casting commissioned officers would be unwilling to elect to a chief tradership one who was "a foreigner and raised from the ranks." Erlandson's health was deteriorating but in 1838 he built Fort Nascopie on an arm of Lake Petitsikapau. From there, in 1839, he accompanied John McLean on a journey to Esquimaux Bay during which they became the first Europeans to see the Grand (Churchill) Falls of the Grand (Churchill) River. Before leaving Ungava in 1840, Erlandson spent the winter at Fort Trial on George River.

In 1841, after many delays while travelling, Erlandson reached the company's Lake Superior district to which he had been assigned. The posts of which he had charge there, Long Lake (1841–43) and Pic (1843–48), did not offer enough scope for his abilities and so enable him to press for promotion. His dissatisfaction grew and he retired voluntarily in 1848.

In "easy circumstances, without a family," he settled near retired chief trader George Gladman* in Port Hope, Canada West. He visited London and Denmark in 1853–54, and apparently in 1855 stayed for a while with John McLean, who was then agent for the Bank of Montreal in Guelph, C.W. Two sums of money disappeared in mysterious circumstances during his visit, and because, on his death in 1875, he left an estate of some $14,000 (most of which he bequeathed to the Toronto General Hospital), he has been accused of having stolen the missing money. No accusation was made against Erlandson during his lifetime and in the interests of justice an examination should be made of his financial transactions in Canada, in London, and possibly in Denmark, before judgement is passed on one who always bore an exemplary character.

ALICE M. JOHNSON

HBC Arch. G.1/62, G.1/64, G.1/236 (three MS charts). HBRS, III (Fleming); XXIV (Davies and Johnson). McLean's notes of twenty-five year's service (Wallace).

ERMATINGER, EDWARD, fur-trader, businessman, politician, and writer; b. in February 1797 on the island of Elba, son of Lawrence Edward Ermatinger, assistant commissary general in the British army, and grandson of Lawrence Ermatinger*, merchant of Swiss origin who married a sister of fur-trader Forrest Oakes*; d. in October 1876 at St Thomas, Ont.

Edward Ermatinger's mother, an Italian, died when he and his younger brother Francis* were infants. Their father – "indeed a good-hearted man – but what a strange Father" – apparently took only a casual interest in their upbringing, but Edward received in England a good education in languages and music. Several members of the family were fur traders – an uncle, Charles Oakes Ermatinger*, established the important trading post at Sault Ste Marie – and Lawrence Edward Ermatinger arranged for his sons' entry into the service of the Hudson's Bay Company as apprentice clerks. The brothers sailed from London on Prince of Wales, arriving at York Factory on 14 Aug. 1818.

Edward Ermatinger remained in the company's service until 1828, at Island Lake, Oxford House, York Factory, Red River (all in present-day Manitoba), and for three years in the Columbia district. His "York Factory express journal," covering his travels between Fort Vancouver and York Factory, 1827–28, has been published, along with a diary of his canoe journey out to Lachine in 1828. He had, however, little enthusiasm for the life of the trade. "I have long sought to get out of this Country but never could manage it before – now I must struggle once out of it to keep so." Though there is reason to believe that he was diappointed in his hopes that Governor George Simpson* would promote his advance in the company, he accepted a reverse with equanimity: "I never heartily desired to return." He was to remain on friendly terms with many former colleagues in the trade, including John Work*, some of whom unburdened themselves freely to this sympathetic correspondent and often asked him for advice on their establishing themselves after retirement. He seems to have had no regrets about leaving the northwest and the "humdrum life we led there."

Ermatinger visited England in 1828, where he saw his father, but returned to Canada in 1829. He made several journeys through Upper Canada and his diaries suggest that he was seeking a new way of life. He finally settled in St Thomas where he thought he saw opportunities for the profitable employment of his small capital. There, as postmaster from at least 1842 to 1876, banker, and merchant, he remained until his death. He opened a general store, and was successively manager of the Bank of Upper Canada, the Commercial Bank, and for 14 years the Bank of Montreal. When Elgin County was established in 1851 he was the moving spirit in the formation of the Bank of the County of Elgin and was chairman of the board.

Ermatinger contested the Middlesex seat in the Legislative Assembly. In 1844 he was elected as a Conservative. He was defeated in 1847 and by 1851 he had withdrawn from politics: "What I gained in wisdom I lost in pocket." He did not find congenial a political climate in which "some of the advisers of Her Majesty's Representatives were the rebels of '37." He obviously found more enjoyment in literary composition, writing several pamphlets, many letters to the press, particularly to the Hamilton Spectator under the pseudonym of "British Canadian," and a biography of Colonel Thomas Talbot*. He also founded the St. Thomas Standard about 1843–44, and edited it for two years before selling it. He married Achsah Burnham, daughter of Zaccheus Burnham* of Cobourg and sister of the Church of England rector at St Thomas. They had seven children.

Edward Ermatinger appears from his correspondence to have been a man of attractive personality, who cherished his friendships. He devoted himself indefatigably to his business, but his diary of a trip to New York records a nightly visit to a theatre or other entertainment. He took great pleasure in music and his proficiency with the flute and violin provided him with enjoyment long after he had left the fur trade. He made a collection of the words and music of French Canadian folksongs, which survives, and one of his friends refers to a "Red River March" he composed. An active man, though introspective, he displayed a lively interest in affairs at home and abroad and held vigorous opinions on the issues he discussed in his letters and published writings. In spite of his freely expressed dislike of the life of the fur trade, he preserved no animus against the HBC and defended it against its critics.

Deeply concerned with religion, Ermatinger was a staunch adherent of the Church of England. He was, as a Mason and an anti-Catholic, no sympathizer with the more conciliatory views espoused by Toronto bishop, John Strachan*, noting that "the vigilance of the laity is required to expurgate the leaven of popery with which [the church] is infected." He seems early to have won the "estimation of all the most respectable" and to have retained it until his death.

L. G. THOMAS

Edward Ermatinger was the author of The Hudson's Bay territories; a series of letters on this important question (Toronto, 1858), and of Life of Colonel Talbot, and the Talbot settlement, its rise and progress ... (St Thomas, C.W., 1859). There is also: "Edward Ermatinger's York Factory express journal, being a record of journeys made between Fort Vancouver and Hudson Bay in the years 1827–1828," ed. C. O. Ermatinger and James White, RSCT, 3rd ser., VI (1912), sect.II, 67–132.

PABC, Edward Ermatinger papers, 1828–49. PAC, MG 19, A2 (Ermatinger family papers), ser.2; A21 (Hargrave papers); MG 24, D16 (Buchanan papers); MG 25, G, 107 (Ermatinger family papers). University of Western Ontario Library, 27 (Ermatinger papers), boxes 1–3. HBRS, II (Rich and Fleming); IV (Rich); VI (Rich); XVIII (Rich and Johnson). Vignettes of St. Thomas, an anthology of the life and times of its first century, ed. W. C. Miller (St Thomas, Ont., 1967). C. O. Ermatinger, The Talbot regime; or the first half century of the Talbot settlement (St Thomas, Ont., 1904).

EVANS, JOHN, miner and MLA; b. 25 Jan. 1816 at Machynlleth, north Wales; m., in Wales, first, on 1 June 1840, Martha Evans (who died young) and secondly, in November 1842, Ann Thomas (d. 1866) by whom he had three sons and two daughters, and at Victoria, B.C., on 24 April 1877, Catherine Jones; d. 25 Aug. 1879 at Stanley, B.C.

Born and brought up in a Welsh village, John Evans worked as a young man in Manchester, but in 1854, in order to give his children a "pure Welsh" upbringing, he moved to Tremadoc, where he had interests in several small quarries. In 1863 he emigrated to British Columbia in charge of "one of the better organized attempts to secure gold in the Cariboo." Henry Beecroft Jackson, a wealthy Manchester cotton manufacturer, offered to finance the project for two years, all profits to be divided: one half going to the men in equal shares; the other half to Evans and his patron. Evans personally selected 26 respectable north Welsh miners including his second son Taliesin, and on 22 Dec. 1862 the men sailed aboard the Rising Sun for Victoria via Cape Horn. Evans himself went by the shorter Panama route. Leaving Liverpool on 17 Feb. 1863 he arrived on 15 April, and thus had time to examine various mining possibilities on the mainland before the Rising Sun docked on 10 June.

Having applied for a mining lease on Lightning Creek, "Captain" Evans, as his men called him, left Victoria at the head of the Welsh company on 16 June, and after a gruelling journey over the Harrison-Lillooet trail established on 21 July the "Basford Mines," at the junction of Last Chance and Lightning creeks, the site of the present settlement of Stanley. Capital, skill, and energy were not wanting; nevertheless the venture failed. The glowing descriptions of the Cariboo by the Victoria correspondent of the London Times had ignored the exorbitant price of provisions, as well as the need for more efficient machinery than wooden pumps and waterwheels to control the water which flooded into the shafts. By the time the men's contract expired on 1 Oct. 1864 eight rebels had already left the enterprise and Evans had recovered only $450 worth of gold for an expenditure of over $26,000. Most of the Welsh company returned home, but their leader stayed on until he died, trying to develop claims on Antler and Davis creeks, acting as a mining and land surveyor in the Cariboo district, and cherishing the vain hope that "sooner or later something may turn up." But he was never able to send for the wife or the "dear children" left behind in Wales.

Almost as soon as he arrived on Lightning Creek, Evans was asked to stand for election to the first Legislative Council of the mainland colony. He consented, chiefly in order to press for the amendment of the existing mining laws which gave no protection to the man who had sufficient capital to embark on a large-scale venture. A claim could be staked only by an individual miner, who was then free to dispose of it as he chose. Thus Evans had been compelled either to place himself at the mercy of his workmen by recording titles in their names, or to lease ground abandoned by individual miners. He was defeated in the elections of 1863, 1965, and 1871. Finally in 1875 he was elected to the Legislative Assembly of the province, and re-elected in 1878. He declared himself to be "no party man," but voted as his conscience bade him, and "his energetic and eccentric manner in urging his views on the House" was long remembered.

A strict Nonconformist, who had hoped to give part of his mining profits to the Booth Street Welsh Congregational Chapel in Manchester, Evans did his best to improve manners and morals in the Cariboo. He frowned on drinking, gambling, and swearing and would not allow his men to work or travel on Sunday. In 1866 he and other Welshmen built the Cambrian Hall in Barkerville, where religious services, literary meetings, and celebrations of St David's Day were held until the great fire of 1868. Evans had no great success as a miner, but he was loved and respected throughout the Cariboo for his generosity, his scrupulous integrity, and his courage in maintaining the principles he believed to be right. For the simple wooden head-board of his grave in the Stanley cemetery his friends chose the fitting epitaph: "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord."

DOROTHY BLAKEY SMITH

PABC, John Evans papers. British Columbia, Legislative Assembly, Journals, 1876–79. Cariboo Sentinel (Barkerville, B C.), 1865–75. Colonist (Victoria), 1863–79. Victoria Daily Standard, 28 Aug. 1879. Can. parl. comp., 1876; 1877; 1878; 1879. Alan Conway, "Welsh gold-miners in British Columbia during the 1860's," BCHQ, XXI (1957–58), 51–74. R. L. Reid, "Captain Evans of Cariboo," BCHQ, II (1938), 233–46.

EYNARD, MARIE-GERMAIN-ÉMILE, Oblate of Mary Immaculate, missionary; b. 28 May 1824 at Genoa, Italy, son of Jacques Eynard and Marie-Anne-Agathe Lévêque, who came originally from Embrun (department of Hautes-Alpes), France; d. 6 Aug. 1873 at Fort Chipewyan, N.-W.T.

Marie-Germain-Émile Eynard began his studies at the classical college of Embrun and completed them at the college of the university, where he obtained his baccalaureate in arts and also in mathematics. After studying at the École Polytechnique, he joined the roads department.

In 1847 he was at Longuyon (department of Moselle) as acting inspector of rivers and forests. He soon left this post and entered the seminary of Metz; he was then admitted into the noviciate of the Oblates at Notre-Dame de l'Osier (department of Isère), and made his profession on 1 Nov. 1854. He completed his training at the theological college of Montolivet, near Marseilles, and there, on 24 March 1855, holy orders were conferred on him by Bishop Charles-Joseph-Eugène de Mazenod.

The following year Eynard was living in the presbytery of Notre-Dame de Cléry (department of Loiret), where because of his frail health and innate timidity he seldom officiated as a priest, but acted as tutor for the Marquis de Poterat's sons. From there he went to Dublin to study English for some months, before leaving for the missions in the Canadian northwest.

He arrived at Saint-Boniface (Manitoba) in 1857, and during the winter of 1857–58 was curate of Saint-Norbert; he then set out for the missions of the Athabasca-Mackenzie district, together with Archdeacon James Hunter* of the Church of England. He was intended for the poor but important mission of St Joseph, at Fort Resolution on the shore of Great Slave Lake. The missionary was exposed to hunger and solitude, and the employees of the mission put endless difficulties in his way. In addition to looking after his flock, Eynard studied the Montagnais language and taught French and the catechism to the children at the Hudson's Bay Company post. Despite feeble health and weak eyesight, he visited and ministered to the posts at Fort Rae and Fort Providence. His numerous and arduous journeys caused his bishop, Henri Faraud*, to remark that he spent "the greater part of his winters with snow-shoes on his feet, and sleeping on the snow."

From 1863 until his death in 1873 he served at the mission of La Nativité (Fort Chipewyan, N.-W.T.), on the shores of Lake Athabasca, and at the chapel of Notre-Dame-des-Sept-Douleurs (Fond du Lac). From there he went out to various parts of the region, and each year was to be found at different forts: Providence, Resolution, as well as at Salt River. On 15 Aug. 1867, while living at Fort Chipewyan, he was one of the two assistant priests on the occasion of the modest ceremony at which Bishop Isidore Clut* was consecrated.

Timid and not much of a talker, Eynard always experienced considerable difficulty in learning and speaking the Montagnais language, which he styled "unmanageable"; he nevertheless continued to study it until the end of his life. The Indians with whom he dealt considered him a "good man," and one of them was prompted to say: "With Father Eynard one speaks less, but one prays with more fervour." His spiritual influence was unrivalled; but because of his absent-mindedness he was always deemed unsuited to take on the practical direction of a mission. However, his superiors and his confrères sought out his company and held him in high esteem. He was a level-headed and sagacious man, and became a member of the vicariate council of the Mackenzie district. Moreover, his conciliatory spirit enabled him to act as an agent for peace between the Catholic missions and the officers of the HBC. He maintained relations of real friendship with Lawrence Clarke, a bourgeois of Fort Rae, and with Roderick MacFarlane, of Fort Chipewyan. In conformity with the attitudes of the time, Eynard deplored the arrival of Protestant ministers in the district, and was ready for any sacrifice to defend his flock.

Father Eynard died while bathing in Lake Athabasca. His body was recovered thanks to his friend MacFarlane. In accordance with the desire he had expressed before his death, he was buried in the old Indian cemetery of the mission of La Nativité. It is said that he was keenly missed by all, Protestants as well as Catholics.

GASTON CARRIÈRE

Archives of the archbishopric of Grouard-McLennan (McLennan, Alta.), Mémoires de Mgr Isidore Clut. Archives de l'archevêché de Saint-Boniface (Man.), Germain Eynard, Histoire de la mission de Saint-Joseph du Grand lac des Esclaves. Archives générales O.M.I. (Rome), Dossier Germain Eynard; Histoire de la mission de Notre-Dame-des-Sept-Douleurs établie au fond du lac Athabasca (copies in AHO). Notices nécrologiques des O.M.I., II, 423–29. [P.-J.-B.] Duchaussois, Aux glaces polaires; Indiens et Esquimaux (1re éd., Lyon, [1921]), 230–33. Morice, Hist. de l'Église catholique, II. Henri Faraud, "Nécrologie," Les missions catholiques (Lyon), VI (1874), 21–23.

F

FALCON, PIERRE (or jocularly Pierriche – Pierre the rhymer), poet and song-writer, a Métis of Red River; b. 4 June 1793 at Elbow Fort (near present-day Swan River, Manitoba), in the Swan River Department of the North West Company; d. 26 Oct. 1876 at Saint-François-Xavier, Man.

Pierre Falcon was named after his father, an employee of the North West Company. His mother was an Indian woman said by early historians to have been from the Missouri country but believed by her descendants to have been a Cree. As a child Pierre was taken to Lower Canada and baptized at L'Acadie (Saint-Jean County) on 18 June 1798. He apparently lived with relatives, and although early historians described him as unlettered, he learned to read and write. At the age of 15 young Falcon returned to Red River to become a North West Company clerk. In 1812 he married Mary, daughter of the Métis Cuthbert Grant* Sr; the couple had three sons and four daughters. After the amalgamation of the Hudson's Bay Company and the North West Company in 1821, Falcon served the new company until 1825.

With a number of other Métis families, he then followed Cuthbert Grant* Jr to Grantown (Saint-François-Xavier) on the White Horse Plain. There the group settled, and the 1838 census listed Falcon as having 30 acres of land under cultivation. By 1849 he was shown with only 15 acres since the remainder had been divided among his sons. He was a justice of the peace for the settlement.

Pierre Falcon, described by his descendants as an excitable and quick-moving man, had a poet's feeling for words and a musician's sense of rhythm, and he used them to put local incidents into songs. An armed clash between a party of mounted Métis under Cuthbert Grant Jr and the Selkirk settlers under Governor Robert Semple*, at Seven Oaks (in present-day Winnipeg) on 19 June 1816, was the subject of his best known song, "La Chanson de la Grenouillère." Another Métis ballad, entitled "Le Lord Selkirk au Fort William, ou La danse des Bois-Brûlés," tells a further part of the story of Seven Oaks. In retaliation for events at Red River, Lord Selkirk [Douglas*] and his soldiers, en route to the settlement, seized the Nor'Westers' headquarters at Fort William in August 1816. A ball held there later by Selkirk is what is described in this ballad, attributed to Falcon. A third song to survive is "Ballade du général Dickson," describing the departure from Grantown in 1837 of an American adventurer, James Dickson*, who dreamed of setting up an Indian kingdom in California.

During the Red River troubles of 1869–70, Falcon, though advanced in years, wished to accompany the party of Métis going to the boundary to stop Governor William McDougall*'s entry into the settlement in October 1869. He protested: "While the enemy is occupied in despatching me, my friends can strike hard and get in many good blows." Prevented from participating he wrote instead a song of mockery, "Les tribulations d'un roi malheureux," which was set to the tune of "The wandering Jew."

Pierre Falcon is said to have composed many other songs describing the daily life of the voyageurs on the rivers and the hunters on the plains. Agnes Laut's "The buffalo hunt" is believed to be a romanticized free translation of the lyrics of a song by Falcon. The bard's songs were carried by the voyageurs from the St Lawrence to the Mackenzie, and Lake Falcon in Manitoba was named by them in his honour. His ballads were also sung by the Métis to the accompaniment of the fiddle around prairie camp fires. Regrettably, the words of many of Falcon's songs were never written down and have been lost.

BRUCE PEEL

[Pierre Falcon's extant songs are given in M. A. MacLeod, Songs of old Manitoba; with airs, French and English words, and introductions (Toronto, [1960]), 1–40. The following three articles by Mrs MacLeod each give one of Falcon's songs with its background; the first article has biographical information on Falcon, and the second includes a picture of him: M. A. MacLeod, "Bard of the Prairies," Beaver, outfit 286 (spring 1956), 20–25; "Dickson the liberator," Beaver, outfit 287 (summer 1956), 4–7; "Songs of the insurrection," Beaver, outfit 287 (spring 1957), 19–23. For variants in the tune of "Chanson de la Grenouillère," and biographical information on Falcon see: Margaret Complin, "Pierre Falcon's 'Chanson de la Grenouillère' " RSCT, 3rd ser., XXXIII (1939), sect.II; 49–58. B.P.]

FARRELL, JOHN, Roman Catholic priest and bishop; b. 2 June 1820, at Armagh, Ireland, son of James Farrell and Joan Patterson; d. 26 Sept. 1873, at Hamilton, Ont.

John Farrell emigrated to Canada with his parents, who settled in Kingston, Upper Canada, in 1830. He was educated in Kingston and at the seminary of Saint-Sulpice at Montreal, ordained in October 1845, and named pastor at L'Orignal. He later taught at Regiopolis College in Kingston for a few years before taking on the duties of pastor at Peterborough, Canada West. On 11 May 1856 Farrell was consecrated first Roman Catholic bishop of Hamilton.

One of Bishop Farrell's first tasks in the newly created diocese was to provide for the needs of its many German-speaking Roman Catholics. To this end he brought from Europe in 1857 two brothers, Fathers Eugene and Louis Funcken of the Congregation of the Resurrection of Our Lord Jesus Christ, who laid the foundations for the education of a native clergy, one of Farrell's principal objectives. The fruit of these efforts was St Jerome's College, located in Berlin (Kitchener) and incorporated by provincial statute in 1866.

In the summer of 1862 Farrell became involved in a local controversy when the dying Sir Allan MacNab*, long the leading political figure in Hamilton and a member of the Church of England, requested the bishop to receive him into the Roman Catholic Church. In the furore that ensued, George BROWN, the powerful publisher of the Toronto Globe and an opponent of Catholic interests in the province, claimed, over Farrell's strong denials, that MacNab had been duped into this "remarkable" death-bed conversion. The heated exchange was symptomatic of the deeper conflict then raging in the province.

Farrell, who had been lauded for his efforts to "educate his people" in both Peterborough and Hamilton, urged politicians, especially those in Canada East (Quebec), to defeat attempts by Brown and other Reformers to block effective school legislation for Roman Catholics in Canada West. The bishop repudiated his fellow-Irishman, Thomas D'Arcy McGee*, in 1859 for contemplating a political alliance with Brown and he criticized Brown's programme of representation by population in the fear that it might unduly strengthen the Protestant segment of the province. Later he was gratified when McGee rejected the friendship of Protestant Reformers who were opposed to separate school legislation, particularly the bill first introduced in 1860 by Richard William Scott*. A modified version of this bill received royal assent in 1863, after protracted debates, and "quite satisfied" Farrell. On the eve of confederation, Farrell, in company with other Canadian bishops, urged the government of John A. Macdonald* to embody the principles of Scott's act in the constitution of the Dominion, a course of action subsequently provided for in the British North America Act.

Farrell augmented the educational facilities of his diocese, notably by supporting the work of the Ladies of Loretto, who established schools for young women in Guelph and Hamilton, and of the Congregation of Notre Dame which founded academies at St Agatha, Formosa, and Waterdown. He combined his efforts on behalf of Catholic education with a "loathing and contempt for American Fenianism." Throughout his career he was, it would appear, "an uncompromising foe" of the "agitators who trade[d] upon Irish patriotism and Irish generosity."

C. M. JOHNSTON

Berliner Journal (Berlin (Kitchener), Ont.), 2 Oct. 1873. Canadian Freeman (Toronto), 29 July 1859. Catholic Citizen (Toronto), 5 June 1856. Gazette (Montreal), 29 Sept. 1873. Globe (Toronto), 27 Sept. 1873. Hamilton Spectator, 26 Sept. 1873. Mail (Toronto), 29 Sept. 1873. Documentary history of education in Upper Canada (Hodgins), XIX.

The golden jubilee of the diocese of Hamilton and consecration of St Mary's Cathedral, ed. M. J. O'Reilly (Hamilton, [1906]). J. G. Hodgins, The establishment of schools and colleges in Ontario, 1792–1910 (3v., Toronto, 1910), I, II. Moir, Church and state in Canada West. Theobald Spetz, The Catholic Church in Waterloo County ([Toronto], 1916). F. A. Walker, Catholic education and politics in Upper Canada: a study of the documentation relative to the origin of Catholic elementary schools in the Ontario school system (Toronto and Vancouver, 1955). Brother Alfred [A. J. Dooner], "The conversion of Sir Allan MacNab, Baronet (1798–1862)," CCHA Report, 1942–43, 47–64. T. F. Battle, "The Right Reverend John Farrell, D.D., first bishop of Hamilton," CCHA Report, 1942–43, 39–45. A. P. Monahan, "A politico-religious incident in the career of Thomas D'Arcy McGee," CCHA Report, 1957, 39–51.

FEILD, EDWARD, Church of England clergyman, inspector of schools, bishop of Newfoundland; b. 7 June 1801 at Worcester, England, third son of surgeon James Feild; m. in 1867 Sophia Bevan of Rougham Rookery, Suffolk, England, the widow of the Reverend Jacob Mountain; d. 8 June 1876 at Bishop's Court, Hamilton, Bermuda.

Edward Feild was educated at Rugby, where he gained distinction in Latin composition, and at Queen's College, Oxford, graduating BA in 1823, MA in 1826. He became a fellow of his college and after his ordination he served as curate at Kidlington, near Oxford, from which parish he rode into Oxford to attend to his university duties, thus reversing the practice of clerical fellows by lodging in his curacy instead of living in college and going out to his parish. At Kidlington, as at Bicknor, Gloucestershire, where he served from 1834 until 1844, Feild combined his parish duties with an interest in schools and teaching. Of this period a friend wrote, "He readily made up his mind, and was firm in execution; he was no talker, made no display, and all proceeded from him earnestly from the sober temperament and habit of his mind."

Partly through the influence of Dr Charles James Blomfield, the reforming bishop of London, who was impressed by Feild's reports in 1840 and 1841 as an inspector of schools for the National Society (a society for promoting the education of the poor in the principles of the established church), Feild was appointed bishop of Newfoundland in 1844. His consecration took place at Lambeth on 28 April 1844 at the hands of William Howley, archbishop of Canterbury, assisted by the bishops of London and Worcester. Upon his arrival in St John's on 4 July, he was greeted aboard ship by the two Church of England clergymen of St John's, their wardens, and other church officials, as well as by the son and private secretary of the governor, Sir John Harvey*. On the wharf were the Royal Newfoundland Companies with their officers, and the carriage of Lady Harvey took him to his temporary residence at government house. Of his reception, Bishop Feild wrote, "I should have preferred a procession with litanies and holy services attended by priests and choristers leading me to church . . . yet the mixture of secular and ecclesiastical respect was not to be contemptuously rejected . . . though to me, personally, the whole proceedings were as distasteful as they were unsought for and unexpected."

His dislike for secular display was soon forgotten in the larger task he found in Newfoundland. Some 24 clergymen of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel together with perhaps some 12 or 15 others were coping with the 43 churches scattered along its eastern and southern coasts. On the western French shore and Labrador coast were some settlements never visited by a clergyman. The area from Cape Ray on the southwestern corner of Newfoundland along the western coast to Cape St John near the port of Twillingate was treated as one of "non-settlement" by the government in keeping with a treaty with France, and no magistrates, excise officers, laws, or police were provided. Thus the settlers there, by their remoteness from any source of authority, tended to licentiousness in conduct and conversation. According to Archdeacon Edward Wix*, who visited the western coast and Labrador in 1830 and 1836, "acts of profligacy were practised at which the Micmac Indians expressed to me their horror and disgust. . . . I met with more feminine delicacy in the wigwams of the Micmac and Canokok Indians than in the tilts of many of our own people." Archdeacon Wix warned that "unless some sympathy be excited for the improvement of our people in this and like places, they must fast merge into a state similar to that in which the first missionaries found the inhabitants of the islands in the South Seas."

The new bishop's diocese included not only Newfoundland and the coast of Labrador, but also the Bermudas. During his 32-year episcopacy, Feild consistently protested against this arrangement as it added immeasurably to his problems by forcing him to divide his time between two areas some 1,200 miles apart, whose problems were completely different. The difficulties of travel in Newfoundland were alleviated by the Reverend Robert Eden, the rector of Leigh in Essex, later bishop of Moray and primus of Scotland, who presented an 80-ton brig to the diocese to be used as a church ship. As this vessel proved too large, the donor permitted it to be sold. A smaller ship, Hawk, was purchased, and became a familiar sight along the coasts of Newfoundland and Labrador. Each summer Bishop Feild spent three to four months visiting fishermen in the isolated outports where he regularized marriages, baptized children, and consecrated graveyards and churches. Often he travelled as much as 1,600 miles each year, and continued to do so until a coadjutor was appointed in 1867.

Gradually, under Bishop Feild's powerful influence, the character of the church in Newfoundland changed. Most of the clergy, influenced by Feild's predecessor Aubrey George SPENCER, had inclined towards the low church; by the close of Bishop Feild's long episcopacy, as D. W. Prowse* noted in his history of Newfoundland, "one of this school is now a rara avis in the diocese." Bishop Feild's firmness, or what some considered his intransigence, paralleled a similar hardening of feeling under the Roman Catholic bishops, Michael Anthony Fleming* and John Thomas Mullock*. The latter had forbidden the practice of "Catholics . . . going to Church in the evening . . . to compliment their Protestant friends," after attending mass in the morning. Bishop Feild's attitude towards Wesleyans and other Protestants was uncompromising. In a charge to the clergy in 1858 he warned of the "increase of the Wesleyans, now assuming the name and functions of a church, which makes but too manifest their desire and endeavour to draw away disciples after them." His fear of Wesleyan activities amongst Church of England members was reinforced by reports from clergymen in the outports. At Moreton's Harbour in Notre Dame Bay, he was told, the "Methodists, by their class-leaders and prophetesses, are busy everywhere, and have made such havoc in this mission, driving some out of their senses and many out of the Church."

His attitude towards Roman Catholicism was indicated in a letter to the bishop of London, to whom he described his first visitation along the Labrador coast in 1848. He observed that there were as many as 1,000 permanent settlers and some 10,000 temporary fishermen during the four summer months, and he spoke of the "wolves . . . among them, not sparing the flock"; "had a Roman Catholic priest come along the shore before me, many would have sought baptism, at least for the children . . . this danger is always imminent." He urged that a French-speaking clergyman be secured as "many of the men understand little English."

Both Church of England and Catholic feeling increased in the controversy that arose over the General Academy, established in 1845 under a grant from the provincial legislature. Even though the headmaster of the new academy was a Church of England clergyman nominated by the bishop, Feild was far from satisfied with it. He continued his own school, which he had established immediately upon his arrival in Newfoundland, "to mitigate," as he said, "the evil of a public academy established under liberal principles" that is, one having no religious instruction. Bishop Feild's hostility to the new academy was shared by Roman Catholics and other Protestants. The teaching staff was composed of the Anglican headmaster, two Irish Roman Catholic masters, and an Irish Episcopalian secretary. Native-born Newfoundlanders objected that there should have been a Newfoundland master and other Protestant denominations were irritated by the Church of England and Catholic monopoly on the staff. An additional objection was the fee of £8 per child. By 1850 the General Academy was dissolved and three separate academies formed, one of which was a Church of England academy directly under the bishop's control.

The same fears that led to the closing of the General Academy influenced Feild in his disapproval of the manner of distribution of the legislature's educational grant of £5,100. This was divided between Catholics and Protestants in proportion to population, which meant, in effect, that half of it went to the Catholics and the other half was awarded to the Protestants with no special reference to the Church of England. Feild complained that "We are fighting the battle of Education . . . and the Church (as between Romanists and Dissenters is usually the case) is jostled out of her rights." He also resented the share of the grant which was allotted to the schools of the Newfoundland School Society, a Church of England organization, but one which permitted Wesleyans on the staff of its schools. To Feild "Education could not be carried on without religion, and religion can never be truly and honestly taught without frequent recurrence to . . . those distinctive matters of faith . . . which each church recognizes." For these reasons, Feild sought and eventually secured a subdivision of the Protestant educational grant according to denominations. Each denomination gained more direct control over its allotment, but the result was a proliferation of denominational schools and, in some cases, a lowering of teachers' salaries.

Bishop Feild had incurred unpopularity by his uncompromising attitude towards any joint Protestant endeavours. In the spring of 1846 he refused an invitation to be a vice-patron of the newly formed Newfoundland branch of the British and Foreign Bible Society – an organization not exclusively Church of England. He claimed that there was no need for such a society in Newfoundland as Bibles could be procured already at the cheapest rate. Bishop Feild's action was not popular with low church members of his flock and it produced dismay among many Protestants in St John's who "lamented that the new Bishop . . . had made a terrible mistake, for they [Protestants] cried for unity as regards religion, the more so, indeed, as unhappily, by party strife, their [Protestants'] religious and political positions could not be separated."

Since the introduction of representative government in Newfoundland in 1832, political parties had tended to reflect denominational differences. The Liberal party was almost exclusively Catholic, although its leadership contained a sprinkling of Protestants; the Conservative or Tory party was solidly Protestant. Any religious conflict among Protestants tended to weaken their political position, thus many Protestants were anxious to promote religious harmony and to have Bishop Feild assume the leadership of the British and Foreign Bible Society branch. But Feild preferred to confine his activities strictly within the Church of England.

To help alleviate the lack of clergy in the diocese, Bishop Feild concentrated on building up the theological college which had been begun by Bishop Spencer. In 1844 the college consisted of a poor wooden building in which six students met daily to receive instruction from the clergy of St Thomas's Church. Bishop Feild required these students to attend daily prayer and to be instructed in church music, and he hoped for a theological college where the students would live under collegiate discipline. By 1847 he had formulated plans for Queen's College (named for his Oxford college) and for a collegiate school, both to be endowed. Each was to have accommodation for 12 resident students, and by 1850 the bishop had expended some £3,000 towards the purchase of buildings and had secured the services of the Reverend William GREY as principal. Lack of funds made it difficult for him to secure a vice-principal or tutor.

From the beginning of his work in Newfoundland, Bishop Feild stressed the importance of church people in the colony contributing towards the upkeep of the clergy and parsonages, rather than depending entirely upon the generosity of members of the parent church in England. In 1846 the usual SPG stipend for a clergyman was £100 with another £100 raised locally. Bishop Feild contemplated trying to raise an additional £200 or £300 in the hope that "two or three might be found who would be ready to endure hardness for these poor fishermen and for Christ's sake." As an agency for organizing the financial basis of the church, he supported the Newfoundland Church Society, but his attempt to make a pledge to contribute to the Church Society the sign of church membership met with much opposition. Lieutenant-Colonel Robert Barlow McCrae, the commanding officer of the garrison in St John's in the 1860s, reported that "year by year the Bishop has to go down to the annual meeting [of the Church Society] and sorrowfully announce the amount of the subscriptions, in a place where the exports and imports of commerce amount to more than 3,000,000£ (the greater part of which is in the hands of Protestants) to be something over or under 800£, dividing some 40£ or 50£ a year among a number of half-starved clergymen, and leaving a pitiful balance in his hands for churches and parsonages."

The 1860s saw the fisheries fail season after season, and in 1863 Bishop Feild asked the legislature to appoint a day of special "humiliation in which Christians of all denominations would unite in supplication for Divine favour . . . for the removal of these afflicting dispensations." He observed that many of the old fishing establishments of the northeast coast, originally founded by Church of England people from Dorsetshire and Poole, had failed and "the owners have let their houses to young adventurers, who generally are dissenters . . . which is one of the ways in which our Church is now divided and desolated."

In 1869, after a decade of severe depression, Bishop Feild published one of his most powerful pastorals in which he condemned the "supply system" by which fishermen were given provisions at exorbitant prices by suppliers in the expectation that payment would be made out of the season's catch. This system, he claimed, led to recklessness and dishonesty on the part of many fishermen who tended to sell their catch to other suppliers for cash and evade payment to their own supplier by saying they had had a poor season. Bishop Feild not only deplored the dishonest practices of both fishermen and suppliers, but also regretted what he called the "continual withdrawal from the colony, every year, of wealth . . . to be wholly spent in other countries, cruelly hindering all material progress and improvement here." No less caustic were his references to the moves towards confederation with the new dominion of Canada. "He must have greater faith in Dominion politics and politicians than I have, who expects to obtain much relief from that quarter."

In spite of the financial and other difficulties which beset him during the 32 years he spent in Newfoundland, Bishop Feild could recount an increase of SPG clergy from 24 in 1844 to more than 50 in 1876, a large number of whom were trained under his close supervision. Of the 100 churches in existence in 1876, more than one half had been consecrated by Feild. In addition to the theological college and the collegiate school for which he had succeeded in raising endowment funds, he had also established schools for boys and girls, created a widows' and orphans' fund for the benefit of clergy, and built two partly endowed orphanages. In the last five years of his episcopacy, steps were taken to organize a synod to encourage the laity to take an interest in the affairs of the church.

Feild was largely responsible for financing the construction of the cathedral in St John's, which was consecrated and opened for service on 21 Sept. 1850. The foundation stone had been laid as early as 21 Aug. 1843 by Bishop Spencer. In 1846 Feild journeyed to England to obtain consent to the appropriation of £15,000 towards the completion of the cathedral, and much of the money was collected in English churches. Copied from a design of Sir George Gilbert Scott, the cathedral was built of grey cut stone in the Gothic style with a tower and spire 130 feet high. At its opening in 1850 only the nave was completed, but when finished the cathedral was considered one of the finest in British America.

Feild's great contribution to the church in Newfoundland was in administration. Like his Roman Catholic contemporary in Montreal, Bishop Ignace Bourget*, Feild laid the groundwork for a firm church establishment, backed by a financial arrangement no longer dependent upon the bounty of the mother church in England. His was an uncompromising spirit in matters of church doctrine and discipline, which led to the accusation that he was "wanting in Christian charity towards ministers of other denominations." This was too harsh a judgement. Rather, he permitted no compromise in matters which seemed to him to threaten the religious or financial position of the Church of England. A high churchman, Feild gradually influenced the character of the church and clergy in the colony away from the low church tendencies which had previously prevailed. For many years he was distrusted by a large section of Protestants, but eventually he won the esteem of all classes by his uprightness, modesty, and piety. In religious matters, he was not a controversialist. When refusing to join the British and Foreign Bible Society, he preferred to rest his case on the reasons given by the bishop of Salisbury for withdrawing from the society rather than to elaborate his own. In social life, he was described as a delightful companion, full of humour and pleasantness, and a great lover of children.

Elinor Senior

[There are neither Edward Feild papers nor memoirs, but many of his journals of visitations along the coasts of Newfoundland and Labrador were published in their entirety. These include: Diocese of Newfoundland. A journal of the bishop's visitation of the missions on the western and southern coast, August and September, 1845 ... (Church in the Colonies series, X, London, January 1846). Diocese of Newfoundland. Part II. A journal of the bishop's visitation of the missions of the northern coast, in the summer of 1846 (Church in the Colonies series, XV, London, November 1846). Journal of the bishop of Newfoundland's voyage of visitation and discovery on the south and west coasts of Newfoundland and on the Labrador in the year 1848 (Church in the Colonies series, XXI, London, March 1849). Journal of the bishop of Newfoundland's voyage of visitation on the coast of Labrador and the north-east coast of Newfoundland, in the church ship, "Hawk," in the year 1853 (Church in the Colonies series, XXX, London, [1854]). Some letters from Feild to the secretary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts are in the Report of the incorporated Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign parts ... (London) for the years 1845–76. The biography of Feild by H. W. Tucker, Memoir of the life and episcopate of Edward Feild, D.D., bishop of Newfoundland, 1844–1876 ... (London, 1877), is well written and valuable for its many extracts from his letters to clergymen in England and for its appendices which include his "Poor pastoral" of 1869. A number of his charges to his clergy and many of his pastorals exist in printed form; a partial list can be found in the British Museum catalogue.

Accounts of Feild's life are found in: DNB. John Langtry, History of the church in eastern Canada and Newfoundland (Colonial church histories of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, London, 1892), 87–116. C. H. Mockridge, The bishops of the Church of England in Canada and Newfoundland: being an illustrated historical sketch of the Church of England in Canada as traced through her episcopate (London and Toronto, 1896), 101–11. O. R. Rowley, The Anglican episcopate of Canada and Newfoundland (London and Milwaukee, Wis., 1928), 217.

Other sources include: PANL, Morine papers; Alfred Morine's unpublished history of Newfoundland including his memoirs; Newfoundland, Executive Council, Minutes, 14 Dec. 1861; Returns of an address to the House of Commons, 15 May 1862. Newfoundlander (St John's), 16 June 1876. Royal Gazette (St John's), 1843–76. M. F. Howley, Ecclesiastical history of Newfoundland (Boston, Mass., 1888). R. B. McCrae, Lost amid the fogs; sketches of life in Newfoundland, England's ancient colony (London, 1869). Charles Pedley, The history of Newfoundland from the earliest times to the year 1860 (London, 1863). Prowse, History of Nfld. Philip Tocque, Newfoundland: as it was and as it is in 1877 (London, 1878). E.S.]

FELTON, WILLIAM LOCKER PICKMORE, lawyer and politician; b. 6 April 1812 at Mahon, Minorca, eldest of a family of 12 children, son of William Bowman Felton*, who had distinguished himself in the navy during the Napoleonic wars, and of Anna Maria Valls; d. 12 Nov. 1877 at Sherbrooke, Que.

In 1815 William Locker Pickmore Felton came to Canada with his parents, who settled at Belvedere, near Sherbrooke (then called Hyatt's Mill). He attended Mr Johnson's school at Hatley, then that of Mr Dricoll at Saint-Jean-Baptiste-de-Nicolet. After studying law at Quebec in the firm of Andrew Stuart* and Henry BLACK, he was admitted to the bar on 21 Nov. 1834; he then took up residence at Quebec, where he practised for three years. It was in this town that on 6 Aug. 1835 he married Clara Lloyd, daughter of Thomas Lloyd, a surgeon in the English army.

In 1837 Felton was attached to the judicial district of Saint-François; he was first appointed a queen's counsel, became president of the Court of Sessions before 1854, then crown attorney (1853–61), and was elected bâtonnier of the district (1861–75). He was the MLA for Sherbrooke-Wolfe from 1854 to 1857, and as a candidate in Sherbrooke in 1861 against Alexander Tilloch Galt* was defeated by a slight majority. The prestige of Galt, who for 20 years had directed the colonizing company known as the British American Land Company, and who had obtained passage of the St Lawrence and Atlantic Railroad through Sherbrooke in 1853, explains Felton's defeat. At this time Galt was also solicitor general in the cabinet of George-Étienne CARTIER and John A. Macdonald*. As a Liberal-Conservative deputy, Felton had concerned himself with questions relating to seigneurial rights and municipal laws. Furthermore, at his wife's suggestion, he had defended the cause of the separate schools in Upper and Lower Canada when Joseph Papin* made a proposal recommending the establishment of a general and uniform system of elementary schools maintained by state support. At the local level, Felton, although a Protestant, encouraged his wife to contribute to religious and educational causes in the parish of Saint-Michel at Sherbrooke. Thus in 1857 Clara Lloyd was to make possible the founding of Mont Notre-Dame, which was administered by the sisters of the congregation.

William Locker Pickmore Felton died at Sherbrooke, in Villa Belvedere, on 12 Nov. 1877. He left one son, William Hughes, who had been called to the bar on 8 April 1862 and who was practising at Arthabaska. The respect in which Felton was held can be judged through a significant incident: on the day of his death, his colleagues at the bar of the district of Saint-François decided to honour his memory by wearing mourning for a month. Felton was a prominent man in the region of Sherbrooke, and people of high social standing were often to be found at his house. Nevertheless he does not seem to have exercised as great an influence in the community as his father or to have made as lasting a contribution to its causes as his wife, who outshone him in this regard.

MAURICE O'BREADY

The author had access to the family papers of Mrs H. S. Horsfall (Lennoxville, Que.). Archives du Mont Notre-Dame (Sherbrooke, Qué.), letters of William Locker Pickmore Felton to the superior. Gazette (Montreal), 15 Nov. 1877. Le Pionnier de Sherbrooke, 16 nov. 1877. Le Progrès (Sherbrooke), 16 nov. 1877. Annuaire du séminaire Saint-Charles-Borromée, Sherbrooke, 1882–1883 (Sherbrooke, Qué., 1883), 28, 48 Can. biog. dict., II, 249–50. P.-G. Roy, Les avocats de la région de Québec, 162. Maurice O'Bready, La première messe à Sherbrooke (Sherbrooke, Qué., 1933), 14–16.

FERGUSON, THOMAS ROBERTS, merchant, soldier, Orangeman, and politician; b. December 1818, at Drumcor, County Cavan, Ireland, son of Andrew Ferguson; d. 15 Sept. 1879, in Innisfil Township, Ont.

Thomas Roberts Ferguson's parents left Ireland for Upper Canada during the late 1830s; his father died en route. After a brief stay in Montreal, the family settled near Cookstown in 1842 where Ferguson became a farmer. He bought more property in Innisfil Township and established each of his brothers on a farm before becoming a merchant in Cookstown. In 1856 he married Frances Jane Gowan, daughter of Orange leader Ogle Robert GOWAN, and they had three sons and six daughters. Ferguson had joined the Orange order in 1847 and he became a prominent member. In 1852 he was master of the Loyal Orange Lodge no.1580 and in June 1858 he was elected one of the deputy grand masters of the order. From 1867 to 1873 he was a director of the Northern Railway, and in 1872 he became a provisional director of the Huron and Ontario Ship Canal Company.

Ferguson served from 1847 as an officer with the 4th Battalion and then the 7th Battalion Simcoe militia. In 1861 he was instrumental in the establishment of the 1st Rifle Company of volunteer militia of Cookstown, to which he was appointed captain on 13 June 1862. He rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel by 1865. The next year he led his company against the Fenians at Fort Erie; in the engagement Ferguson accompanied John Stoughton Dennis* on the tug W.T. Robb and met the Fenians under John O'NEILL as the latter was leaving Canada. Lieutenant Christopher Cook later charged Ferguson with misconduct in matters of morale and money. He was acquitted of the charges, and on 25 June 1869 he was provisionally appointed major with the "Simcoe Foresters," the 35th Battalion of the Volunteer Infantry. He held this post until his retirement in 1873.

When the first council of Innisfil Township had been formed in 1850, Ferguson was elected a councillor. From 1852 to 1873 he served on the council, four years as councillor and 18 years as reeve. He was also warden of Simcoe County in 1858 and from 1862 to 1867.

A Conservative, Ferguson first ran for a seat in the Legislative Assembly in the election of 1858 against Tory William Benjamin Robinson. In this election, and subsequently in 1861 and 1863, he was returned for Simcoe South. In 1867 and 1872 he was elected by acclamation to represent Simcoe South in the Legislative Assembly for Ontario. He also campaigned successfully in Cardwell in 1867 for a seat in the House of Commons but did not run in 1872.

Ferguson was a strong advocate of representation by population and during his first term in the assembly he moved for the adoption of a bill to introduce it into law. On 19 Oct. 1860, Ferguson was appointed arbitrator on behalf of Simcoe County to see to the maintenance and repair of the Holland River bridge at Bradford. As a politician, he was concerned about local and county affairs and about the people he represented. He wrote letters supporting their petitions on a wide variety of subjects, including the release of prisoners whom he felt had been punished too severely by lengthy sentences for minor crimes; he was often actively involved on their behalf, for example in 1857 and 1859 when he attempted to prevent the incorporation of a section of the Innisfil Township into Barrie.

In 1872 at a political meeting in Bradford, Ferguson frustrated the intention of its sponsors to condemn acts of the federal government. When the meeting was over and the majority of people had left, however, a fight broke out; in attempting to stop it, Ferguson suffered a serious blow to his head which caused permanent physical and mental damage. As a result, he resigned his seat in the Ontario legislature in 1873 and he was prevailed upon to accept the office of collector of customs at Collingwood. Shortly after the Liberal government of Alexander Mackenzie* came to power in 1873, Ferguson was moved to Toronto. In 1876 he was dismissed without compensation or apology. He spent his remaining years at his home in Cookstown where he died of paralysis at 60 years of age.

Carole B. Stelmack

PAC, MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), entries for T. R. Ferguson; MG 27, I, E30 (T. R. Ferguson papers); RG 5, C1, 557, no.906; 587, no.2026; 613, no.597; 636, no.1580; 680, no.558; 681, no.585; 682, nos.595, 617; 683, no.652; 706, no.489; 742, nos.639, 640; 772, no.391; 779, nos.781, 795; 782, no.908; 804, nos.507, 508; 851, nos.853, 854; 868, no.54; RG 9, I, C1, 19, 20; C3, 11; C6, 7; 174, no.1002; RG 30. [G.-É. Cartier], Discours de Sir Georges Cartier ..., Joseph Tassé, édit. (Montréal, 1893). Can. directory of parliament (Johnson). Can. parl. comp., 1867; 1869; 1871; 1872. Hunter, Hist. of Simcoe County. Innisfil Township centennial, 1850–1950, June 23–24, 1951; a record of 100 years of progress, historical review ([Barrie, Ont., 1951]).

FIFE, DAVID, farmer; b. 1805, third son of John Fife and Agnes Hutchinson; m. about 1826 Jane Beckett by whom he had eight children; d. 9 Jan. 1877, near Peterborough, Ont.

John Fife brought his family from Kincardine, Fifeshire, Scotland, to Canada in 1820, and cleared a farm in the newly opened Otonabee Township, Peterborough County. After David married, he settled nearby in Otonabee Township, where he lived the rest of his life.

In 1842 Fife received through a friend a small sample of wheat taken from a cargo from Danzig (now Gdańsk, Poland) as the ship was unloaded in Glasgow. David sowed the sample in the spring, but not many heads developed as it contained only a few grains of spring wheat – later identified as Galician. However, these were carefully harvested and multiplied. The new wheat yielded well, notably on heavy clay soils, was free of rust, threshed well, and produced flour of excellent quality, although it matured eight to ten days after the currently grown varieties.

Until 1848 Red Fife, as it came to be known, was grown by Fife and his neighbours in Otonabee Township, but in 1849 cultivation of it spread first into the adjacent townships and then "rapidly throughout Upper Canada so that by 1860, it had almost completely superseded other varieties of spring wheat." It spread to New York State and Wisconsin, then to Minnesota and the Dakotas. By 1870 small amounts were grown in Manitoba and from 1882 to 1909 it was the leading variety in the province. However, as the prairies were opened to agriculture to the west and north of the Red River valley, an earlier maturing variety was needed to escape damage from frost. On account of its high quality, Red Fife was chosen as the male parent of the famous Marquis wheat and it enters into the pedigree of most spring wheat varieties now grown on the western prairies.

I. L. Conners

PAC, RG 31, A1, 1851, Peterborough County, Otonabee Township; 1861, Peterborough County, Otonabee Township; 1871, Peterborough County, Otonabee Township. Henry Bawbell, "Fife's spring wheat," Canadian Agriculturist (Toronto), I (1849), 302–3. Peterborough Examiner, 25 Jan. 1877, 31 Dec. 1929, July 1945, 12 June 1950, 24 Nov. 1958, 22 Sept. 1962, 15 Nov. 1963. A. H. R. Buller, Essays on wheat (New York, 1919), 206–15. R. L. Jones, History of agriculture in Ontario 1613–1880 (Toronto, 1946), 103–4.

FINLAYSON, NICOL, HBC chief factor; b.c. 1795 at Loch Alsh, Ross-shire, Scotland; d. at Nairn, Scotland, 17 May 1877.

Nicol Finlayson and a younger brother, Duncan*, joined the Hudson's Bay Company as writers in 1815. Nicol's early experience was gained at Albany Factory on James Bay and at subordinate inland posts as far west as Lac Seul in present day northwestern Ontario. Although he was first considered frivolous and inattentive to business, he became efficient both as a trader and as an accountant. Being a good-natured man, he was liked by his Cree customers and in time acquired an exceptional knowledge of their language and customs.

On 10 June 1830 Finlayson left Moose Factory for Ungava Bay to execute Governor George Simpson*'s plans for trading with the Eskimos of Hudson Strait, who usually visited the Moravian missions on the northern part of the Labrador coast, and with the wandering Indians of the interior, who obtained their few necessities either from opposition traders on Esquimaux Bay (Hamilton Inlet) or from traders, HBC and others, on the Gulf of St Lawrence. Formerly the Ungava Bay area had been known to the HBC only from the journeys of the Moravians, Benjamin Gottlieb Kohlmeister* and George Kmoch, and its own employees, James Clouston* and William Hendry*.

Finlayson followed Hendry's overland route of 1828 and built Fort Chimo on the east bank of the South (Koksoak) River about 27 miles from its mouth. The site was almost destitute of wood and clay for building purposes but it provided a convenient berth for the vessel which was expected to keep Fort Chimo regularly supplied with trading goods and provisions from York Factory on the west coast of Hudson Bay. Because of its extreme isolation, both from York Factory and from the posts on James Bay, it proved impossible to maintain regular communication with Fort Chimo. Consequently Finlayson faced not only danger from the age-old enmity between Eskimos and Indians but also the problem of survival in a grim, barren land. In spite of all his efforts and those of his "second," Erland ERLANDSON, business was unprofitable, the Eskimos having but little to spare and the Indians being more concerned with following the herds of caribou which supplied food and clothing (as well as the means for trading guns, ammunition, and tobacco) than with trapping furs, which were much more profitable for the company. John McLean*, who succeeded Finlayson, suffered less patiently the frustrations endured in trying to carry out Governor Simpson's over-optimistic plans for exploiting the trade of a region he (McLean) described as presenting "as complete a picture of desolation as can be imagined."

Finlayson, who had been a chief trader since 1833, left Fort Chimo for Moose Factory in July 1836. He was granted extended furlough and visited Scotland in 1837–38 before returning to duty. For the remainder of his career he was employed at Michipicoten and York Factory, and in the HBC districts of Rainy Lake, Saskatchewan, Swan River, Île-à-la-Crosse, and Cumberland. His promotion in 1846 to the rank of chief factor entitled him to a seat on the Council of the Northern Department of Rupert's Land. His health, impaired in Ungava, never fully recovered, and in 1855, at the end of his fourth visit to Scotland, he was retired by the company. He moved to Nairn, where he died in 1877.

Finlayson had four sons and a daughter by an unidentified "native woman," and two sons and a daughter who survived childhood by Elizabeth, a daughter of chief factor Alexander Kennedy*, to whom he was married by Governor Simpson at Moose Factory on 10 Aug. 1829.

ALICE M. JOHNSON

HBRS, III (Fleming); XIX (Rich and Johnson); XXIV (Davies and Johnson). R. M. Ballantyne, Ungava, a tale of Esquimaux-land (London, 1857).

FISHER, CHARLES, lawyer, politician, and judge; b. 15 Aug. or 16 Sept. 1808 at Fredericton, N.B., eldest son of Peter Fisher and Susanna Williams; d. 8 Dec. 1880 at Fredericton.

Peter Fisher, a merchant and lumber operator of loyalist ancestry, is noted for his Sketches of New Brunswick (1825), the first historical study published in the province. More a description than a history, the book was highly critical of those big businessmen who exploited the province while contributing nothing to its progress. Charles Fisher seems to have been influenced by his father's point of view on this subject.

Charles Fisher was educated at the Fredericton Collegiate School and at King's College (University of New Brunswick), where he received a BA in 1830. He turned to the study of law under the attorney general, George Frederick Street*, was admitted attorney to the New Brunswick bar in 1831 and, after a stay at one of the Inns of Court in England, became a barrister in 1833. He started his practice in Fredericton where, in September 1836, he married Amelia Hatfield, by whom he had four sons and four daughters.

Almost as soon as he was admitted to the bar, Fisher turned to politics, running unsuccessfully for York County in the 1834 election. Three years later he entered the assembly as a colleague of Lemuel Allan WILMOT, also from York. For the next 10 or 12 years these two were the backbone of the New Brunswick reform movement, working mainly for responsible government. Wilmot has gone into the history books as the great man in the movement, but Joseph W. Lawrence*, an acute contemporary observer, quotes with approval the widely held view that "Fisher made the balls and Wilmot fired them." Fisher certainly understood the issues behind the constitutional changes being demanded, and may well have worked out the arguments which the more volatile Wilmot presented.

Following his election in 1837, Fisher worked diligently, often in cooperation with the government. A moderate reformer, he attempted to effect innovations in the fluid non-party structure of the day. New Brunswick was governed, often well but frequently injudiciously, by the lieutenant governor and the executive councillors, none of whom had a seat in the assembly in the 1830s. Not content to exist in what he considered an imperfect system, Fisher demanded improvements. In 1842 he introduced a bill requiring that assemblymen resign and seek re-election when appointed to the Executive Council or to an office with remuneration. He introduced another resolution calling for the initiation of money bills by the executive – an essential practice for efficient government; it was defeated 23 to 12, apparently because the members were not yet ready for such a sacrifice. Fisher also pressed for bills to fix the property qualification of legislative councillors at £500, to reduce the charges on the province under the civil list bill, to limit the salaries of department heads to £600, and to have all fees placed in the public treasury, not in the pockets of office-holders. His reform proposals reveal a deep streak of parsimony.

During the 1840s Fisher's relationship with Edward Barron CHANDLER and Robert Leonard HAZEN, the leaders of the government, was most amicable. They appointed him registrar at King's College in 1846 knowing full well that the move was probably "distasteful" to the college council. Fisher wrote to his friend Joseph HOWE on the evil ways of the "family compact" and on the irresponsible nature of the government and its politics. "Till this Election," he wrote in 1843, "I could not believe that respectable people would resort to such lies as have been made use of in this community to carry a point & the acrimony they evince exceeds anything to be conceived." At the same time Fisher hoped to avoid party strife in the small province of New Brunswick even though he praised it elsewhere. In one breath he could exult in "the general liberal triumph" of 1847 in Nova Scotia. In another: "He would regret to see the day when the organization of violent antagonistic political parties would be found necessary in this province" where "there was little talent enough for one good Government."

Fisher divorced the concept of responsible government from party considerations. He wrote of New Brunswick: "We are too loyal and too ignorant to put down the old [compact]." The best approach was a coalition which "with the growing influence of the liberals would in ten years give the liberals all without any violent movement." It was with this point of view that Fisher, fully aware of the theoretical ramifications of responsible government, moved his resolution of 1848 "that the House should approve of the principle of Colonial Government contained in the despatch of the Right Honorable Earl Grey [Henry George Grey] . . . and of their application to this province." The motion was carried 24 to 11 and within three months Fisher entered the government formed by the new lieutenant governor, Sir Edmund Walker Head*. For taking this step both Fisher and L. A. Wilmot, who was appointed attorney general, have been accused of desertion and lack of principles. Fisher's defeat in the election of 1850 is offered as proof of public indignation. If the partisanship of the party system was required to attain responsible government, for which Fisher had been chief advocate and theoretician, then he had committed an indefensible act. If it could be achieved by coalition and collaboration without loss of integrity, then Fisher was wrongly accused. In his own defence he said: "In accepting office, I have compromised no principles; I have neither changed nor surrendered any opinion which I have heretofore advocated in Trade [in particular] nor Politics in general."

Fisher was not prominent in the council: Hazen, Chandler, John R. Partelow*, and even Wilmot tended to dominate. He wrote to Howe asking him about the operation of the council. "Does the Governor take the opinion of the whole Council and act upon the recommendation of a majority?" Fisher thought the appointment of persons to the Legislative Council was "a Branch of patronage indispensable to the well working of an Executive Council" and that the decision of that council must prevail. Lieutenant Governor

Head, however, was not a man who would be ruled by his council.

Fisher's defeat in the election of 1850 should have been followed by his resignation as a matter of course, but he stayed in the council until January 1851. Governor Head had just before this date appointed a new chief justice, James CARTER, and had filled the vacancy on the Supreme Court with L. A. Wilmot. Both appointments were made in spite of the advice of the Executive Council. Fisher resigned, he stated, because the governor had not acted "consistent with my ideas of Responsible Government." Since his resignation was overdue, the sentiment has a hollow ring, yet Fisher realized better than anyone that Head had crippled responsible government for the time being. Its resurrection became his goal. By this time Fisher had lost faith in a coalition system; from being an opponent of the party system, he became its champion, and set about to weld together a party that would gain power and control all aspects of government, especially the actions of the governor.

Fisher's status as a constitutional lawyer and the respect he enjoyed from the "compact" council resulted in his serving, from 1852 to 1854, with William B. Kinnear* and James Watson Chandler* on a commission appointed to consolidate and codify the provincial statutes and to examine the courts of law and equity and the law of evidence. The results of the study were published in many volumes in 1854.

The year 1854 was an election year in New Brunswick and Fisher returned to the house. There was a new lieutenant governor, John Henry Thomas MANNERS-SUTTON, and reciprocity with the United States provided a new political issue. When the house was called together to ratify the reciprocity treaty in the fall of 1854, Fisher, fully aware that he controlled a majority in the house, rose on 20 October to introduce an amendment to the fifth paragraph of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. He stated "that your Constitutional Advisers have not conducted the Government of the Province in the true spirit of our Colonial Constitution." Should the governor believe, declared Fisher, "that the Bluenoses had no pluck, that the New Members were divided and split into sections with internal jealousies and disputes, and could be easily beaten in detail . . . , it was only fair to disabuse his mind." The amendment was carried on 28 October by a vote of 27 to 12, and Fisher was called upon to form a government. The compact council was finally removed from office; responsible government had been rescued by the creation of a political party.

Fisher, who became attorney general, proceeded to form a government that ranks with the best in the history of the province. Young and talented, it included men of such future prominence as Samuel Leonard Tilley*, Albert James Smith*, William Johnstone Ritchie*, John Mercer Johnson*, James Brown*, and William Henry STEEVES. When the extensive legislative record that followed is considered, the old saw that New Brunswickers were unfit for responsible government before 1854 may well deserve retirement. The new council contained no member of the historic families, and represented, for the most part, the middle class. Levelling, anti-establishment, commercially oriented, the new government meant a "social as well as political" change.

Fisher immediately set about his programme of reform. First the Legislative Council, formerly the preserve of the establishment, was shorn of its power. Its president was included in the Executive Council, and thereby lost his independence. About the same time the bishop of the Church of England was induced to give up his seat in the upper house. Of greater importance than these changes was the "Reform Bill of 1855," calling for "an extension of the franchise . . . to secure the fair representation of intelligence and property at the Polling booths." Fisher pressed for the removal of the £25 property qualification, but, not a supporter of universal manhood suffrage, he wanted to retain the requirement that each voter have a yearly income of £100. Vote by ballot was also introduced. The Liberal party, Fisher maintained, would always be "practical . . . progressive . . . conservative of everything good . . . destructive of everything evil in the political and social condition of the people of this country." With this aim in mind an act was later presented to prevent any person who conducted business with the government from being elected to the assembly or holding a seat in the upper house

Sound financing had always been one of Fisher's themes, and, in 1856, the government supported a private member's bill to the effect that "the right of initiating money grants should be conceded to the Executive government and the practice of the imperial parliament in this respect adopted." A new department of public works was created to carry out government projects, especially the building of highways and railways. New municipal institutions were set up, to "train men in the principles of self-government." Other reforms sought to limit the interest rate to 6 per cent, to introduce decimal currency, to regulate the qualifications of members of the medical profession, and to simplify legal procedures. Fisher supported a public school system but he was unable to push it through; he did establish an improved teacher training system, and named his brother, Henry Fisher, chief superintendent of education for the province.

Two pieces of legislation – the Prohibition Act and the University of New Brunswick Act – require some elaboration. S. L. Tilley, Fisher's provincial secretary, introduced a private member's bill on 3 March 1855 to prohibit the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages after 1 Jan. 1856. Passed by a vote of 21 to 18, it received royal assent, and the members of the government, although divided on the issue, became responsible for upholding the act. The law was not and apparently could not be enforced, and the public outcry for repeal was so great that Manners-Sutton seized on the issue as a way to escape from the Fisher government, which he did not like. When it refused to repeal the law, he forced its resignation, and in the ensuing election had the pleasure of seeing his unconstitutional methods justified. The John Hamilton Gray*–Robert Duncan Wilmot* government received a majority and repealed the law (1856). Within a year, however, Fisher was back in power. With the prohibition issue out of the way it became clear that Fisher and his supporters were more in tune with New Brunswickers than Manners-Sutton's carefully chosen men.

King's College was another contentious issue. People like A. J. Smith and Charles CONNELL repeatedly pressed for its abolition on the grounds that it was a plaything for the privileged subsidized by yeoman labour. Fisher, as a graduate and long time registrar, defended the college but in 1858 he could not stop a bill to abolish it. British disallowance of the act and the inclusion of Connell in the Executive Council as postmaster general brought the college issue up for reconsideration, and in 1860 the University of New Brunswick Act became law. Fisher's bill, based on a commission report, set up a non-sectarian university with a much broader curriculum than in the old classical college.

During these years Fisher was actively supporting railway construction. Though once burned in effigy in Saint John for opposing the Saint John to Shediac line, he was a solid supporter of the European and North American Railway as well as the Intercolonial. After consulting Joseph Howe, Fisher, accompanied by John ROBERTSON, held discussions in London in 1855 on the Saint John to Shediac line, then partly finished. The line was taken over completely by the government. When the Intercolonial project was again revived in 1858, Fisher, full of hope, went to London only to see both the railway project and the union of British North America dismissed as impractical.

Despite some rebuffs Fisher appeared, as the 1860s dawned, to be in complete control of New Brunswick. His government was successful and popular. Tilley, the provincial secretary, was doing most of the administrative work and looking after the affairs of state in general. When he wrote to Fisher in 1859 about serious financial problems, Fisher replied "dont be disheartened. It will all turn out for the best. . . ." He let Tilley find solutions while he concerned himself with crown cases in the law courts of the province. As attorney general that was his responsibility, but it seems that he left far too much to Tilley. For reasons that are unclear, some members of the council, especially A. J. Smith, wanted to be rid of Fisher. Perhaps his leadership was not strong enough. Perhaps he looked too much to the needs of his family and of Fredericton rather than the province. Perhaps it was his personality. One contemporary remarked on Fisher's "want of . . . frankness." "Privately he was not always to be understood – there was a non-commitalism about him, even in important matters, which many of his friends could not account for, as though he always felt that his best counsellor was himself, and the least he divulged to others it would be all the safer for his side." Whatever the reason, a tide began to swell against Fisher in 1858, and when he was implicated in a crown lands scandal of 1861, his colleagues dumped him immediately. Undeniably he used his position to exploit the crown lands for himself, his friends, and his relatives, yet he claimed he was taking the brunt of an attack which should have been more widely spread. He refused to admit a misdeed and he refused to resign as attorney general and thus "compromise his character and independence." Tilley, who emerged as leader, eventually had Fisher removed from the council and induced him to resign as attorney general rather than face further humiliation.

Thus ended Fisher's career as leader of the government. Its record was one of which he could be proud, for it covered constitutional, political, social, and economic reforms that were badly needed. The extent of Fisher's success can be gauged by the complete disintegration of the old "compact" and of all party opposition.

Following his removal in 1861, Fisher remained in the House of Assembly and was easily re-elected in the general election later that year. His constituents apparently believed he had not been treated fairly as did long-time friends such as Joseph Howe and George E. Fenety*. Fisher's personal following in the province and in the assembly posed a serious threat to Tilley. Certainly Tilley feared that Fisher might control the balance of power, and in February 1862 believed he faced an attempt to overthrow him, but this either failed or did not take place. For the next few years Fisher waited, looking forward, he claimed, "to uniting with Tilley" and to again becoming attorney general "at no distant day." Little separated them for they agreed completely on railway policy, especially the Intercolonial. It was confederation that was to reunite them.

Tilley went to the Charlottetown meeting of 1864 on Maritime union expecting little. Fisher was opposed to a Maritime union but supported a British North American federation. The totally unexpected conclusion of the Charlottetown conference and Tilley's commitment to confederation required remodeling of the Liberal party into a union movement, for the issue was so contentious that it required more support than Tilley had. Charles Fisher was therefore invited to join the New Brunswick delegation to the Quebec conference. His contribution does not seem to have been significant. He "preferred a legislative union if it were feasible," but said little except to complain that Canadian domination was excessive and unwarranted. Whatever his apprehensions, he agreed with the over-all conclusions of the conference and returned to New Brunswick confident that the province would follow the lead of the delegates.

New Brunswick was the only province in which the Quebec scheme was voted on in an election. In March 1865 the Tilley government and the confederation project were overwhelmingly defeated. Tilley and Fisher suffered personal defeat and all but six of their supporters fell before the anti-confederation platform of their old colleague, A. J. Smith. Fisher had concentrated his efforts in York County; there as elsewhere the suspicions of New Brunswickers that confederation was a plot originated in "the oily brains of Canadian politicians" could not be allayed.

Charles Fisher's role in reversing the decision of 1865 was central. The death of the chief justice, Robert Parker*, in November 1865 created a vacancy on the bench that was filled by John Campbell Allen*, MLA for York County. A by-election was called immediately, and Charles Fisher offered: "The strong feeling evinced for me . . . leave[s] me no honourable alternative but to step into the arena and throw myself upon you, my fellow subjects." It is unlikely that Fisher's motives were entirely altruistic and it is true that he treated confederation as a minor issue in the campaign, but in the final analysis this by-election was a key to the success of the movement. Confederation desperately needed a boost in the fall of 1865, and a defeat might have discouraged the confederates into giving up. However from the moment of Fisher's victory over John Pickard by a two-thirds majority until Smith's resignation, forced upon him by an unconstitutional action of the lieutenant governor, Arthur H. Gordon*, the pressure in favour of confederation mounted steadily. Fisher's part in Smith's defeat centred on an amendment to the speech from the throne which he introduced on 12 March 1866 and which led to a four-week debate. The governor eventually forced Smith out of office, and Fisher became attorney general in the S. L. Tilley–Peter Mitchell* government that was to carry confederation. He had, as he predicted, returned to his position. It may be that he forestalled Smith's move because he did not wish Smith to claim any rewards – the New Brunswick Reporter, a Fisher paper, said as much, and John A. Macdonald* certainly suspected it.

One of Fisher's rewards was the voyage to England as a delegate to the London conference. There he was thought to be "a good fellow, who talks a good deal and has only a mediocre capacity." Following the success of the London conference and the creation of the new nation, Fisher was one of the first to present himself as a candidate for election to the dominion parliament. He was unopposed. Fisher definitely entertained hopes of being included in Macdonald's first cabinet; Tilley wanted him, but geographic considerations excluded two Saint John River men. After considerable hesitation Tilley selected Peter Mitchell as his fellow cabinet member. Fisher was left with much of the responsibility of reorganizing the New Brunswick government which had many problems caused by the mass exodus to Ottawa.

Because of his distinguished career and his Maritime origin, Fisher was selected to move the address in reply to the speech from the throne – the first speech in the new dominion parliament. That speech, which was received indifferently, marked the highlight of his federal career. As new tariffs and other policies were introduced, mostly over the objections of the New Brunswick members, Fisher recoiled into a defensive position. The selection of the north shore route for the Intercolonial was typical of the decisions he disliked: "If you prefer the longest, the most expensive and the least productive line, then by all means build the Northers; but do not flatter yourself with the belief that it will command much travel and traffic." Defeated on this as on other issues, Fisher, for the first time, seems to have lost interest in politics. With the appointment of his old associate, L. A. Wilmot, as lieutenant governor of New Brunswick in 1868, he sought the vacated judgeship. He was appointed after Tilley warmly supported him in a strong memo to Macdonald in September 1868, "I consider Mr. Fishers claims superior to any other man in New BN except Mr [John Hamilton] Gray." On 3 Oct. 1868 Fisher was appointed puisne judge of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick and on 14 October judge of the Court of Divorce and Matrimonial Causes.

As a judge Fisher was considered thorough and conscientious rather than profound. His devotion had been to politics more than to the law and the change of pace was extreme. Yet he was considered the leading constitutional lawyer of the day.

In his years as a judge Fisher found that most of the old bitterness of the early struggles disappeared, and he became a respected elder statesman. He and his wife Amelia were at the centre of Fredericton society and were especially active at the university which had awarded him a DCL in 1866 and which Fisher served as a member of the senate. Little is known of Mrs Fisher except that she was inarticulate. An apocryphal story is worth repeating because it may contain a germ of truth. On the occasion of Fisher's elevation to the bench Mrs Fisher asked "You'll be 'Your Honour' and what will I be?" He replied instantly, "You will be the same damned old fool you always were." Fisher remained alert and active until the end. On Saturday, 5 Dec. 1880, he was well; on Tuesday, 8 December, he was dead, apparently from an inflammation of the lungs.

Of all those who participated in the struggle both for responsible government and for confederation, Fisher has received the least attention and has never had a biographer. Historians have been content to incriminate the "corrupt Charles Fisher" with his "bad reputation, deserved or not." One statement is quoted widely as the final word on Fisher. The Duke of Newcastle [Henry Pelham Clinton] wrote: "I am not ignorant that Mr. Fisher is one of the worst public men in the British North American provinces and his riddance [1861] is a great gain to the cause of good government in New Brunswick." This statement, the crown lands scandal, and his apparent willingness to disregard principles in 1848 seem to be the major reasons for the denigration of Fisher. His not entirely attractive personality may also have contributed.

A more favourable interpretation is reached if one considers Fisher's attitude to parties on the one hand and the nature of colonial politics on the other. It seems clear that politics in New Brunswick differed little from politics in Nova Scotia or Canada. The "spoils" of office was an integral part of the system both in British North America and in Britain. Fisher got caught in the crown lands scandal, yet his exclusion from office was only temporary. His constituents and friends honestly believed he was treated unjustly, and S. L. Tilley, whose probity as a politician ranks as high as any, did not hesitate to recommend Fisher to the bench. Fisher's reputation was set by the opinions of young, inexperienced, and frequently arrogant individuals of the British colonial system such as Manners-Sutton, Gordon, and the Duke of Newcastle. Their views of either the people or the society in the colonies can hardly be accepted as definitive. Fisher in particular refused to defer to these officers and was singled out for this reason. A gentleman, by their definition, he may not have been, but a close examination of his career leads to the conclusion that he was a better man than most. A few years before his death he stated what might well have been his obituary: "My object is not personal aggrandizement; and I do not regard the gathering together of money as important, except for the sake of my family. I want to live and to act so, that when I die men may say of me, 'he left the impress of his mind on the institutions of his country.' "

C. M. WALLACE

[There is no Charles Fisher manuscript collection, but useful material is available in: N.B. Museum, Edward Barron Chandler papers; Tilley family papers. PAC, MG 24, B29 (Howe papers); MG 26, A (Macdonald papers); MG 27, I, D15 (Tilley papers). PRO, CO 188 (letters of Edmund Walker Head, John Henry Thomas Manners-Sutton, and Arthur Hamilton Gordon). University of New Brunswick Library, Archives and Special Collections Dept., Arthur Charles Hamilton Gordon papers, 1861–66.

Among the contemporary printed sources are: New Brunswick, House of Assembly, Journals, 1834–68; Synoptic reports of the proceedings, 1834–68. Globe (Saint John, N.B.), 1858–68. Morning News (Saint John, N.B.), 1839–65. New Brunswick Reporter (Fredericton), 1844–80. Saint John Daily Telegraph and Morning Journal, 1869–73. Saint John Morning Telegraph, 1862–68.

There is no biography of Fisher except for the short and inadequate ones in J. C. Dent, Canadian portrait gallery, IV, and Biographical review, this volume contains biographical sketches of the leading citizens of the province of New Brunswick, ed. I. A. Jack (Boston, 1900). Other sources include: G. E. Fenety, Political notes and observations, and his "Political notes," Progress (Saint John, N.B.), 1894, collected in scrapbooks in N.B. Museum and PAC.

Lawrence, Judges of New Brunswick (Stockton) is of some use for information on Fisher as is Hannay, History of New Brunswick, II. The latter has been largely superseded by MacNutt, New Brunswick: a history. D.G.G. Kerr, Sir Edmund Head, a scholarly governor, with the assistance of J. A. Gibson (Toronto, 1954) should be consulted along with J. K. Chapman, The career of Arthur Hamilton Gordon, first Lord Stanmore, 1829–1912 (Toronto, 1964). See also the following articles: A. G. Bailey, "The basis and persistence of opposition to confederation in New Brunswick," CHR, XXIII (1942), 374–97. J. K. Chapman, "The mid-nineteenth-century temperance movement in New Brunswick and Maine," CHR, XXXV (1954), 43–60. W. S. MacNutt, "The coming of responsible government to New Brunswick," CHR, XXXIII (1952), 111–28.

By far the most valuable study of Fisher is E. D. Ross, "The government of Charles Fisher of New Brunswick, 1854–1861," unpublished MA thesis, University of New Brunswick, 1954. C.M.W.]

FISHER, THOMAS, merchant miller; b. 3 March 1792 in Pontefract, Yorkshire, Eng., son of John Fisher and Mary Colley; d. 23 July 1874, in Toronto, Ont.

Thomas Fisher, who received a good education, was a merchant in Leeds, Yorkshire, by 1813 when he married Sarah Sykes. Three sons and one daughter were born to them in England, and three daughters in Upper Canada.

Leaving his family in England, Fisher emigrated to North America in 1819. He landed in New York, and spent three years partly in the United States and partly in Upper Canada looking for a good investment. In May 1820 he was given the right to locate 200 acres in Upper Canada as a farm. In 1821 he selected 100 acres in Nissouri Township (now East and West Nissouri), but did not receive the grant until 1823. Meanwhile, his family had joined him at York (Toronto) in 1821, and in 1822 he settled down as tenant of the King's Mill on the west bank of the Humber River, Etobicoke Township. The Nissouri lands were still undeveloped when he sold them in 1827.

The King's Mill was a saw mill, with a timber reserve of 1,100 acres, built in 1793 by the Queen's Rangers at the head of navigation, about 2½ miles above the mouth of the river. The Humber flooded each year making repairs to the dam costly and government policy towards the mill's tenants was so niggardly that few did more than patchwork. The property was dilapidated when Fisher took it over.

By 1829 Fisher had turned the mill into a profitable business. He had paid off back rent and other debts incurred by his predecessor, Josiah Cushman, and had begun to manufacture nails; he was also a merchant miller: a designation given to millers who acted as traders, shippers, storekeepers, and frequently as innkeepers, and who performed other services for their customers, labourers, and neighbours.

Fisher surrendered the timber reserve in 1834 and most of it was assigned for a rectory for Christ Church, Mimico. He had been a major contributor to the building of the church. He retained the King's Mill and was granted 100 acres of land with a mill site on it about 1½ miles south of Dundas Street. In 1835 he sold the King's Mill to William Gamble*, who added a grist mill, and on his own property Fisher built Millwood House, a grist mill, a store, and cottages for his labourers. As Millwood was hemmed in by the rectory, Fisher built roads north to Dundas Street and south to Milton Mills (the former King's Mill) where, under arrangement with Gamble, he sent his flour in summer. In winter he teamed his flour to Toronto. He was active in 1844 in the organization of the parish of St George's-on-the-Hill (Islington), as a contributor to its building in 1847, and as a parish officer until 1864.

In the prosperous 1840s Fisher began to mortgage his property and engage in speculative ventures, partly in properties and partly in expansion of his mill after a fire in 1847. He was unable to meet his commitments in 1849 when a number of export firms failed after the repeal of the British corn laws, and mill credits were tightened. A disastrous flood in 1850 washed out the dams on the Humber. Fisher got so into debt that in 1860 the mill was bought for a fraction of its value by Edward William Thomson* whose daughter Sarah Maria had married Edwin Colley Fisher, now working with his father.

After the flood Fisher left management of the mill mostly to his son, and took up another career. He had bought land at a crossroad where the village of St Andrews (now Thistletown) was taking shape. Here he built a store which he sold at a profit in 1857. He then retired from business.

Fisher had performed a number of public duties. As an officer of the West York militia, he had turned out with the regiment during the rebellion of 1837. He had been given responsibility for road improvements. He was appointed to the Court of Requests in 1836, made a justice of the peace in 1837, and a coroner in 1838.

NORAH STORY

Borough of Etobicoke, Clerk's Office, assessment rolls, 1851–60. Middlesex County Registry Office (London, Ont.), deed of sale, lot 11, concession 2, Nissouri Township, 16 Jan. 1827. Ontario Provincial Secretary's Office (Toronto), patent, 5 Jan. 1835, east half of lot 9, concession C, Etobicoke. PAC, RG 1, E3, 10, pp.169–72; 29, pp.12–15; 30, pp.156–57; 31, pp.60–63; 34, PT.3, p.28ff; L1, 29, p.412; 35, p.353; L3, 130, p.494; 190, no.136; 191, no.13; 196a, years 1822–25; RG 7, G16, C, 30, p.21; 36, p.51; RG 9, I, B5, 2, list of 1824; 3, list of 1827; 6, list of 1838; RG 31, A1, 1851, Etobicoke Township; 1861, Etobicoke Township; RG 68, 151, p.47. PAO, RG 1, C–IV, Etobicoke Township papers, Fisher to J. W. Gamble, 12 Dec.

1832; J. W. Gamble to [the civil secretary], 24 Dec. 1832; Nissouri Township papers, certificate of 4 Oct. 1826; RG 22, ser.7, 20, 28 May 1840; 25, 9 June 1858. St George's-on-the-Hill Church (Toronto), minutes of the vestry, 1848–64. York County Registry Office (Toronto), deeds relating to land sales and transfers, 1835–60. York County Surrogate Court (Toronto), will of E. W. Thomson, 1865.

Courier of Upper Canada (Toronto), 17 Sept. 1835. Globe (Toronto), 1 Nov. 1848, 23 July 1874. Landmarks of Toronto (Robertson), II, 771–72. Toronto Mirror, 12 July 1843, 15 Dec. 1845. Toronto Patriot, 1 Sept. 1835, 20 Sept. 1837, 17 May 1849. Upper Canada, House of Assembly, Journals, 1828, app.21, "Revenue accounts. Upper Canada. Names of persons licenced as innkeeper...." Edna-Mae Pickering, Through the years at St. George's-on-the-Hill, Islington, Ontario, 1844–1969 (n.p., n.d.).

FLEMING, JOHN ARNOT, surveyor, artist, draughtsman, and topographer; b. 5 Dec. 1835 in Kirkcaldy, Scotland, youngest son of Andrew Greig Fleming and Elizabeth Arnot and brother of Sandford Fleming*; d. unmarried on 8 Jan. 1876 in Toronto, Ont.

John Arnot Fleming was educated in Kirkcaldy and came to Canada in 1847 with his parents. He attended the Toronto Academy under Thomas Henning. In 1861 he qualified as a provincial land surveyor and began his brief career in surveying.

Already, however, he had taken part in the events for which he is chiefly remembered. In 1857 he accompanied Henry Youle Hind* as his assistant on the expedition sent out to explore the routes to Red River. He was again Hind's assistant the following year on the expedition to the Assiniboine and the Saskatchewan rivers to explore the agricultural and settlement possibilities of the prairies. In the course of this expedition Fleming led a small party down the Saskatchewan River from Fort-à-la-Corne to the Red River Settlement by way of the Grand Rapids of the Saskatchewan and of Lake Winnipeg, enduring much bad weather and near starvation. His account of the journey is printed in Hind's report for 1859, and he also left sketches in pencil and water-colour.

Fleming was a cheerful and steady person. His work is distinguished by the clarity and accuracy of his pencil sketches, which have been described as "models of draughtsmanship," and the limpid beauty of his water-colours of the falls between Lake Superior and Red River and the great valleys of the plains west of Red River. These charming relics are a moment of vision in Canadian history, last glimpses of the prairies before settlement.

His family believed that Fleming's health never recovered from the hardships of the western expeditions. Between 1862 and 1870, however, he was engaged, under Sandford Fleming's supervision, in surveys on the Northern Railway in Ontario, and on the reconnaissance survey of the Intercolonial Railway, 1863–1864. In 1865 he was draughtsman in the office of the city engineer of New York. In 1870 and 1871 he explored a route for the Canadian Pacific Railway along the north shore of Lake Superior, his last recorded employment.

W. L. Morton

Fifty-four sketches by John Arnot Fleming, 25 in water-colour and the rest in pencil, are in the John Ross Robertson Collection at the MTCL. His report on the journey he undertook in 1858 is printed in H. Y. Hind, North-West Territory: report of progress, together with a preliminary and general report on the Assiniboine and Saskatchewan exploring expedition ... (Toronto, 1859), 72–84.

PAC, RG 5, C1, 523. J. R. Harper, Early painters and engravers in Canada (Toronto, 1970). "John A. Fleming," Ont. Land Surveyors Assoc., Ann. Report (Toronto), no.35 (1920), 121–23.

FLEMING, MAY AGNES. See Early

FLETCHER, HENRY CHARLES, soldier, private secretary, and author; b. 28 April 1833 at Sussex Place, Regent's Park, London, Eng., son of Major-General Edward Charles Fletcher, magistrate of Kent, deputy-lieutenant for Kirkcudbright County, Scotland, and the Hon. Ellen Mary Shore, daughter of John, 1st Lord Teignmouth; d. 31 Aug. 1879 at Putney, Eng.

Henry Charles Fletcher's mother died when he was two years old and three years later his father married Lady Frances, daughter of Charles, 2nd Earl of Romney. In November 1850 Henry Charles obtained a commission as ensign in the Scots Fusilier Guards (and as lieutenant in the army). He saw active service in the Crimea in 1856, and promotion to captain (and lieutenant-colonel in the army) came in June 1859. He travelled to Canada with the 2nd Battalion in the Guards brigade at the end of 1861, when troops were sent out during strained relations between Great Britain and the United States following the Trent incident. He took the opportunity to see the American Civil War and was present at the battles of Williamsburg, Fair Oaks, and the Seven Days. General George Brinton McClellan showed him "every courtesy," had him pitch his tent near his own, and invited him to stay as long as he wished. Fletcher thus learned the power of the new American armies. His reports to General Sir William Fenwick Williams*, the commander-in-chief in North America, were brought to the notice of the Duke of Cambridge at the Horse Guards. Returning home before his regiment, Fletcher married Lady Harriet, second daughter of Charles, 3rd Earl of Romney, on 24 Sept. 1863. He also published a three-volume History of the American war.

Fletcher appeared before the commission on military education of 1868–69, presided over by Lord Dufferin [Blackwood*], and there advocated that British infantry and engineer officers should be trained together as in the United States. This proposal was not accepted by the commission but Dufferin invited Fletcher to join it as a member for the second part of its investigation, the education of other ranks.

In 1872 Dufferin was appointed governor general of Canada. Because there were no troops in central Canada, he was not given a military secretary and therefore took an officer, Fletcher, as his private secretary to Ottawa. Fletcher's wife was considered a suitable companion for the Countess of Dufferin [Hariot Georgiana Hamilton*] in the bourgeois society of North America, and the Fletchers enjoyed the gay social life of Rideau Hall. The secretary's chief task was to develop a military spirit in Canada so that the Canadian government might be induced to make adequate provision for defence. He lectured to militia officers and others on the theme that the peaceful attitude of the United States, which then only had forces scattered along the Indian frontier, might change overnight and that every nation must have military forces at its disposal if it wished to survive. Dufferin forwarded Fletcher's memorandum on this subject to his ministers and to the War Office, and Fletcher published his lecture at his own expense. He suggested Canada should train its militia officers in permanent schools.

In 1869 Dufferin had obtained a report on the United States Military Academy for his commission on military education. Colonel Sir Patrick Leonard MacDougall*, its author, had stressed West Point's high moral qualities, which contrasted strongly with what the commission heard about the Royal Military College at Sandhurst. In April 1874, sent by Dufferin, Fletcher visited West Point and supplemented MacDougall's report to the effect that the great contribution West Point had made could be duplicated in Canada by a similar institution in which officers of all arms would be trained together. Fletcher's report was important in influencing Alexander Mackenzie* to establish the Royal Military College of Canada at Kingston in 1875.

The Canadian government offered Fletcher £80 as an honorarium for the report, but he courteously refused it. He had been promoted colonel in the army in 1874 and was considered for appointment as GOC Canadian Militia, but he preferred to return to his regiment in 1875 as major lest his professional career be jeopardized by long absence. Dufferin reported to the colonial secretary and the commander-in-chief that Fletcher had contributed substantially to the revival of the military spirit in the dominion; he was decorated with the CMG.

After his return to England, Fletcher was aide-de-camp to the Duke of Cambridge and a justice of the peace in Kent. He lectured to the Royal United Service Institution on the use of colonial forces in imperial wars. But he retired on half-pay in March 1879 and died at his residence, Spencer House, at the comparatively early age of 46, a few days after he had sold his commission. He left a son, and "other issue."

In Dufferin's opinion Fletcher was "not particularly brilliant or quick," but he was "sensible and trustworthy. . . . Everybody . . . liked him." Fletcher's History of the American war, although sound, shows little insight into the revolutionary changes taking place in warfare. Nevertheless Fletcher did much to foster the development of suitable military institutions in Canada and a comment in an obituary, that by his death the army lost an able and zealous soldier, is fully justified.

RICHARD A. PRESTON

H. C. Fletcher, The defence of Canada; a lecture delivered at the Literary and Scientific Institute (Ottawa, 1875); History of the American war (3v., London, 1865–66); Memorandum on the militia system of Canada (Ottawa, 1873); Report on the Military Academy at West Point, U.S. ([Ottawa, 1874]); "A volunteer force, British and colonial in the event of war," Royal United Service Institution, J. (London), XXI (1877), 631–58.

PAC, MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), 100, pp.39616–35; RG 9, II, A1, 85, f.9053; 604, pp.211–514. Public Record Office of Northern Ireland (Belfast), Dufferin papers, D 1071/H2/4, 16; D 1071/H2/5, 107; D 1071/H3/1, 8–10, 120–24, 182–86. [Blackwood and Herbert], Dufferin-Carnarvon correspondence (de Kiewiet and Underhill), 141–42, 157. Edward Walford, The county families of the United Kingdom or royal manual of the titled and untitled aristocracy of England, Wales, Scotland and Ireland (London, 1875), 361. Gentleman's Magazine and Historical Chronicle (London), CIII (1833), I, II. Journal of the Household Brigade for . . . 1879 (London), XVIII (1879), 309.

FORMAN, JAMES, merchant and banker who was accused of embezzlement; b. in May 1795 at Halifax, N.S., eldest son of James Forman (1763–1854) and Mary Gardner; d. early 1871 in London, Eng.

James Forman was probably educated at the Halifax grammar school. His father was a successful merchant in partnership with George Grassie, and it is likely that James was trained in the family business and worked with the Grassie family after his father's retirement in 1820. On 5 March 1821 Forman married Margaret Ann Richardson at St Matthew's Church, Halifax; they had two, perhaps three, sons.

James Forman was one of the men who petitioned the Nova Scotia assembly on 31 Jan. 1832 requesting incorporation of the Bank of Nova Scotia. The incorporation was granted on 30 March, and William Lawson* became the bank's first president; on 24 May the bank appointed James Forman its first cashier – a position equivalent to general manager. After a period at the Bank of New Brunswick in Saint John, where he studied its accounting system, Forman took up his new duties. When Forman's friend, Mather Byles ALMON, succeeded Lawson in March 1837, the cashier was placed in a position of great trust which he maintained throughout Almon's 30-year presidency. During these years Forman was active in the community as a member of the Nova Scotia Literary and Scientific Society, treasurer of the Halifax Mechanics' Institute, a trustee for the Provincial Building Society, a member of the council of the Horticultural Association and International Show Society, and president of the North British Society of Halifax.

Although the Bank of Nova Scotia opened several new branches during Almon's presidency and Forman's tenure as cashier, its annual statements showed little progress. A partial explanation for this lack of success came to light in 1870 with the discovery by the accountant, J. C. Mackintosh, that over a period of many years James Forman had embezzled about half the bank's capital of £140,000 – a theft of $314,967.68. After his actions came to light, Forman transferred property worth $179,296.45 to the bank as partial coverage for the theft. Because of Forman's social position and the collapse of his health, the bank did not prosecute, despite an uproar in the local press. A rumour at the time said that Forman had taken the money to help his son who was in financial difficulty, and this supposedly brought public opinion to Forman's side. He quickly left Halifax and went to London where he died a few months later, probably early in 1871.

PHYLLIS R. BLAKELEY and DIANE M. BARKER

PANS, Nova Scotia House of Assembly petitions, Trade and Commerce, 31 Jan. 1832. St Matthew's Church (Halifax, N.S.), records, 1795, 1821, 1854, 1858. Acadian Recorder (Halifax), 14 Jan. 1878, 27 April 1925. British Colonist (Halifax), 6, 11 Aug. 1870. Morning Journal (Halifax), 9 April 1860. Novascotian (Halifax), 6 Nov. 1854. Belcher's farmer's almanack, 1864. McAlpine's Nova Scotia directory, 1868–69. Annals of the North British Society of Halifax, Nova Scotia, for one hundred and twenty-five years . . ., comp. J. S. Macdonald (Halifax, 1894), 378, 388, 395, 396. History of the Bank of Nova Scotia, 1832–1900; together with copies of annual statements ([Toronto, 1900]), 43, 44, 46, 48, 50–51.

FOSTER, ASA BELKNAP, railway contractor and politician; b. at Newfane, Vermont, 21 April 1817, son of Stephen Sewell Foster*, a physician and politician, and Sally Belknap; d. at Montreal, Que., 1 Nov. 1877.

Asa Belknap Foster came with his parents to Frost (near Waterloo, Lower Canada), in 1822 and was educated in the village. In 1837 he returned to the United States where he joined his uncle, S. K. Belknap, a railway contractor, and for 15 years built railways in New England. He married Elizabeth Fish of Hatley, Lower Canada, in 1840; they had ten children.

Foster returned to Canada in 1852 and settled in Waterloo. He became both a merchant and an immensely successful contractor, building railways throughout Quebec and bordering areas. Foster served as president of the South Eastern Counties Junction Railway (later the South Eastern Railway), vice-president and managing director of the Canada Central Railway, managing director of the Brockville and Ottawa Railway, and director of the Bedford District Bank, and he attained prominence in Montreal business circles.

Foster entered politics in 1858 as a follower of George-Étienne CARTIER when he was elected in a by-election to the Legislative Assembly for Shefford. He had received the support of Lucius Seth Huntington*, a Liberal, both of them being opposed to the custom of non-resident members in the Eastern Townships. Huntington was elected for Shefford when Foster resigned in 1860 to run for the Legislative Council. Acclaimed for Bedford, Foster held the seat until 1867 when he entered the dominion Senate. Also in 1867 he was chosen the first mayor of the municipality of Waterloo, and from 1857 to 1869 was a lieutenant-colonel in the Shefford militia.

Foster was involved in the "Pacific Scandal," partly through his friend, George W. McMullen, the Canadian-born businessman from Chicago. McMullen, acting for a group of American businessmen bitter over their exclusion from the transcontinental railway company being formed in Canada in 1872, attempted to redeem some of the money they had advanced through Sir Hugh Allan* to the Conservatives (including Sir John A. Macdonald* and Cartier) during the 1872 election.

The expedient tried was blackmail: on 31 Dec. 1872, McMullen visited Macdonald and demanded business concessions connected with the railway in exchange for not publishing incriminating documents concerning the 1872 campaign. Macdonald refused. Charges of corruption based on the documents were soon after made in the House of Commons by Huntington and the documents were later published.

Foster had been aware of the dealings between Allan and Macdonald and Cartier in 1872, and revealed this knowledge in a letter meant for publication which he wrote to McMullen, who was being much abused, in July 1873. The angry Conservatives assumed that it was Foster who gave McMullen's evidence, which helped to destroy Macdonald's government, to his friend Huntington and the Liberals. Foster, a provisional director of Allan's Canada Pacific Railway, refused to testify – as did the Liberals – before the royal commission investigating the scandal.

Belief in the apostacy of the Conservative senator was intensified by two agreements made by the new Liberal government under Alexander Mackenzie* in 1874 and 1875 under the authority of the Canadian Pacific Railway act of 1874. The first agreement, with the Canada Central Railway of which Foster was a leading figure, provided a subsidy of $12,000 per mile for the construction of the link between the village of Douglas, near Renfrew, Ontario, and the Georgian Bay branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The latter was to be constructed, under the second agreement, from Lake Nipissing to Georgian Bay. Although it was to "be considered as forming part of the Canadian Pacific Railway," it would "upon its completion be the property of the Contractor..."; the subsidy per mile was $10,000 and 20,000 acres of land. Senator Foster thus contracted to build and operate some 200 miles of line, from the C.P.R. terminus at Lake Nipissing to Georgian Bay as well as into the Ottawa valley. According to Alexander Mackenzie these lines would provide "the most direct line from . . . Georgian Bay to Montreal. . . ." Provision was made for cooperation between Foster's system and such north-south lines as the Northern Colonization Railway (which formed part of the Canada Central Railway) and the Kingston and Pembroke Railway. Foster had earned the epithet: "Canadian Railway King."

The Conservatives were convinced that these railway transactions were venal. Senator Robert Read* charged: "Now what is this for? Simply to pay the Northern Pacific [to which McMullen was connected] for their assistance through McMullen to defeat the late Government, and also Mr. Foster for the part he took in that transaction." According to J. G. Haggart*: "It was a notorious fact that the information used to turn out the late Government was furnished by the Hon. A. B. Foster, and everybody in the country expected that [he] would receive his reward. . . . And he did."

By the mid-1870s Foster was in financial trouble. In 1871 he had purchased major portions of the Brockville and Ottawa Railroad and of the Canada Central. He also bought a huge quantity of rails. His debt of $2,000,000 was to be paid in instalments, but by 1877 he was bankrupt, and at the insistence of the American competitors of his South Eastern line in Vermont he was briefly imprisoned in Vermont for debt. So vicious was competition, that in 1877 parts of that line were sabotaged and had to be "guarded by a sheriff and posse." The bankrupt promoter died of heart disease at Montreal. He had resigned his seat in the Senate in 1875, ending an undistinguished legislative career.

The Montreal Gazette commented: "He devoted himself to the construction of railways with an ardor which did not spring from any mere desire of pecuniary profit, but from enthusiasm in his profession." This assessment can be faulted without accepting the strictures of the Conservatives. Nineteenth-century railway promotion in Canada reveals little selfless idealism; David Mills* pointed out that "Corruption taints the majority of railroad enterprises from their inception to completion." Evidence in this area concerning Asa Belknap Foster is both documentary and circumstantial; he sometimes used the aphorism: "It is no good having friends if you can't use them." He was doubtless not an untypical railway man, although his career juxtaposes failure and success in an unusually dramatic manner.

DONALD SWAINSON

PAC, MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), 125. Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1877; Sessional Papers, VIII (1875), PT.8, no.44. Gazette (Montreal), 1877. Globe (Toronto), 1873, 1877. Montreal Witness, 1877. Can. biog. dict., II, 75–76. Can. directory of parliament (Johnson). Can. parl. comp., 1873. Dom. ann. reg., 1878. Creighton, Macdonald, old chieftain. H. A. Innis, A history of the Canadian Pacific Railway (Toronto, 1923; Toronto, 1971). Gustavus Myers, History of Canadian wealth (Chicago, 1914). J. P. Noyes, Sketches of some early Shefford pioneers ([Montreal], 1905), 7–90.

FRANKLIN, Lady JANE. See GRIFFIN

FRANKLIN, LUMLEY, businessman and amateur musician; b. probably *c.*1820 in England, son of Lewis Franklin, a Liverpool banker, and Miriam Abraham; d. 3 Aug. 1873 in San Francisco, Calif.

At least as early in 1857 Lumley Franklin was in San Francisco, where his brother Selim had been in business since 1849, and in July 1858 he followed Selim to Victoria, Vancouver Island. Here the brothers established the firm of S. Franklin and Company, auctioneers and land agents, and were soon recognized as among the most able and highly respected members of the Jewish business community, whose growth had been stimulated by the gold rush to the Fraser River. In 1863 Lumley was president of the short-lived Eureka Copper Company. Both Franklins were active in the Victoria Philharmonic Society, which was organized at their place of business, the "Anchor Rooms," on 26 Jan. 1859. Lumley is said to have "had the advantage of an Italian musical education" and was a composer as well as a performer: at a concert in 1865 he sang his own setting of Byron's "Adieu, adieu my native shore." He was also active in masonic circles. While in San Francisco he had been a member of the Occidental Lodge no.22, A.F. & A.M., and in 1865 he became worshipful master of Victoria Lodge no.1085 of which he was considered a founding member.

In November 1865 Lumley Franklin was elected mayor of Victoria, and when the laying of the Atlantic cable was completed in July 1866 he signed the city's telegram of congratulation to the mayor of London. Urged to seek a second term he declined, but continued to take an active interest in public affairs, serving on the board of education for Vancouver Island and as president of the Mechanics' Literary Institute, and advocating the removal of the capital from New Westminster to Victoria. In October 1871 he left for England and returned a year later, after "a lengthened tour of Europe and Canada." In 1873 he was in San Francisco administering the estate of his brother Edward when he had a paralytic stroke; he died soon after, leaving a reputation as "a most amiable gentleman . . . always foremost in good works."

DOROTHY BLAKEY SMITH

PABC, Colonial correspondence, Lumley Franklin correspondence, 1863–71. Colonist (Victoria), 1858–73. Daily Alta California (San Francisco), 5 Aug. 1873. Victoria Daily Standard, 11 Aug. 1873. Victoria Gazette, 1858–59. R L. Reid, Grand Lodge of British Columbia, A.F. & A.M.: historical notes and biographical sketches, 1848–1935 (Vancouver, B.C., n.d.), 9. David Rome, The first two years: a record of the Jewish pioneers on Canada's Pacific coast, 1858–1860 (Montreal, 1942), 51–52. "Journal of Arthur Thomas Bushby" (Blakey Smith), "Biographical appendix," 177.

FYFE, ROBERT ALEXANDER, Baptist clergyman and educator; b. on 20 Oct. 1816, in the parish of Saint-Philippe, in the seigneury of Laprairie, L.C.; d. at Woodstock, Ont., on 4 Sept. 1878.

Robert Alexander Fyfe was the son of Scots who had emigrated from Dundee in 1809. He grew up on the farm, later learned the art of shoemaking and worked in lumber camps, and, in his late teens, moved with his family to the town of Laprairie where he clerked in a store. On 27 April 1835 he was baptized by the Reverend John Gilmour* and joined the Laprairie Baptist Church. Soon after, he determined to devote his life to the Baptist ministry.

His formal education was so limited that it took four years of arduous work for him to qualify for entrance into a theological college. The first year of this preparation was spent at the Hamilton Literary and Theological Institution in Hamilton, New York; the second, in the Baptist College in Montreal. In June 1837 he journeyed to Massachusetts hoping to enter the Newton Theological Institution, but he was advised to take more preliminary training, and this he received at the Manual Labor High School of Worcester, Massachusetts. Overcoming severe financial and health problems, he entered the Newton institute in October 1839, graduated in 1842, and was ordained to the ministry at the Brookline Massachusetts Baptist Church on 25 Aug. 1842.

Fyfe immediately left for Canada. In previous summers he had served as student pastor in the Ottawa valley with the Reverend Daniel McPhail. He went now to Perth, Canada West, where a church was organized on 31 Oct. 1842, and on 23 Feb. 1843 he married Jane Thomson, also the child of a Scottish immigrant, of Laprairie.

That fall Fyfe was prevailed upon by the governing body of the Montreal Baptist College to accept its principalship on an interim basis. He was deeply interested in education, but he did not feel prepared at that stage of his career to accept permanent charge of the college, although it was offered to him. After the arrival of a new president, John Mockett Cramp*, in the fall of 1844, Fyfe accepted a call to the March Street Baptist Church (later Bond Street, and then Jarvis Street) in Toronto, where he laboured with great success until 1848. During his term a new church was erected on Bond Street.

A son had been born in 1844, and a second son in June 1845. Fyfe experienced great tragedy when in June 1846 the two boys died within 17 days of each other and when a year later, in June 1847, his wife died after a long illness. In September 1848, in Massachusetts, he married Rebecca S.

Kendall of Brookline. They had no family and she survived him, living until May 1884.

Fyfe left Toronto in October 1848 to begin a second pastorate at Perth. After three successful years as pastor he resigned, having become discouraged over his failure to bring about closer cooperation between the Baptists of the eastern and western portions of the Province of Canada. The Baptists of the Ottawa valley and Montreal were mainly immigrants from Great Britain with traditions that differed from those of the Baptists farther to the west who were largely of American origin. The fundamentalism of the latter led to differences on a number of doctrinal questions between the two groups which were hard to reconcile. In December 1851 Fyfe accepted a call to the Baptist church in Warren, Rhode Island, and in November 1853 he became the minister of the First Baptist Church in Milwaukee, Wisconsin. Two years later he returned to the Bond Street Church in Toronto for a second pastorate.

After the failure of attempts to operate Baptist theological schools in Montreal (where the Baptist college had closed in 1849), and later in Toronto, Fyfe advocated the founding, for men and women, of a school for advanced literary education of which theological education would form a part. His plan was accepted, and he became the first principal of the Canadian Literary Institute at Woodstock, which opened in September 1860. Through the institute, he exerted great influence on all aspects of denominational life. After Fyfe's death, the theology department was moved in 1881 to Toronto as the Toronto Baptist College; in 1887 it was incorporated as McMaster University. The Canadian Literary Institute, which had remained in Woodstock, was in affiliation and it was renamed Woodstock College.

In 1859, with a friend, Fyfe had purchased the Christian Messenger, a denominational paper published in Brantford, and made its place of publication Toronto, renaming it the Canadian Baptist in 1860. He provided outstanding editorship until 1863 when he was succeeded by the Reverend Hoyes Lloyd. Fyfe was a champion of civil rights, and from the earliest days of his ministry was concerned with questions of public interest. He was a prolific writer and a forceful speaker. With vigour and clarity he entered into public discussions on clergy reserves, endowed rectories, the desectarianism of King's College, and, in later years, reform in the management of the University of Toronto even though he was then a member of that university's senate.

Fyfe was the leading Baptist of his time in Ontario and Quebec. He was a sincere Christian gentleman, respected by old and young alike. His ability as a pastor and evangelist is attested by the fact that two of the four congregations he served recalled him for a second term. He had a broad outlook and everything connected with the prosperity of his denomination was of interest to him. After his return to Canada in 1855 he did more than anyone else to unite the heterogenous body of Baptists in the two sections of the province. He gave leadership on boards, committees, and societies covering almost every activity connected with the organization of the Baptist churches. At the same time he was the wise counsellor of the small rural churches, the sincere friend and helper of missionaries, and the confidant of distraught pastors.

F. T. Rosser

The Baptist encyclopædia ..., ed. William Cathcart (Philadelphia, 1881) J. E. Wells, Life and labors of Robert Alex. Fyfe, D.D. ... (Toronto, n.d.). John McLaurin, "Robert Alexander Fyfe," McMaster University Monthly (Toronto), III (1893–94), 1–9.

G

GABOURY, MARIE-ANNE (Lagemodière), first white woman resident in the west, grandmother of Louis Riel*; b. 2 Aug. 1780 in Maskinongé, diocese of Trois-Rivières, Que., fifth child of Charles Gaboury (Gabourie) and Marie-Anne Tessier (Thésié); d. 14 Dec. 1875 at Saint-Boniface, Man.

Following the death of her father on 7 Dec. 1792, Marie-Anne Gaboury went into domestic service as the assistant housekeeper to the parish priest of Maskinongé. She remained there until her marriage, on 21 April 1806, to Jean-Baptiste Lagemodière (sometimes written Lagimonière, Lajimodière, and Lagimodière), a fur-trader from the Hudson's Bay Company territories, formerly from Maskinongé.

Immediately following her marriage she travelled with her husband by canoe from Montreal to Fort Gibraltar, at the junction of the Red and Assiniboine rivers in present-day Winnipeg. It was a long and arduous journey for a young woman and did not end until her arrival at a Métis encampment on the Pembina River in the autumn. At Fort Daer (Pembina, N.D.), on 6 Jan. 1807, her first child was born. The date being the church festival of the Epiphany, the baby girl was named Reine in honour of the Magi.

In the following spring the Lagemodières left Fort Daer for the Saskatchewan valley. At Cumberland House, Marie-Anne and her daughter were welcomed as the first white females to have penetrated thus far into the interior of the company's territories. Finally, at the end of August, they found themselves in the North Saskatchewan region, where they remained from 1807 until 1811. In 1810 Alexander Henry Jr met Lagemodière with his family at Paint Creek (Vermilion River). During these years Marie-Anne accompanied her husband on the many hunting expeditions which were the way of life of the free-trader in the west, thus experiencing to the full the hardships and privations that were the lot of the pioneer woman. Several more children were born to them.

When news arrived that a permanent colony was to be started under the initiative of Lord Selkirk [Douglas*] along the Red and Assiniboine rivers, Lagemodière and his family returned to Red River. They reached Red River towards the end of August, before the colony had really got under way, and continued their journey to Fort Daer. In the spring they returned to the newly established Red River Settlement. The North West Company, looking upon the establishment of the settlement as a scheme on the part of the HBC to cripple its trade, undertook to destroy the colony. Marie-Anne and her husband witnessed but took no part in the struggle between the Nor'Westers and the Selkirk settlers. However, in October 1815 Colin Robertson*, the HBC representative in the region, anxious to communicate with Lord Selkirk, employed Jean-Baptiste Lagemodière to carry dispatches to the earl in Montreal. He made the journey during the winter of 1815–16, on foot and unaccompanied, travelling over 1,800 miles and successfully completing his mission. On the return journey, however, he was taken prisoner by Indians acting in the interests of the North West Company. He was imprisoned in Fort William and remained there until August 1816, when he was released following the capture of the fort by Lord Selkirk.

Meanwhile Marie-Anne had been compelled to take refuge with the Indians. On the arrival of Selkirk, she was once more reunited with her husband in September 1816. For his services to the earl, Lagemodière was rewarded with a grant of land lying between the east bank of the Red River and the Seine in the vicinity of present-day Winnipeg. Here he built a frame house in which he, Marie-Anne, and their expanding family lived for many years. To the children already mentioned, the Lagemodières added five others, one of whom, Julie (b. 1822), became the mother of Louis Riel.

On 7 Sept. 1855 Marie-Anne's husband died. She, however, lived to the advanced age of 95. Deprived though she so often was of comforts and necessities, her life had been one of selflessness and devotion, and she survived long enough to see the settlement of the west grow in strength and numbers, and her grandson become the father of the province of Manitoba.

GEORGE F. G. STANLEY

AJTR, Registre d'état civil. Archives de l'archevêché de Saint-Boniface (Man.). Archives de la Société historique de Saint-Boniface (Man.). L'Écho de Louiseville, 4 févr. 1970. HBRS, II (Rich and Fleming), 229. Morice, Dict. hist. Can. et Métis, 116–17. J. M. Gray, Lord Selkirk of Red River (Toronto, 1963), 124–26, 136, 170, 273, 284. Georges Dugas, La première Canadienne du Nord-Ouest ou biographie de Marie-Anne Gaboury, arrivée au Nord-Ouest en 1806, et décédée à Saint-Boniface à l'âge de 96 ans (Montréal, [1883]).

GADBOIS, ALBINE, dite Marie de Bonsecours, Sister of Providence of Montreal, foundress and directress of the Institution des sourdes-muettes de Montréal; b. 22 Jan. 1830, daughter of Victor Vandandaigue, dit Gadbois, of Belœil (Verchères County), L.C., and Angélique Daignault, of Longueuil (Chambly County), L.C.; d. 31 Oct. 1874 at Montreal, Que., and buried 3 Nov. 1874 in the cemetery of the community at Longue-Pointe.

Albine Gadbois belonged to a family that came from French Flanders to Quebec around 1675. Her father cultivated a rich, spacious farm at Belœil, bordering on the Richelieu River and at the foot of Mont Saint-Hilaire. He had a fortune which allowed him to give his eight children a private education in French, English, and deportment. As the children grew up, Victor Gadbois kept them informed of his affairs. Unknown to himself, he thus contributed to the establishment of a charitable institution for deaf and dumb girls. The story of Albine Gadbois and of three of her sisters who joined the Sisters of Providence is identified with that of the Institution des sourdes-muettes de Montréal.

In 1846 Abbé Charles-Irénée Lagorce, parish priest of Saint-Charles-sur-Richelieu, through the help given by Mother Marie-Émélie-Eugénie Tavernier*, foundress of the Sisters of Providence, opened a school for the deaf and dumb of both sexes in a room of the Asile, then the mother house of the sisters at Montreal. With the members of the house, Albine Gadbois, who was still a novice, attended the Sunday catechism lessons, and showed a particular interest in them. She remembered a deaf-mute whom her parents had welcomed to their home, and the keen desire she had experienced to help children afflicted with deaf-muteness; she had said: "I will become a nun and care for these unfortunate ones." She joined the Sisters of Providence on 17 March 1847, and made her profession on 31 March 1849. Appointed then to the boarding-school at Longue-Pointe, Marie de Bonsecours found there quite by chance a deaf and dumb girl eight years old, and was appointed to devote herself exclusively to her education and that of the daughter of a friend of her family. On 19 Feb. 1851 the charitable organization for deaf and dumb girls was thus started.

As she saw her activity on a large scale, the foundress asked to go to study at L'Industrie (Joliette), where the Clercs de Saint-Viateur had just set up a class for deaf-mutes. This was in 1852, when Abbé Lagorce, who had recently joined the Clercs de Saint-Viateur, was returning from a study leave in France. Seven weeks later the young schoolmistress returned to Longue-Pointe with a third pupil. Then in 1853, when there were 10 deaf and dumb girls at the institution, she left for New York. As an ordinary student, in secular costume, she spent a year at the Peet Institution (New York School for the Deaf). With new theoretical and practical knowledge, Marie de Bonsecours resumed her teaching at Montreal in July 1854. She brought new pupils back with her, and thus increased the number to 20. She spent eight more months in New York in 1858, and went to the United States for several more study leaves.

The growing institution was already suffering from its inadequate quarters at Longue-Pointe. On 8 July 1858 her 32 pupils were therefore transferred to Saint-Joseph house, the community house of the Sisters of Providence, near the Asile. A government grant of $480 had by now been obtained, as well as contributions from some municipalities. The public responded generously to the institution's annual collection, but during its first 30 years it lived above all on the generosity of the parents and friends of the foundress. It is therefore true to assert that the Institution des sourdes-muettes owes its existence to the Gadbois family. Following their sister, Azilda, Malvina, and Philomène Gadbois gave to it the best part of their lives. The parents assigned all their wealth to it, even converting their farm, which had become a burden with the entry into religion of their seven daughters and the accidental death of their only son, into a branch establishment. The hospice La Providence Saint-Victor, at the foot of Mont Saint-Hilaire, still stands as a testimony to a family's generosity.

In its turn, Saint-Joseph house became too small. On 17 July 1863, a Montreal lawyer, Côme-Séraphin Cherrier*, gave it a piece of land in Rue Saint-Denis, in the Saint-Jacques district, on the edge of his property. The community of the Sisters of Providence was in poverty; Marie de Bonsecours had only $300 with which to put up a building. Fortunately, a gift of a few thousand dollars enabled her to meet the legitimate requirements of the undertaking. In July 1864 a house of rough stone opened its doors to deaf and dumb girls, at the spot where the present Institution des sourdes-muettes de Montréal stands.

Marie de Bonsecours spared no effort to forward her endeavours. At the beginning, under the influence of the Clercs de Saint-Viateur, she had adopted the mimic method of Abbé Charles-Michel de l'Épée. This famous 18th-century French educator had created for deaf-mutes a language of conventional signs. But Sister Marie de Bonsecours went to Europe in May 1870, to study a method of teaching which had been developed in Germany. This so-called oral method is based on the principle that the mutism of deaf-mutes is most often due to inability to hear, and not to lack of vocal organs. It is therefore possible to enable a deaf-mute to perceive speech through sight and touch, and thus to teach him gradually to pronounce sounds, syllables, words, and sentences. From May to July 1870, Sister Marie de Bonsecours visited institutions similar to her own in Belgium, France, England, and Ireland. In the autumn of 1870, in her own institution, she gave priority to the oral over the dactylological method, keeping the sign method for extreme cases only.

Sister Marie de Bonsecours' establishment was improved and expanded. In January 1872 a wing was added to the house in Rue Saint-Denis. It was the last building operation supervised by the foundress. In August 1874 she came back ill from a mission at Missoula (Montana), afflicted with cancer of the throat. She returned only to die at home, at the Institution des sourdes-muettes de Montréal, an establishment she had herself created, organized, and developed with tenacious will power and indefatigable charity. Of the 44 years of her life, Albine Gadbois, dite Sister Marie de Bonsecours, had devoted 24 to the education of deaf and dumb girls. By bringing them out of their intellectual and moral isolation she had restored them to themselves and to Canadian society.

ANDRÉE DÉSILETS

Nécrologies des Filles de la Charité Servantes des Pauvres, dites sœurs de la Providence de Montréal

(1847–1891) (2ᵉ éd., Montréal, 1921), 124–43. Institution des sourdes-muettes (Montréal), Au pas de la Providence; les étapes d'un centenaire, 1851–1950 (Montréal, [1950]). "L'Institution des sourdes-muettes, à Montréal," La Semaine religieuse de Montréal, 20 févr. 1892. La Minerve (Montréal), 5 nov. 1874 (obituary of S. Marie de Bonsecours).

GAMBLE, JOHN WILLIAM, manufacturer and politician; b. 5 July 1799, in the garrison at York (Toronto), U.C., eldest son of John Gamble*, loyalist and army surgeon, and Isabella Elizabeth Clarke of Connecticut; m., in 1822, Mary, daughter of James Macaulay* of York, by whom he had five children; in 1834, Matilda Atkinson, by whom he had three daughters; and thirdly the widowed Minerva Anne Niles; d. 12 Dec. 1873 at Pine Grove, Ont.

John William Gamble was brought up in Kingston but returned to York about 1815 because the family lands were concentrated in Etobicoke Township. He kept a store, first with his brother-in-law William Allan* and, from about 1822, with his own brother, William*, to whom he left most of the responsibility until the arrangement was dissolved in William's favour in 1827. By 1823 J. W. Gamble had settled on Mimico Creek in Etobicoke to engage in farming, milling, and management of his inheritance. He became a magistrate in 1827 and was chairman of General Quarter Sessions of the Home District from 1836 to 1842. In the absence of Church of England clergymen he read services in Mimico (now in the borough of Etobicoke) until Christ Church was built on land he gave in 1833.

In 1843 Gamble moved up the Humber to Pine Grove in Vaughan Township. Here he resided the rest of his life and built up a manufacturing complex: grist and flour mill, sawmill, distillery, and a cloth factory. He served 14 active terms on the district (later county) council as reeve of Vaughan Township from 1846, but, a Tory among Reformers, was only twice warden of York County. He supervised the Vaughan Plank Road Company and was parliamentary spokesman (1853–56) for the farmers, millers, and merchants who formed the Bank of Toronto. Gamble helped establish Christ Church, Woodbridge, on land he gave in 1851, and was an influential layman on the synod of the Church of England.

Gamble entered politics in 1838 when he ran as a "Constitutional" Tory and defeated George DUGGAN to represent the 1st riding of York in the assembly; his electorate, despite later changes, always included both Mimico and Woodbridge, and his political stronghold was Etobicoke. He opposed the union of the Canadas as threatening to extend Catholic influence, and stood in the election of 1841 for "attachment to the Throne and reverence for the Altar." The Reformer James Hervey Price* defeated him in the brawling poll, and again in 1847. Though returned comfortably in a swing against the followers of Robert Baldwin* in 1851 and 1854, Gamble was unsuccessful in 1857 against William Pearce Howland*, also prominent in milling and the grain trade. Tory and Orange interests brought him forward for the Legislative Council in October 1860, but he suffered a heavy defeat.

Gamble accepted "absolute Free Trade" in December 1847 but by February 1849 he had made protection his central political concern. The threat he saw to Canadian produce and manufacturing came from Britain which, with its overwhelming economic superiority, would keep Canada a permanent "plantation," a primitive source of raw materials and a helpless dumping ground for British products. Capital must be built up in Canada behind tariff walls, he felt, and not be allowed to leave the country as profit for British capitalists. Under tariffs the United States had grown rapidly, Gamble believed, and he admired Yankee enterprise which he knew from his early business connections with his mother's relatives in Boston. The annexation movement later in 1849 was viewed by Gamble as a serious threat to Canadian nationality and the British connection, and he feared it could lead to civil war. He joined the executive of the British American League and held the floor (flanked by Ogle Robert GOWAN) during much of its second convention. He made proposals for an elective governor and upper house. A pamphlet of his at this time concluded that "To continue British, Canada must possess a prosperity as great and rapid in its growth as that of its neighbour, and with institutions not less favourable to popular liberty."

From 1851 to 1857 Gamble fought in the legislature against reciprocity with the United States, and also against undiscriminating tariffs that would penalize American raw materials the province could never itself produce but would not protect it from Britain. He also stood for the clergy reserves and against fullblown separate schools. Nevertheless, he deplored, at this period, those Tories who refused to concede that theirs was an age of democracy. His faith in the basic common sense of the mass of the people came from his work on the county council and his views on education showed a loyalty to the local schools. His advocacy of protection, above all, fitted not only his own interests but his vision of a complex, self-reliant, close-knit Canadian society.

Gamble saw himself the squire of a god-fearing parish, a thriving village, to which his own industries were crucial, and a trusty yeomanry. He looked the squire too, broad and tall with a strikingly handsome head and a decisive manner. By the 1860s, however, Gamble had lost his last election, some of his chief causes had been overthrown or bypassed, and various family enterprises had crumpled in the depression of the late 1850s. He turned to genealogy for solace and compiled Family records. Its epigraph revealed a retreat to hard-shelled Toryism: "My son, fear thou God and the King, and meddle not with them that are given to change."

Barrie Dyster

J. W. Gamble edited Family records of the Gambles of Toronto (Toronto, 1872), and was the author of Letter on Lord Grey's despatch of 31st March, 1848, relative to Canadian customs duties (Toronto, 1849); Memoir of Isabella Elizabeth Gamble (Toronto, 1859); Produce tables, showing the value of any quantity of grain, the standard weight of which is sixty pounds to the Winchester bushel (Toronto, 1844); Speech on the commercial policy of the country (Toronto, 1852); To the members of the Yorkville branch of the British American League (n.p., [1850]).

MTCL, Baldwin papers, entries for J. H. Price; Boulton papers, Gamble to G. S. Boulton, 15 April 1853. PAC, MG 24, D16 (Buchanan papers), pp.23129–40. Globe (Toronto), July 1854, December 1857, 3–6 Oct. 1860. Leader (Toronto), July 1854, December 1857, 28 Sept. 1860. Mail (Toronto), 13 Dec. 1873. Patriot (Toronto), 30 Jan. 1838, January 1848, December 1851. Arthur papers (Sanderson). British American League, Minutes of the proceedings of the second convention ... (Toronto, 1849). J. of Education for Ont., XXVII (1874), 9. Town of York, 1815–1834 (Firth). Christ Church, Woodbridge, Ontario, 1842–1967 (n.p., [1967]). Creighton, Macdonald, young politician. Landmarks of Toronto (Robertson), I, 16; V, 321. Joseph Schull, 100 years of banking in Canada, a history of the Toronto-Dominion Bank (Vancouver, Toronto, Montreal, 1958). Samuel Thompson, Reminiscences of a Canadian pioneer for the last fifty years; an autobiography (Toronto, 1884). H. O. Tremayne, One hundred years old; a sketch of the history of Christ Church, Mimico, 1827–1927 (n.p., [1927]).

GARVIE, WILLIAM, journalist, scholar, and lawyer; b. in the West Indies in 1837, son of John Garvie, came to Halifax, N.S., with his Scottish parents; d. at Hyères, France, 15 Dec. 1872.

Garvie was probably educated at King's College, Windsor, Nova Scotia, and at the University of Edinburgh. His initial training was in classics, and upon his return to Halifax from Scotland he became a private tutor at the newly revived Dalhousie College. Garvie's interests soon took a different turn; he was one of those rare spirits endowed with intelligence, humour, and sensitivity, from whom the role of tutor never required, nor commanded, his full energies. In 1863, with Edmund M. McDonald, he founded the Halifax Citizen, a tri-weekly newspaper.

Halifax at that time had a constellation of able newspapers and editors, but even among these the Citizen was conspicuous. It came into its own in 1864 with confederation, an issue which first appeared upon Nova Scotia's horizon in July 1864. The Citizen's editorials (probably Garvie's) against the federal principle were the paper's main weapon in opposing the Quebec resolutions, and were used with considerable effect in November and December 1864. Even more effective was Garvie's famous satire, Barney Rooney's letters on confederation, botheration and political transmogrification. Like all satire, Barney Rooney's letters have an evanescent quality, much depending on personal knowledge that only contemporaries could have. But the Letters make lively reading even now as can be seen in the following attack on Charles Tupper* and Jonathan McCully:

" 'Sir,' sez Tupper, as he dried the bottom iv his tumbler, and held it handy to D'Arcy's ladle, 'the well understood wishes iv the people are so notoriously in favor iv this scheme that it would be a reckless and infamous policy to put them to the trouble of expressing themselves in a special vote upon it. . . . My dear McCully, I am sure you will agree with me. . . .'

" 'My dear Tupper,' sez McCully, 'yes – no – that is, I mean yes, – or rather no; but I want to see you privately about it. . . .' "

In 1866 Garvie gave up his interest in the Citizen, and, at the age of 29, went to Lincoln's Inn to study law. He won a first prize and an exhibition in constitutional and legal history which he held 1868–70, and was called to the bar in Lincoln's Inn in 1869. He was still a strong anti-confederate, and while in England supported with all his energy the Nova Scotian anti-confederate missions to London in 1866, 1867, and 1868.

He returned to Nova Scotia in 1870 to establish a legal practice in Halifax, and in 1871 was appointed to the Executive Council of the province as commissioner of public works and mines. He was returned for Halifax County in the provincial election of May 1871. When the new assembly opened, 22 Feb. 1872, Garvie was too ill to attend, but an attack on the government in the house brought him from his bed despite the expostulations of friends. There he made an impassioned and powerful speech in support of the government on 24 Feb. 1872. It was the first and last day he was ever in the house. Already ill with consumption, a disease that had struck down three others of his family, he went to the south of France later in 1872 in the vain hope of arresting the disease. He died at Hyères, 15 Dec. 1872. "Everyone who stood in the presence of William Garvie," wrote the Acadian Recorder, "felt the power of the man." The Morning Chronicle added, "Nil tetigit quod non ornavit."

P. B. Waite

PANS Report, 1948, app.C, 35–56. Acadian Recorder (Halifax), 16 Dec. 1872. Morning Chronicle (Halifax), 17 Dec. 1872. Benjamin Russell, "Reminiscences of a legislature," Dal. Rev., III (1923–24), 5–16. M. J. Shannon, "Two forgotten patriots," Dal. Rev., XIV (1934–35), 85–98.

GASPÉ, PHILIPPE-JOSEPH AUBERT DE. See Aubert

GAUTHIER, AMABLE, sculptor and architect; b. 11 Nov. 1792 at Saint-Jean-Baptiste-de-Nicolet, L.C., son of Antoine Gauthier and Gosephte Girardin; d. 30 June 1873 at Maskinongé, Que., and buried 3 July at Saint-Barthélémi (Berthier County).

Amable Gauthier was orphaned as a boy, and his uncle found work for him at the studio of the sculptor, Louis-Amable Quévillon*, the head of Les Écorres (an art studio) at Saint-Vincent-de-Paul (Laval). According to tradition the young apprentice, receiving free board and lodging while learning his trade, shared with his companions in the master's undertakings. In this studio, the largest in the region, they were trained in sculpture, but also in the art of ornamentation by which an architectural creation is embellished and completed. Several of the apprentices, under Quévillon's influence, were also to take up architecture. Thus Gauthier, with his master's direction, worked on the churches at Lavaltrie, Saint-Ours, and Maskinongé.

After the master's death in 1823, Gauthier took up residence at Saint-Barthélémi, near Berthier, and opened his own studio. In his turn, he developed around him a group of bright young architects and sculptors. He remained at Saint-Barthélémi until about 1850, and then went to Maskinongé to live. During the first years of his career he devoted himself to sculpture, and at the same time engaged in business. It was only after 1844 that he adopted the title of architect and contractor.

During half a century of work as a sculptor and architect, Gauthier, whom Gérard Morisset* has called the "prince" of Quévillon's pupils because of the quality and quantity of his production, completed innumerable undertakings. Among the best known are the church of Sainte-Élisabeth at Berthier; the churches of Saint-Viateur and Saint-Paul at Joliette; the church at Berthier, which he restored and decorated with Alexis Milette; the famous statue of St Cuthbert, the altars of the church of Saint-Isidore at Laprairie, and the pulpit of the church of Saint-Barthélémi, sculpted at the age of 80.

Amable Gauthier had been promoted to the rank of militia captain in 1833, which did not prevent him from devoting himself to the nationalist cause: in 1837, for example, he hid two refugees in his own house.

Gauthier had married Euphrosine Gendron before his arrival at Saint-Barthélémi. They had at least 15 children, several of whom died in infancy. Their son Agapit, a sculptor of promise, died at the age of 25. Louis-Zéphirin, who was also trained in his father's studio, became known particularly for his extensive work as an architect. He built more than 100 churches, among them those of Hull and Aylmer in Gatineau County.

Jean Coutu

AJTR, Registre d'état civil, paroisse Saint-Jean-Baptiste-de-Nicolet, 1792. Archives judiciaires de Nicolet (Qué.), Registre d'état civil, paroisse de Saint-Barthélémi. PAC, MG 30, D62 (Audet papers), 13, p.766. Gérard Morisset, Coup d'œil sur les arts en Nouvelle-France (Québec, 1941), 35–39. Émile Vaillancourt, Une maîtrise d'art en Canada (Montréal, 1920).

GAUTHIER, FÉLIX-ODILON, lawyer, recorder for Quebec City, judge of the Superior Court; b. 18 Aug. 1808 at Quebec, son of Augustin Gauthier and Marie Trudelle (Trudel); husband of Marie-Sophie Lapane; d. 29 April 1876 at Montmagny, Que.

Félix-Odilon Gauthier, whose father was the treasurer of Quebec City from 1851 to 1868 and one of the founders of the society of St Vincent de Paul in Canada, studied at the Petit Séminaire of Quebec, and then received legal training under Jean-Baptiste-Édouard Bacquet. He was called to the bar in 1833, and for 23 years carried on his profession at Quebec. In 1847 he was a captain in the 3rd Battalion of Quebec militia.

In 1856 the town prevailed upon the legislature to create a recorder's court, the recorder's role being to ensure the collection of debts and fines and to judge certain offences committed in the town. The court sat every day in a room in the town hall. The recorder was therefore a highly placed municipal official, appointed by the crown, and he drew a salary greater than that of the mayor. Félix-Odilon Gauthier was the first to hold the office, from 1856 to 1860. At a time when Quebec was the principal port of entry into Canada, his post was not a sinecure. Each summer brought its procession of unruly sailors.

In 1860 Gauthier accepted the post of judge of the Superior Court for the newly created district of Montmagny. For 10 years he discharged his duties, and earned the respect of the population. When he retired on 27 May 1870 he remained at Montmagny, where he died six years later. He was buried in the cemetery of that town.

Pierre Savard

ASQ, Fichier des anciens du séminaire. Drolet, Ville de Québec, III, 17–19. P.-G. Roy, Les juges de la province de Québec, 235.

GAUVREAU, FERDINAND-EDMOND, Roman Catholic priest; b. 12 Sept. 1806 at Quebec, L.C., son of Louis Gauvreau and Marie-Anne Barbeau; d. 2 May 1875 at Saint-Flavien, Quebec.

Ferdinand-Edmond Gauvreau studied theology at the seminary of Nicolet and was ordained on 20 Sept. 1828. Almost immediately he was appointed curate at Memramcook, New Brunswick, where he arrived in October. He was parish priest of this large mission from June 1829 until July 1832, when, exhausted physically and emotionally, he returned to Quebec. In October he was appointed parish priest at L'Ange-Gardien (Montmorency County). In November 1833 he became the first parish priest of Saint-Sylvestre, Lotbinière County, and while there he founded the neighbouring parish of Saint-Ferdinand (now Bernierville) in Megantic County in 1834. Gauvreau returned to the Memramcook mission in December 1836 and remained there until his appointment to Tracadie, N.B., in January 1852.

At Tracadie, during the following 20 years, Gauvreau accomplished the most significant work of his career among the 25-odd inmates of a leprosarium transferred from nearby Sheldrake Island in 1849. The plight of the lepers had improved, thanks in part to the newly built institution and the proximity of the inmates to family and friends in Tracadie. Nevertheless, discontent and insubordination, engendered by insufficient, untrained, and poorly motivated staff, as at Sheldrake, soon turned to open hostility, evasion, and violence. Gauvreau became intensely preoccupied not only with the physical condition of the lepers, but also with the despair which consumed their minds and spirit. As chaplain of the institution and as a member and later chairman of the Board of Health for Gloucester and Northumberland counties, he pleaded, in correspondence with government officials and in the newspapers, for more humane treatment and improved general conditions. His efforts were finally rewarded in 1868 when the provincial government agreed to transfer the administration of the leprosarium to six nuns of the Hôtel-Dieu of Montreal [see Céré]. Contemporary views attribute the new hope and dignity which henceforth emanated from the inmates of the institution to the work of this group of dedicated women.

Gauvreau's health began to fail him soon after this achievement at Tracadie, and worsened during 1870. In September 1871 he returned once more to Quebec. He spent his final years as parish priest at Saint-Flavien (Lotbinière County).

Bernard Pothier

Archives acadiennes, Université de Moncton, Archives paroissiales de Saint-Thomas (Memramcook, N.B.), 1828–52. Gloucester County Court (Bathurst, N.B.), Gloucester County records, 21 (1969). N.B. Museum, Edward Barron Chandler papers, political correspondence, 1829–65; New Brunswick, Gloucester County land grants, 1842. Lovell's province of New Brunswick directory for 1871 (n.p., n.d.). Allaire, Dictionnaire.

R.-É. Casgrain, Histoire de la paroisse de l'Ange-Gardien (Québec, 1902). F.-M. Lajat, Le Lazaret de Tracadie et la Communauté des religieuses hospitalières de Saint-Joseph (Montréal, 1938). MacNutt, New Brunswick. L.-E. Cousineau, "M. l'abbé François-Xavier Lafrance, fondateur du Lazaret de Tracadie et 'préfondateur' du collège Saint-Joseph de Memramcook," Revue canadienne, new ser., XVI (1915), 481–95. Édouard Lefebvre de Bellefeuille, "Les lépreux de Tracadie," Revue canadienne, VII (1870), 545–74. P.-G. Roy, "Saint-Ferdinand d'Halifax," BRH, III (1897), 17. "Saint Ferdinand d'Halifax," BRH, XXXVI (1930), 606. F. L. Whitehead, "Leprosy in New Brunswick: the end of an era," CMA Journal, 97, no.21 (1967), 1299–1300.

GEDDIE, JOHN, Presbyterian clergyman and missionary; b. 10 April 1815 in Banffshire, Scotland, only son of John Geddie and Mary Menzies; d. 14 Dec. 1872 at Geelong, Australia.

John Geddie's family immigrated in 1817 to Pictou, Nova Scotia, then the centre of the timber trade in the province. There they joined the Secession Church under Dr Thomas McCulloch*. John was educated at the Pictou grammar school and Pictou Academy. During his formative years the young man worked with his father as a clockmaker, but spent many hours reading books sent by the London Missionary Society. When he was 19 he made a public profession of religion and enrolled in theology courses under Dr McCulloch. Geddie was licensed to preach by the presbytery of Pictou on 2 May 1837. After working in various congregations he was called to Cavendish and New London, Prince Edward Island, on 13 March 1838 and was ordained there. On 21 Sept. 1839 at Antigonish, N.S., he married Charlotte Lenora

Harrington MacDonald, who was to bear him eight children.

The young minister longed to undertake missionary work although, at that time, no branch of any Presbyterian church in the British colonies was actively involved in missions. Geddie organized a missionary society in his own church and persuaded other congregations to do the same. He also wrote letters to the local Island papers and to the Presbyterian Banner, and brought his suggestions for missionary work before the presbytery of P.E.I. and the synod of Nova Scotia. Finally a board of foreign missions was appointed with the Reverend James Waddell as recording secretary and John Geddie as corresponding secretary. At a synod meeting in July 1845 the board reported that $1,000 had been collected; the synod, by a vote of 13 to 12, decided that the board should select a field "and negotiate with candidates for occupying that field as soon as possible." The New Hebrides was chosen and John Geddie, who had volunteered, was selected as the potential missionary.

Geddie spent the next year preparing himself for the new life. At the offices of the Eastern Chronicle in Pictou, he learned to operate a printing press, which he would take with him; he studied the rudiments of house building and shipbuilding; he learned to identify and treat tropical diseases. Shortly after their designation service at Pictou on 3 Nov. 1846, Geddie, his wife, and their two small children sailed from Halifax. They spent eight months in Samoa learning the language, then settled in July 1848 at Aneiteum, the most southerly of the New Hebrides. There they encountered tropical storms, strange new diseases, and suspicious natives, described as heathen cannibals. By the end of the second year Geddie reported that ten people were attending his services, but signs of success began to increase rapidly thereafter.

Geddie organized a school which the natives began to attend, and he printed school books in their language on his press. His wife, a doctor's daughter, dispensed medicines and attempted to discourage the natives from following some of their old customs. To prevent the habit of strangling widows, she took the women into her home. In 1857 the Geddies were joined by the Reverend George N. Gordon* and his wife, who were killed by natives in 1861. In 1863 a mission vessel, Dayspring, was sent from Pictou to assist in the work. The money to build her had been raised mainly from Sunday school collections and mite boxes, one of which was in practically every Presbyterian home in the area. Aboard Dayspring were more missionaries including the Reverend James Douglas GORDON, to carry on the work of his slain brother, the Reverend Donald Morrison and his wife, and the Reverend William McCulloch, son of Thomas McCulloch.

After 15 years at their post Geddie and his wife returned to Nova Scotia on furlough. While in Canada Geddie received a DD from Queen's University at Kingston, but he spent most of his time in Nova Scotia visiting churches and recounting the dramatic tale of the mission. He also worked at revising his translation of the Book of Psalms into Aneiteumese.

The Geddies were back in Aneiteum on 5 Sept. 1866, but the missionary's health was deteriorating. He spent the remaining years of his life in the New Hebrides and in Australia mainly working on his translations of various books of the Bible into Aneiteumese. He finished a translation of the New Testament, and at the time of his death was working on the Old Testament.

John Geddie's death was widely reported in the Nova Scotia press where his work had been greatly admired. As a memorial a fund of $6,000 to assist the widows and orphans of missionaries was announced by the Home and Foreign Record of the Presbyterian Church of the Lower Provinces in May 1873.

PHYLLIS R. BLAKELEY and DIANE M. BARKER

Maritime Conference Archives of the United Church of Canada, Pine Hill Divinity Hall (Halifax, N.S.), Dr John Geddie scrapbook, letters of the Reverend John Geddie, 14 Jan. 1845–May 1870, extracts from his journal; Presbyterian Church of Nova-Scotia (Secession), Minutes of the proceedings of the synod, 3 July 1817–15 July 1842; Presbyterian Church of Nova Scotia, Minutes of the proceedings in the synod, 4 July 1843–4 Oct. 1860; Presbyterian Church of the Lower Provinces of British North America, Minutes of the synod, 4 Oct. 1860–1875.

Acadian Recorder (Halifax), 12 March 1873. Christian Instructor, and Missionary Register, of the Presbyterian Church of Nova Scotia (Halifax, then Pictou, N.S.), I (1856)–V (1860). Eastern Chronicle (Pictou, N.S.), 1843–65. Home and Foreign Record of the Presbyterian Church of the Lower Provinces of British North America (Halifax), I (1861)–XV (1875). Missionary Register of the Presbyterian Church of Nova-Scotia (Pictou, N.S.), 1 (1850)–7 (1856). J. W. Falconer, John Geddie, hero of the New Hebrides (Toronto, [1915]). J. P. MacPhie, Pictonians at home and abroad (Boston, Mass., 1914). George Patterson, Missionary life among the cannibals: being the life of the Rev. John Geddie, D.D., first missionary to the New Hebrides; with a history of the Nova Scotia Presbyterian mission on that group (Toronto, 1882).

GÉLINAS, ÉVARISTE, journalist, federal civil servant; b. 1840 at Saint-Barnabé, Saint-Maurice

County, not far from Yamachiche, L.C., of the second marriage of Joseph Gélinas, with Théotiste Hudon-Beaulieu; d. 7 Jan. 1873 at Ottawa, Ont.

According to Benjamin Sulte*, Évariste Gélinas' family was descended from Étienne Gélineau (he signed Gellyneau or Gélineau), who was born at Saintes, the capital of Saintonge, and who had emigrated to Canada with his son Jean in 1662. His grandsons were among the first to make their home at Yamachiche, where they had numerous descendants with the names Gélinas, Gérin, Lacourse, and Bellemare.

In his 13th year, in October 1852, Évariste Gélinas entered the college and seminary of Nicolet to receive a classical education, which he completed in 1860. A philosophy student, he had been elected president of the college in 1859, the same year the establishment acquired a distinguished superior in Abbé Louis-François Laflèche*. Since his return from the Canadian west in July 1856 Laflèche had had unrivalled influence on the students, thanks to his lively eloquence and fluency as a teacher and his ascendancy as a priest who for 12 years of his life had been a missionary engaged in spreading the gospel.

Shortly after leaving the college, and following in the footsteps of Antoine Gérin-Lajoie* and Raphaël Bellemare, both inhabitants of Yamachiche and his relatives, Gélinas joined La Minerve, and was responsible for almost all the editorial work from 1861 to 1865. Being at the head of the principal Lower Canadian newspaper, a Conservative party organ, he had to manœuvre in difficult circumstances: not the least of these were three general elections, three changes of ministry, and particularly the alliance that George-Étienne CARTIER, then at the height of his political power and enjoying the clergy's support, made, to the stupefaction of his opponents, with George BROWN, in order to prepare the way for confederation. The Liberal journals such as Le Défricheur, directed by Jean-Baptiste-Éric Dorion*, Le Pays under Charles Daoust* (in December 1863 he had succeeded Louis-Antoine Dessaulles* as editor), Médéric LANCTOT's L'Union nationale, and finally L'Ordre denounced this alliance, and sought to win the clergy's trust. "It is our right," the journalist of L'Ordre wrote on 4 July 1864, "to make a proud appeal to the sympathies of the clergy of the country. To wish to deny the enormous influence the clergy has exercised for some years in our country's political affairs would be to lie to our conscience, and an act of the most cowardly hypocrisy. Without a doubt, this influence has been exerted on the side of the Conservative party only under the honest and patriotic impression that thereby the preservation of religion and consequently of nationality was being assured. Today all is unmasked!"

Évariste Gélinas replied in his best vein to this self-seeking invitation. In La Minerve of 9 July 1864 he gave an example of his style, and of the level of polemics at that time: "The Rouge press . . . finds itself suddenly smitten with a noble passion for what was previously the butt of its sarcasm. It becomes national, patriotic, nay, religiously minded. Behold, it is now the high-principled press! Why, it even goes so far as to woo the clergy; it no longer fears either the stole or the holy water!" Attacking at the same time Dessaulles and the other liberal journalists who, logically to them, favoured Italian unification and consequently wished to see the disappearance of the Pope's temporal power, which Catholics as a whole then considered essential for the country's spiritual independence, Gélinas added vehemently: "You, the supporters of Catholicism, nonsense! But are you even Catholics? How long have you ceased to be free thinkers? And dear Garibaldi, you would abandon him outright! Thankless individuals!"

These four years of intense labour in the field of journalism had impaired his health. In 1865, for a rest, Gélinas went to Europe to travel. On his return some months later, he obtained from the Conservative party, which he had served loyally, the post of supernumerary first class in the Department of Militia at Ottawa. During the leisure that his occupation as a public servant left him, Évariste Gélinas returned to journalism, but as a freelance writer; he wrote witty articles for La Minerve and L'Opinion publique which he signed with the initials C. T. or the pseudonym Carle Tom or as "Un Solitaire." These sparkling causeries raised him straightway to the level of a Hector Fabre*, who on Gélinas' death at the young age of 33 rendered homage in L'Événement of 10 Jan. 1873 to his rival's talent as a humorist: "A collection of his chronicles would form a piquant volume to which one might give the title of Comédie humaine."

On 3 Sept. 1862, at Quebec, Évariste Gélinas had married Mathilde, the second daughter of Étienne PARENT; she bore him four sons.

PHILIPPE SYLVAIN

ANQ, Collection Chapais, Fonds Langevin, É. Gélinas à H.-L. Langevin, 8 nov. 1864. St Joseph's Church (Ottawa), Register of burials. Le Canadien (Québec), 10 janv. 1873. Le Constitutionnel (Trois-Rivières), 8 janv. 1873. Le Courrier de l'Outaouais (Hull), 8 janv. 1873. L'Événement (Québec), 10 janv. 1873. Le Journal des Trois-Rivières, 9 janv. 1873. L'Opinion publique (Montréal), 30 janv. 1873. L'Union des Cantons de l'Est (Arthabaska), 9 janv. 1873. Tanguay, Diction- naire, IV. F.-L. Desaulniers, Les vieilles familles d'Yamachiche (4v., Montréal, 1898–1908), II, 197, 237. J.-A.-I. Douville, Histoire du collège-séminaire de Nicolet, 1803–1903, avec les listes complètes des directeurs, professeurs et élèves de l'institution (2v., Montréal, 1903), I, 323, 454; II, 180. Benjamin Sulte, "Nos écrivains d'il y a cinquante ans," Le Bien public (Trois-Rivières), 5 Sept. 1918.

GERMAIN, CÉSAIRE, notary and school inspector; b. in 1808 at Saint-Vincent-de-Paul (Laval), L.C., son of Jean-Baptiste Germain and Marie Dusablé; d. 16 April 1874 in the same municipality.

Césaire Germain received his legal training from Jean-Baptiste Constantin, and was admitted to the profession of notary on 6 April 1830; an active scrivener, he practised at Saint-Vincent-de-Paul and signed his last act on 17 March 1874. His registry is deposited in the Palais de Justice at Montreal.

On 2 March 1852, when the first school inspectors were appointed, Césaire Germain was named inspector for the counties of Laval, Terrebonne, Deux-Montagnes, and for part of Argenteuil, at a salary of $600 per year; in 1855 this salary was raised to $875. At that time his area contained 110 schools divided among 38 municipalities. On 1 April 1858, at a meeting held in his house at Saint-Vincent-de-Paul, Césaire Germain established a society of the schoolteachers of his district. He gave a talk on the progress made in public instruction in the country and the advantages of teachers' associations [see KÉROUAC].

It was not long before the inspectors' influence and their pedagogical action had results. Inspector Germain, in a report that reveals his learning, estimated the progress made: "The number of children who have attended school," he wrote, "is far superior to that of preceding years. The commissioners are showing more zeal in their efforts to secure the services of better qualified teachers, both male and female. The secret of the perfect teacher lies in creating a love of school and in making lessons interesting, thus putting in an attractive light what is by nature arid." In the Journal de l'instruction publique for the year 1870–71, Inspector Germain gave as his opinion that the salaries of women teachers, which varied between $72 and $80, were inadequate, and he voiced his astonishment that so much devotion, self-denial, and toil should be offered so cheaply. On 19 Aug. 1873 Césaire Germain took part in the first congress of school inspectors held at the École Normale Laval, at Quebec, under the chairmanship of the minister of public instruction, the Honourable Gédéon Ouimet*.

Césaire Germain, postmaster, notary, and school inspector, was a citizen of amazing activity. He seems to have succeeded in reconciling his profession as a notary with the regular visiting of 110 schools. In 1830, at Saint-Vincent-de-Paul, he had married Zoé Pépin; he had several sons: one, Césaire-Ernest, became a notary in 1862 and practised at Montreal, signing nearly 12,000 acts. It is possible that Édouard-Pépin Germain, a notary at Sainte-Thérèse-de-Blainville, and Joseph-Gérasime, an Ottawa doctor, were also Césaire Germain's sons.

LOUIS-PHILIPPE AUDET

AJM, Registre d'état civil (notes biographiques fournies par J.-J. Lefebvre). Canada, Province of, Legislative Assembly, Journals, 1852–53, app. J.J., "Education, Lower Canada: report of the superintendent of education...." JIP, avril 1858, 66; juill. 1858, 124; févr. 1861, 35; mai 1863, 76; oct. et nov. 1872, 149. André Vachon, Histoire du notariat canadien, 1621–1960 (Québec, 1962).

GILMOUR, JOHN, timber merchant, shipbuilder; b. 31 Oct. 1812, at Craigton, Mearns, in Renfrewshire, near Glasgow, Scotland, fourth child of John Gilmour (d. 1841–42) and Margaret Urie; d. 25 Feb. 1877 in Montreal, Que.

John Gilmour came with his brother David (b. 20 Aug. 1815) to Quebec about 1832 to work for the Glasgow timber firm of Pollok, Gilmour and Company. The three partners who made up this firm, John and Arthur Pollok and Allan Gilmour Sr (1775–1849), all of whom came from Mearns and lived in Glasgow, had started in 1804 as importers of timber, tar, hemp, and flax from the Baltic. When Napoleon forced the British timber trade to shift from the Continent, Allan Gilmour* Jr, a nephew and namesake of the partner in the firm, was sent to British North America and established the family business in New Brunswick, first on the Miramichi and then at Saint John. Allan Jr, the older brother of John and David, came to Lower Canada in 1828 to tap the timber trade coming down the St Lawrence and managed the office in Quebec.

John and David Gilmour were put to work at the booms of the timber storage ground and pond, or at the company shipyard, all located at Wolfe's Cove (Anse au Foulon); they also worked in the office. In the winter they went up the river valleys on snowshoes, to inspect the camps of the timber-cutters on the lands leased by the firm on the Ottawa River and its tributaries. Of wiry constitution, they adapted quickly to Canada, became great hunters, particularly of moose, and could sleep in the snow in the coldest weather. In the 1830s and 1840s the firm had an expanding timber business and some 130 ships were built for the trade. When Allan Gilmour Sr retired in 1838 his namesake left the Quebec business in the hands of John and David Gilmour and moved to Glasgow; the latter two were admitted into the firm. John married Caroline White and David married her sister Matilda. About 1856, David Gilmour died suddenly in Rutland, Vt., on his way to New York, and John became the resident partner in Quebec the next year. The other partners in 1857 were Allan Gilmour Jr of Glasgow – the Polloks had retired in 1852 – Robert Rankin* of Liverpool and a third Allan Gilmour* (1816–1895), known as "Shotts Allan," of Ottawa, another nephew of Allan Gilmour Sr.

John Gilmour was elected to the council of the Board of Trade of Quebec in 1843 and re-elected in 1844, 1845, and 1846; in 1848 he was elected to its board of arbitration and in 1849 again to the council. He remained a member of the board, but without holding office.

John Gilmour was a reserved man, a "good-humoured, honest farmer type." In July 1848 he bought a residence "Marchmont" with property on the high ground just above the Gilmour timber depot at Wolfe's Cove; it became the Maison Généralice of the Ursulines of Quebec. John Gilmour was active from 1847 with the St Andrew's Society and he was founder of the Mount Hermon Cemetery in 1848; his wife was a director of the Quebec Protestant Ladies' Asylum in 1859. Otherwise Gilmour "immersed himself in his work," which centred on the Rue Saint-Pierre office in the Lower Town; there he "seemed somewhat careworn, severe and suspicious," according to the reminiscences of an employee.

The Gilmour shipyard was active in the 1850s and continued to produce until 1870; among the more notable vessels built there were the Advance, 1,466 tons, and in 1855 the Illustrious, a clipper of 1,200 tons. As many as four ships at a time were often on the stocks and over a thousand men were employed in the shipyards and at the timber-handling. A shipping-point was established at Indian Cove (Anse aux Sauvages) on the Lévis side, to which timbers were towed from Wolfe's Cove. Prominent employees of the shipyard were naval architects Robert McCord, James Dodds, and Captain John Dick, and the woodcarver John Penney. Two paintings of the timberyard and ships by Robert Clow Todd* survive in the possession of a relative in England.

John Gilmour of Quebec received a severe blow when Thomas McDuff of Edinburgh, who had taken over the family interests in Montreal from a younger brother James Gilmour (b. 1818), abused his trust, speculated in pork, lost large sums of money, and absconded. Deeply affected by this event, John disappeared early in 1877. His body was found under the ice in Montreal harbour in the spring. The date of his death is recorded as 25 February. Liquidation of his former business interests in Quebec followed quickly. John's sons and their cousin, David's son, were to continue the family tradition in their timber interests on the Ottawa and Gatineau rivers.

Courtney C. J. Bond

ANQ, Quebec Board of Trade, minute book, 5, 6. PAC, MG 28, III, 6 (Gilmour and Hughson Limited). Quebec Daily Mercury, 3 May 1832, 12 June 1838, 1 March 1877. Borthwick, Hist. and biog. gazetteer. George Gale, Quebec twixt old ... and ... new (Quebec, 1915), 45, 64, 66, 68, 230, 241–42. J. W. Hughson and C. C. J. Bond, Hurling down the pine; the story of the Wright, Gilmour and Hughson families, timber and lumber manufacturers in the Hull and Ottawa region and on the Gatineau River, 1800–1920 (Historical Society of the Gatineau pub., Old Chelsea, Que., 1964). John Rankin, A history of our firm; being some account of the firm of Pollok, Gilmour and Co., and its offshoots and connections, 1804–1920 (2nd ed., Liverpool, Eng., 1921), 12–40, 90, 94, 103–5, 245, 254, 287, 303.

GLOBENSKY, HORTENSE (Prévost), known as Chevalière des Deux-Montagnes and Héroïne du Nord; b. 1804 at Saint-Eustache, daughter of Dr Auguste-France Globensky and Marie-Françoise Brousseau, dit Lafleur de Verchères; d. 29 April 1873 at Montreal.

Of Polish ancestry, Hortense Globensky's father was born in Berlin. He came to Canada in 1776 as a surgeon in the Brunswick-Hesse regiment. On 7 Jan. 1829, at Saint-Eustache, Hortense married the notary Guillaume Prévost, son of Guillaume Prévost and Josephte Quévillon, of Sainte-Anne-des-Plaines, by whom she had at least two children.

In the election of 1834 Hortense's brother, Frédéric-Eugène Globensky, stood as Tory candidate in the county of Deux-Montagnes. Many times Hortense, with her usual fieriness, publicly championed his cause. But it was the representatives of the Patriote party, William Henry Scott* and Jean-Joseph Girouard*, who were elected. Hortense, having made no secret of her attachment to the government, could not expect, when the insurrection came, to escape the attacks of the young Patriotes of the county of Deux-Montagnes. On 6 July 1837 friends advised her to seek refuge with neighbours, since the Patriotes intended to come and attack her house. But Hortense, who had just lost one of her children, aged three and a half, decided not to abandon its body. At nightfall some 50 Patriotes approached the house with the purpose of sacking it. Dressed in her husband's garb and wearing his characteristic blue cap, Hortense stationed herself at a window with all the firearms she had been able to muster. The Patriotes saw her, with a gun levelled straight at them, and chose to run. As a memento of this event, loyalist admirers made Hortense a gift of a silver teapot bearing the following inscription: "Presented to Madame G. Prévost, of Sainte-Scholastique, by several loyal persons of Montreal, in testimony to her heroism, greater than that expected of a woman, on the evening of 6 July 1837."

Subsequently Hortense Globensky often got herself talked about, and what people said was not always flattering. Coming from mass on 15 Oct. 1837, at a moment when Patriotes were inciting the parishioners to rebellion, Hortense began to speak and asked them to remain loyal to the government. When the Patriotes made a move to silence her, she took out a pistol and threatened to shoot the first one who came near. As a result of this incident she had to answer a charge of illegally carrying firearms. In November she repeated the action, once more against the Patriotes, who never lost an opportunity to provoke her. Amury Girod*, an associate of Dr Jean-Olivier Chénier*, organized an expedition one day to try to bring Hortense to heel, but it had no result.

After the battle of Saint-Eustache, several people of Sainte-Scholastique and the neighbourhood are believed to have gone to Hortense's house to express their regret for not having listened to her wise advice, and to entreat her to intercede with her brother, Colonel Maximilien Globensky*, on behalf of Patriotes who had been arrested by John Colborne*. Hortense agreed, and obtained the release of several prisoners.

Brave to the point of recklessness, Hortense Globensky-Prévost had an impetuous temperament, or at least an exceptional one. She was called Chevalière des Deux-Montagnes and Héroïne du Nord by newspapers at the time.

YVON GLOBENSKY

La Minerve (Montréal), 17 juill., 20 juill. 1837. La Patrie (Montréal), 11 nov. 1933. Le Populaire (Montréal), 12 juill., 6 oct., 22 déc. 1837. Ludwik Kos-Rabcewicz-Zubkowski, The Poles in Canada (Canada Ethnica, VII, Ottawa and Montreal, 1968), 17. The Polish past in Canada; contributions to the history of the Poles in Canada and of the Polish-Canadian relations, ed. Wiktor Turek (Toronto, 1960), 119–21. Michèle Lalonde, "La femme de 1837–1838: complice ou contre-révolutionnaire?" Liberté (Montréal), VII (1965), 155–57. Jacques Prévost, "Les Globensky au Canada Français," SGCF Mémoires, XVII (1966), 160–62.

GORDON, Lord GORDON (alias Hon. Mr Herbert Hamilton, Lord Glencairn, George Gordon, George Herbert Gordon, John Herbert Charles Gordon), adventurer and swindler; b. 184?; d. 1 Aug. 1874, Headingley, Man.

Gordon's career is first documented in 1868 when, using the name of Glencairn, he leased a shooting estate in Scotland after convincing London solicitors and Edinburgh jewellers that he would fall heir to the title and fortune of Lord Glencairn on 25 March 1870. He vanished from the British Isles shortly before that date.

In 1871 he appeared in Minneapolis, Minnesota, with the name Gordon. There he convinced the Northern Pacific Railroad that he was about to buy a vast acreage. He moved to New York in January 1872 and rapidly, but briefly, convinced the notorious financier Jay Gould that he held 60,000 shares of Erie Railway stock. Gould began court proceedings against Gordon when the deception was revealed, but his lordship fled to Canada leaving his bondsmen to pay $37,000 bail.

As Mr Gordon Gordon he arrived at Fort Garry (Winnipeg) in October 1872, posing as a British gentleman in search of sport. In Manitoba he lived quietly, enjoying frequent shooting expeditions, until 2 July 1873. On that evening he was seized by a party of Minnesotans, acting as agents of one of the bondsmen for his bail. The kidnappers attempted to abduct him to the United States, but were arrested the next day at Pembina, 100 yards north of the international border, on the ground that they had no legal authority on Canadian soil. They were returned to Fort Garry where stormy legal proceedings ensued. Throughout the remainder of the summer Manitoban, Canadian, Minnesotan, United States, and British officials angrily contested the legality of the abductions, arrests, and court proceedings within their respective authorities. By September 1873 the Manitoba courts had restored international calm but Gordon's American accomplishments had been fully exposed.

On 1 Aug. 1874 his lordship's British past also caught up with him. At the home of Mrs Abigail Corbett, where Gordon was boarding, he was arrested under a warrant issued at Toronto on the instance of an Edinburgh jeweller to whom he was in debt. Apparently deciding that the best of his days were now over, Lord Gordon Gordon shot himself through the head and died immediately, carrying with him to a Manitoba grave the truth of his origin and identity.

JOHN A. BOVEY

PAM, Alexander Morris, Ketcheson collection, correspondence, telegram book; Alexander Morris, Lieutenant Governor's collection, Lord Gordon Gordon papers. Manitoba Free Press (Winnipeg), 12, 19, 26 July, 2, 9 Aug., 20 Sept., 22 Nov. 1873; 8, 15 Aug. 1874. W. W. Folwell, A history of Minnesota (4v., Minnesota Historical Society pub., ed. S. J. Buck, St Paul, 1921), III, 362–88. J. L. Johnston, "Lord Gordon Gordon," HSSM Papers, 3rd ser., no. 7 (1952), 7–20.

GORDON, JAMES DOUGLAS, Presbyterian clergyman, author, and missionary; b. 1832 at Cascumpeque (Alberton), P.E.I., son of John Gordon and Mary Ramsey; d. 25 Feb. 1872 at Eromanga, New Hebrides.

James Douglas Gordon was born into a large family; they were tenants on the estate of Samuel Cunard* in Prince Edward Island. In 1850, after years of battle against Cunard's "unrighteous" high rents, his father was forced to give up his land. James Gordon's education included some years of study in arts at the Presbyterian Theological Seminary in Truro, Nova Scotia, where one of his classmates was David Laird*; Gordon and the future P.E.I. editor and politician became lifelong friends. For several years Gordon worked as a journalist on the Island, and, at one time, was legislative reporter for the P.E.I. assembly. In 1861, his brother, George N. Gordon*, and his sister-in-law, Ellen, were martyred at the Presbyterian mission which had been established by John Geddie in 1848 in the New Hebrides. James Gordon was studying theology at the Presbyterian College in Halifax, N.S., at the time of his brother's death. He completed his studies, and in 1863 published a eulogistic volume, The last martyrs of Eromanga; being a memoir of the Rev. George N. Gordon and Ellen Catherine Powell, his wife.

In 1864 James Gordon followed in his martyred brother's footsteps and became a missionary in Eromanga. During his first four years in Eromanga Gordon represented the Presbyterian Church of the Lower Provinces of British North America; for the next two, he represented the Presbyterian Church of New South Wales. He resigned the latter tie in 1870, and henceforth served on his own authority although he made frequent trips to New South Wales. During his eight years at the mission, Gordon became an accomplished linguist, translating the Book of Genesis, the Gospel of St Matthew, hymns, and primers into the local language. He also helped to establish a mission station on the larger island of Espiritu Santo.

On 25 Feb. 1872 a native arrived at the mission sub-station at Portina Bay requesting urgent medical help for his ailing sons. Gordon accompanied the man to his hut only to find the two children dead. The distraught father accused the missionary of witchcraft and immediately killed him with his hatchet. James Gordon's body was buried at Dillon's Bay, the main mission on the island; the Martyr's Church there was opened in 1879 and restored in 1968.

James Gordon had remained unmarried and had insisted on working and living alone, a tendency which friendly critics thought "greatly impaired his happiness and his usefulness." He was described as a man of "singular piety, somewhat eccentric in his way, self-denying to an extreme."

Bruce W. Hodgins

J. D. Gordon, The last martyrs of Eromanga; being a memoir of the Rev. George N. Gordon and Ellen Catherine Powell, his wife (Halifax, 1863). Patriot (Charlottetown), 3, 8 Aug. 1872. "Sad report confirmed: death of Rev. James D. Gordon," Home and Foreign Record of the Presbyterian Church of the Lower Provinces of British North America (Halifax), XII (1872).

GOSSELIN, SCHOLASTIQUE, Grey Nun of Montreal, missionary; b. 11 June 1806 at Sainte-Famille, Île d'Orléans, L.C., daughter of Joseph Gosselin, farmer, and of Josephte Pageot; d. 5 Oct. 1876 at Saint-Boniface, Man.

Scholastique Gosselin received a good education as her elegant writing shows. She entered the Congregation of the Grey Nuns of Montreal and took her vows on 8 July 1828. After making her profession, she was for 18 years in charge of the education and care of orphans at the mother house. In 1844 the Grey Nuns of Montreal, in response to the request of Bishop Joseph-Norbert Provencher*, founded their Red River mission. Sister Gosselin joined the third group of nuns nominated to it. She set out from Montreal on 10 July 1846 and travelled, by steamboat and railway, via Lake Ontario to Buffalo, Detroit, and Chicago. From Chicago the last stage was covered in what were known as prairie wagons. The party reached its destination on 5 September.

When Sister Gosselin arrived the community was still in its heroic period. The sisters, lodged at Saint-Boniface in a small tumble-down house where everything froze hard in winter, had to adapt themselves to a pioneer's existence, tilling the fields and weaving their clothes. They had already begun to educate Indian children; they travelled about the countryside to help the poor and care for the sick, some of whom were brought under their roof, where the sisters organized a small hospital. For her part, Sister Gosselin was responsible for domestic matters at the bishop's palace and for the upkeep of the cathedral sacristy. When the cathedral burned down in December 1860 she displayed remarkable coolness; making her way three times into the flaming building, she managed to save the sacred vessels.

Sister Gosselin's courage is also revealed by her correspondence; speaking of difficult days, she wrote: "... I did all I could to appear cheerful." As a counsellor, Sister Gosselin assisted the superior and also took part in the expansion of the Red River mission; she was closely associated with the founding of the boarding-schools of Saint-Boniface (1849), Saint-François-Xavier (1850), Saint-Norbert (1858), and Saint-Vital (1860), and of the Saint-Boniface hospital (1871). When a septuagenarian, she was still said to be "the most sprightly of them all." On 5 Oct. 1876, pleurisy terminated her 30 years of missionary life. Sister Gosselin was buried at Saint-Boniface.

LÉONIE FERLAND

Archives paroissiales de Sainte-Famille, Île d'Orléans, Registres des baptêmes, mariages et sépultures, 1806, B, no.7. ASGM, Ancien Journal, II, 132; Chapitre des fondations, 1843–1872, 17; Chroniques de Saint-Boniface, I, II; Correspondance de Saint-Boniface, 147, 224, 246, 256, 260; Registre des admissions, vêtures et professions, I, f.27. Morice, Dict. hist. Can. et Métis, 125–26. David Gosselin, Figures d'hier et d'aujourd'hui à travers Saint-Laurent, I.O. (3v., Québec, 1919), II, 18–19. Raoul Raymond, "Gosselin," SGCF Mémoires, XIII (1962), 243.

GOWAN, OGLE ROBERT, Orangeman, journalist, farmer, and politician; b. at Mount Nebo, County Wexford, Ireland, 13 July 1803, sixth son of John Hunter Gowan, a prominent landlord, magistrate, and captain of the Wexford yeomanry, and of his second wife, Margaret Hogan; d. at Toronto, Ont., 21 Aug. 1876.

Ogle Robert Gowan was raised at Mount Nebo and educated at home. The son of an important Wexford Orangeman and a godchild of George Ogle, one of the early grand masters of the Irish Orange Order, he was initiated as an Orangeman in 1818 in County Wicklow. He later moved to Dublin where he published, in collaboration with George Perkins Bull*, a small political newspaper called the Antidote. Gowan also wrote several tracts hostile to Roman Catholicism, including a lengthy address to the lord lieutenant of Ireland, the Marquis of Wellesley; these were undoubtedly printed in the Antidote and some may have been published in pamphlet form. His major work during this time was a book entitled The annals and defence of the Loyal Orange Institution of Ireland, published in 1825.

When the Irish Orange lodges were dissolved temporarily in 1825, Gowan became assistant grand secretary of the Benevolent and Loyal Orange Institution of Ireland, which was organized by Sir Harcourt Lees, a prominent Orangeman. Although this society received only limited support in Ireland, it carried on correspondence with Orangemen in Canada. Gowan was thus known to many Canadian Orangemen before he arrived in 1829.

Orangeism in Upper Canada was firmly established at this time in centres such as York (Toronto), Kingston, Perth, and Brockville. Orangemen numbered perhaps several thousands and had already attracted unfavourable attention because of riots in Perth and Kingston. In politics, the Orangemen of York supported William Lyon Mackenzie*, and elsewhere many supported local Tories who would not acknowledge Orange support. Most Orangemen felt the need for a grand lodge to provide central leadership and for an able spokesman who would act as their political champion. Gowan may have come to Canada with this possibility in mind, particularly as he had incurred the enmity of the reconstituted Irish Grand Lodge by his efforts to continue the Benevolent and Loyal Orange Institution as a separate organization, but his departure from Ireland may also have been influenced by the passage of the Roman Catholic emancipation act and by the general prospects of better opportunities in the new world.

Gowan settled in Escott Park, Leeds County, Upper Canada, with a household of nine, including two servants. Although he soon became a substantial "gentleman" farmer in the community, his real interest was in politics, and the obvious means of entering Canadian politics was by providing the Canadian Orangemen with a leader and a grand lodge. As a young gentleman who had played an active part in the Irish Orange movement (his quarrel with the Irish Grand Lodge was not generally known in Canada at the time of his arrival) and who was able to talk and write in a manner comprehensible to plebeian Orangemen, Gowan's talents were ideally suited to the needs of the Canadian movement. He was able to call a meeting of representatives of most existing lodges in Upper and Lower Canada at the Brockville courthouse on 1 Jan. 1830. The Grand Orange Lodge of British North America was founded and Gowan was chosen deputy grand master. The Duke of Cumberland was invited to become grand master but he declined, and after several years of negotiations Gowan became the first Canadian grand master. The movement was dedicated to the defence of the Protestant religion and the preservation of the British connection, but it owed much of its vitality to its function as a fraternal society. Although it was potentially an agency of anti-clericalism, this aspect of Orangeism was overshadowed by its loyalism during the 1830s.

As the leader of the Canadian Orangemen, Gowan was a person of some consequence in the province. He therefore decided to run as an independent "immigrant" candidate in the election of 1830, appealing to Roman Catholics as well as Protestant Irish. His refusal to run in partnership with the Tory candidate, Henry Sherwood*, seems to have upset the Perth Orangemen, and he was denounced in the Tory Brockville Gazette in letters which were strongly nativist in tone.

Although defeated in the election, Gowan had established a position in provincial politics. This he sought to consolidate by founding a small newspaper in 1830 called the Brockville Sentinel (named the Antidote in 1832), but it did not flourish. His efforts with the Brockville Gazette, which had been founded in 1828, were no more successful: after Gowan took it over in December 1831 it appeared for a few issues and then ceased publication until July when it was acquired by Orangeman Arthur McClean.

While engaged in these journalistic ventures, Gowan, with the support of the Tory families of Ephraim Jones* and Solomon Jones*, attempted to found "independent" clubs and later "patriot" clubs; these were, in most respects, similar to the Constitutional Clubs that flourished later at the time of the 1836 elections. Although Gowan undoubtedly profited by his connection with the Joneses, he seems to have been embarrassed by this association. In an encounter with Mackenzie he felt it necessary to deny that he served either the Joneses or the Sherwoods, and during a Grenville by-election he denounced as calumny rumours that he had instructed the Orangemen to vote for the Joneses' candidate. Mackenzie commented at the time that "Mr Gowan's general manner of speaking pleased me much, and I really regretted to see an Irishman of his abilities acting the humble part of a deputy assistant to such as the Jones and Sherwoods." Mackenzie's comments were hardly a fair commentary on Gowan's relations with the Compact families in Brockville, but Gowan was obviously sensitive to such criticism. He nevertheless continued to cooperate with the Jones and Sherwood families in 1832 in support of the immigrant societies of Sir John Colborne*, which were opposed by the Reformers.

In 1833, however, Gowan became involved in feuds with the Tory families in the Brockville area which had their origin in the refusal of Sheriff Adiel SHERWOOD to release an Orangeman convicted of arson. Relations further deteriorated when Gowan attacked members of the Family Compact for their outspoken criticisms of the Colonial Office at the time of the dismissal of Christopher Hagerman* and Henry John Boulton* in 1833. Relations between the Orangemen and the Family Compact at this time are indicated by a resolution of the grand lodge which declared that "The policy of W. L. Mackenzie is the one which should prevail," although the grand lodge stated its disapproval of Mackenzie's methods and suspected him of secret republicanism. At this time, Andrew Norton BUELL of the Reform newspaper the Brockville Recorder, wrote, "Gowan was coming around to the liberal side and with a little management could be brought fully over."

In 1834 Gowan stood for election in company with the attorney general, Robert Sympson Jameson*, who was a government rather than a Tory candidate. Jameson's willingness to run with Gowan is a measure of the degree to which Gowan's influence was supplanting that of the Compact families in Leeds County – influence gained to a large extent by his efforts to secure title deeds for immigrants, thus enabling them to vote. He was elected for Leeds in 1834 and in 1835, but his election was declared invalid each time because of Orange violence at the polls. In a by-election early in 1836 he was defeated, but was re-elected along with Jonas Jones* in the summer of 1836 after Lieutenant Governor Sir Francis Bond HEAD had dissolved the House of Assembly.

During the general election of 1836, Gowan had arranged an alliance with Roman Catholics which he had always sought and which had been maturing since 1832. Under his leadership the grand lodge of British North America welcomed "the manifestations of loyalty on the part of the Roman Catholics and their Venerable Bishop," and in an election address to the free-holders of Stormont and Glengarry, the Roman Catholic bishop, Alexander Macdonell*, acknowledged "having received from Orangemen unequivocal and substantial proof of disinterested friendship." The alliance provided a combination of the bloc votes of Catholics and Orangemen in favour of candidates who supported Head. Before the election Gowan had also toured the Toronto area in company with the Tory journalist, George Gurnett*, helping to win Toronto Orangemen away from the lingering influence of Mackenzie. By 1836, Gowan was already a figure of consequence in provincial politics, and he consolidated his position by founding the Brockville Statesman in 1836, his first successful venture in journalism.

With the outbreak of the rebellion in Lower Canada in the late autumn of 1837, Gowan inspired the raising of a volunteer company named the Brockville Invincibles. He was made a captain in the 2nd Regiment of Leeds militia, and later given a company of the Queen's Own Rifles which he led during the capture of Hickory Island near Gananoque in 1838. He was then given command of a provisional battalion of militia of Upper Canada as lieutenant-colonel. At the battle of the Windmill near Prescott, where he was wounded twice, he was thanked for his services in general orders, and his provisional battalion was honoured with the name of Queen's Royal Borderers.

Before his brief career of active service had come to an end, Gowan was directing criticism at the policies of Head, and of his successor, Sir George Arthur*. The Orange lodges in the United Kingdom had been dissolved in 1836 under threats of anti-Orange legislation and Head had expressed the hope that the Canadian Orangemen would also dissolve. Although a few Orangemen severed their connection with the movement in deference to Head, the grand lodge, led by Gowan, refused to disband. As Head and Arthur were unwilling and unable to make any public acknowledgement of the services performed by the Orangemen during the rebellion, the Orangemen were prepared to introduce their own reform programme.

There is a tradition that Gowan had written a letter on responsible government in 1830, and he always described himself as an independent rather than a Tory. In 1839 he published a letter on responsible government in the Statesman which Francis Hincks* reprinted in pamphlet form. As a result of this letter Gowan was removed from his post as agent of crown lands in the Johnstown District (which included Leeds and Grenville counties) and there was Tory pressure within the Orange lodges for his removal as grand master. Gowan placed still greater strain on the unity of the lodges and on his relations with the Tories by introducing on 8 April 1839 in the House of Assembly a bill for dividing clergy reserves among all legally recognized denominations. Under pressure from Tory Orangemen and the threat of the proposed union with Lower Canada, Gowan turned to other issues, without repudiating his stand on clergy reserves and responsible government.

In his views on the union of Upper and Lower Canada, Gowan differed little from the Tories in that he expressed fear of a combination of Upper Canadian Reformers with the French majority of Lower Canada. His opportunities to impose these views were limited as he failed to win a seat in the first election after the union in 1841. This defeat forced him to seek consolation in the politics of the Johnstown District. Here he became involved in a dispute with one of the Reformers, Buell, whom he accused of treason during the 1837 rebellion. Buell retaliated by charging that Gowan over-stated his property qualifications when seeking election. Gowan also had to bear the brunt of the attack on the Orange lodges launched by the administration of Robert Baldwin* and Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine*, with the moral support of the governors, Sir Charles Bagot* and then, for some time, Sir Charles Metcalfe*.

The ministry's attacks reached a climax in 1843 when a bill, introduced by Baldwin, was passed which was intended to prevent Orangemen from holding office under the crown and sitting on juries, and which endangered the liquor licences of taverns where Orange meetings were held. As the passage of the bill coincided with a cabinet crisis involving disputes between Metcalfe and Baldwin over patronage, the governor reserved it for the consideration of the imperial parliament, where it was subsequently disallowed, but he permitted the passage of a bill against Orange processions. Metcalfe's action was undoubtedly undertaken as a concession to Gowan, whom he had consulted at this time on the prospect of forming an alternative ministry.

Gowan was returned as representative for Leeds and Grenville in the 1844 election and soon won the respect of his friends and enemies for his abilities as a parliamentarian. La Fontaine declared that Gowan was the most accomplished speaker in the house; Hincks found him formidable and the possessor of a "greater amount of tact and general information than any man engaged in public affairs." His skill was demonstrated in 1846 when during the debates on clergy reserves, Gowan opposed Henry Sherwood's motion calling for the division of the reserves among interested denominations on the grounds that it would lead to the establishment of a tenant system in Canada. He followed these comments by an amendment calling for the sale of the reserves at the least expense and as quickly as possible, an amendment which passed with a substantial majority.

During this period, Gowan formed a close association with John A. Macdonald* and was credited by the Montreal Pilot with leading the popular wing of conservatism against the Family Compact interest represented by Sir Allan MacNab*. It has been said that it was John A. Macdonald's association with Gowan which influenced the leader of the government, William Henry Draper, in his decision to offer Macdonald the post of attorney general shortly before Christopher Hagerman's death. Moreover, Draper urged Macdonald to visit Lord Elgin [Bruce*] in the company of Gowan to persuade the new governor that Conservatives were not ultra-Tories. The nature of Gowan's relationship with Macdonald and the Draper administration is indicated by a letter which Macdonald wrote in May 1847, stating, "We cannot expect to obtain his [Gowan's] services and refuse the reward and highly as I appreciate his powers of benefiting us, I confess I fear his means of doing mischief more." The reward under consideration was the appointment of Gowan as assistant commissioner of crown lands, but Gowan's prospects in this regard vanished with the fall of the Draper ministry.

The administration's neglect of Gowan can be attributed partly to his position as Orange grand master, a position he was unwilling to renounce, but was more the result of the continued influence of Compact Tories who distrusted and disliked Gowan as a demagogue and a political manipulator. Gowan was inclined to blame Macdonald for not pressing his claim to office with sufficient force, and this conviction was strengthened by Macdonald's neglect of him when the Conservatives were returned to office in 1854. Gowan seems to have nursed his grievances in private as he accepted the relatively minor post of supervisor of tolls on the canals west of Lachine, a post from which he was dismissed in 1849 by the Baldwin-La Fontaine government. Although it is possible that Macdonald might have pressed Gowan's claims more vigorously, he would have done so without much support from other Liberal Conservatives, who felt no need to have Gowan in the inner circles of Draper's administration from 1844 to 1847.

The growing political influence of Gowan did not help secure his hold on the Orangemen; he lost the office of grand master to George Benjamin* of Belleville in 1846. Benjamin, and later John Hillyard Cameron, represented a new type of Orange grand master, better able to conciliate vested interests and more acceptable to conventional Conservatives. But they were wanting in Gowan's powers as a popular leader, and consequently they were less able to control the militant Protestantism of the lodges which so often posed a threat to Conservative political alliances.

In the elections of 1847–48 Gowan was defeated by a narrow majority by the Reformer, William Buell Richards*, and he suffered further loss of prestige when he led the Orange opposition to the rebellion losses bill. In the demonstrations against Lord Elgin during his visit to Canada West (still popularly called Upper Canada), Gowan took a prominent part and he attacked the governor viciously in the Statesman. These actions resulted in his removal from the commission of the peace for Brockville, to which he had been appointed in 1845, and the loss in 1849 of his commission as a lieutenant-colonel in the militia.

In 1849 Gowan was active along with the new Orange grand master, George Benjamin, in organizing the British American League, which was designed to rally public opinion against a supposed threat to the British connection. At the Kingston convention of the league in July 1849, Gowan introduced a motion calling for Canadian "protectionism," which was supported by Macdonald. When the question of the federation of the British North American provinces was raised, Macdonald criticized it as premature whereas Gowan declared himself opposed to a federal union of the provinces on the grounds that it would leave the English in Lower Canada under French domination. He proposed instead a scheme for redividing the counties of Lower Canada (Canada East) which would give the river-front counties to the French and the back counties to the English. At the Toronto convention of the British American League in November, which was held after the Montreal Annexation Manifesto had appeared, Gowan took a strong stand against annexation, but announced his support of an elective Legislative Council, pointing out that the last of the 13 American colonies to revolt had had an elective Legislative Council.

Gowan remained active in the local politics of the Johnstown District and appears to have continued as a gentleman farmer since he was prominent in the local agricultural society. In 1851 he was again defeated in the Leeds election by the Reformer, W. B. Richards. Early in 1852 he ceased publication of the Statesman and moved to Toronto where he acquired the former Compact newspaper, the Toronto Patriot, and entered municipal politics, being elected a Toronto alderman in 1853 and again in 1854.

While engaged in these journalistic and political activities, Gowan challenged Benjamin's leadership of the Orange lodges at the Kingston meeting of the grand lodge in 1853. Benjamin had become a formidable rival as he had gained credit with Orangemen for the repeal of the anti-Orange processions act. Yet Gowan's supporters were more aggressive and better organized, and they succeeded in electing Gowan grand master. In the course of the contest and its aftermath Benjamin's supporters made use of charges which had been brought against Gowan by Orangeman G. P. Bull, with whom Gowan had earlier quarrelled in Ireland. Bull had come to Canada in 1832 and had attacked Gowan, accusing him of being an imposter on the grounds that he had not been a member of the Grand Lodge of Ireland, reconstituted in 1828 on the eve of Gowan's departure. As Gowan had been assistant grand secretary of an institution recognized by the British Grand Lodge, Bull's charge had little substance. Bull also circulated a transcript of an Irish court case, Hopkins v. Gowan, involving a quarrel over a family will, during the course of which doubts were raised about Gowan's legitimacy and one witness declared that Gowan had been a shoemaker's apprentice. Although Bull had made careless statements before (he was imprisoned in Ireland for libel against a Roman Catholic priest), his charges seem to have induced Montreal Orangemen to repudiate Gowan's leadership in the 1830s and the charges were from time to time circulated by Gowan's enemies in Upper Canada. Yet they seem to have made no impression on his friends and little on the general public.

After its defeat, the minority supporting Benjamin formed a separate grand lodge which they claimed was the only authentic grand lodge of British North America. Although they charged Gowan with making the lodges subservient to political interests, the schismatic leaders were equally political and merely stood for a more consistently anti-clerical policy. Yet their accusations became more pointed when Gowan, after some wavering between a Protestant alliance with Reformers and a Conservative alliance with the French Bleus, chose the latter, leaving the Benjamin followers to support the "rep by pop" campaign of George BROWN. Gowan sought the aid of Roman Catholics by arguing, in company with other Conservatives, that the complete secularization of clergy reserves would endanger the special position of the Roman Catholic church in Quebec and the aspirations of Catholics throughout the province. Gowan was able to rally most of the Orange vote for Conservative candidates, but he himself failed to win a seat in the new riding of Ontario North in 1854, and was compelled to sell the Patriot to James Beaty* who merged it with the Leader.

Gowan conducted a vigorous campaign against the schismatic Benjamin faction, which he accused on occasion and without evidence of attempting to create a nativist movement in Canada. Of the 563 lodges in Canada, only 106 adhered to Benjamin and all the Maritime lodges supported Gowan. Yet the schism was unpopular with the average Orangeman and Gowan agreed to step down as grand master in 1856, thus permitting a reunion under the leadership of George Lyttleton Allen* who had been grand secretary for a number of years.

The following year Gowan again ran for the riding of Ontario North and again suffered defeat, as local Orangemen accused him of "being sold to the Pope." He received some compensation for this humiliation in the spring of 1858 when he won a by-election in the riding of North Leeds. During these campaigns, Gowan infuriated George Brown by adapting his slogan of rep by pop, to "rep by pop and territory." Brown denounced Gowan as an "uncompromising adherent of the priest party, whilst all the time professing to be an Orangeman and extreme Protestant," and declared that no constituency would return him.

After Gowan's victory in the by-election, Brown attacked him again, asserting that the ministry would regret his presence in the assembly and that he was more dangerous to his friends than to his enemies. But when Gowan retired from provincial politics in 1861, he was regarded as "the father of the House." There is no obvious motive for Gowan's retirement from politics at the age of 58, except a need for rest and possibly greater financial security. He accepted the office of inspector in the money order department of the post office in Upper Canada, an office he held for a number of years before becoming issuer and inspector of licences for the city of Toronto from 1869 until 1874. During the 1860s much of his attention was devoted to the Orange movement, particularly the founding of the Imperial Grand Council in Belfast in 1867. As early as 1855, Gowan had written to the Irish grand master, the Earl of Enniskillen, suggesting periodic meetings of Orangemen from different parts of the empire. He attended a preliminary conference at Belfast in 1866 as the representative of the Provincial Grand Lodge of Western Canada and there he proposed that an Imperial Grand Council be held annually "for the consideration of the state of Orangeism and Protestantism generally, with the view of devising means for the extension of Orangeism."

Gowan was married to Francis Anne Turner of Wexford who died in 1852. Of his 11 children, two sons, the eldest, Nassau, who became a clergyman of the New Connexion Methodist Church, and Harcourt, were prominent Orangemen. Of his daughters, Aliza Amelia married the Reverend William Peck of Lansdowne and Frances Jane married Thomas Roberts FERGUSON. Gowan married Alice Hitchcock in 1866.

In many respects Gowan resembles the Irish Chartist leaders such as Feargus O'Connor and Bronterre O'Brien. Like them he learned the art of popular politics in the Ireland of the 1820s when Daniel O'Connell's Catholic Association dominated politics. Like them, too, he was an effective orator with a flair for popular journalism and a master of machine politics and he went as far as these abilities could take him. Gowan differed from the Chartists in being more conventional in his politics; his views on general questions did not differ much from those of John A. Macdonald. After 1850 being an Orangeman no longer barred a man from high office, yet, though men such as Mackenzie, Hincks, and Macdonald could appreciate Gowan's abilities as a popular leader, he was kept from it because most Reformers and nearly all compact Tories did not consider him "respectable."

This impression of Gowan was largely the result of his style and manner, but it was enhanced by his continual involvement in private disputes which often resulted in legal action, the first and most serious of these being his long quarrel with G. P. Bull. But Gowan was undoubtedly the most impressive of all Canadian Orange grand masters, and he gave the movement the kind of prestige and energetic leadership it required during its formative years in the 1830s. By the 1850s the lodges had gained a secure place in Canadian society and could be better served by the more conventional leaders such as Benjamin and Cameron.

In his political writings Gowan offers shrewd commentary on contemporary affairs, spiced with quotations from Viscount Bolingbroke and Edmund Burke. The most influential was his letter on responsible government, published in 1839. His major literary work, however, was a multivolume history entitled Orangeism, its origin and history, of which three volumes were published in Toronto in 1859–60. The fourth volume, dealing with the Canadian Orange movement, was never published and the manuscript has been lost. The published volumes provide much useful information on Irish Orangeism, but this is blended with Orange folklore and the Orange interpretation of history.

HEREWARD SENIOR

[O. R. Gowan was the author of The annals and defence of the Loyal Orange Institution of Ireland (Dublin, 1825); An important letter on responsible government (Toronto, 1839); and Orangeism; its origin and history (Toronto, 1859–60). His other writings are listed in Morgan, Bibliotheca Canadensis.

The principal manuscript sources are MG 27, I, E30 (T. R. Ferguson papers) and RG 5, A1, at the PAC, and the A. N. Buell papers, the Sir James R. Gowan and Ogle R. Gowan papers (which are disappointing as they contain only a few letters exchanged mainly by Gowan and his cousin James R. Gowan* between the years 1825 and 1843), and the Mackenzie-Lindsey collection at PAO. A Gowan scrapbook, compiled by his daughter Mrs Emily Ferguson, and now in the possession of Colonel Ashmore Kidd, Kingston, Ontario, contains many interesting notes and clippings. A series of letters written by one of Gowan's granddaughters was published in the Mail and Empire (Toronto), 15 March 1930, 12 July 1934, and in the Globe and Mail (Toronto), 12 Oct. 1938; they give valuable details on Gowan's life.

The most extensive sources are the newspapers, especially Gowan's Brockville Statesman, 1836–51, and Toronto Patriot, 1852–54. Also useful are the Colonial Advocate, 1829–34, Constitution, 1836–37, Examiner, 1838–55, and Globe, 1844–61, of Toronto; Pilot and Journal of Commerce, 1844–62, and Vindicator and Canadian Advertiser, 1828–37, of Montreal; Orange Lily and Protestant Vindicator, 1849–54, of Bytown (Ottawa); and Brockville Gazette, 1831–32, and Brockville Recorder, 1830–49. The Loyal Orange Association of British North America, Grand Lodge, Annual Reports, include some of Gowan's addresses, and those for 1853–56 contain long accounts of the schism in the movement. Interesting trial: Hopkins against Gowan, Wexford spring assizes ... (Dublin, 1827; Kingston and Toronto, 1837) is the most important pamphlet.

Creighton, Macdonald, young politician, discusses Gowan's relations with John A. Macdonald; [Walter McCleary], One man's loyalty; background of first grand master, Ogle R. Gowan ... (History of the Orange Association in the Dominion of Canada, no.1, n.p., 1953) is an attempt at an official history of the Orange order and has a somewhat sketchy biography of Gowan. W. B. Kerr's three articles on Orangeism, "The Orange order in Upper Canada in the 1820's" and "The Orange order and W. L. Mackenzie in the 1830's" in the Sentinel and Orange and Protestant Advocate (Toronto), 19 Jan., 2, 16 Feb., 2, 16 March, 6, 20 April, 4, 18 May 1939, and "When Orange and Green united, 1832–9; the alliance of Macdonell and Gowan" in Ont. Hist., XXXIV (1942), 32–42, present thoughtful narratives by an Orangeman and professional historian.

Brief but not always accurate summaries of Gowan's life can be found in the obituary notices in the Toronto Globe, Leader, and Mail, in August 1876. There are also biographical sketches in Encyclopedia Canadiana, V, 5; Morgan, Sketches of celebrated Canadians, 777–79; Sketches of the 13th parliament in Upper Canada (Toronto, 1840); Wallace, Macmillan dictionary, 274; and Davin, Irishman in Canada, 411. H.S.]

GOWAN, ROBERT, banker, journalist, and civil servant; b. in Scotland, c. 1800; d. 30 Jan. 1879 at Fredericton, N.B.

Robert Gowan came to Fredericton about 1816 as a drummer-boy in the 74th Regiment and later became a hospital sergeant. He entered civilian life as an accountant in the firm of Robert Rankin*, lumber merchant and shipbuilder. Gowan took a leading part in the founding of St Paul's Presbyterian Church in Fredericton and in the organization of freemasonry in New Brunswick. In association with Henry Garrett Clopper, Gowan was a founder of the Central Bank of New Brunswick, which opened in 1834. This bank was a Fredericton corporation capitalized at £15,000 which helped break the monopoly of the Saint John-based Bank of New Brunswick.

His experience with Rankin and Company in the timber trade gave Gowan a powerful bias against the authoritarian control exercised by the commissioner of crown lands, Thomas Baillie*, who levied heavy charges on the timber trade in the hope of creating a giant fund that would make government independent of the legislature. In 1832 and 1833 Gowan wrote a series of letters, under the nom de plume of John Gape, to the New Brunswick Courier. These letters concentrated on attacking the inefficiency of the Crown Lands Office and the arrogance and alleged graft of Baillie. They hardened public opinion against the government in power and gave impetus to the movement led by Charles Simonds* and Edward Barron CHANDLER that in 1837 resulted in the surrender of the crown lands to legislative control. Witty and homespun and reflecting the libertarian prejudices of the timbermen against overbearing bureaucracy, these letters could scarcely be described as literary, but they were influential. "He wielded a facile and sprightly pen; and his Johnny Gape letters to the St John Courier have created a wider influence in the province than any letters before or since. . . . What old resident of New Brunswick has forgotten those famous letters?" Perhaps the most impressive of his journalistic contributions was a drama in three parts, commencing in the Courier 23 Feb. 1833 and entitled "The triumph of intrigue." This depicts Baillie and his father-in-law, William F. Odell*, presiding over the crown lands after the fashion of Scottish lairds.

Probably as a reward for political service Gowan became chief clerk in the Crown Lands Office in 1840, and held the position until his retirement in 1870. Among the freemasons he was notable for a determination to maintain the independent jurisdiction of the Scottish lodges.

W. S. MACNUTT

New Brunswick Courier (Saint John, N.B.), 1832–33. New Brunswick Reporter (Fredericton), 5 Feb. 1879. W. F. Bunting, History of St John's Lodge, F. & A.M. of Saint John, New Brunswick together with sketches of all Masonic bodies in New Brunswick, from A.D. 1784 to A.D. 1894 (Saint John, N.B., 1895), 21, 358, 378. MacNutt, New Brunswick, 234, 236, 476. The old grave-yard, Fredericton, New Brunswick: epitaphs copied by the York-Sunbury Historical Society Inc., ed. L. M. Beckwith Maxwell (Sackville, N.B., 1938), 139.

GREELEY, HORACE, journalist and American politician; b. 3 Feb. 1811 near Amherst, New Hampshire, son of Zaccheus Greeley and Mary Woodburn; d. 29 Nov. 1872.

The eldest of five sons of a poor farmer, Horace Greeley received a rudimentary education, then was apprenticed to a Vermont printer. As soon as he was 20 he set out for New York, where, while endeavouring to complete his education, he concerned himself with ways of developing a cheap newspaper.

On 11 April 1841, after starting some short-lived papers, he founded the New York Tribune, a daily which from 500 subscribers at the beginning numbered 11,000 only seven weeks later, and which in 1854 reached a circulation of 112,000 copies. Thanks to this newspaper, Greeley became a political power to be reckoned with. The Tribune was the spokesman for his firm anti-slavery opinions and for his social views, inspired chiefly by Charles Fourier, whose doctrine had been popularized in the United States by Albert Brisbane.

Alert to all the liberal movements shaking the Old World, Horace Greeley placed at the service of his convictions the influence of his pen or of his word – for he was a speaker sought after as much for the impetuous quality of his utterance as for the extreme originality of dress that made him an eminently picturesque personage. Thus, on 29th Nov. 1847, "to the accompaniment of thunderous applause," he read before an assembly of more than 6,000 persons an address of congratulations to Pius IX, who was considered at that time a liberal pope. When the same pontiff withdrew from the Italian national movement, the Tribune was not slow to condemn him.

It was not surprising that in 1868 the Institut Canadien should have thought of inviting as a speaker this eminent American liberal, then at the height of his fame as journalist and lecturer. At this time the institute found itself the object of a renewed outburst of severity on the part of episcopal authority. Bishop Ignace Bourget* did not believe in the sincerity of the members who had applied to Rome to obtain the lifting of censures pronounced against them [see Gonzalve DOUTRE]. On the contrary, he was convinced that "The Institute is not waiting for Rome's reply in order to reform itself in submission to its judgement," and he offered proof to his correspondents: "At present it [the institute] is reviewing the bishops and priests of the country, and giving them sharp rebuffs for having concerned themselves with Confederation."

Ten days earlier, 17 Dec. 1868, Greeley had addressed the Institut Canadien, on the 24th anniversary of its founding. One of the speeches was by Louis-Antoine Dessaulles*, on "tolerance," but the lecturer had set himself to analyse an example of intolerance that each of his listeners had been easily able to identify. Greeley exalted "the truly liberal man," who had "only one country: the world; one religion: love; one patriotism: to civilize and improve the human family," and whose adversaries were: "tyranny, ignorance, superstition, in a word all that is degrading."

One of the members of the institute, a lawyer, Christophe-Alphonse Geoffrion*, then made himself the interpreter of the "keen enthusiasm" that Greeley's words had aroused in the audience, taking good care to specify that "all liberties are of the same family": "The enemy of corporal slavery is necessarily the irreconcilable adversary of intellectual slavery: soldiers under the same flag, we are indebted to him [Greeley] for the harmony of feeling which is being demonstrated for him at this moment. . . . Your presence here," Geoffrion added, addressing himself directly to Greeley, "is a solemn approval of the path the Institute has followed ever since its foundation, without deviating from it by one iota, despite the countless obstacles amassed on that path." The texts of Dessaulles, Greeley, and Geoffrion were reproduced in the Annuaire de l'Institut canadien pour 1868. This 30-page pamphlet was put on the Index in July 1869.

The firmness with which Greeley had all his life defended liberal principles, and the talent he had displayed as a journalist and lecturer, led the liberal Republicans and the Democrats to put him forward in 1872 as a candidate for the presidency. But despite more than 150 speeches in a ruthless electoral campaign, he had the mortification of being defeated by his adversary General U.S. Grant, who was re-elected by a large majority. Horace Greeley died on 29 Nov. 1872 of the double grief caused by this failure and the loss of his beloved wife, Mary Youngs Cheney.

PHILIPPE SYLVAIN

Many archives in the United States hold Greeley papers; the most important collections are in the following: Calais Free Library (Calais, Me.); Denver Public Library; Library of Congress (Washington); New Hampshire Historical Society (Concord, N.H.); New York Historical Society; New York Public Library; Western Reserve Historical Society (Cleveland, Ohio).

The main printed works by Greeley are: The American conflict: a history of the great rebellion in the United States of America, 1860–1865 . . . (2v., Hartford, Conn., and Chicago, 1864–66); A history of the struggle for slavery extension or restriction in the United States, from the Declaration of Independence to the present day . . . (New York, 1856); Recollections of a busy life: including reminiscences of American politics and politicians, from the opening of the Missouri contest to the downfall of slavery . . . (New York and Boston, 1868).

ACAM, RLB, 17, p.73; 901.059. Annuaire de l'Institut canadien pour 1868; célébration du 24e anniversaire de la fondation de l'Institut canadien, le 17 décembre 1868 (Montréal, 1868). DAB. W. G. Bleyer, Main currents in the history of American journalism (Boston, 1927), 211–38. Robert [Philippe] Sylvain, Clerc, garibaldien, prédicant des deux mondes: Alessandro Gavazzi (1809–1889) (2v., Québec, 1962), I, 221–22; La vie et l'œuvre de Henry de Courcy, premier historien de l'Église catholique aux États-Unis (Québec, 1955).

GREEN, ANSON, Methodist clergyman; b. 27 Sept. 1801 at Middleburgh, Schoharie County, New York, one of a large family born to Joseph Green and Lydia Vorce; d. 19 Feb. 1879 at Toronto, Ont.

Anson Green was raised on the family farm in the Catskills and sent to school for only a short period each year. He had little interest in religion until his mother died in 1816 and he was seriously ill for several months in 1818. He was then led to read the Scriptures and attend prayer meetings, and to a growing conviction of personal sin. In 1819, after he had discovered his brother praying privately in a field for his conversion, Green passed through a spiritual crisis. He felt that his burden of guilt had been removed and he soon joined the Methodist Episcopal Church and was licensed as an exhorter.

Green came to Upper Canada in 1823 while en route to Ohio, decided to remain, and, although largely self-educated, obtained a teaching post at West Lake in Prince Edward County. He was licensed to preach in 1824 by the Canada Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church and was received into the ministry on trial the next year. He was ordained deacon in 1827 and elder in 1830. In 1828 he had married Rachel, second daughter of Caleb HOPKINS, a Reform politician who was later a founding member of the Clear Grit party.

As a saddle-bag parson responsible for a 400-mile frontier circuit, Green preached on an average of once a day. Methodist itinerants were posted to different circuits at least every second year but most of Green's early circuits were in the eastern Lake Ontario–upper St Lawrence region. Green soon earned the reputation of being a fiery preacher, but he also displayed administrative talents which quickly led to his promotion to positions of authority within his church. From 1832 to 1835 he was chairman of the Augusta District in eastern Upper Canada and, from 1836 to 1839, chairman of the Bay of Quinte District. He left this area in 1839 and until 1844 was chairman, first of the Toronto District, later of the Hamilton District, before returning to the Toronto District.

In 1833 the Canadian conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church had united with the more conservative British Wesleyan Methodist Church (this name being retained), at the instigation and with the financial encouragement of the Colonial Office and the Upper Canadian government [see Robert ALDER]. However, many members of the British conference disapproved of the voluntaryism and liberal political sentiments of their Canadian colleagues, particularly as publicly expressed by Egerton Ryerson*, and the union was dissolved in 1840. Some of the Canadian itinerants went to the British body, but Green remained with the Wesleyan Methodist Church in Canada.

Green deplored the disruption of 1840, however. When he was elected president of the Canadian conference in 1842, after having been secretary in the previous year, he and John RYERSON were sent to New York to seek the aid of the American Episcopal Church in healing the breach. They were unsuccessful, but in 1846, when Green went to England with John Ryerson to attend the meeting which resulted in the formation of the Evangelical Alliance, they also formulated the terms which led to the reunion of the Canadian and British churches in 1847.

Green also played a prominent part in promoting the union of the several Methodist denominations in Canada. He was active in the events that led to union of the Wesleyan Methodist conferences of Canada East and Canada West in 1855. He served on a joint committee from 1871 to 1874 when the union of the Canadian Wesleyan Methodist Church, the Methodist New Connexion Church, and the Wesleyan Methodist Church in Eastern British North America was effected.

In 1844 Green had succeeded Alexander McNab* as steward of the conference Book Room and printing establishment (later the United Church Publishing House and its subsidiary, the Ryerson Press) in Toronto, an appointment that marked his effective separation from circuit work and his entry into the central administrative offices of the church. He expanded the operations of the Book Room by making a highly favourable trade arrangement for books with the American conference's Book Room in 1848 and by opening a branch in Montreal in 1849. He also introduced the first steam newspaper press to Canada in 1851 for the use of the Methodists' weekly, the Christian Guardian.

Green was concerned with regularizing the institutional life of the church. He was responsible for the incorporation in 1851 of the Wesleyan Methodist Church in Canada and of its Book Room, Annuitant Society, and Superannuation Fund Society. He was involved in the reorganization of the church's temporalities in 1855 when the conference provided increased pecuniary benefits to its preachers. It was also resolved at this conference to appoint equal numbers of laymen and preachers to all committees dealing with finance, the first time laymen were given a role in the government of the Canadian Wesleyan Methodist Church. Green was also named chairman of the church's Board of Superannuation.

Although he himself was superannuated in 1855, Green returned to service in 1856 as a delegate to the British conference, and supervised the transfer of the Methodist missions in the north-west to Canadian jurisdiction. He served as book steward from 1859 to 1862 and in 1864, and he became, in 1863, the first Canadian to be appointed president of the Canadian conference by the British conference under the terms of the 1847 union. He was again placed on the superannuated roll in 1865.

Green had a long connection with Victoria College, particularly with its financial administration. As chairman of the Bay of Quinte District in 1836 he had presided at the opening of the conference's educational institution, the Upper Canada Academy at Cobourg. As treasurer and member of the academy's managing committee he negotiated with Lieutenant Governor Sir Francis Bond HEAD for the payment of the royal grant. When the academy was reopened as Victoria College in 1841 to teach university subjects, Green was chairman of the college board and delivered the address at the installation of its first principal, his friend Egerton Ryerson. In 1858 he became bursar of the college and in 1860 appeared along with Samuel Sobieski Nelles* and Joseph Stinson* before a parliamentary committee which was investigating the claims of denominational colleges to share in the provincial university endowment. In 1868 he was secretary of a joint committee of Queen's University at Kingston and Victoria College, appointed to study the questions of their finances and their proposed affiliation to the University of Toronto.

Over a period of years Green was active in a variety of social and religious agencies, including the provincial asylum and the Toronto House of Industry; he helped organize Canadian Indian and Japanese missions, build Toronto's Metropolitan Methodist Church, and found the Dominion Evangelical Alliance.

In an age when the laity played little part in the government of the Wesleyan Methodist Church, Green acquired a reputation among his fellow clergy of being a successful seeker of offices of power. In every position he occupied he showed managerial talents of a high order and seemed to achieve satisfaction through controlling much of the inner operations of the church rather than in creating a public image as a prominent preacher. In addition to having been three times a delegate to both the English and the American conferences and twice president of the Canadian conference, he held virtually every senior administrative post in his church and served on many of its committees.

Anson Green died in Toronto in 1879 and was survived by his widow and one son, Columbus H. Green, a barrister. His married daughter, Eliza, had died in 1863. Green's autobiography refers in the 1870s to a son, Anson, but this may have been a family name for Columbus.

John S. Moir

[Anson Green wrote his autobiography, The life and times of the Rev. Anson Green, D.D. . . . (Toronto, 1877), at the request of the Canadian Wesleyan Methodist Conference. The book is both readable and reliable, but the personal papers on which it was obviously based do not appear to have survived. A few of his letters are in the A. E. Ryerson papers at the United Church of Canada Archives, Toronto, and have been quoted in Sissons, Ryerson.

Christian Guardian (Toronto), 26 Feb. 1879. The minutes of the annual conferences of the Wesleyan Methodist Church in Canada, from 1824 to 1857 (2v., Toronto, 1846–63). [A. E. Ryerson], My dearest Sophie, letters from Egerton Ryerson to his daughter, ed. C. B. Sissons (Toronto, 1955). Cornish, Cyclopædia of Methodism, I. Carroll, Case and his cotemporaries. The chronicle of a century, 1829–1929, the record of one hundred years of progress in the publishing concerns of the Methodist, Presbyterian, and Congregational churches in Canada, ed. Lorne Pierce (Toronto, 1929), 78–85. J.S.M.]

GREY, WILLIAM, Church of England clergyman, missionary, educator, architect, and artist; b. 27 Oct. 1819 in England, second son of the Reverend Harry Grey and Frances Elizabeth Ellis; m., on 25 July 1849, Harriet White by whom he had one son, William, 9th Earl of Stamford; died 1 Sept. 1872 in Exeter, England.

William Grey graduated in classics with a BA in 1842 and an MA in 1845 from Magdalen Hall, Oxford, where he also studied church architecture and ecclesiology. Having been ordained by the bishop of Salisbury, in 1843 Grey became curate of Allington and Amesbury, Wiltshire, where he surprised his neighbours and shocked his relatives by lodging with an old farmer. "His quarters did for him, for he was content with the smallest attendance and the simplest fare," observed a neighbour.

Late in 1848 Edward Feild, bishop of Newfoundland, who considered Grey to be "a very valuable acquisition" with "qualities eminently serviceable to St John's," engaged him to serve as his secretary and chaplain on a visitation of Bermuda and Newfoundland. Heir presumptive to the earldom of Stamford for the greater part of his life, Grey, unlike most of the men who became missionaries, was in no need of preferment or social advancement. Together with a few others, he is an example of the exceptional type of missionary whom Feild inspired to serve in Newfoundland.

In 1849 Grey's offer to begin a mission on the Labrador coast was refused by Bishop Feild who felt that Grey's talents were more needed in St John's. Feild instead appointed Grey as the principal of Queen's College, St John's – the remodelled version of the theological institute founded by Bishop Aubrey George Spencer in 1841. There students were hardened for work in Newfoundland by a semi-monastic discipline, were taught theology, and, since the college was Tractarian in tone, could make their confessions to the principal.

After a year as principal, Grey, probably because he wanted a more distinctly missionary existence, moved to Portugal Cove, near St John's. In 1849 he had become diocesan architect, and, as well as designing numerous new churches, such as St Peter's, Portugal Cove, he spread the principles of the Gothic Revival by regular lectures to students and clergy. As colonial correspondent of the Oxford Architectural Society, he contributed an article on "The ecclesiology of Newfoundland" to the Ecclesiologist. In it he bemoaned the lack of good church architecture in Newfoundland, and praised Feild's campaign against high pews and galleries.

His wife being ill, Grey left for England in 1853 but returned to Newfoundland in 1857 to accompany Feild on a voyage of visitation of Newfoundland and Labrador. During the voyage, he designed churches at Battle Harbour and Tilt Cove, and, feeling that the quality of sketches published by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel was too low and that Newfoundland, a "country little known and often very under-rated," deserved better publicity, he made sketches of the colony's churches and scenery which he published in England.

On his return to England late in 1857 or early in 1858 he took charge of the parish of Milford, Whitley, from which he retired in 1865 to live in Exeter. He was in poor health but occupied himself by decorating the roof of St Mary-Steps, a project which may have expedited the throat cancer which caused his death.

William Grey brought to Newfoundland the ideas of the Gothic Revival, and by his sketches and writings helped his bishop to publicize in England the Church of England in Newfoundland.

FREDERICK JONES

USPG, C/CAN/NFL, 7; D, 9A, 9B. William Grey, "The ecclesiology of Newfoundland," Ecclesiologist (London), XIV (new ser., XI; 1853), 151–61; [ ], Sketches of Newfoundland and Labrador (Ipswich, Eng., [1858]). Burke's peerage (1967), 2357. Thomas Mozley, Reminiscences, chiefly of towns, villages and schools (2v., London, 1885), II.

GRIFFIN, JANE (Lady Franklin), world traveller, organizer of Arctic expeditions; b. 1792 in London, one of three daughters of John Griffin and Mary Guillemard, both of Huguenot stock; d. 18 July 1875 at London.

Jane Griffin was educated at home and at a small boarding school in Chelsea. She was a close friend of the poetess, Eleanor Anne Porden, first wife of John Franklin*, who died in 1825, only six days after Franklin had left England on his second Arctic overland expedition. When Franklin returned in 1827, he renewed his acquaintance with the Griffin family and in November 1828 he and Jane were quietly married. Five months later he was knighted.

During her youth, Jane had travelled throughout Britain and had frequently visited the Continent with her widowed father, a wealthy silk weaver, and with her sisters or friends. Now, as Lady Franklin, she continued to travel and to describe the events of a crowded life in voluminous journals and long letters. Between 1830 and 1833, when Franklin had command of a frigate on the Mediterranean station, she visited many parts of North Africa, Syria, and Asia Minor. From 1836 to 1843, when Franklin was lieutenant governor of Van Diemen's Land (now Tasmania), she toured the island and took a lively interest in promoting the social and cultural life of the young settlement. She is said to have been the first woman to go overland from Melbourne to Sydney, Australia, and she also visited many parts of New Zealand.

On his return to England in 1844, Franklin, despite his age (nearly 60), sought and obtained the command of a naval expedition then being outfitted to find a northwest passage. In May 1845 he sailed with Erebus and Terror, provisioned for three years. When in 1848 no word had been received from the expedition, five relief and searching expeditions were sent out. Other expeditions followed every year until 1854, when Dr John Rae* learned from Eskimos near King William Island details of the expedition's tragic fate.

Lady Franklin took a leading part in the organization of the searching expeditions. Between 1850 and 1857 she outfitted five ships wholly or mainly at her own expense, and she inspired substantial contributions to her cause from other persons and from other nations. This work involved her with many leading personalities of her time and she became as learned in Arctic geography as any authority of the day. By returning again and again to the orders Admiralty had given her husband and to her knowledge of his invincible sense of duty, she was, as events proved, in general more nearly correct about his route and where his ships should be sought than anyone else except, perhaps, Dr Richard KING.

In 1857, at personal expense, she sent the yacht Fox (Capt. Francis Leopold M'Clintock*), in a final search for survivors, records, and other evidences of the expedition's fate. Three years later M'Clintock returned with numerous relics, among them a record that gave news of the discovery of a northwest passage, of Franklin's death in 1847 and of other deaths, of the abandonment of the ships in 1848, and of the survivors' intention to head for Back River, on which journey, as later searches revealed, the last of the men must have died.

Exhausted by the dramatic events of the previous 12 years, Lady Franklin now turned with relief to her passion for foreign travel. She and her secretary-companion, Sophia Cracroft, her niece by marriage, accepted a long-standing invitation to visit Henry Grinnell, a wealthy New York merchant who had personally supported two expeditions in the Franklin search. Lady Franklin had visited North America in 1846, and she was eager to return. In August 1860, after an enthusiastic reception in New York, she and Sophia travelled to Montreal, where their reception was hardly less royal than that accorded the young Prince of Wales, who was then touring the Canadas. They visited Quebec and cruised up the Saguenay River, then stopped at Ottawa, Kingston, Toronto, and Hamilton on their return to New York, where they sailed for San Francisco by way of Cape Horn.

They reached California early in 1861 and pressed northward to British Columbia, reaching Esquimalt on 24 February, delighted, according to Sophia, to be "once more among our own people only, after many months of residence with Americans." Lady Franklin was more than somewhat anti-American and objected especially to American accents. They spent a month in Victoria, during which they crossed to the mainland to ascend the Fraser River, first by commercial vessel as far as Yale, then in a canoe paddled by 12 Indians up to the Fraser's first falls. On their return, they discovered hanging over a narrow canyon a white banner with "Lady Franklin Pass" lettered on it, a tribute from the citizens of Yale that has not, as a place-name, endured. After a short return visit to California, they continued their journey by way of the Sandwich Islands (Hawaii), Japan, and India. During the rest of the decade, Lady Franklin frequently visited Europe and made a long tour of India.

In October 1865 she first heard rumours that Charles Francis HALL believed, on the basis of Eskimo reports, that there might still be survivors of Franklin's expedition. She wished to question him personally and, when she learned in September 1869 that he had come back from King William Island with numerous relics of the expedition, she and Sophia set out, by a circuitous route, to meet him in the United States.

They rounded Cape Horn once more, stopped again at San Francisco, then, in late April 1870, travelled farther north on the steamer Newborn. After a few days among old friends in Victoria, they continued up the west coast to Alaska. On 10 May they stopped at Tongass and two days later reached Sitka, where they spent a month. Sophia's 16-page letter home and her illustrated journal of their residence in Sitka are a valuable description of Alaska in its first years of occupation by the United States. In July they travelled by rail from San Francisco to Salt Lake City, where they stopped to disapprove of the Mormons on their home ground. Brigham Young himself came to visit them, which prompted Sophia to suppose "it was the first time in his life, that the President [Young] had ever paid a visit of ceremony or respect to any woman." In Cincinnati, Ohio, and later in New York they achieved the great object of their journey, interviews with Hall. Unfortunately, no record of what passed between them has been preserved. At the time of their meetings, Hall's plans to try for the North Pole had been formed, but he evidently agreed to renew later his search for survivors on or near King William Island.

Even when she was in her eighties, Lady Franklin's attention was still firmly fixed on Arctic matters and in 1875 she took an active interest in the preparations of the expedition by George Strong Nares* toward the North Pole and, especially, in Allen Young*'s proposed search for Franklin's records. Among her very last concerns was the erection in Westminster Abbey of a monument to her husband, which was unveiled a fortnight after her own death. It bore, in part, these words: ". . . erected by Jane, his widow, who, after long waiting, and sending many in search of him, herself departed, to seek and to find him in the realms of light. . . ." She was buried in Kensal Green, west London, beside her sister, Lady Mary Simpkinson.

Lady Franklin never allowed herself to be photographed, she published no books, she did not lecture, and her campaigns were mainly conducted through others. But, in a period when popular sentiment was greatly influenced by the example of Queen Victoria mourning her consort, Lady Franklin's steadfast loyalty to her husband's memory and her own impressive dignity in adversity gave her, despite her reserve, a firm hold on the public's imagination and sympathy, and her name was a household word throughout the world.

It has often been said that the loss of Franklin's expedition achieved more for the exploration of the Canadian Arctic than its success could have done. To the extent that this generalization is true, the credit is due to Lady Franklin, who would not rest nor would she let those in authority rest until the whole truth of the expedition's fate, so far as it could be ascertained, had been found out and the achievements of her husband and his men fittingly acknowledged.

ALAN COOKE

SPRI, MS 248/121, 248/122 (Jane Franklin's two-volume journal, August–September 1860, 1–5 Jan. 1861); MS 248/160 (Jane Franklin's journal, July–August 1846); MS 248/163/3 (Jane Franklin's journal notes, July–August 1860); MS 248/242 (Sophia Cracroft's journal at Sitka, 12 May–14 June 1870); MS 248/247/73–83 (Sophia Cracroft's letters, 13 Dec. 1860–9 June 1862); MS 248/247/84–96 (her letters, 23 Jan.–18 July 1870); MS 695 (Sophia Cracroft's journal letter, February–April 1861).

Times (London), 19 July 1875. DNB. Kathleen Fitzpatrick, Sir John Franklin in Tasmania, 1837–1843 (Melbourne, Aust., 1949). A. L. Korn, The Victorian visitors: an account of the Hawaiian kingdom, 1861–1866, including the journal letters of Sophia Cracroft, extracts from the journals of Lady Franklin, and diaries and letters of Queen Emma of Hawaii (Honolulu, 1958). F. L. M'Clintock, The voyage of the "Fox" in the Arctic seas: a narrative of the discovery of the fate of Sir John Franklin and his companions (London, 1859). W. F. Rawnsley, The life, diaries, and correspondence of Jane, Lady Franklin, 1792–1875 (London, 1923). F. J. Woodward, Portrait of Jane: a life of Lady Franklin (London, 1951).

GUGY, BARTHOLOMEW CONRAD AUGUSTUS, soldier, MHA, seigneur; b. 6 Nov. 1796 at Trois-Rivières, eldest son of Louis Gugy*, member of the assembly, seigneur, and legislative councillor, and of Juliana O'Connor; d. suddenly on 11 June 1876 at his residence of Darnoc, at Beauport, near Quebec.

A Huguenot by birth, and the son of a Swiss colonel who was a French royalist before entering the service of Great Britain, Bartholomew was educated at the school of the Reverend John

Strachan* at Cornwall, and enlisted in the Canadian Fencibles as soon as war was declared in 1812. He fought beside his father, was promoted lieutenant, and distinguished himself at the battle of Châteauguay. He then studied law and was called to the bar on 7 Aug. 1822. He was not long in acquiring a numerous and lucrative clientele, but his subsequent career was above all political and military.

In 1831 Gugy was elected to the assembly for Sherbrooke, and was re-elected until the period of the 1837–38 disturbances. As he was one of the small number of Tories who could express themselves readily in French, he had frequent and stirring verbal bouts with Louis-Joseph PAPINEAU. Gugy fought with supple oratory, using irony, banter, sarcasm, and insolence. He had the knack of finding the best way to exasperate the speaker, and the latter would respond loudly. (According to certain champions of Papineau, it was this same Gugy who was chiefly responsible for the improprieties of language of the Patriotes and their leader.)

In 1837, at the first echo of the revolt, Gugy volunteered for the militia. With the rank of colonel, he led the cavalry at Saint-Charles, and it may have been he who personally seized the "column of liberty" the Patriotes had erected in honour of Papineau, and carried it in triumph (with two subalterns) to Montreal. At Saint-Eustache he again distinguished himself by his enthusiasm. He is said to have led his horse into the church in order to water it at the stoups. He was accused of cruelty, and even of walking knee deep in the blood of French Canadians. But a pamphlet, Attestation de six curés au sujet de la conduite du colonel Gugy en 1837–1838, re-establishes the truth in his favour. Later, having billetted his troops at Saint-Hyacinthe, Gugy stayed at the Dessaulles' house, where the Papineau children had taken refuge. He gave a wax doll to Ezilda and two picture books to Gustave.

From 22 Nov. 1838 to 2 Jan. 1839, Gugy held the position of police magistrate at Montreal, and on 14 March 1841 he agreed to become adjutant-general of militia for Lower Canada. Until his resignation on 30 June 1846 he was one of the favourite targets of the Liberal party of Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine*, which accused him of not appointing enough French Canadians to the higher ranks of the militia. After the Union in 1841, Gugy had stood as a Tory candidate in Saint-Maurice County, but had been defeated despite the scrutineer's efforts on his behalf. In fact, the supporters of his opponent, Joseph-Édouard Turcotte*, had seized the polling booth. He had also been a candidate in Sherbrooke but was defeated by Edward HALE. In 1848 he was elected by acclamation in the town of Sherbrooke. In the house, Gugy voted regularly against La Fontaine's ministry, and during the famous debate on the rebellion losses bill, Gugy, with Sir Allan Napier MacNab*, was the principal leader of the opposition. His speeches contributed not a little to the almost electric tension that finally exploded during the riots following the burning of the parliament building in 1849. He reacted with his customary spirit and impetuosity, and began to fight with the very people who had been aroused by his speeches. During the night the parliament was set on fire, he seized several of the agitators to stop them from setting upon the speaker, Augustin-Norbert Morin*; the next day, 26 April, on the Champ de Mars, when the rioters were assembling to launch an attack on the homes of Francis Hincks*, Benjamin Holmes*, and La Fontaine, Gugy climbed a lamp-post and harangued the crowd for two hours, trying in vain to persuade them to disperse. These pirouettes (physical and political) led Le Canadien of 9 May 1849 to portray the colonel as "a hitherto undescribed variety of the species, one who belongs to no nation in particular . . . being part Swiss, part Irish, part French, part Indian, and we believe part ——." After 1850, through fear of the annexationists, Gugy gradually drew away from the Montreal Tories. This is perhaps why he did not venture to become a candidate in the 1851 election.

That year Colonel Gugy was nevertheless appointed one of the Canadian representatives to the universal exhibition in London. In 1853 he received another civil post as inspector and superintendent of police at Montreal, but resigned the same year to retire to the estate at Beauport that he had inherited in 1840 from his father, together with the seigneuries of Yamachiche, Rivière-du-Loup, Grandpré, Grosbois, and Dumontier. After a stinging defeat in 1854 at the hands of another Tory, James Moir Ferres, in Missisquoi-Est, he retired from politics for good.

Hot-headed, irascible, endowed with a colourful nature, the bulky, loud-voiced colonel was not vindictive, or intolerant, or sectarian. As a seigneur, he collected his rents with regularity, but never resorted to vexatious measures. He liked lawsuits. In 1844, for example, he had given a thrashing to a young delivery-boy who, on Francis Hincks' orders, persisted in leaving the Pilot at the colonel's door. Hincks had prosecuted him, and Gugy had particularly enjoyed his victory. Later, he brought actions against a certain William Brown which lasted 22 years, and which were ended only by the fire that destroyed the Palais de Justice at Quebec in 1873. Towards the end of his life Gugy often returned to Quebec, riding erect on horseback despite his 78 years, to ensconce himself in the library of the Palais de Justice and regale the young of all ages with the details of his former litigations and addresses to the court. He does not seem to have had a fanatical temperament. If he was never popular among French Canadians, it is because he too often upheld principles which they rejected.

By his two marriages, with Louise Duchesnay and Mary McGrath, he had one son and three daughters.

Jacques Monet

B. C. A. Gugy, How I lost my money: an episode in my life (Quebec, 1859); Letters originally published in the "Quebec Gazette," addressed to His Excellency Sir E. W. Head, Bart, governor-general of B.N. America, &c. (Quebec, 1855). PAC, MG 30, D62 (Audet papers), 14, pp.641–762. Certaines attestations, dédiées au jury éclairé qui a décidé la cause Gugy vs Brown (Québec, 1871). Le Canadien (Québec), 9 mai 1849, 12 juin 1876. Montreal Standard, 3 Feb 1912. Morgan, Sketches of celebrated Canadians, 517–28. Political appointments, 1841–1865 (J.-O. Coté).

Raphaël Bellemare, Les bases de l'histoire d'Yamachiche 1703–1903; commémoration des premiers établissements dans cette paroisse; ses fiefs, ses seigneurs, ses premiers habitants, ses développements, son démembrement en plusieurs paroisses et autres renseignements tirés de manuscripts inédits conservés dans les vieilles archives du Bas-Canada (Montréal, 1901), 100–1. Cornell, Alignment of political groups. Dent, Last forty years, II, 616. Gérard Filteau, Histoire des Patriotes (3v., Montréal, 1938–39). Monet, Last cannon shot. D. R. Barry, "An eminent Quebec lawyer of the last century," Canadian Law Times (Toronto), XXXII (1912), 427–38. É.-Z. Massicotte, "Les tribunaux de police de Montréal," BRH, XXVI (1920), 180–83. P.-G. Roy, "Bartholomew-Conrad-Augustus Gugy," BRH, X (1904), 333–36.

GUIGUES, JOSEPH-BRUNO, priest, Oblate of Mary Immaculate, bishop, and educator; b. 26 Aug. 1805 in the hamlet of La Garde, in the commune of Gap (department of Hautes-Alpes), France, son of Bruno Guigues, army officer and goldsmith, and Thérèse Richier; d. 8 Feb. 1874 at Ottawa, Ont.

Joseph-Bruno Guigues, to whose first name Eugène is sometimes added, began his studies at Gap and continued them at the classical college at Forcalquier. On 2 Aug. 1821 he entered the noviciate of the Oblates at Notre-Dame-du-Laus (Hautes-Alpes). Because of his youth he did not make his profession until 4 Nov. 1823, at Aix-en-Provence, and he remained in this town to complete his theological studies.

While still just a deacon, Guigues was appointed professor of philosophy (1827–28) and bursar (1827–29) at the seminary of Marseilles. On 31 May 1828 he was ordained priest by Charles-Fortuné de Mazenod, bishop of Marseilles. Shortly afterwards he was appointed novice-master at Saint-Just, near Marseilles, but was obliged to give up his post for reasons of health, and he then spent some years at Notre-Dame-du-Laus and at Aix. In 1834 Guigues became first superior and parish priest ex officio at Notre-Dame de l'Osier (department of Isère), and raised this ancient place of pilgrimage from its material and spiritual ruins. At the same time he devoted himself to preaching retreats in the dioceses of Grenoble and Valence, and contributed to the regional Catholic journal.

In 1844, after 10 years of steadfast service during which he won the confidence of the French bishops, he was appointed "visitor," or acting superior, in Canada, where the Oblates had been working since 1841. He arrived at Longueuil on 18 Aug. 1844, and immediately began organizing his congregation. During his stay at Longueuil he sent missionaries to relieve secular priests; the Indians of the Saguenay and Timiskaming regions thus received visits. Then, in 1845, Fathers Alexandre-Antonin Taché* and Pierre Aubert* set off for the Red River missions. Guigues endeavoured also to send missionaries to Oregon: in 1847 Father Pascal Ricard, together with three priests and a brother, left France for this mission. In addition, the Oblates concerned themselves with a number of houses in the United States. While directing missionary activities, Guigues was also superior of the new community of sisters of the Holy Names of Jesus and Mary.

The Canadian bishops, Ignace Bourget* in particular, were not slow in recognizing the qualities of the superior of the Oblates and obtained his appointment as first bishop of Bytown (Ottawa) on 9 July 1847. Not being familiar with the English language, Guigues withdrew to the parish of Saint-Colomban in the diocese of Montreal (now in the diocese of Saint-Jérôme), to learn it, as it was indispensable for his new sphere of activity. On 30 July 1848 he was consecrated bishop in the Bytown cathedral by Rémi Gaulin*, bishop of Kingston.

The new bishop continued to direct the Congregation of the Oblates, first as "extraordinary visitor" until 1851, when Father Jacques Santoni* succeeded him, and again from 1856 when he was appointed provincial. He was replaced by Father Joseph-Henri Tabaret* in 1864. This position with the congregation did not prevent him from giving serious attention to the affairs of his vast diocese, with a population of 35,000 to 40,000 persons, a good many of whom were Protestant. On his arrival he found an unfinished cathedral, three stone churches, and some 15 chapels made of wood; seven secular priests and seven Oblates made up his whole clergy. He set to work resolutely, and at the time of his death 67 churches, 48 chapels, and several schools were in existence; he had under him 53 secular priests and 37 Oblates. In 1871 the population of the diocese reached a total of 182,171, of whom 96,548 were Catholics.

The bishop took a keen interest in the missions among the Indians and in the lumber camps. He even worked towards setting up an apostolic vicariate for the Indians located between James Bay and Labrador, but this plan was realized only in the 20th century. Guigues also devoted his efforts to the task of settlement; to ensure its success, he started a settlement society on 3 Sept. 1849 and took on the presidency himself. The purpose of this society was to supply useful information to new settlers, and to get the government to open roads and survey land. He wrote numerous letters on this subject to various authorities. He was of the opinion that the clergy must take an interest in this work, but he considered that it was "essentially a laic" enterprise and that the direction of it was better left to laymen. For the work to make headway, he judged it expedient to steer the Quebec settlers towards the Gatineau region and the townships situated between Rigaud and Bytown. "It is better to begin with these," he said, "for Canadiens are troubled when they are alone; it is preferable to put them in groups." As for the Irish settlers, he encouraged them to settle between Ottawa and Lake Huron.

Education of youth was one of his first concerns. As early as September 1848 he opened a college and a seminary at Bytown. In 1856 a new stone college was erected on the present site of the University of Ottawa. Father Joseph-Henri Tabaret was its superior, and the Oblates were entrusted with directing it. They continued to do so until 1965. The seminary provided the bishop with some priests, but, to fill his needs, he had to recruit several from his native diocese.

Bishop Guigues was a perspicacious man, who grasped immediately the special character of his diocese and introduced bilingualism into the ministry and into education. He was also active on behalf of Catholic schools, and fought for a long time to obtain justice for Catholics and French Canadians. He offered to have given free at the college in Ottawa "a course of instruction designed to provide complete education and result in the qualifications necessary for teaching." He presided over several citizens' meetings to encourage them to support and defend Catholic and French schools. He was in constant touch with the episcopate of Ontario, in particular with Armand de Charbonnel*, bishop of Toronto, as well as with Richard William Scott*, a member of the Legislative Assembly, in order to obtain a law favourable to separate schools. It was passed in 1863. In his letters to Egerton Ryerson*, the superintendent of education for Canada West, Guigues denounced mixed schools (common schools), which he considered as one of the greatest threats to family peace and the future of the whole country. Finally, he helped the Ottawa schools by lending them sums drawn from the episcopal treasury. He supported the Grey Nuns, who were already established at Ottawa, and their superior, Mother Élisabeth BRUYÈRE, and had the Brothers of the Christian Schools and the sisters of the Congregation of Notre-Dame come to Ottawa. The latter organized a boarding-school.

A friend of the poor and forsaken, Bishop Guigues gave his support to the setting up of an old people's home, and recruited the Good Shepherd Nuns of Angers who came from Buffalo to open a house for the protection of young girls. The bishop also encouraged the Institut Canadien-Français of Ottawa, the Union Saint-Joseph (which has become the Union du Canada), the Institute of Young Catholic Irishmen, the Cercle Littéraire de la Jeunesse Catholique, and the St Vincent de Paul Society.

The bishop of Ottawa had the interest of the Canadian church at heart, and regularly attended the provincial councils of Quebec. In 1870 he went to the Vatican council, where he received the title of Roman count, and visited several general chapters of his congregation in France. His attachment to the universal church had led him to propose a plan for the support of the Zouaves when the papal states were invaded in 1867. As early as 1860 he had recommended that each bishop support one or more Zouaves.

By nature of great gentleness and charm, Bishop Guigues possessed unusual energy and knew how to circumvent obstacles to attain his ends. He was a simple man; until the end of his life he discharged the duties of parish priest or vicar, he regularly heard confession in his cathedral, and he often preached and visited the sick. He made a tour of his diocese each year, and these visits constituted veritable retreats during which the bishop was accessible to all.

GASTON CARRIÈRE

Ten registers of Bishop Guigues' correspondence are found at the Archevêché d'Ottawa; other letters are in the Archives provinciales O.M.I. (Montreal) and the Archives générales O.M.I. (Rome). A copy of each of these documents is at the AHO. A copy of Dossier F. 182 (Ottawa, mission reports, 1848–76), Archives de la Propagation de la Foi de Paris, can be found at the Research Centre in Canadian Religious History at St Paul's University Seminary (Ottawa).

[Louis Gladu], Monseigneur J.E.B. Guigues, 1er évêque d'Ottawa: sa vie et ses œuvres (Ottawa, 1874). Notices nécrologiques des O.M.I., III, 89–130. Alexis de Barbezieux, Histoire de la province ecclésiastique d'Ottawa et de la colonisation dans la vallée de l'Ottawa (2v., Ottawa, 1897), I, 241–609. Carrière, Histoire des O.M.I. Pierre Hurtubise, "Mgr de Charbonnel et Mgr Guigues; la lutte en faveur des écoles séparées à la lumière de leur correspondance (1850–1856)," Revue de l'université d'Ottawa, XXXIII (1963), 38–61. Henri Morisseau, "Mgr Joseph-Eugène Guigues, oblat de Marie-Immaculée, premier évêque d'Ottawa," Revue de l'université d'Ottawa, XVII (1947), 136–80. Albert Perbal, "Mgr Guigues . . . ," Petites annales de la Congrégation de missionnaires oblats de Marie-Immaculée (Paris), XIX (1909), 139–45. Edgar Thivierge, "A la naissance du diocèse d'Ottawa," Revue de l'université d'Ottawa, VII (1937), 424–40; VIII (1938), 6–30.

GUNN, DONALD, educator, scientist, historian, and politician; b. at Halkirk, Caithness-shire, Scotland, September 1797, youngest son of William Gunn, a tenant farmer in the strath of Braeholme; d. at St Andrews, Man., 30 Nov. 1878.

Donald Gunn was educated in the parish school of Halkirk. In 1813 he entered the service of the Hudson's Bay Company and spent ten years at York Factory, Severn Fort, and Oxford House successively, earning promotion to lesser postmaster. In 1819 he married Margaret, eldest daughter of James Swain, a company officer; between 1822 and 1849 they had seven sons and two daughters. In 1823, his services not being required after the union of the HBC and the North West Company, he settled at Red River in "Little Britain," later the parish of St Andrews. His farm prospered and after ten years the assistance of his growing family enabled him to take charge for the next 18 years of the Church Missionary Society's parish school. He also acted later in his substantial stone house as custodian and librarian of the only public collection of books in Red River.

A critic of the company and a leader of the settlers in the demand for a greater degree of self-government, Gunn was never appointed to the Council of Assiniboia, but he early became a magistrate and president of the Court of Petty Sessions in his district. He served as foreman of the jury at the trial of Pierre-Guillaume Sayer in 1849. In 1870 he was chosen as delegate from St Andrews to the provisional assembly, although he was an advocate of the entry of the northwest into confederation. The Gunns seem to have been on friendly terms with John Christian Schultz* and his wife. Subsequent to the establishment of Manitoba as a province, Gunn was appointed police magistrate, justice of the peace, postmaster, and inspector of fisheries. On 10 March 1871 he was appointed to the Legislative Council of Manitoba and remained a member until its abolition, which he supported, in 1876.

Gunn played an important part not only in public affairs but also in the cultural and intellectual life of Red River. As an outspoken opponent of the HBC and as a leading Presbyterian layman, he was frequently involved in controversy with the authorities of the colony. Nevertheless he retained the respect of the majority and the personal esteem of many. He was a member of the Council of the Institute of Rupert's Land of 1862. His interest in natural history was reflected in his experiments with new methods of tillage and new strains of wheat and led to his long-standing connection with the Smithsonian Institution, of which he was one of the earliest meteorological correspondents. He earned a tribute from its secretary for the reliability of his observations of the weather and the importance of the objects he contributed in nearly every branch of natural history as well as archaeology and ethnology. In 1866 he made a special exploration for the Smithsonian of the region west of Lake Winnipeg to collect skins and birds' eggs, "among the latter several previously entirely unknown in museums."

Gunn disputes with Alexander Ross* the title of father of the history of Canada's prairie west. As an historian he was primarily concerned to provide for his readers all the available information. At the same time he by no means ignored the historian's duty of critical evaluation of his sources. An eye-witness of many of the events described in his posthumously published History of Manitoba, he was aware of the danger of "depending for our knowledge of past events on the special pleading of others." Though his history is essentially a narrative of events he did not avoid problems of interpretation. His sympathies clearly lie with the settlers rather than with the HBC. A staunch Presbyterian and an elder of his Kirk, he was not illiberal in religious outlook, though often critical of the Anglican and Roman Catholic clergy of the colony. His attitude to those he saw as representative of an unjust order, from Lord Selkirk [Douglas*] to Bishop David Anderson*, was tinged with an acerbity by no means characteristic of the relations with others of this genial and humorous man.

L. G. Thomas

Smithsonian Institution, Annual report, 1878 (Washington), 63–64. Donald Gunn, "Indian remains near Red River settlement, Hudson's bay territory," Smithsonian Institution, Annual report, 1867 (Washington), 399–400; "Notes of an egging expedition to Shoal lake, west of lake Winnipeg. Made under the direction of the Smithsonian Institution in 1867 . . . ," Smithsonian Institution, Annual report, 1867 (Washington), 427–32. Donald Gunn and C. R. Tuttle, History of Manitoba from the earliest settlement to 1835 by the late Hon. Donald Gunn, and from the admission of the province into the Dominion by Charles R. Tuttle (Ottawa, 1880). Begg, Hist. of North-West, I, 393ff., 450; II, 35. Morton, Manitoba, a history.

GWYNNE, WILLIAM CHARLES, physician and educator; b. at Castleknock, Ireland, April 1806, son of the Reverend William Gwynne, of the Church of Ireland, and of Eliza Nelson; d. on board ship, 1 Sept. 1875.

William Charles Gwynne followed the eight-year programme in arts and medicine at Trinity College, Dublin, becoming a Bachelor of Medicine in 1831, and earned certificates of surgical competence in both Dublin and Edinburgh. Early in 1832 he sailed for Quebec as ship's surgeon and by June had established himself in York (Toronto). His scholarly antecedents ensured a respectable practice, which was strengthened socially by his marriage in 1835 to Anne Murray Powell, granddaughter of William Dummer Powell*. His combativeness, however, drove him immediately to oppose the Tory clique which controlled medical teaching, licensing, and hospital attendance for Toronto and Upper Canada. He convened meetings and circulated petitions in this cause during the late 1830s; in October 1838 he took his place on the enlarged and reformed Medical Board of Upper Canada. By 1839 Gwynne was also deputy grand master of the Grand Orange Lodge of British North America, but left the order after an unsuccessful attempt in that year to depose and succeed Ogle Robert GOWAN as grand master.

Gwynne was ready to admit his involvement in politics, his special enemies being "the Ultra-Canadian party" or Compact Tories. He considered himself "liberal conservative," and the appointment of Charles Poulett Thomson* as governor cheered him. He was at first the only doctor named to the new commission of management for the Provincial Lunatic Asylum in 1841. In November 1842 Governor Sir Charles Bagot* appointed him professor of anatomy and physiology in the projected King's College, Toronto, with precedence over the other medical professors. (He was later Bagot's physician during his last illness.) Sitting on King's College council from September 1843, Gwynne led minority opposition to High Church and clerical dominance there, and precipitated prolonged inquiries into the management of the college's rich endowment. He continued his campaigns (usually in association with Christopher Widmer*, the city's senior doctor) against both Tory and Radical factions seeking sole and statutory control over the medical profession. In all these matters Gwynne, like many other whiggish, low church Anglo-Irish gentlemen, found Robert Baldwin*'s parliamentary group congenial spokesmen, and Baldwin's bill of 1849 reconstituting the University of Toronto met his wishes. Under it he remained professor of anatomy.

When a political deal involving John Rolph*, leader of the Radical doctors in Canada West and a minister in Francis Hincks*' administration, abolished the university's medical school in 1853, Gwynne, incensed, retired to Britain, but he returned to Toronto in 1856. He neglected both politics and medicine (except for his continued membership on the Medical Board) for farming and the study of insects. Gwynne had various landholdings which were always entangled by mortgage and debt; he had only one other business interest: a directorship in the Toronto and Goderich Railway for 1846–49 and for 1851–53 in the railway that succeeded it in 1851, the Toronto and Guelph, both short-lived promotions of his brother, the lawyer John Wellington Gwynne*.

Gwynne's strong sense of intellectual and social self-esteem had drawn him first to combat on many fronts. Then, on his own defeat, and the eclipse of his allies, he was condemned to a stubborn inner exile. Wracked by long frustrations, Gwynne died from "an ulcer in the stomach" on board the Miramichi on 1 Sept. 1875 while travelling to New Brunswick for his health. Three sons had died in infancy; only an unmarried daughter and his shrewish wife survived him.

BARRIE DYSTER

Academy of Medicine (Toronto), 920 (Local biography), (Gwynne, certificates and testimonials, 1829–31); AM 360 (Bagot to Gwynne, January 1843). MTCL, Baldwin papers, entries in the index for Gwynne, Croft, and Crooks; typescript by J. H. Richardson, "Reminiscences of the medical profession in Toronto." PAC, MG 24, A13 (Charles Bagot papers), 2, Christopher Widmer to Bagot, 10 Nov. 1842; Gwynne to Bagot, 25 Nov. 1842; 5, Bagot to Gwynne, 21 Nov. 1842; Bagot to Widmer, 6 Nov. 1842; Bagot to John Strachan, 9 Dec. 1842; RG 5, A1, 17 Nov. 1835, 29 Jan. 1836, 5 March 1836; C1, 1841, no.1434; 1842, no.2723. PAO, Jarvis-Powell papers, 1842, 1843, 1853, 1854; Ridout papers, G. Powell to Charlotte Ridout, 10 Feb. 1873. St James' Cemetery (Toronto), record book and monument. University of Toronto Archives, Office of the Chief Accountant financial records (109, Final report of the commission of inquiry of 1848 into the affairs of King's College and Upper Canada College); Office of the Chief Accountant (117, King's College Council Minute Book, III, 1842–48); University of Toronto Senate minutes, 1850–53.

Examiner (Toronto), 8 May 1850. Globe (Toronto), 4 May 1850, September 1875. Toronto, Directories, 1833–75. Canniff, Medical profession in Upper Canada, 86–89, 402–7. Institutional care of the insane in the United States and Canada, ed. H. M. Hurd (4v., [Baltimore, 1916–17]), IV, 131. Landmarks of Toronto (Robertson), III, 13–14.

H

HALE, EDWARD, businessman, MHA, and legislative councillor; b. 6 Dec. 1800 at Quebec, second son of the Honourable John Hale* and Elizabeth Frances Amherst, sister of Lord William Pitt Amherst; d. 26 April 1875 at Quebec.

Edward Hale is sometimes confused with his uncle and namesake, the seigneur of Portneuf, who died in 1862. His father was a member of both the Legislative and the Executive councils of Lower Canada; his brother, Jeffrey Hale*, was an important figure at Quebec, where a hospital still bears his name. Edward Hale was educated at Kensington, England, in a private school, where he seems to have attained a level of knowledge equivalent to that of today's secondary schools. His voluminous correspondence, in which he expresses himself with elegance, precision, and humour, gives evidence of remarkable learning. In 1820 he returned to Quebec, where he was appointed a secretary in the office of the auditor general of the province of Lower Canada.

Edward Hale spent the years 1823 to 1828 in India as private secretary to his uncle, Lord Amherst, who was then its governor general. On 10 March 1831, having returned to Quebec, he married Eliza Cecilia Bowen, daughter of Edward Bowen*, chief justice of the Superior Court of Lower Canada; they had seven children, one of whom, Edward John, married the granddaughter of Jonathan Sewell*.

Life as a public servant does not seem to have appealed strongly to Edward Hale. As early as the summer of 1833 he thought of settling in the Eastern Townships, and gathered information from compatriots already established at Drummondville, Sherbrooke, and Richmond. On 18 Feb. 1834 his uncle Edward Hale, of Portneuf, congratulated him on having bought a farm at Sherbrooke, sent him seed, and discussed the timber trade with him. Hale built a house on the banks of the Rivière Saint-François, probably during 1834. On 14 October of the same year, Peter McGill* asked him for information about the Eastern Townships, on behalf of immigrants who wanted to buy land from the British American Land Company: Hale eventually became one of the shareholders of this company, of which for a time Alexander Tilloch Galt* was secretary. Hale spent the years after 1834 developing his holdings.

During the 1837–38 disturbances, Hale served "for some weeks" with the Sherbrooke volunteers as the colonel's secretary. He was considered an important citizen of the Eastern Townships and was nominated to the Special Council. Thomas Leigh Goldie informed him of the appointment on 27 Aug. 1839, and on 2 September he accepted. He voted for the resolutions on the union of Upper and Lower Canada on 13 November.

On 6 Aug. 1840 the governor general, Lord Sydenham [Thomson*], divided Lower Canada into 22 municipal districts and appointed wardens for each of them. Edward Hale was chosen to preside over the district council of Sherbrooke. The new officials found themselves charged with important responsibilities both for the municipalities and for education. Edward Hale's correspondence with Dr Jean-Baptiste MEILLEUR, concerning the schools in his district, showed that he carried out his task conscientiously.

In 1841, at the time of the elections for the new parliament, Edward Hale was asked to stand in Sherbrooke. His opponent was Colonel Bartholomew Conrad Augustus GUGY, who had already represented this constituency in the House of Assembly of Lower Canada from 1831 to 1838. Gugy even wrote to Hale on 21 March 1841, to ask him to withdraw from the electoral struggle, but Hale refused to do so. Gugy was defeated, disputed the election, and lost his appeal.

Edward Hale went to the sessions of the assembly regularly, whether at Kingston or Montreal. His correspondence with his wife shows that he was most assiduous in attending the sittings of the house and interested in the different questions debated there. But these duties were prejudicial to his business, and on 17 Nov. 1847 he informed William Badgley*, who had just been appointed attorney general for Lower Canada, of his intention not to stand at the next elections. His successor as MHA for Sherbrooke was Colonel Gugy. In 1867, when the province of Quebec was set up, Edward Hale agreed to sit on the Legislative Council for the division of Wellington, and remained a member until his death.

Edward Hale was a businessman of some standing: in the three townships of Shipton, Eaton, and Simpson alone he owned nearly 4,000 acres of land; in that of Brompton, he owned seven lots "in good condition." His correspondence reveals him as a man much taken up with the sale of land, mortgages, loans, the negotiating of interest, and farm activities; farmers would write to borrow money, buy pieces of land, pay their interest, or request extensions of time. Hale was often urged to establish a branch of the Bank of Montreal at Sherbrooke, but none was opened in the town until 1908. He placed funds in the Eastern Townships Bank; when it was amalgamated with the Canadian Bank of Commerce in 1912, the Hale estate still had $12,000 in it. He also had an interest in the Stanstead and Sherbrooke Mutual Fire Insurance Company, of which he was president from 1865 until his death, and gave much attention to the Sherbrooke Agricultural Society. Finally, Hale was associated with the project, proposed in 1843 by A. T. Galt, for the construction of a railway linking Montreal and Boston and passing through the Eastern Townships; he was a member of the sub-committee responsible for drawing up plans. In 1845 the St Lawrence and Atlantic Railway received a charter, the railhead decided on being Portland (Maine) rather than Boston [see POOR]. Hale was on the provisional committee formed to supervise the undertaking.

In 1866 Edward Hale was appointed chancellor of the University of Bishop's College, in recognition of his services to the Church of England in the Eastern Townships. He died at his son's residence at Quebec, and was buried at Sherbrooke.

LOUIS-PHILIPPE AUDET

ANQ, Famille Hale. PAC, MG 23, G II, 18 (John Hale papers). Bishop's University Archives (Lennoxville, Que.), Minutes of the corporation, 1866–75. Holy Trinity Cathedral (Quebec), marriage registers, 1831. McCord Museum (McGill University, Montreal), Hale family papers. St Peter's Church (Sherbrooke, Que.) burial registers, 29 April 1875. Stanstead and Sherbrooke Insurance Company (Sherbrooke, Que.), Minutes, 1865–75. Cyclopædia of Can. biog. (Rose, 1888), 518–20. Turcotte, Conseil législatif de Québec, 9, 298. Chapais, Histoire du Canada, V. O. D. Skelton, The life and times of Sir Alexander Tilloch Galt (Toronto, 1920). L.-P. Audet, "La surintendance de l'éducation et la loi scolaire de 1841," Cahiers des Dix, XXV (1960), 147–69.

HALL, CHARLES FRANCIS, Arctic explorer; b. 1821; d. 8 Nov. 1871.

Charles Francis Hall was born in the state of Vermont in 1821, but while he was still a child his family moved to Rochester, New Hampshire, where he spent his boyhood and received what little formal schooling he was given. In the 1840s he married and drifted westward, arriving in Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1849. There he established a small seal-engraving business and, in the late 1850s, two small newspapers, the Cincinnati Occasional and the Daily Press.

During Hall's years in Cincinnati, he developed a passionate interest in the Arctic, reading widely in its geography and history. Always driven by boundless energy and an inquiring mind, he decided in 1859, at the age of 39, that he was destined to find survivors of Sir John Franklin*'s expedition, which had disappeared almost 15 years before. The discovery in 1859 of bodies and relics of the Franklin expedition on King William Island by Francis Leopold M'Clintock* did not deter Hall or change his belief that there might be survivors living with the Eskimos.

Although his businesses had been moderately successful, Hall had little money. Furthermore, he knew nothing about navigation. Early in 1860 he went to the east coast and there met the founder of the American Geographical and Statistical Society and patron of United States Arctic exploration, Henry Grinnell. Grinnell gave him introductions to whaling firms in New London, Conn., one of which offered Hall free passage to Baffin Island. Hall sailed north for the first time on 29 May 1860 on the bark George Henry, Sidney O. Budington, captain.

Hall's plan was to put ashore at "Frobisher Strait," hire Eskimos, navigate through the so-called strait to Foxe Basin, and from there make his way to King William Island. His expedition boat was destroyed, he discovered that the strait was actually a bay, and he did not even approach King William Island, but his first expedition was not a complete failure. He not only proved that the strait was a bay but also, by finding relics of Sir Martin Frobisher*'s attempts to mine gold on his third expedition, that it was indeed the site of the Elizabethan's 16th-century explorations. Hall also hardened himself to living in the Arctic environment, helped by a remarkable English-speaking Eskimo couple, Ebierbing and Tookolito, known to whalers as "Joe" and "Hannah." They had been taken to England by a British whaler in the early 1850s, and according to legend enjoyed tea with Queen Victoria.

After two years in Frobisher Bay, Hall returned to the United States, bringing Joe and Hannah with him. He virtually ignored the war between the states, which was at its height, to devote all his energy to gathering money for his next expedition.

He lectured, using the Eskimos in their native costumes as an attraction, and worked on a book about his first expedition, Arctic researches and life among the Esquimaux . . . (New York, 1865, published in London in 1864 as Life with the Esquimaux).

Hall still insisted that even after almost 20 years there might be survivors of the Franklin expedition living in the area of King William Island, and he persuaded Grinnell and the American Geographical and Statistical Society to help him on his next venture. In July 1864, still accompanied by the loyal Joe and Hannah, he sailed again with Captain Budington in the whaler Monticello to northern Hudson Bay. In the four years that followed, he led a life of hardship and frustration in the area of Roes Welcome Sound. Except for occasional visits to whaling ships, he stayed with Eskimos, trying unsuccessfully to persuade them to accompany him to King William Island. For a brief time, despairing of their help, he hired some whalemen, but this experiment ended violently when he shot and killed one for threatening mutiny. Finally in the spring of 1869 he made his way to King William Island, helped by Joe, Hannah, and several other Eskimos. In spite of rumours that there were white men living in the area, all he found of the Franklin party was more relics and skeletal remains.

During this expedition, he determined to try to reach the North Pole on his next venture. Soon after his return to New Bedford, Mass., in September 1869 he gained the attention of President Ulysses S. Grant and of some powerful men in Congress. Fifty thousand dollars were appropriated, and Hall was put in command of what became known as the Polaris expedition (named after his ship, the 387-ton Polaris).

At last Hall had a large-scale, well-financed expedition, but the Polaris expedition proved to be ill fated. Sailing early in July 1871, the Polaris, captained by Budington, easily set a record farthest north of about 82°11′ by September, cruising up the narrows between Ellesmere Island and Greenland. Turned back by ice at the edge of the Lincoln Sea, Hall had Budington put the ship into a shallow harbour on the northwest shore of Greenland, which he called "Thank God Harbour." There they prepared to winter. In October Hall made a two-week sledge journey to the north. When he returned to the ship, he became violently ill after drinking a cup of coffee. For two weeks he was sick, apparently paralysed on one side and sometimes demented. In his dementia he accused many of the officers of murdering him. He died on 8 Nov. 1871 and was buried ashore.

After Hall's death, the morale of the expedition deteriorated and little was accomplished. In the fall of 1872, when Budington tried to sail the badly damaged Polaris southward, a party of 19 men, women, and children – the Eskimos had their families with them – were separated from the ship on an ice floe during a storm in Smith Sound. After six months during which they drifted some 1,300 miles on the floe, the party (which included George E. Tyson*) was rescued by a sealer off Labrador. In the meantime, Budington had run the Polaris aground near Etah, Greenland, where he and the rest of the expedition spent the winter. They were picked up by Captain William Allen of the Scottish whaler Ravenscraig in the spring.

A navy board of inquiry cleared Budington of any serious charges and reached the conclusion that Hall had died of apoplexy. The transcript of its investigation, however, shows that the expedition had been seriously weakened by hostilities among the officers. Budington had been drinking heavily and had quarrelled with Hall. Dr Emil Bessels, the expedition's surgeon and naturalist who had treated Hall in his final illness, also had quarrelled with him.

In August 1968 Hall's well-preserved remains were exhumed by a party of investigators, and a graveside autopsy was performed. Neutron activation tests run by Toronto's Centre of Forensic Sciences on his hair and fingernails proved that during the last two weeks of his life he had received large amounts of arsenic (76.7 ppm at the base of his fingernail). That the cause of his death was arsenic poisoning cannot be conclusively proved although the dosage he had received was very large. Nor can it be proved that he was murdered: he owned a medical kit of his own and, distrusting Dr Bessels, he may have overdosed himself with an arsenical patent medicine. In spite of the new evidence, Hall's death must remain a mystery forever.

The irony of the Polaris expedition is that, although Hall had always wished to command a large-scale expedition, he was far more successful as a lone-wolf explorer than as an expedition leader. His greatest contribution to Arctic exploration was perhaps in proving that a white man living as the Eskimos lived could survive for long periods of time in the Arctic free from ships or other sources of civilized supplies. In his adaptability to the Arctic environment, he was the predecessor of Vilhjalmur Stefansson*. And like Stefansson he was a propagandist for the Arctic, enthusiastically praising its beauty and its potential value for the civilized world. In one of his typical lectures, delivered just before the departure of the Polaris expedition, he said: "Many who have written to me, or who have appeared to me personally, think that I am of an adventurous spirit and of bold heart to attempt to go to the North Pole. Not so. It does not require that heart which they suppose I have got. The Arctic Region is my home. I love it dearly; its storms, its winds, its glaciers, its icebergs; and when I am there among them, it seems as if I were in an earthly heaven or a heavenly earth."

ERNEST S. DODGE and C. C. LOOMIS

Smithsonian Institution (Washington), Division of Naval History, Charles Francis Hall papers. C. F. Hall, Arctic researches and life among the Esquimaux: being the narrative of an expedition in search of Sir John Franklin, in the years 1860, 1861, and 1862 (New York, 1865); [C. F. Hall], Life with the Esquimaux; the narrative of Captain C.F. H. . . . from the 29th May, 1860, to the 13th Sept., 1862; with . . . the discovery of actual relics of Martin Frobisher . . . and deductions in favour of yet discovering some of the survivors of Sir J. Franklin's expedition (2v., London, 1864). Narrative of the second Arctic expedition made by Charles F. Hall: his voyage to Repulse Bay, sledge journeys to the Straits of Fury and Hecla and to King William's Land, and residence among the Eskimos during the years 1864–'69, ed. J. E. Nourse (Washington, 1879). Narrative of the north polar expedition: U.S. Ship Polaris, Captain C. F. Hall, commanding, ed. under the direction of G. M. Robertson by C. H. Davis (Washington, 1876). "Report of the reception, by the American Geographical Society, of Captain Hall and his officers, previous to their departure for the Arctic regions, held June 26th, 1871," American Geographical Society of New York, Journal, III (1870–71), 406. [G. E. Tyson], Arctic experiences: containing Capt. George E. Tyson's wonderful drift on the ice-floe, a history of the Polaris expedition, the cruise of the Tigress, and rescue of Polaris survivors, ed. E. V. Blake (New York, 1874). DAB.

HALL, GEORGE BENSON, lumberman and businessman of the region of Quebec; b. 1810 at Amherstburg, U.C., son of George Benson Hall, an officer in the Royal Navy, and Angelica Fortier; d. 4 Sept. 1876 at Montmorency, Que., and buried 7 September in Mount Hermon cemetery at Quebec.

George Benson Hall was of Irish descent and was an Anglican; his father had come to Canada with the British troops sent to defend the colonies during the Anglo-American War of 1812, and had assumed command of one of the ships under General Isaac Brock*'s orders in the Great Lakes.

The circumstances that brought his son to the Quebec region are unknown. It seems that Hall merely wanted to take advantage of the commercial exploitation of timber, which in the 19th century was being carried out on a large scale in the province of Quebec. But when in 1842 Great Britain revoked the preferential customs tariff formerly granted to the Canadas, and began to buy Baltic timber which was sold more cheaply, Hall was one of those who saw the expansion of the lumber industry as the answer. And Hall was doubly served by circumstances. The 1854 reciprocity treaty created favourable conditions for sawmill owners by opening to them a large, safe market in the United States. Furthermore, in 1843 Hall had married Mary Jane Patterson, only daughter of Peter Patterson*, from whom he inherited an important business undertaking. By harnessing the power of the Montmorency Falls, Patterson had started the lumber-milling industry in the Quebec region. Conducted on profitable lines, the exploitation of commercial lumber had been so extensive that on 27 May 1844 Patterson had been able to purchase the seigneury of Beauport for £8,300.

Thus favoured, Hall increased his commercial activities in the Quebec region and beyond. Over a period of 25 years, using his intelligence and energy, he bought sawmills which he made prosperous, and obtained new land grants in all the regions of Canada East, even on the upper Matawin River where in 1869 he set up a farm to supply his lumber camps with agricultural produce. At his death in 1876 he was acknowledged to be one of the most active and one of the richest lumbermen in Canada. According to The storied province of Quebec, "The Hall Mills at Montmorency were the greatest in the world." His business then passed into the hands of his son, Peter Patterson Hall (1851–1910), one of his ten children born between 1843 and 1863.

For Quebec City, Hall was a valuable citizen: he opened a lumber business there in 1851, and, as an alderman, took part in the government of the town from 1853 to 1862. But it was the region of Montmorency Falls and the parish of Beauport that particularly benefited from Hall's activity. In 1876, 800 families of this region owed their livelihood to his lumber business. Consequently, immediately after his sudden death the municipal council of Beauport held a special meeting, and, in the form of unanimous resolutions, the citizens of Beauport acknowledged George Benson Hall as "one of the greatest benefactors of the parish," and "the protector and father" of all the socially underprivileged of Beauport. In the opinion of the editor of the Morning Chronicle of Quebec, Hall was "one of Quebec's most prominent and enterprising citizens . . . particularly esteemed for the benevolence and kindness of his character."

ANDRÉE DÉSILETS

AJQ, Greffe de E. G. Meredith, acts de vente des héritiers Hall à L.-A. Sénécal, 7 juin 1883. AVQ, Procès-verbaux du conseil. Documents concernant la construction, la pose de la pierre angulaire et l'inauguration solennelle du nouvel hôtel-de-ville (Québec, 1896). Le Canadien (Québec), 7 sept. 1876. L'Événement (Québec), 7 sept. 1876. Morning Chronicle (Quebec), 6 Sept. 1876. Raoul Blanchard, Le Canada français; province de Québec; étude géographique (Montréal, 1960). Storied Quebec (Wood et al.), I, 402; IV, 400. P.-B. Casgrain, "Le Kent-House; rectification historique," BRH, XIX (1913), 5–9.

HALY, Sir WILLIAM O'GRADY, soldier, general officer commanding British forces in North America; b. 1810, son of Aylmer Haly of Wadhurst Castle, Sussex, Eng.; d. Halifax, N.S., 19 March 1878.

William O'Grady Haly joined the army in June 1823 when he was 13, became an ensign in the 4th Foot on 17 June 1828, and a captain in April 1834. Between 1828 and 1854 his regiment served in Scotland, Ireland, Australia, and India as well as in England. Haly fought in the Crimean War, 1854–55, won a medal with four clasps, and was awarded the CB on 5 July 1855 and also the Third Order of the Medjidie and the Turkish Medal. He was appointed lieutenant-colonel of the 38th Foot, then stationed in India, on 4 Feb. 1859 and served in the East Indies from 1861 to 1870; he was promoted major-general in January 1865 and lieutenant-general, May 1873.

From 6 May 1873 he was general officer commanding the British forces in North America, stationed at Halifax. The governor general, Lord Dufferin [Blackwood*], wanted the Halifax garrison to come under the command of the GOC Canadian militia, a new appointment in 1874, but the War Office feared it would thereby lose control. Major-General Sir Edward Selby Smyth*, the first incumbent of the new appointment, was junior to Haly, who had to be reminded by Dufferin that the GOC militia was not under his command and would not report to the War Office through him.

In 1877 Haly's independence of Ottawa, combined with negligence in the offices of the governor general and the prime minister, Alexander Mackenzie*, led to a confrontation when Haly arbitrarily ordered the stopping of traffic on the Intercolonial Railway because it had failed to build a tunnel across War Department land near a powder magazine in Halifax, as promised by Mackenzie. Instead it had made a cutting, and the War Office had already refused to approve an iron roof over this as a substitute. Dufferin protested emphatically against Haly's action, which he said was "too violent a proceeding even for a lieutenant-general." He sent Haly a telegram "couched in sufficiently strong language" to make it possible for Haly to back down and postpone the carrying out of the War Office's orders. Shortly after this incident Haly asked for a recommendation to the vacant governorship of Gibraltar.

As GOC British North America Haly was appointed administrator to act as head of government during the absences of the governor general. He served in this capacity from 12 Oct. to 2 Nov. 1874, from 15 May to 21 Oct. 1875, and from 21 Jan. to 3 Feb. 1878. But Dufferin thought it "a good deal of bother" to bring the GOC British North America all the way from Halifax especially as he was likely to know little of Canadian affairs and might be "a headstrong soldier unused to civil life and anxious to 'make a splash.' " He found Haly "fidgetty and incompetent." He suggested that the GOC militia would be a more suitable administrator. During Haly's service Dufferin succeeded in postponing the introduction of a Colonial Office arrangement for the administrator to receive one-fourth of the governor general's allowances; at Mackenzie's suggestion, he did not call upon Haly to act as his deputy during short periods of leave in remote parts of Canada but appointed the chief justice of the Supreme Court, with somewhat circumscribed powers.

In 1875, Haly's incompetence led to a virtual diminution of the governor general's prerogative of pardon. A Canadian minister had told a prisoner that he would be reprieved from a death sentence at a time when the administrator had not made a decision about the minister of justice's recommendation. The colonial secretary, the Earl of Carnarvon [Herbert], said Haly should have stood firm and used the telegraph to obtain instructions instead of backing down.

Haly was appointed colonel of the 106th Regiment in 1874, was knighted (KCB) on 29 May 1875, transferred to the command of the 47th Regiment on 2 Nov. 1875, and was promoted brevet-general on 1 Oct. 1877. He died in office in 1878 as a result of an attack of "gout of the stomach." He had married Harriett Hebden, and their eldest son, Major-General Richard O'Grady Haly, was GOC Canadian militia, 1900–2.

RICHARD A. PRESTON

Royal Archives, Windsor Castle, Cambridge papers, Dufferin to Cambridge, 11 Dec. 1874. [Blackwood and Herbert], Dufferin-Carnarvon correspondence (de Kiewiet and Underhill), 156, 164, 283, 346–48, 384, 419. The annual register: a review of public events at home and abroad for the year 1878 (London, 1879), 142. Boase, Modern English biography, I, 1297.

HAMILTON, WILLIAM, iron founder, machinist, and inventor; b. in 1810 in Lasswade, Midlothian County, Scotland; d. 28 Nov. 1880 in Toronto, Ont.

After a seven-year apprenticeship with an iron founder in Scotland, William Hamilton moved to England in 1834 and worked in the shops of the Liverpool and Manchester Railway in Manchester, the Bridgewater Foundry at Patricroft, and the Great Western Railway at Swindon. He was a pattern maker for James Nasmyth and after 1840 for Daniel Gooch, learning from them the techniques of steam-driven machine-making tools.

With 23 years experience in "mechanical engineering," Hamilton arrived in Toronto in October 1850 with his wife and their two sons and two daughters. He worked for James Good and then for James Rogers ARMSTRONG before establishing in 1851 or 1852, in partnership with his son William, the St Lawrence Foundry, Engine Works, and Machine Shop. The shop offered castings and steam engines. The latter were then in great demand in the province: 340 were imported from 1853 to 1857, half of them railway locomotive engines. The foundries of Toronto had, however, to be content with producing castings primarily. The Ontario, Simcoe, and Huron Union Railroad (later the Northern Railway) gave the contract for the first locomotive to be built in Toronto to James Good in 1852, and William Hamilton secured only the contract for iron chairs and other accessories. Yet, despite considerable competition, Hamilton's assets doubled from 1856 to 1857, in 1858–59, and again in 1860–61. In 1861 he employed 40 men and produced $37,000 worth of castings, nuts, and bolts for the railways.

With the outbreak of the Civil War in the United States in 1861, American shops turned to war production and Canadians had to make more of their own machinery. Hamilton acquired a larger power plant, and his became one of the first Canadian shops to produce whole systems of steam-driven tools. In the Civil War years he manufactured the power plant and hammer-rollers for the Steel, Iron, and Railway Works Company in Toronto, and the power plant and machinery for the Toronto Knitting and Yarn Factory. In the mid-1860s he invented and began manufacturing his "fish-plate bolt" which reduced railway accidents caused by rails shaking loose from their ties.

Hamilton's production techniques differed markedly from those then most current in Toronto. Good, for example, had been producing what were virtually handmade machines since the 1830s. Hamilton used a larger number of machine tools while retaining numerous well-trained artisans; his techniques attracted machinists, inventors, and moulders of high calibre, including James Martin Sr. He produced such diverse items as the fence for Osgoode Hall in Toronto, railway cars and wheels, steam engines with boilers for factories and boats, and steam dredges for clearing harbours.

Hamilton, however, rarely owned the land on which his machines were housed in wooden buildings, and he was hard hit by business slumps. A fire on his major site in 1876 almost ruined him. He lost control of the St Lawrence Foundry in 1879 but continued to work the Don Foundry in Toronto.

Hamilton married twice, his second marriage being to a young widow, Anne Kilgallen Erlan, on 21 October 1865; he adopted her two sons. A daughter married the distiller Henry Gooderham.

GEO. MAINER

City of Toronto Archives, Toronto assessment rolls, 1849–80. Little Trinity Church (Toronto), records of baptisms, marriages, and burials. PAC, RG 31, A1, 1861, Toronto, St Lawrence's ward; 1871, Toronto, St Lawrence's ward. St James' Cemetery (Toronto), records of burials, 1880. Daily Colonist (Toronto), 3 Feb. 1852. Globe (Toronto), 1 Dec. 1880. Mail (Toronto), 30 Nov. 1880. City of Toronto directory, for 1867–8 . . ., comp. James Sutherland (Toronto, 1867), 328, 384. Hist. of Toronto and county of York, I, 386.

HANRAHAN, EDMUND, politician and public servant; b. in 1802 at Carbonear, Nfld.; d. at Ferryland, Nfld., on 6 Feb. or 13 Feb. 1875.

Edmund Hanrahan, a man of "humble origins," entered Newfoundland politics in December 1840 by contesting a by-election in Conception Bay. Both Hanrahan and his opponent, James Luke Prendergast, were Roman Catholics; Prendergast was backed by the Protestant merchants including John MUNN, and Hanrahan was actively supported by the Roman Catholic clergy. The election was rendered abortive "by the ferocious conduct of a mob at Carbonear." Rowdyism at elections was, indeed, known for a time in Newfoundland as "Carbonearism," for it was at Carbonear that rioting occurred with regularity. Hanrahan was returned for Conception Bay in the general elections of 1842, 1848, and 1852; and, following the 1854 sub-division of districts, for Carbonear in 1855, 1859, and 1861. In the House of Assembly he was among the more radical of the Liberals and after 1850 supported Philip Francis Little* in the struggle for responsible government.

In 1855, on the introduction of responsible government, he was appointed to Little's cabinet as surveyor general. After Little's retirement, Hanrahan was continued in John KENT's cabinet until its dismissal by Governor Alexander Bannerman* in 1861. The weak and divided Liberal party lost the general election in May 1861. Although Hanrahan was re-elected as a Liberal for Carbonear, where there was again violence, he accepted the appointment of acting appraiser to the General Water Company from the Conservative government of Hugh Hoyles*. Hanrahan's resignation from his House of Assembly seat caused a by-election in Carbonear in November 1862 in which, for the first time in more than 20 years, a Conservative candidate, John Rorke*, was elected. The following year Hoyles rewarded Hanrahan with the appointment of stipendiary magistrate at Ferryland, necessitating the retirement of the incumbent Peter Winser. The Liberal Record reported that "Hanrahan sold Carbonear . . . at the expense of an honest man . . . Peter Winser." In 1872 Hanrahan was elevated to the position of sheriff of the Southern District.

Hanrahan was married and the father of an apparently large family; four sons died young. After Hanrahan's death his widow Mary unsuccessfully petitioned the assembly for a pension in consideration of her husband's long service.

Elizabeth A. Wells

PANL, Newfoundland, Executive Council, Minutes, 1 March 1862. Newfoundland, Blue Books, 1842–74 (copies in PANL); House of Assembly, Journals, 1863, 8, 931. Courier (St John's), 20 March, 25, 29 Oct. 1862. Newfoundlander (St John's), 18 Oct. 1872, 17 Jan. 1873, 26 Feb. 1875. Newfoundland Patriot (St John's), 27 Feb 1875. Pilot (St John's), 8, 22 Jan. 1853. Public Ledger (St John's), 30 Oct., 14 Nov., 15 Dec. 1840; 28 Jan. 1862. Record (St John's), 8 March 1862, 15 Dec. 1863. Times and General Commercial Gazette (St John's), 4 Jan. 1843. E. A. Wells, "The struggle for responsible government in Newfoundland, 1846–1855," unpublished MA thesis, Memorial University of Newfoundland, 1966.

HARDING, FRANCIS PYM, army officer and administrator; b. c. 1821 in England; d. at the Grove, Lymington, Hampshire, England, 25 Feb. 1875, aged 54 years.

As an officer of the 22nd Foot (Cheshire Regiment), Francis Pym Harding not only saw more active service than most of his contemporaries, but also distinguished himself on several occasions. Gazetted ensign in 1836, he was posted to India and, in 1850, was Persian interpreter to Sir Charles Napier. A major in 1854, Harding served in the Crimea as aide-de-camp to General John Lysaght Pennefather; there he took part in the battles of Alma, Balaklava, and Inkerman, when he was severely wounded and mentioned in dispatches. He was commandant of Balaklava from January 1855 until the evacuation of the Crimea. He received the CB and other decorations and was promoted colonel in 1858. By 1866 he was commanding the first battalion of the 22nd Foot in Malta.

At this time the Fenian threat was troubling New Brunswick and the governor, Arthur Hamilton Gordon*, had been energetically deploying the military resources at his disposal to counter it. Colonel Harding and the 22nd Foot were brought from Malta to stiffen the defence and reinforce the 15th Foot whose commander, Lieutenant-Colonel John Ambler Cole, did not have Harding's experience. Harding and his men appear to have arrived in New Brunswick in April 1866 by which time Gordon had sailed for England. Major-General Charles Hastings Doyle*, administrator of the province, appointed Harding commanding officer of the exceptionally large garrison serving there at the time. Harding proved himself most efficient in his duties, worked well with the local militia, and was much concerned about the comfort of his troops, housed in the Fredericton Exhibition Building.

On 12 Oct. 1867, Hastings Doyle sent a telegram to Sir John A. Macdonald* stating that Harding was the senior military officer in New Brunswick. Sir John promptly recommended Harding's appointment as lieutenant governor; it was confirmed on a provisional basis later the same month. Doyle himself was then appointed lieutenant governor of Nova Scotia, which meant that these two experienced soldiers and administrators were able to provide effective continuity during the period of administrative transition and military reorganization caused by confederation.

In March 1868 Harding was promoted major general; in February of the following year, the garrison was reduced and the 22nd Foot transferred home. Harding sailed for England with his regiment and retired on half pay for the few remaining years of his life.

Hugh A. Taylor

Lymington, England Registration District, entry of death, 1875, no.407. PAC, MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), 126070; RG 2, ser.2, 1, file 14A; RG 7, G1, 68, ff.351–52; G17, A, 9, f.20; RG 8, I, A1, 37, ff.25, 184; 186A; C18, 1681–88 1690; C20, 1689. PANB, Lieutenant governor's letter book, 1867–74. PRO, CO 42/663, 337–38. Hart, New army list, 1867; 1875.

HARLEY, JOHN, shipbuilder, inspector of lights, buoys, and beacons, and harbour master; b. in 1800 at Courtmacsherry, County Cork, Ireland, second son of a schoolmaster; d. 16 Sept. 1875 at Chatham Head, Miramichi, N.B., and buried in St Andrew's Churchyard, Newcastle, N.B.

John Harley's older brother, William, emigrated from Ireland to Miramichi, New Brunswick, about 1820 and quickly found employment as a government land surveyor. William Harley encouraged his sister Mary Ann to follow him in 1822; the next year a third member of the family, John, also came to Miramichi. On his arrival John Harley went to work for William Abrams*, who was a prosperous merchant and shipbuilder at Rose Bank (Nordin) both before and after the great Miramichi fire of 1825. "By his faithfulness and industry," said the Union Advocate in an 1875 obituary, "he [John Harley] in a short time reached the responsible post of foreman of the yard, and soon after rose to the position of master builder." At Miramichi, in 1829, John Harley married Ann Coughlan by whom he had three sons and two daughters.

After Abrams' death in 1844, John Harley became master builder for Joseph Russell at Beaubair's (Beaubear's) Island. When Russell, a devout Mormon convert, left Miramichi for Salt Lake City, Utah, in 1849, John Harley with a partner, George Burchill, of Nelson, bought the island and the shipbuilding plant. This partnership was dissolved in 1857, and Harley continued on his own until 1866 when his last craft were built. At this time he stated that he had been responsible for the building of 62 sailing vessels on the Miramichi River.

John Harley had been appointed one of two commissioners for the lighthouse at Escuminac in 1853. After confederation he was appointed inspector of lights for New Brunswick, a position he held until his superannuation in 1871. He continued as inspector of buoys and beacons for Miramichi River and Bay as late as 1873; in that year he was also harbour master, a post he had held for some years.

John Harley's successful career as a shipbuilder is a notable example of what could be achieved in the 19th century by industry and ability. His 62 well-built vessels, mostly large barks and full-rigged ships, found a ready market in the Old Country. They were sound and durable and had no difficulty in maintaining the Lloyd's classifications for which they were built. William Abrams' Phoenix, built the year after the Miramichi fire and so aptly named, was still registered at Lloyd's in 1850. Other Harley vessels reached the age of 21 years – the Royal Adelaide (built in 1830), the Romulus (1831), the Kalodyne (1856), the Sandringham (1864), and many more. Fast passages of the Harley vessels between Miramichi and Liverpool were often recorded in the Gleaner (Chatham); in 1864 the bark Sea Mew took 16 days from Miramichi to Liverpool and equalled that speed on her return trip.

John Harley's 50 years in Miramichi were well spent. When he died the Union Advocate said a host of friends mourned him for "his warm and loving disposition, and for his integrity and sterling character."

LOUISE MANNY

Lloyd's register of British and foreign shipping (London), 1839–71. Gleaner (Chatham, N.B.), 1833–73. Mercury (Chatham, N.B.), 1829. Union Advocate (Newcastle, N.B.), 23 Sept. 1875, 16 Feb. 1898 (this issue contains a reprint from the Press (Portland, Me.) of family traditions related by Mrs John Henry (Mary Ann Harley) when she was 99 years old). Louise Manny, Ships of Miramichi: a history of shipbuilding on the Miramichi River, New Brunswick, Canada, 1773–1919 (N.B. Museum Hist. Studies, 10, Saint John, N.B., 1960).

HARPER, JEROME, cattle rancher, flour mill and sawmill owner; b. in Tucker County, West Virginia, in 1826; d. a bachelor 27 Nov. 1874, at Santa Barbara, Calif.

Little is known of Jerome Harper's youth. He is reported to have been involved in a rebellion in Chile, and in 1852, with his younger brother Thaddeus*, he was farming in Santa Clara County, California. The two brothers probably came to British Columbia in 1858 with the great rush of gold miners to the Fraser River. By 1859 they were operating a sawmill in Yale. Jerome took an active interest in the Cariboo mines and bought and sold several mining claims there, but by the autumn of 1862 he had entered the cattle business and had stock on a ranch east of Kamloops. In 1862 or 1863 Jerome began to purchase cattle in Washington and Oregon and import them into British Columbia. After wintering the cattle south of Osoyoos, B.C., he would drive them in herds of about 450 head along the old fur brigade trail through the Okanagan Valley to Kamloops and from there on to the Cariboo where they were held in the mountains to be slaughtered as required. The success of these operations provided the miners with inexpensive beef and the Harper brothers with increased wealth. Jerome, pursuing the business with great energy, soon won a dominant position in the cattle importing industry and diversified his activities by building a sawmill at Quesnellemouth late in 1863 and, five years later, a flour mill north of Clinton.

In 1871 Jerome signified his intention to retire, and advertised his mills for sale. He moved to San Francisco for health reasons in March 1872, but in February 1873 was reported to be "hopelessly insane." He drowned in his bath tub in November 1874. His estate, valued at $150,000, passed to Thaddeus but only when the will had been upheld in court after relatives maintained Jerome had been insane.

Jerome Harper never changed his citizenship and was a strong supporter of the Confederate states; to him, Robert E. Lee was the equal of Napoleon or Wellington. In 1862–63 he was connected with a plot to outfit a Confederate privateer at Victoria, but the scheme failed and only the plotters were discomfited. Harper was widely known and respected. The lavishness of his entertainment was celebrated – champagne lunches at the Clinton mill were not unknown. Jerome was always the leader of the two brothers; it was his initiative that laid the foundations for the giant cattle ranches later owned by Thaddeus at Kamloops, Cache Creek, Clinton, and in the Chilcotin.

G. R. NEWELL

PABC, Jerome Harper correspondence; F. W. Laing correspondence. Cariboo Sentinel (Barkerville, B.C.), 1865–74. F. W. Laing, "Some pioneers of the cattle industry," BCHQ, VI (1942), 257–75.

HARRIS, ALEXANDER, writer; b. 7 Feb. 1805, London, Eng., eldest of 11 children of the Reverend William Harris and Mary Redford; d. Copetown, Ont., 1 Feb. 1874.

Alexander Harris was educated privately at Windsor and Wallingford. He moved to London in 1823 to work as a proof-reader, later enlisted in the Horse Guards, deserted, and in 1825 set sail for Australia. Here, chiefly in the Goulburn-Taralga-Crookwell district of New South Wales, he spent the next 16 years as an itinerant sawyer, carpenter, and clerk. He returned to England late in 1840 and married Elizabeth Atkinson, who died five weeks after the marriage; he subsequently married, in 1842, Ursula Sarah Carr, by whom he had three sons. Harris separated from his wife in 1847, and emigrated in 1851 to the United States where he settled eventually at Sturgeon Bay, Wisconsin; it was in this area that he was to spend most of the years between 1854 and 1872 as a teacher and free-lance writer. He was joined at Sturgeon Bay by his family in 1858, but with the outbreak of civil war in 1861 his wife and children moved to Berlin (Kitchener), Canada West, and here Harris spent varying periods of time between 1861 and 1863. By the latter date the attempted reunion had failed. Ursula and the children left for Nova Scotia and Harris returned to the United States, where he became an American citizen in 1870. By July 1872, however, he was writing to his wife from Copetown, a small settlement not far from Hamilton, on the Great Western Railway. Two years later he died and was buried at Copetown.

Harris' best-known work is Settlers and convicts, or recollections of sixteen years' labour in the Australian backwoods. It was first published in 1847, anonymously, but A guide to Port Stephens in New South Wales, published in 1849, identified the author of the earlier work as "Alexander Harris." His writings, which also include Testimony to the truth (1848), a three-volume novel entitled The emigrant family (1849), and a number of pamphlets, draw heavily on his Australian experiences and are almost obsessively autobiographical. It is clear, however, that Harris made no sharp distinction between fact and fiction, creating his own image of himself and his environment according to his mood at various stages of his career. A mission worker in London in the 1840s and a devout nonconformist to the end of his life, his work is pervaded by an evangelical concern for soul salvation: he is pursued by the hound of heaven. Subsidiary themes are the ideal nature of woman, the evils of drink, and the iniquity of flogging. He belongs to the ranks of the itinerants of empire of the 19th century along with Sir George Arthur*, William Dunlop*, and Samuel Butler. A descriptive artist of the first order, his Settlers and convicts has become an Australian classic.

In 1953 an Australian edition of Settlers and convicts was published with a foreword by Australian historian C. M. H. Clark, who raised doubts as to whether Harris had actually existed, a wide search of primary documents, chiefly Australian, having yielded no evidence. The entry on Harris in the 1958 edition of The Australian encyclopædia, which took note of the controversy, was read by a grandson of Harris, Grant Carr-Harris of Ottawa; in 1961 Carr-Harris produced The secrets of Alexander Harris, a book based on a series of articles contributed by his grandfather, under the title "Religio Christi," to the Saturday Evening Post (Philadelphia) in 1858, and containing, in an introduction, extensive biographical information about him. In a third Australian edition of Settlers and convicts (1964), Professor Clark took note of the new evidence.

ROBERT L. MCDOUGALL

Alexander Harris, The emigrant family (3v., London, 1849); new ed. with intro. W. S. Ramson (Canberra, 1967); A guide to Port Stephens in New South Wales (London, 1849); new ed. with intro. Grant Carr-Harris (Sydney, Aust., 1961); [ ] The secrets of Alexander Harris, a frank autobiography . . . , ed. Grant Carr-Harris ([Sydney, Aust.], 1961); Settlers and convicts, or recollections of sixteen years' labour in the Australian backwoods (London, 1847; Carlton, Aust., 1953, 1954; Parkville, Aust., 1964); Testimony to the truth (London, 1848). Works by Harris, who wrote also under the epithets "An emigrant mechanic" and "A working hand," are listed in the British Museum catalogue; it gave Harris' name as a pseudonym in 1963, but the entry was corrected in 1968. ADB. The Australian encyclopædia (10v. Sydney, Aust., [1958]).

HARRIS, THOMAS DENNIE, merchant and office-holder; b. 30 Oct. 1803, of English parents, at Boston, Mass.; m. Lucy (Lucille, Lucinda) Charles of Montreal in 1827, by whom he had 12 children; d. 18 Jan. 1873, at Toronto, Ont.

Thomas Dennie Harris emigrated to Montreal in 1817 and worked in John Frothingham's hardware store. In 1825 he moved to Kingston, and in 1829 he went to York (Toronto) as manager of a branch hardware store for John Watkins of Kingston. He entered into a partnership with Watkins for operating the store in 1832. It was dissolved in July 1838 and Harris continued as a wholesaler and retailer, later in partnership with William Robert, his first-born, as Harris and Son. Harris was retired by 1859 but the firm continued for about seven more years as Harris, Evans and Company, William Robert Harris joining with John J. Evans who had earlier been an assistant in the store.

Harris had joined volunteer fire companies in Montreal and Kingston. He did the same on arrival at York, and with the reorganization of the Toronto Fire Brigade in March 1838 he was appointed its chief engineer. The post was unpaid but required supervision at every fire and detailed reports. These he presented with characteristic thoroughness until he retired exhausted and amid much regret in 1841. In the next few years he formed and led new fire and hose companies and was president of the Home District Mutual Fire Insurance Company. In the mid-1860s Harris was Toronto agent for the Home and Colonial Life and Fire Insurance Company. Fire had also made a massive intrusion on Harris' time in the great blaze of April 1849 when he lost his own store. St James' church, where he was rector's churchwarden, was levelled, and he managed its reconstruction. He also oversaw the establishment of St James' cemetery from 1844 and imported its iron chapel in 1861.

A member of the Toronto Board of Trade from the 1830s, and its president in 1864, Harris served as the board's representative on the Toronto Harbour Commission from 1854 to 1864 and again from 1866 to 1869. In 1863–64 he was the commission's president. He was harbour master of Toronto from 1870 to 1872, when he resigned through ill health. In the 1830s he had also become treasurer of the Commercial Newsroom, a meeting-place and reading-room mainly for merchants. He was later treasurer of the Toronto Athenaeum from its founding in 1845 (it soon absorbed the Newsroom and in turn merged with the Canadian Institute in 1855).

Harris helped inaugurate or sustain many enterprises. He was president of Canada's first telegraph company, the Toronto, Hamilton, Niagara, and St Catharines Electro-Magnetic Telegraph Company, from the year of its formation in 1846 until it was swallowed by the Montreal Telegraph Company in 1852. He served long periods on the boards of the British America Assurance Company, the Colonial Life Assurance Company, the Toronto Building Society, and the Canada Permanent Building and Savings Society. He was frequently called in to adjudicate commercial disputes.

Harris' most distinctive contribution to the city's commercial life, however, came in 1838 and 1839 when the banks suspended specie payment causing trade to limp for lack of ready cash. Harris issued handsome printed notes for small denominations, "the Harris shinplasters," which circulated as change and could, in aggregates worth a dollar or more, be exchanged for bank bills at par. Several thousand dollars worth came into use. He was the only person to make such an issue and one of only three merchants at this time who manufactured special metal tokens to do duty as pennies.

Harris was a manager rather than a speculator, supervising rebuilding or harbour maintenance, and keeping trade open with his "shinplasters." He eschewed notoriety in any guise, including the offer of a magistracy, and every temptation to speechmaking. His church work did not extend to a seat on synod and he was never a candidate for city council. An admirer of another native of Boston, Ben Franklin*, he presented a portrait of him to the Toronto Mechanics' Institute on its formation, and in his constant busyness, severe practicality, and sense of civic responsibility there are echoes of Franklin's Poor Richard.

BARRIE DYSTER

Metropolitan Toronto Board of Trade, Council, minute books. MTCL, Consumers' Gas Company papers, lists of shareholders, 1855; Toronto, Mechanics' Institute papers, 1832. PAC, RG 5, A1, 17 Aug. 1836. PAO, Toronto City Council papers, 1838–46. St James' Cemetery (Toronto).

Church Herald (Toronto), 23 Jan. 1873. Globe (Toronto), 25 Jan., 27 Nov. 1860; 20 Jan. 1873. Mail (Toronto), 20 Jan. 1873. Patriot (Toronto), 30 Jan., 4 Sept. 1838. Town of York, 1815–1834 (Firth). Brown's Toronto general directory, 1856 . . . (Toronto, [1856]). Brown's Toronto general directory, 1861 . . . (Toronto, [1861]). Caverhill's Toronto city directory, for 1859–60 . . ., ed. W. C. F. Caverhill (Toronto, n.d.). Landmarks of Toronto (Robertson), I, 300–1; II, 575–76. F. H. Armstrong, "The first great fire of Toronto, 1849," Ont. Hist., LIII (1961), 201–21; "The rebuilding of Toronto after the great fire of 1849," Ont. Hist., LIII (1961), 233–49. Ernest Green, "Canada's first electric telegraph," Ont. Hist., XXIV (1927), 366–72.

HARRISON, ROBERT ALEXANDER, lawyer, author, politician, and judge; b. 3 Aug. 1833, at Montreal, Lower Canada, son of Richard Harrison and Frances Butler; d. 1 Nov. 1878, at Toronto, Ont.

Robert Alexander Harrison's parents emigrated to Canada from Skegarvey, County Monaghan, Ireland, shortly before his birth. Soon after his birth, the family moved to Cookstown and then settled in Toronto where Harrison received his education. He attended Upper Canada College and Trinity College, obtaining a BCL in 1855 and DCL in 1859. In June 1859 he married Anna E. Muckle; she died in March 1866, leaving one daughter. Harrison was married again in January 1868, to Kennithina Johana Mackay, and they had one daughter.

Harrison began his law studies with the Toronto firm of Robinson and Allan when he was 17 and completed them in the office of Crawford and Hagarty. He was called to the bar of Upper Canada in 1855, and in 1867 became a QC. From 10 Sept. 1854 to 28 Feb. 1859 he was chief clerk of the Crown Law Department, having been appointed by the attorney general, John Ross, and retained by Ross's successor in 1854, John A. Macdonald*. Harrison left this position to go into private practice with James Paterson, and they were later joined by Thomas Hodgins* and then John Bain. When Paterson died, Harrison established the firm of Harrison, Osler and Moss, with Thomas Moss* and Featherston Osler*. Harrison was a successful lawyer and rapidly acquired a brilliant reputation. He was industrious and conscientious, "a gentleman of ability," as Macdonald said. His connection with the Crown Law Department had provided him with important contacts, and the firms he was associated with frequently acted as agents for crown business. Harrison was often himself a counsel for the crown. One of his more notable cases was the successful defence of the ministers of the crown accused of violating the Independence of Parliament Act in 1858 by the "double shuffle." The defence was based on an act passed in 1857, which said in effect that any person could vacate an office and be appointed to another within a month without having to resign and be re-elected; the defendants were exonerated from liability in respect of the statutory penalties and it was declared that the letter of the law had not been violated [see DRAPER]. During the Fenian trials in 1866–67, he and John Hillyard CAMERON conducted most of the cases for the crown. In 1871, Harrison was elected a bencher of the Law Society and on 8 Oct. 1875 he was appointed chief justice of the Court of Queen's Bench of Ontario. His appointment was generally regarded by the legal profession as a "reward [which] had been fairly and justly earned, and had been bestowed on one who would bring to bear on the administration of justice, a wide experience and tireless energy."

Harrison's contribution to jurisprudence was not confined to his work as a lawyer and judge. He was also an eminent author in the field, contributing works of learning and practical value. He began writing as an 18-year-old law student and published A digest of reports of all cases . . ., with James Lukin Robinson. Harrison was also an active contributor to various periodicals and newspapers, including the Merchants' Magazine and Commercial Review (New York) and the Daily Colonist (Toronto). In Toronto he was one of the founders and editors of the Local Courts' and Municipal Gazette, a joint editor of the Upper Canada Law Journal, and an editor of Poker, a humorous journal, in 1859–60.

Although for most of his career he was involved in jurisprudence, Harrison did serve in other positions at various times. He was a member of the Corporation of the City of Toronto, and a director of the Royal Canadian Bank and of the Life Association of Scotland. In 1876 he was appointed one of the arbitrators to decide the northwestern boundary of Ontario. He also managed to entertain a brief political career, serving as an alderman for Toronto in 1867 and 1868 and as the representative for Toronto West in the House of Commons, 1867–72. Preferring to devote himself to his extensive legal practice, he did not stand as a candidate in the 1872 election. As a member, he was chairman of the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills for two sessions. He was associated with several measures of some importance, including bills for amending the law as to stamping promissory notes and bills of exchange and for the collection of criminal statistics. He was a strong supporter of the extension and consolidation of the dominion, and to this end favoured the widening and deepening of canals and the building of railways. Because of his interest in the latter, he became a director of the Toronto, Grey, and Bruce Railway in 1869. He was a Conservative and a staunch supporter of Macdonald.

CAROLE B. STELMACK

R. A. Harrison was the editor of The Common Law Procedure Act; and other acts relating to the practice of the superior courts of common law; and the rules of court (Toronto, 1858; 2nd ed., 1870); A digest of reports of all cases determined in the Queen's Bench and practice courts for Upper Canada, from 1823 to 1851 inclusive . . ., ed. under the supervision of J. L. Robinson (Toronto, 1852); The new municipal manual for Upper Canada, containing notes of decided cases . . . (Toronto, 1859; 2nd ed., 1867; 3rd ed., 1876); The statutes of practical utility in the civil administration of justice, in Upper Canada, from the first act passed in Upper Canada to the Common Law Procedure Acts, 1856 (Toronto, 1857); and, with Henry O'Brien, Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Chancery, in Upper Canada . . . (Toronto, 1863).

PAC, MG 26, A (Macdonald papers); RG 1, E7, 46, 67; RG 5, C1, 562, f.1137; 607, f.370; 658, f.844; 672, f.103; 673, f.130; 879, f.541; RG 10, A8, 254; RG 19, A1, 1, PT.3. Globe (Toronto), 8, 11 Oct. 1875; 2 Nov. 1878. Mail (Toronto), 2, 4 Nov. 1878. Can. biog. dict., I. Can. directory of parliament (Johnson). Can. parl. comp., 1867. Dent, Canadian portrait gallery, IV. Morgan, Bibliotheca Canadensis; Sketches of celebrated Canadians. Wallace, Macmillan dictionary.

HART, ADOLPHUS MORDECAI, lawyer and author; b. 11 April 1814 in Trois-Rivières, son of Ezekiel Hart* and Frances Lazarus, grandson of Aaron Hart*; d. 23 March 1879 in Montreal and buried in Trois-Rivières.

Adolphus Mordecai Hart took up the study of law and spent part of his time as a law clerk in the office of the attorney general of Lower Canada, Charles Richard Ogden*. He was admitted to the bar of Lower Canada on 19 May 1836. Along with his uncle Benjamin Hart* and Benjamin's son Aaron Philip Hart, Adolphus Hart took part in the movement of the 1830s to obtain equal rights for Jews in Lower Canada, in particular to make it possible for Jews to take the oath as a justice of the peace by omitting the phrase "on the true faith of a Christian." A law of 1832 granting Jews rights and privileges came under question, and the House of Assembly in 1834 formed a special committee to consider this legislation; Hart submitted evidence to it, which appears in the committee's report.

While he was still a student, Hart also lodged a complaint in 1836 before the assembly, through Bartholomew Conrad Augustus GUGY, against the conduct of Judge Edward Bowen*. His complaint had some justification but was said to have been presented in such an exaggerated manner that the assembly would not pursue the case. Louis-Michel Viger* and Amable Berthelot* were authorized to make an inquiry; on 10 March 1836 the committee on grievances found the judge guilty.

Hart's family home was in Trois-Rivières. Louis-Joseph PAPINEAU came there to dinner in 1836, a significant occasion for nearly all the respectable English citizens of the town refused the invitation. Hart established a practice in the aftermath of the disturbances of 1837–38, and he defended several persons associated with them. In 1837, during the trial of "a rebel," he was fined for contempt of court. In 1839 he pleaded for Joseph-Guillaume Barthe*, law student and journalist, and Richard Cook, saddler, both of Trois-Rivières, who were arrested for publicizing an address to the exiles of Bermuda.

In the early 1840s Adolphus Hart was living in Montreal and is recorded as a member of the Jewish synagogue. In 1846 he appears as an ensign in the 3rd battalion of militia. On 12 Dec. 1844 he had married Constance Hatton Hart, daughter of his uncle Benjamin Hart; they had three daughters and two sons, one of whom, Gerald Ephraim Hart*, became known as a historian, bibliophile, and numismatist. Constance Hatton Hart was the author of Household receipts; or domestic cookery by "A Montreal Lady" which had a second edition in 1867.

Hart went to the United States in 1850. He was active in the Democratic party in New York State, assisting with literature for the gubernatorial campaign of Horatio Seymour in 1854. He also wrote a number of works from 1850 onwards. Among these was a History of the discovery of the valley of the Mississippi (1852), one of the early discussions of this subject. Written for the general reader, and presenting events up to 1748, it had two editions in 1852; the story was extended in another edition in 1853. In 1854 came Uncle Tom in Paris; or views of slavery outside the cabin. He wrote also, under his own name or pseudonymously, on such topics as paper money and the liquor question. This writing activity was continued after he returned to Canada in 1857 and resumed his legal practice in Montreal. He wrote Practical suggestions on mining rights and privileges in Canada . . . in 1867. The political state and condition of her majesty's Protestant subjects in the province of Quebec . . ., 1871, has been ascribed to him; the edition is reported to have been purchased and destroyed by the government.

Adolphus Hart suffered a stroke while pleading a case in court and died a few days later. The entire Montreal bar and most of the bench joined the escort for the body to the station, and the bar observed a month of mourning for him. At his funeral in Trois-Rivières, Alexander Abraham de Sola* officiated.

D. ROME

Adolphus Mordecai Hart published three works under the pseudonym of "Hampden": A few thoughts on the liquor question (New York, 1854); The impending crises (New York, 1855); The political state and condition of her majesty's Protestant subjects in the province of Quebec (since confederation) (Toronto, 1871). He also wrote History of the discovery of the valley of the Mississippi (1st ed., St Louis, Mo., 1852; rev. ed., Cincinnati, Ohio, 1853); History of the issues of paper-money in the American colonies, anterior to the revolution, explanatory of the historical chart of the paper-money of that period (St Louis, Mo., 1851); Life in the far west; or, The comical, quizzical, and tragical adventures of a Hoosier (Cincinnati, Ohio, [1850]); Practical suggestions on mining rights and privileges in Canada; with an appendix containing the gold mining regulations . . . (Montreal, 1867); Uncle Tom in Paris; or, Views of slavery outside the cabin (Baltimore, Md., 1854).

McCord Museum, Hart papers. Lower Canada, House of Assembly, Journal, 1834, app.GG. Le Journal des Trois-Rivières, 31 mars 1879. Morgan, Bibliotheca Canadensis. P.-G. Roy, Les avocats de la région de Québec. M. H. Stern, Americans of Jewish descent; a compendium of genealogy (Cincinnati, Ohio, [1960]). Wallace, Macmillan dictionary. Fauteux, Patriotes. V. B. Rhodenizer, Canadian literature in English (Montreal, 1965). David Rome, Jews in Canadian literature; a bibliography (2nd ed., 2v., Montreal, 1964), I, 1–3. Benjamin Sulte, Pages d'histoire du Canada (Montréal, 1891), 401–32. J.-P. Tremblay, A la recherche de Napoléon Aubin (Vie des lettres canadiennes, 7, Québec, 1969), 41–43.

HARTT, CHARLES FREDERICK, geologist and paleontologist; b. 23 Aug. 1840 at Fredericton, N.B., eldest son of Jarvis William Hartt and Prudence Brown; m. in 1869 Lucy Lynde of Buffalo, N.Y., by whom he had two children; d. in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, 18 March 1878.

Charles Frederick Hartt's father was principal of the Baptist seminary in Fredericton, New Brunswick, when his son was born; he soon joined the staff of Horton Academy, Wolfville, Nova Scotia. Charles Frederick was educated at the academy and at Acadia College, receiving his BA in 1860. In that year his father moved to Saint John, N.B., and established a young ladies' high school, where his son taught for a year.

From an early age C. Fred Hartt (as he was usually known) manifested a great interest in the natural sciences, especially geology and paleontology, and he made extensive collections in both Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Several species new to science which he had collected were described by Sir William Dawson* in Acadian geology (Edinburgh, 1855). From 1861 to 1864 Hartt studied under Professor Louis Agassiz at the Museum of Comparative Zoology at Cambridge, Mass. Hartt was a founding member, along with Moses H. Perley*, George Frederick Matthew*, and others, of the Natural History Society of New Brunswick in 1862; the society bought his fossil collections to assist in financing his studies under Professor Agassiz. In 1864 he and G. F. Matthew assisted Professor Loring Woart Bailey* of the University of New Brunswick in a government-instituted survey of southern New Brunswick.

In 1865 when Professor Agassiz was organizing the Thayer Expedition to Brazil, Hartt was appointed one of the two geologists. The expedition returned to the United States in 1866 but Hartt went back in 1867 for further study of the geology of the Bahia region and the coral reefs. In 1868 he became professor of natural history at Vassar College but soon resigned to become head of the department of geology at Cornell University.

Brazil was, however, his great interest. In 1870 he organized the largest of his expeditions, taking with him another professor and 11 Cornell students. On this and a subsequent expedition he worked in the Amazonas. In 1874 he submitted a proposition to the Brazilian government for a geological survey of Brazil, and in 1875 the Geological Commission of the Empire of Brazil was organized with Professor Hartt as its chief. For the next three years he directed expeditions working in many parts of the country and set up a museum to house all the scientific specimens collected. Then in the spring of 1878, when he returned to Rio de Janeiro after an exhausting inland expedition, he died of yellow fever at the age of 38, cutting short a brilliant career.

Hartt's contribution to scientific research in Brazil did not end with his own outstanding geological work. Inspired by his example the students whom he had taken to Brazil continued the research long after his death. Dr John Casper Branner, who had been personally associated with Hartt, wrote: "It is not difficult to sum up Hartt's influence upon geological work in Brazil, for with very few exceptions all the work of this character which has been done in that country since 1874 is traceable, either directly or indirectly, to the impetus given it by Hartt . . . as he was not a narrow specialist but a broad-minded naturalist, his students have also done other than purely geological work."

W. AUSTIN SQUIRES

J. C. Branner, "Prof. Hartt in Brazil," Cornell Magazine (Ithaca, N.Y.), February 1890. G. U. Hay, "Memorial sketch of the life and work of Prof. Ch. Fred. Hartt," New Brunswick Natural History Society, Report, 1881 (Saint John, N.B.), 3–14; "The scientific work of Prof. Chas. Fred. Hartt," RSCT, 2nd ser., V (1899), sect.IV, 155–65. G. F. Matthew, "Charles Frederick Hartt," Natural History Society of New Brunswick, Bull. (Saint John, N.B.), IX (1890), 1–24.

HASZARD, JAMES DOUGLAS, printer, journalist, farmer, and businessman; b. 27 June 1797 at Charlottetown, P.E.I., eldest son of Thomas Rhodes Haszard and his wife Jane; d. 17 Aug. 1875 at his home in Charlottetown, P.E.I.

James Douglas Haszard was the son of Rhode Island loyalists who immigrated to Prince Edward Island in 1785. At an early age James was apprenticed to his uncle, James D. Bagnall*, who was king's printer. When Bagnall was absent from the Island for three years, his young apprentice took over the task of printing royal notices and proclamations. With his uncle's return in 1811, Haszard resumed his role as apprentice. He broadened his experience by attending school in Halifax from 1816 to 1817, and by working as a printer in Rhode Island.

In 1823, two years after his return from the United States, Haszard established the Prince Edward Island Register, which because of the lack of printed matter on the Island was used as a reading text as well as a newspaper. The 11 Oct. 1823 issue was strongly critical of the Island's lieutenant governor and chancellor, Charles Douglas Smith*, whose actions as governor were described as "highly oppressive and illegal." Haszard was called before the governor in his capacity as chancellor, sternly lectured, but discharged, ostensibly because of his "youth and inexperience."

In 1825 Haszard married Sarah Sophia Gardiner who died within the next decade; then in 1835 he married Susanna Jane Nelmes. His second wife survived him as did at least four of his children.

Haszard continued to publish the Register until 1830 when he was appointed king's printer, a position he held until 1851. During those 21 years he published the Royal Gazette, which carried local and foreign news, and letters to the editor, as well as official notices and proclamations. After Edward Whelan* displaced him as queen's printer, Haszard began to publish Haszard's Gazette, which his son George continued after the father's retirement in December 1852.

Haszard was involved in several other enterprises. He established the first clothing mill in the colony, had interests in the insurance business, and owned a store which carried a wide selection of books, stationery, and Protestant religious tracts. He rented a number of houses in Charlottetown, and several farms around the Island, which a lieutenant governor, Sir Henry Vere Huntley*, described in 1844 as "extremely good" in quality. In a letter to the Colonial Office three years later, Haszard portrayed himself as "holding a large and important stake in the country." He also took an active part in community institutions such as the Royal Agricultural Society, Temperance Hall, and the Mechanics' Institute.

James Haszard was the first native Island journalist. He was not a gifted writer, and when Governor Huntley was about to strip him of a minor office he wrote that there was nothing to fear from Haszard: "he is without talent of his own, too penurious to pay for that belonging to others, and moreover, he will do nothing to endanger his possession of the office of Queen's Printer." Nonetheless, Haszard did introduce several important Island newspapermen, such as John Ings and James Barrett Cooper*, to their future profession, and in late 1852 he and his son George imported the colony's first power printing press. In politics, he was closely associated with the Tory élite which ruled the Island prior to responsible government. It was but natural that he should be displaced when this era came to an end. He appears to have aged prematurely, and not to have taken an active part in public life in his declining years.

IAN ROSS ROBERTSON

PAPEI, Henry Jones Cundall, letter book, 27 March 1867–26 May 1871, p.111. PRO, CO 226/67, 16–20; 226/71, 288, 361, 367; 226/75, 18; 226/98, 336–38. Prince Edward Island, Supreme Court, Estates Division, will of James Douglas Haszard, [21 April 1868]. Examiner (Charlottetown), 23, 30 Aug. 1875. Haszard's Gazette (Charlottetown), 1852. Patriot (Charlottetown), 3 Sept. 1875. Prince Edward Island Register (Charlottetown), 1823–30. Royal Gazette (Charlottetown), 1830–51.

Duncan Campbell, History of Prince Edward Island (Charlottetown, 1875), 201. R. L. Cotton, "Early press," in Historic highlights of Prince Edward Island, ed. M. C. Brehaut (P.E.I. Hist. Soc. pamphlet, Charlottetown, 1955), 42–43. W. L. Cotton, Chapters in our Island story (Charlottetown, 1927), 92–93, 125–28; "The press in Prince Edward Island," Past and present of Prince Edward Island . . ., ed. D. A. MacKinnon and A. B. Warburton (Charlottetown, [1906]), 112–21. T. R. Millman, A history of the parish of New London, Prince Edward Island (n.p., 1959), 6–7. J. B. Pollard, Historical sketch of the eastern regions of New France, from the various dates of their discoveries to the surrender of Louisburg in 1758; also Prince Edward Island, military and civil (Charlottetown, 1898), 200–1.

HATHEWAY, GEORGE LUTHER, farmer, merchant, lumberman, and politician; b. at Musquash, Sunbury County, N.B., 4 Aug. 1813, son of Calvin Luther Hatheway and his wife Sarah; m. in June 1840 to Martha Slason of Fredericton (there were no children); d. 5 July 1872 at Fredericton, N.B.

George Luther Hatheway attended school in Saint John, New Brunswick. He settled at Durham

Bridge, York County, where he became a farmer, country merchant, and lumber operator. He later moved to Saint Mary's across the Saint John River from Fredericton. At the time of his death he owned large areas of timber land.

Hatheway, a born politician, entered politics in 1850 as a reformer. Loud and boisterous, he was also warm-hearted, yet a formidable adversary in any debate. He was the central figure at any social gathering and he appealed to rural voters who felt he was one of them. He was able to do things which would have ruined other politicians. During his election campaigns he frequently dispatched messengers to the nearest tavern for brandy which he drank in full view of his audience. One story tells that he was surprised to receive the votes of a man and his three sons with whom he had quarrelled. He offered to shake hands with the head of the family saying he was glad their differences had apparently been resolved. The man refused, replying that there were two places for which he felt Hatheway was suited – Hell and the legislature – and that he would do his best to see him in both.

Hatheway, a supporter of responsible government, was elected in 1850, 1854, and 1856. He advocated in 1851 a bill to make the Legislative Council elective. In 1856 he introduced perhaps the most important legislation passed that year – a bill giving the Executive Council the sole right to initiate money grants. He was defeated in the 1857 election but in 1861 was back in the house and became chief commissioner of public works.

In 1865 Hatheway objected to the terms under which it was proposed that New Brunswick enter confederation. These terms were accepted by the majority of Samuel Leonard Tilley*'s government and Hatheway was the only member who decided to resign, which he did in January 1865, thus weakening the government. Hatheway has been criticized for his apparent lack of political conviction and his willingness to change sides when an issue seemed doomed to failure, yet, in deserting the Tilley government in 1865, he appears genuinely to have believed that the terms discussed at the Quebec conference of 1864 were not advantageous to New Brunswick. He demonstrated his sincerity in later years when he fought for better terms.

It has been said that during the debate over confederation "party politics was completely set aside . . . and personal advantage in the public area became the guiding spirit" of New Brunswick politicians. This may be so but after the government's defeat in the 1865 election, Hatheway, who had been re-elected as an anti-confederate, turned down an opportunity to form the new government. He was the first man approached by Lieutenant Governor Arthur H. Gordon*, despite the fact that Gordon considered him "destitute of principle, as well as of education." Instead Hatheway became chief commissioner of public works in the government formed by Albert James Smith*. In the election of 1866, probably because he sensed a major upset coming at the polls, Hatheway withdrew from the contest a few days before the end of the campaign. His desertion weakened the anti-confederates' chances of regaining power.

Hatheway was re-elected in 1870 to the provincial assembly and in February 1871 he was one of the men responsible for ousting the government of George Edwin King*. King was not a strong leader and many considered his government to be a creature of Ottawa. Hatheway was again accused of office seeking and in this case the charge had more validity. He deserted those who had helped him defeat King, and formed a new government including King and some of the ablest men from both parties.

Hatheway became premier and provincial secretary of a government organized primarily to pass the controversial school law bill of which King had been the architect. In his views on educational reform, Hatheway followed a consistent policy. As early as 1852 he had supported direct taxation for school purposes, pointing out that higher wages were paid to men working in the woods than to teachers. He realized that assessment would be unpopular but argued that "every child had a right to an education." He also supported the appointment of additional school inspectors and in 1854 he defended King's College (University of New Brunswick) against the attacks of A. J. Smith and others who wanted it closed. In the election of 1871 he declared that his government would stand or fall on the issue of the school bill and the principle of direct taxation for school purposes. He won the election and the bill was passed.

The school act of 1871 called for "free, tax supported, non-sectarian schools" and was opposed by those who felt that direct taxation was unnecessary and by the clergy, particularly Roman Catholics. The opponents of the bill carried the fight to the New Brunswick Supreme Court and the dominion parliament, and the government of Sir John A. Macdonald* referred it to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. All attempts to overthrow the bill failed and the higher courts declared it to be constitutional and within the jurisdiction of the province. This act, for which Hatheway deserves much of the credit, "laid the foundation of a free school system" when it went into effect in January 1872 and was "the most significant educational advance in New Brunswick during the nineteenth century."

On 25 June 1872 Hathaway badly damaged his left hand when he jumped from a moving train; he died as a result of blood poisoning from the injury. Hatheway was an able politician and a colourful individual though with many faults. Much more than a "loud-mouthed demagogue" or an unprincipled opportunist, he worked for reform both in government and in education and was never afraid to state his views, no matter how unpopular, to the house or to the people he represented.

W. A. Spray

N.B. Museum, Hatheway papers, F28, draft of a short history of the Hatheway family by W. F. Hatheway; "New Brunswick biographies," unpublished MS by G. H. Markham, 94–95. York County Court of Probate (Fredericton), IV (1866–77), 216–19. Fenety, Political notes and observations, 405, 474. New Brunswick, House of Assembly, Debates, 1866, 91. Morning Freeman (Saint John, N.B.), 6 July 1872. New Brunswick Reporter (Fredericton), 10 July 1872. Saint John Daily News, 6 July 1872. Saint John Daily Telegraph and Morning Journal, 6 July 1872. Telegraph Journal (Saint John, N.B.), 1 March, 28, 29 April, 6 May, 15, 16 June 1932. Can. parl. comp., 1871, 258, 267. Wallace, Macmillan dictionary, 305.

Creighton, Road to confederation, 200, 231. Hannay, History of New Brunswick, II, 140, 178–79, 234–37, 252–53, 293–301; Wilmot and Tilley (Toronto, 1907), 228, 233, 250. K. F. C. MacNaughton, The development of the theory and practice of education in New Brunswick, 1784–1900: a study in historical background ed. with intro. A. G. Bailey (U. of New Brunswick Hist. Studies, 1, Fredericton, 1947), 143–47, 155–263. MacNutt, New Brunswick, 365, 427–32. Waite, Life and times of confederation, 242, 245. C. M. Wallace, "The life and times of Sir Albert James Smith," unpublished MA thesis, U. of New Brunswick, 1959, 111–12, 122–31. A. G. Bailey, "The basis and persistence of opposition to confederation in New Brunswick," CHR, XXIII (1942), 374–97. James Hannay, "The premiers of New Brunswick since confederation," Canadian Magazine (Toronto), IX (1897), 213–21.

HAZEN, ROBERT LEONARD, lawyer, judge, and politician; b. 15 Oct. 1808 in Fredericton, N.B., son of William Hazen* Jr and Deborah Murray, a daughter of Colonel John Murray*; d. at Saint John, N.B., 15 Aug. 1874.

Robert Leonard Hazen's grandfather, William Hazen* Sr, had been one of the original members of the Council of Twelve which administered the province of New Brunswick before the appointment of the first governor, Thomas Carleton*, in 1785. After studying law in the office of Robert Parker* in Saint John, Robert L. Hazen was called to the bar of New Brunswick when he was 23 years old. In 1837 he married his cousin Sarah Ann, a daughter of William Botsford*, a provincial politician and judge; they had three children of whom one son survived the father. Hazen had a successful career in law; in 1843 he was named a queen's counsel, a considerable honour at that time, and three years later he was appointed a judge of the Court of Vice-Admiralty and recorder of the city of Saint John. At one time he served as a director, and at another as solicitor, for the Commercial Bank of New Brunswick.

In the general election of 1837 Hazen was elected to the assembly as one of the members for Saint John; he was re-elected in 1843 and 1846. In 1844 he was taken into the government, which included Edward Barron Chandler and Lemuel Allen Wilmot, as a member of the Executive Council and minister without portfolio. He resigned from the council in 1845 over a controversy involving the prerogative powers of the lieutenant governor, Sir William Colebrooke*, and became after this time one of the proponents of responsible government in New Brunswick. Once the controversy had been settled to his satisfaction, Hazen re-entered the Executive Council in 1846 where he remained until 1854; he was again a member from 1856 to 1857. As a member of the council, Hazen fought the government's battles in the assembly with conspicuous success. He resigned the assembly seat in 1848, however, to become a member of the Legislative Council; since he was popular in Saint John he could have retained his assembly seat for many years, but not being an ambitious man he chose to retire to the ease of the Legislative Council.

Robert Leonard Hazen exercised power and influence in New Brunswick politics for many years. His obvious talent and sterling honesty made him a man who commanded great respect among his fellows. When the union of the British North American provinces took place on 1 July 1867, Hazen was appointed, by royal proclamation, to a seat in the Senate of Canada. He remained a senator until his death, but did not participate actively in the debates. In the early 1860s his health had deteriorated and he partially lost his voice. He retired from the bar, practising only when, as recorder, he had to appear in court on behalf of the city.

P. R. Lindo

N.B. Museum, Hazen coll., Robert Leonard Hazen papers; Hazen family estate papers, 1852–92; Hazen family papers, 1720–1889. T. E. Hazen, The Hazen family in America, a genealogy, ed. D. L. Jacobus (Thomaston, Conn., 1947). J. W. Lawrence, Footprints; or incidents in the early history of New Bruns- wick, 1783–1883 (Saint John, N.B., 1883); Judges of New Brunswick (Stockton). MacNutt, New Brunswick, 285–94, 299, 318, 340, 343, 360, 430.

HAZLEWOOD, SAMUEL, civil engineer and surveyor; b. in 1822 at Newtonbarry, Wexford, Ireland; d. 11 Jan. 1878, at Brockville, Ont.

Samuel Hazlewood was a land surveyor in Ireland, and had worked on the Ordnance Survey as well as on other public and private projects. This background meant that when he emigrated to Canada at the age of 29 he had little difficulty in finding employment in a country just beginning its era of railway expansion.

It is likely that Hazlewood first settled in the vicinity of Brockville, Canada West. On his arrival he worked on a survey of a projected railway from Prescott to Georgian Bay, and shortly afterwards on the proposed Grand Junction Rail-Road between Belleville and Peterborough. In 1852 Hazlewood was employed on the first survey of the Grand Trunk Railway. Various employments in his profession followed, including time spent with the private contracting firm of Peto, Brassey, and Betts.

Hazlewood again became involved in a major work in 1864. He worked on both the exploratory survey and the preliminary survey of the Intercolonial Railway, and acted as one of the four district engineers during the construction of the road between 1868 and 1874. After its completion he was appointed district engineer for a portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway route under construction between Thunder Bay and Rat Portage (now Kenora). This was to be an "amphibious route," so named because it would use a combined water and rail system along the "Dawson Road," which had been explored and surveyed by Simon J. Dawson* and used as a route for immigrants and soldiers. Hazlewood was specifically in charge of the Fort Frances Canal Works located at the foot of Rainy Lake. In 1878, the year of Hazlewood's death, the route was abandoned, although the canal was almost finished, in favour of the present more northerly route.

Anne E. F. Sniderman

PAO, Historical Branch, "Historical plaque to commemorate the Fort Frances Canal." Revised record, engineers and their assistants employed on public works, Canada, 1779 to 1890 ([Ottawa], n.d.). Dom. ann. reg., 1878.

HEAD, Sir FRANCIS BOND, soldier, author, and colonial administrator; b. 1 Jan. 1793, at The Hermitage, Higham, Kent, Eng., son of James Roper Mendes Head and Frances Anne Burges; m. his cousin, Julia Valenza Somerville, in 1816, and they had four children; d. at his home, Duppas Hall, Croydon, Eng., 20 July 1875.

Francis Bond Head was descended from Dr Fernando Mendes, a Spanish Jew who accompanied Catherine of Braganza to England in 1662 as her personal physician. Francis' grandfather Moses married Anna Gabriella Head, the heiress of a Kentish gentry family; his father took the Head name on inheriting Anna's estates.

Francis Head was commissioned a lieutenant in the Royal Engineers upon passing out of the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, in 1811. He saw service in Malta, at Waterloo, and as engineering officer in the Edinburgh garrison, retiring as a major on half-pay in 1825 to take a position as mining supervisor for a company with South American interests. Loss of the company's concession rendered the expedition a costly failure, for which Head indicted his employers in Reports relating to the failure of the Rio Plata Mining Association (1827).

Head had already begun in 1826 a lifelong connection with the publishing house of John Murray with Rough notes taken during some rapid journeys across the pampas and among the Andes, a book which reveals his talent for graphic description, his love of nature, his interest in primitive peoples, his deep suspicion of things un-English, his erratic and impulsive bent, and his penchant for self-dramatization. Both his books and his exploits brought him to public notice. He was nicknamed "Galloping Head" for his feat in riding twice across South America between Buenos Aires and the Andes; and his demonstration of the military usefulness of the lasso brought him a knighthood from William IV in 1831. A number of other writings followed, including articles for the Quarterly Review and his most successful book, Bubbles from the Brunnens of Nassau (1834), a travel book of ingratiating superficiality which went through six editions. In 1834 as well he was named assistant poor law commissioner for Kent under the new poor law of that year, a preferment he is said to have owed to Lord Brougham's influence.

In December 1835 came a more surprising appointment. Head was named to succeed Sir John Colborne* as lieutenant governor of Upper Canada. Lord Glenelg, the colonial secretary, selected Head not because he had confused him with his cousin Edmund Walker Head*, or because of Lady Head's exalted family connections, but because the strongly reformist members of the cabinet, especially Lord Howick (later 3rd Earl Grey), were convinced by Head's vigorous administration of the new poor law and his writings on the subject that he was the conciliator needed in Upper Canada. It was for the same reason that the puzzled Head, on his arrival in Toronto in January 1836, found himself welcomed as "a Tried Reformer." The cabinet had made an astonishing choice. Head had so little political experience that he had never voted in an election; he had displayed no interest whatever in colonial policy; and even his essay on the poor law, though couched in the rhetoric of reform, was based upon the deepest social conservatism.

Head's first moves as lieutenant governor were promising. Though his publication in full of his instructions from Glenelg embarrassed both the commission under Lord Gosford [Acheson*] in Lower Canada and the home government, and showed his insubordinate attitude towards Glenelg as well as his political innocence, to many Upper Canadians his action seemed an augury of change. Then, after a round of conversations with leading Reformers, Head succeeded in persuading John Rolph* and a reluctant Robert Baldwin*, as well as John Henry Dunn*, the receiver general, to join the Executive Council. Within two weeks, however, Head's coup led to a crisis when all six councillors formally protested his failure to consult them on all matters relating to the government of the province. Head's reply, an able document often attributed to Chief Justice John Beverley Robinson*, was constitutionally unassailable. Since, under the Constitutional Act, the lieutenant governor alone was responsible for the conduct of government and was bound to consult his council only on certain specified matters, Head demanded that his councillors either alter their views or resign. They chose to resign, on 12 March, after having held office for three weeks. The Tory members of the council, George H. Markland*, Joseph Wells*, and Peter Robinson*, though now ready to retract, went out with the new councillors, Head arguing that the council must act as a body though he wished also to avoid the unpopularity that a dismissal of the new councillors alone would have brought him.

The controversy between Head and the council had been conducted temperately; the assembly's reaction, however, was violent. Reformers and Conservatives, with but two dissenting votes, demanded more information from Head on the controversy; on its production a select committee was set up to investigate and report. While it was sitting, the political climate worsened sharply with the disclosure of Colborne's 11th-hour endowment of 57 Anglican rectories. In consequence the committee's report, given the house on 15 April, was extremely harsh. Head was termed a deceitful despot whose conduct dishonoured the king he represented. On adopting the report, the assembly voted also to stop supply, thereby depriving government of £7000 for official salaries. Head, deeply angered by the personal attack upon him, reacted disproportionately by reserving all money bills passed during the session and proroguing the legislature. A month later, on 28 May, he dissolved it and ordered writs to be issued for an election.

Head's pose during these events was that of a man above party, unjustly accused by a faction of partiality to the Conservatives. Far from being captured by the Family Compact, however, he had quite independently made up his mind about the nature of provincial politics almost as soon as he had arrived, and never changed his ideas thereafter. As early as 5 February he had told Glenelg that the Whig policy of conciliation was wrong, that the Reformers – all Reformers – were "The Republican party," and that their aim was to use responsible government to sever the imperial connection.

His private intention of February of "throwing himself on the good sense and good feeling of the people" was carried out during the most bitter election in the province's short history, when he campaigned openly against the Reformers. Many factors caused their overwhelming defeat, but Head's electioneering skill was certainly an important one. His direct and vivid language transformed the complexities of provincial politics into a simple confrontation between the forces of loyalty, order, and prosperity and those of a selfish and disloyal faction. He managed to conjure up the menace of outside intervention (whether French Canadian or American he left unsaid) in support of provincial democrats, and trumpeted, in the name of the loyal militia, "Let them come if they dare!" Such tactics were "not exactly according to Hoyle," he admitted to Glenelg, "but, Mon Seigneur, do you think that Revolutions are made with Rose water," he wrote in French. What Head called his "plain homely language" may have astonished the Colonial Office, but gained him "herds of friends." Conservatives, moderates, and recent immigrants alike responded to his appeals and combined to defeat not only such prominent Reformers as William Lyon Mackenzie*, Marshall Spring BIDWELL, and Peter Perry*, but the bulk of their followers as well.

For Head, the result of the election was a vindication of his views, and the year that followed was a relatively quiet and happy period for him. During the summers of 1836 and 1837 he toured the province informally, meeting many settlers, visiting Indian bands, and acquiring the fund of anecdote that gives piquancy to his books on Upper Canada. His relations with his new legislature went smoothly enough, Head encouraging the conservative majority in the assembly in its ambitious programme of public improvement.

But during the same period, Head dissipated much of the moderate support he had gained during the election and at the same time lost the prestige his victory had momentarily given him at the Colonial Office. Dismissing from office a number of men, including Dr William Warren Baldwin* and Judge George RIDOUT, who had shown Reform sympathies during the election, he embarked at the same time on an extraordinary correspondence with Glenelg in which he urged the abandonment of the policy of conciliation. Although it was plain to Glenelg that Ridout had been unjustly treated, Head refused to reinstate him, nor would he appoint Bidwell to the bench. To Head, Bidwell was a "disloyal man" though he admitted him to be much abler than those raised to judgeships in the province. The strong personal animus Head felt towards Bidwell probably had its origin in the part Bidwell had played as speaker of the Reform assembly. Whatever the reason, Head was so blinded by it that he did not see how valuable a judgeship for Bidwell would have been in cementing the temporary alliance of conservatives and moderates formed during the election campaign. His quixotic response to the bank crisis of early 1837 (he refused to allow provincial banks to suspend specie payments, as banks in the United States and Lower Canada had done) was vigorously attacked in a special session of the legislature called to resolve the crisis. Deadlock between the House of Assembly and the Legislative Council, though eventually broken on Head's terms, showed the extent to which his popularity had diminished.

Head's weakening grip upon provincial politics was soon overshadowed by the events that were to lead to armed revolt in December, a revolt for which he has traditionally been held largely responsible. Yet the origins of the rebellion of 1837 lie in political and religious antagonisms that predate his arrival in the province, and with social tensions engendered by the flood of British immigration that was changing the composition of the province's population. Agrarian economic distress and the swift movement towards revolt in Lower Canada were specific causes of the rebellion in Upper Canada; so too was the personality of Mackenzie. For none of these can Sir Francis be held responsible.

But he was hardly blameless. Although he had not "stolen" the election of 1836 in the corrupt sense alleged by Mackenzie and others, his unprecedented intervention had shattered the old politics and created deep disaffection among a minority; his uncompromising hostility toward Reformers after the election, with the apparent backing of the home authorities, had extinguished for many what hopes they had held for gradual change. More immediately, his deliberate stripping of regular troops from the colony in November 1837 to help Colborne meet the Lower Canadian emergency was most provocative, especially in the light of his foreknowledge of the martial preparations of Mackenzie and his followers. In his Narrative (1839) Head explained that "the more I encouraged [the rebels] to consider me defenceless the better"; he wished "to await the outbreak, which I was confident would be impotent," in order to prove the loyalty of the mass of the people. As J. B. Robinson remarked upon reading this passage, "any quiet Englishman will be apt to say, that man would make a rebellion anywhere." Public criticism prompted Head to change his story in The emigrant (1846). There he alleged that Colborne had withdrawn the troops without consulting him, a statement for which there is no foundation. As late as 20 Nov. 1837 Head told Colborne that he was releasing troops to Lower Canada "as nothing more or less than a challenge to the rebels to change agitation into attack," while at the same time fatuously assuring him (in the face of repeated warnings from Colonel James FitzGibbon* and others) that "nothing can be more satisfactory than the present political state of this province."

It was precisely the defencelessness of the government that led Mackenzie first to propose, and then, on the night of 4 December, to attempt to carry out an armed coup. When Head was awakened with the news of the revolt, he appears to have been thrown into a state of shock, judging from his erratic and indecisive behaviour in the ensuing days. On 7 December the militia had dispersed the rebels on Yonge Street north of Toronto and Head (like Mackenzie before the battle) indulged his talent for excess by ordering burnt both John MONTGOMERY's tavern and the home and buildings of David Gibson*, a rebel leader, though at the same time granting immediate clemency to prisoners from the rebel rank-and-file. He had already settled another score by persuading Marshall Spring Bidwell, who was not involved in the revolt, to go into voluntary exile.

After the suppression of armed risings in the province, Head, his confidence restored, threw himself with characteristic energy into the task of supervising the movements of the militia on the frontiers in order to counter the threat posed by Mackenzie and his new-found American adherents. In the midst of these activities he learned, in a dispatch from Glenelg, that the resignation he had proffered some months earlier had been accepted because of his refusal either to reinstate Judge Ridout or to acquaint him with the grounds of his dismissal. Almost the last accomplishment of Head's administration was the acceptance by the Colonial Office of his recommendation, against the advice of his council, that the special authority under which Thomas Talbot* had for many years controlled settlement in the western part of the province be terminated "without loss of time."

Head departed Upper Canada convinced that he had saved it for the empire, and for several years tilted unavailingly against the colonial policies of such men as Durham [Lambton*], James Stephen, Lord John Russell, and Sir Robert Peel whom he considered were squandering the fruits of his work. Had Francis Head never come to Upper Canada he would still be remembered as a minor and rather engaging member of the gallery of 19th-century English literary eccentrics; Lord Melbourne, who gave Head an interview on his return from North America, could only reply to his catalogue of grievances by observing, "But Head, you're such a damned odd fellow." His selection as lieutenant governor was a singularly unfortunate one, for the implementation of the policy of the Whig government and the state of the province demanded the stabilizing arts of the political healer, not the melodramatics of a literary man turned polemicist with a romantic yearning for the hero's role.

Head never again held a government post. During the remaining years of his long life, his fluent pen produced a series of books and articles, the mixed and ephemeral character of which is indicated by the following titles: Stokers and pokers (1849), Hi-ways and dry-ways (1849), The defenceless state of Great Britain (1850), A faggot of French sticks, or Paris in 1851 (1852), A fortnight in Ireland (1852), The horse and his rider (1860), Mr. Kinglake and his history of the Crimean War (1863), The life of Field Marshal Sir John Burgoyne (1872), and his collected essays, published in two volumes in 1857.

In confederation year Sir Francis petitioned the cabinet for recognition of the contribution he had made to the development of Canada. On 21 Dec. 1867 Queen Victoria made him a member of her Privy Council, an honour termed by the prime minister, Lord Derby, "a tardy act of justice."

S. F. WISE

A complete list of F. B. Head's works can be found in the British Museum catalogue but the following are of interest here: F. B. Head, Descriptive essays contributed to the Quarterly Review (2v., London, 1857); The emigrant (London, 1846); A narrative (London, 1839), repub. as A narrative with notes by William Lyon Mackenzie, ed. with intro. S. F. Wise (Carleton Library series, no.43, Toronto, Montreal, 1969); Rough notes taken during some rapid journeys across the pampas and among the Andes (London, 1826).

PAC, MG 24, A25 (Francis Bond Head papers); A40 (Colborne papers); RG 5, A1, 160–80; RG 7, G1, 75. PAO, Macaulay family papers; Mackenzie-Lindsey collection; Sir John Beverley Robinson papers; John Strachan papers. PRO, CO 42/429–42/431, 42/437, 42/439, 42/444. Charles Lindsey, The life and times of William Lyon Mackenzie; with an account of the Canadian rebellion of 1837, and the subsequent frontier disturbances, chiefly from unpublished documents (2v., Toronto, 1862), I, 355–401; II, 5–132. [A. E. Ryerson], Sir F. B. Head and Mr. Bidwell . . . (Kingston, U.C., 1838).

J. C. Dent, The story of the Upper Canadian rebellion; largely derived from original sources and documents (2v., Toronto, 1885). M. A. FitzGibbon, A veteran of 1812, the life of James FitzGibbon (Toronto, 1894), 184–235. S. W. Jackman, Galloping Head; the life of the Right Honourable Sir Francis Bond Head, bart., P.C., 1793–1875, late lieutenant governor of Upper Canada (London, [1958]). J. A. Gibson, "The 'persistent fallacy' of the Governors Head," CHR, XIX (1938), 295–97. H. T. Manning, "The colonial policy of the Whig ministers, 1830–37," CHR, XXXIII (1952), 203–36, 341–68. H. T. Manning and J. S. Galbraith, "The appointment of Francis Bond Head: a new insight," CHR, XLII (1961), 50–52. C. B. Sissons, "The case of Bidwell; correspondence connected with the withdrawal of Marshall Spring Bidwell from Canada," CHR, XXVII (1946), 368–82. William Smith, "Sir Francis Bond Head," CHA Report, 1930, 25–38.

HEATH, JOHN, Patriote, notary, and registrar; b. c. 1808 in Ireland, son of a regimental captain William Heath and Elizabeth Allen, originally from London, Eng.; d. 16 Nov. 1874 at L'Isle-Verte, Que.

John Heath arrived in Canada when he was still young. A family named Bâcon, probably that of François Bâcon of Quebec, took him in and gave him an education which enabled him to acquire a notary's commission on 17 Nov. 1834. John Heath followed his profession successively at Saint-Charles, county of Saint-Hyacinthe, from 1834 to 1836, at Quebec from 1838 to 1842, at Saint-Germain-de-Rimouski from 1842 to 1849, then at L'Isle-Verte from 1852 until his death. But his registry contains no acts from September 1836 to February 1838 and from November 1838 to the end of August 1840.

For these last four years, John Heath abandoned the profession of notary in order to support the cause of the Quebec Patriotes. He won renown in an unusual way in October 1838, when he engineered the escape from the Quebec citadel of the Americans William W. Dodge and Edward Alexander Theller*, who had been condemned to be hanged for taking part in the Upper Canada insurrection. The fugitives hid for some weeks in the city of Quebec, thanks to Charles DROLET's assistance; then Jean-Baptiste Carrier and John Heath undertook to conduct them across the American border. In the night of 4–5 November the travellers, taking circuitous routes, reached Saint-François-de-la-Beauce (Beauceville). After a rest, they managed to get past three sentinels' posts without attracting attention, and to reach the border. John Heath had the police at his heels when he got back to Canada and stayed in the woods at some distance from Quebec City.

The proclamation of the amnesty allowed him to take up his profession again. He then settled at Saint-Germain-de-Rimouski, where on 11 July 1842 he married Émilie Reeves; they had two children, one being James William Adhémar who also became a notary. John Heath ended his career at L'Isle-Verte, after receiving a commission as registrar for the county of Rimouski in August 1849. When the county of Témiscouata, formed from part of the county of Rimouski, was set up in 1853, John Heath was assigned to it as registrar.

JACQUES MATHIEU

AQ, John Heath; QBC, Procureur général, Événements de 1837–1838, nos.3363, 4136; P.-G. Roy, Dossiers de recherche, Heath. Le Monde illustré (Montréal), 19 févr., 12 mars 1898. La Quotidienne (Montréal), 28 oct. 1838. P.-G. Roy, "L'évasion de Dodge et Theller de la citadelle de Québec," Cahiers des Dix, V (1940), 121–44.

HEAVYSEGE, CHARLES, poet and dramatist; b. 2 May 1816 in Huddersfield, Yorkshire, England; m. Mary Ann Oddy in 1843, by whom he had seven daughters; d. in Montreal, 14 July 1876.

There is little verifiable information on the early life of Charles Heavysege, and we must depend to some extent on his own accounts of his childhood, especially those appearing in an article by Lawrence Johnston Burpee*, a report of an address by G. H. Flint, and an unpublished thesis by T. R. Dale. Heavysege said, in a letter to Charles Lanman* (Montreal, 1860): "I was born in England, as I believe you are aware; my ancestors on the paternal side being of Yorkshire. . . . I was what is usually styled religiously brought up, and, though my works are dramatic, taught to consider not only the theatre itself, but dramatic literature, even in its best examples, as forbidden things. Hence, when a boy, it was only by dint of great persuasion that I covertly obtained from my mother some few pence weekly for a cheap edition of Shakespeare. . . ." According to the same source, Heavysege left school at nine, to return only briefly later. He wrote in another letter that his father, through romantic idealism, had sold his patrimony and divided the money among relatives, but Dale could find no evidence of a Heavysege family holding land in England. In the same letter Heavysege said he was proud to belong to the working class. G. H. Flint adds the following information, probably obtained from Heavysege himself or some friend: "He [Heavysege] was apprenticed to a woodcarver and soon became a first-class workman. On completing his apprenticeship, he started business for himself and employed several men. But he did not seem to have the necessary business tact to compete with the world, and, having married ten years previously, he came to Montreal in 1853, on the invitation of a gentleman here, and followed his occupation as a journeyman carver. . . ."

John Reade*, in a letter to Burpee, writes: "I first met Charles Heavysege in the summer of 1858. He was then living on St. Constant Street, Montreal, and pursuing his occupation as a carver in the firm of J. & W. Hilton, cabinet-makers and upholsterers. . . . Heavysege told me that he was accustomed to compose while he was engaged at work, the occupation of his hands not interfering with the efforts of his mind. Speaking especially of Saul, he said that in this way he had elaborated some of the liveliest scenes." In 1860, according to Heavysege, he became a reporter for the Montreal Transcript; Flint maintained this move was "on the advice of his friends," who hoped it "would stimulate his poetic ability, but, instead, the endless grind and routine almost ruined it." Heavysege apparently remained with the Transcript a short time, and returned briefly to woodcarving. He then joined the Montreal Daily Witness, where he remained until he retired. The report of Flint's address says: "Some two years before his death, his health failing, he resigned his post as City Editor of the Witness, and again turned his thoughts to poetry. He often expressed his desire to review Count Filippo and leave it perfect . . . but he was cut down before the work was fairly begun, on July 14, 1876."

As to the man himself, Burpee quotes a letter from Dr Samuel Edward Dawson*: "The Bible and Shakespeare were his two books. He had a high opinion of his own work, and was obstinate about having anything cut out by his friends. Being a man without general culture, he could not well distinguish . . . between what was good and what was bad. He knew what cost him a long time to do, and he was apt to overvalue that." Heavysege's daughter, Harriet Pettigrew, characterized her father in these words: "He had all a poet's intense love and appreciation of nature. He fairly revelled in the changes in the autumn season." Another daughter, in a letter to Burpee, described him as a sensitive person, who sometimes played his violin with his family. Heavysege seems to have become part of a small literary circle in Montreal which included John Reade and George Martin, and was also, for a time, honorary member of the Montreal Literary Club, which broke up upon the death of Thomas D'Arcy McGee*. Thus he had sympathetic friends, even though, as he remarked, Canada was not a country where circumstances favoured the writer.

Heavysege's first published work is The revolt of Tartarus, a poem in six parts which takes up Milton's Paradise Lost where Lucifer leaves Pandemonium for his mission on the newly created Earth. Upon Lucifer's departure, a group of the fallen angels, despairing and desiring God's forgiveness, decide to disobey Lucifer. Heavysege, wryly, has Jesus, on instructions from God, condemn them once more to eternal punishment although they had begged forgiveness. The machinery for forgiveness had not yet been instituted through the death of Jesus on the cross, but Heavysege shows the same uneasy attitude to the Old Testament God in other works. The dates of the composition and publication of The Revolt remain a mystery as yet. Burpee gives London, 1852, as place and date, which would mean the poem was composed in England. Other sources give other information. Two copies of the work actually obtainable today indicate the poem was published in London, but give no date; it also appeared in Montreal in 1855.

Sonnets "by the Author of 'The Revolt of Tartarus'" was also published in Montreal in 1855. Its 14-line poems only loosely fit the sonnet pattern. They deal with nature, fate, death, and the lessons of history, and contain many Shakespearean echoes.

In 1857 Saul: a drama in three parts appeared in Montreal. This long verse drama, never intended for the stage, deals with Saul's failure to carry out God's commands, and is Heavysege's most notable work. A copy found its way to Nathaniel Hawthorne, then in England, and was passed on by him to the North British Review. The author of its review, Coventry Patmore, said, in part: "In it the greatest subject, in the whole range of history, for a drama, has been treated with a poetical power and a depth of psychological knowledge which are often quite startling, though, we may say, inevitably, below the mark of the subject-matter, which is too great to be done full justice to. . . ." Patmore also speaks of the author's knowledge of the Bible, Shakespeare, and human nature, and of the oddity, subtlety, and originality of his language. Even by modern standards, Patmore's comments are fair and just, though perhaps a little too laudatory. They touch directly on the truth about all Heavysege's works – grand (mainly) in conception, full of a keen understanding of human nature, having fine passages, but spoiled often by the author's lack of self-criticism, which led him from beauty to incongruity. Two short quotations, one from Saul and one from Count Filippo, will serve to show the two extremes: these ridiculous lines from Saul,

> Mew, mew, a cat did mew,
> That a cat was in the vault is true,
> The vault that Saul's his wine in, . . .

and this beautiful passage, which would grace any poet's name:

> So often the indulgent moon allows
> The tide come kissing up the wet-lipped sands.

The friendly reception abroad, as usual, sharpened appreciation of Heavysege's works in North America; other reviews appeared in the New York Evening Post, the Atlantic Monthly, Galaxy, etc. Saul was revised and reprinted in Montreal in 1859 and again in Boston in 1869. There is a hint that Heavysege prepared a stage version, never produced, but evidence is conflicting.

Count Filippo; or, the unequal marriage (Montreal, 1860) "By the Author of 'Saul'" is based on the trials of a May and December marriage. This verse play seems the best sustained of Heavysege's efforts, and its topic suited to his taste for the incongruous, for bawdy puns and racy dialogue. It is a Boccaccio-Chaucer crossbreed, overlaid with Shakespearean language.

Heavysege produced three shorter poems in 1864 and then Jephthah's daughter, which appeared in London and Montreal in 1865. It was composed, according to a letter that year from the author to Charles Lanman, in the interval between his working for the Transcript and the Witness. A dramatic poem of about 1,200 lines, it tells the tragic story of Jephthah's vow to God, fulfilment of which means the killing of his daughter. Jephthah's moral dilemma is explored. The daughter's final acceptance of her fate means her father's promise will be fulfilled and he will be at peace with his God, if not with himself. The work is marked by the same faults and strong points as earlier writings.

Heavysege's only novel, The advocate, a melodramatic tale which makes use of English and French antagonisms in Lower Canada, was a disaster by any standards. After its appearance in Toronto and Montreal in 1865, the author is reported to have tried to destroy all copies of it. "Jezebel", which appeared in the New Dominion

Monthly in 1867, is apparently Heavysege's last written work. Again a biblical story is used to exhibit his obvious ability to portray moral agony in the face of God's punishment; it is not a great work though he does succeed in portraying a spicy, lively Jezebel.

It is difficult to assign a place to the works of Charles Heavysege in the perspective of Canadian literature. He is one of those mysterious figures who often turn up in Canada, produce literature which has little, if any, Canadian flavour, and then perhaps move on to another country; they leave behind works to be examined anxiously for possible literary value, and to be claimed loudly as Canadian if any value, no matter how small, be found. Heavysege's works did not receive wide acclaim or recognition outside of Canada, except for Saul; he never achieved popularity in Canada, and it cannot be said with certainty that his works influenced any other poet. The nature and the quality of his works would hardly seem to merit their republication. Still the works do exist. The product of a circumscribed mind in a circumscribed environment, they contain flashes of acute human insight into moral problems and passages of great beauty. They are a monument to Heavysege's perseverance; more than this cannot be safely said.

J. C. STOCKDALE

Charles Heavysege, The advocate, a novel (Toronto, Montreal, 1865); [ ], Count Filippo; or, The unequal marriage, a drama in five acts (Montreal, 1860); The dark huntsman (a dream) (Montreal, 1864); Jephthah's daughter, a poem (London, Montreal, 1865); "Jezebel," New Dominion Monthly (Montreal), 1867; The owl (Montreal, 1864); [ ], The revolt of Tartarus ([London, 1852]; Montreal, 1855); [ ], Saul: a drama in three parts (Montreal, 1857); [ ], Sonnets (Montreal, 1855).

AJM, Registre d'état civil, Dominion Square Methodist Church (Montreal), 1876. Morgan, Bibliotheca Canadensis. Watters, Check list. Watters and Bell, On Canadian literature. T. R. Dale, "Charles Heavysege," unpublished PHD thesis, University of Chicago, 1951. L. J. Burpee, "Charles Heavysege," RSCT, 2nd ser., VII (1901), sect.II, 19. G. H. Flint, "Charles Heavysege," Dominion Illustrated Monthly (Montreal), 27 April 1889, 263–66. North British Review, XXIX (August 1858), 143–47.

HERBERT, MARY ELIZA, author and magazine editor; b. at Halifax, N.S., c. 1832, second daughter of Catherine and of Nicholas Michael Herbert, shoemaker and blacking manufacturer, who had emigrated from Ireland; d. in Halifax at her father's home, Belle Aire, 15 July 1872, after a long illness, of "chronic gastroses."

Mary Herbert's early poems were published in 1857 with those of her elder sister, Sarah Herbert* in The Aeolian harp: or, miscellaneous poems, a collection on religious, moral, and temperance themes. Both women belonged to the Wesleyan Methodist evangelical group and were active in the temperance movement; these interests provided the main themes for their poetry. Mary Herbert later published a volume containing her own poetry, Flowers by the wayside . . ., written on more romantic themes. In the preface "she trusts that the unassuming flowers thus gathered, may be instrumental in instructing, cheering and comforting some weary traveller in life's rugged way."

Mary Herbert was the first woman in Nova Scotia to edit and publish a magazine: the Mayflower, or Ladies' Acadian Newspaper, a small 32-page volume. It included works partly selected and partly original, and was devoted to literature for those who wished "to roam a while in the flowery fields of romance, – to hold communion with the Muses." The magazine began publication in May 1851, in the year the Literary Garland of Montreal ceased, and was a Maritime example of the North American and English fashion for genteel periodicals with many lady contributors and a literary content which displayed sentiment, piety, and propriety. Printed at the Athenaeum, the official press of the Sons of Temperance, the Mayflower continued for at least nine monthly numbers, but failed to obtain enough support even from those eager to encourage native literature. The outcome is not surprising as the intense competition among Nova Scotia periodicals during this period led to many financial failures.

Mary Herbert also wrote tales and essays for Nova Scotia newspapers and several of her tales were published separately, at her own expense, because the province had no book publishing firms. The tales have little merit, and the poems show a morbid concern with death, but a few have vivid descriptions of nature or poetic mood.

PHYLLIS R. BLAKELEY

M. E. Herbert, Belinda Dalton; or scenes in the life of a Halifax belle (Halifax, 1859); Flowers by the wayside, a miscellany of prose and verse . . . (Halifax, 1865); Woman as she should be; or Agnes Wiltshire (Halifax, 1861); The young men's choice (Halifax, 1869). Sarah and M. E. Herbert, The Aeolian harp; or, miscellaneous poems (Halifax, 1857). Mayflower, or Ladies' Acadian Newspaper (Halifax), May 1851–February 1852.

Acadian Recorder (Halifax), 16 Oct. 1830, 16 July 1872. Novascotian (Halifax), 28 May 1835. Presbyterian Witness (Halifax), 20 July 1872. Morgan, Bibliotheca Canadensis, 183. Watters, Check list, 162, 223.

HILYARD, THOMAS, shipbuilder and lumberman; b. October 1810 at Saint John, N.B., son of Thomas Hilyard and Margaret Miles; m. Matilda Dyer and had 13 children; d. 22 June 1873 at Saint John.

Only a few details of Thomas Hilyard's activities prior to 1852 are known. In 1842, described as a shipwright, he is listed in the Saint John shipping register as the owner of a minute schooner, the Nevermind. From 1848 to 1850 Hilyard owned the large new ship Patriarch. With the construction of two big ships in 1852 he started building on a large scale. He obtained, first by lease and later by purchase, a shipyard in Portland, N.B. At the end of 1854 he bought the adjoining steam sawmill which would give him not only cheap supplies of shipbuilding timber and ready cargoes for his new ships on their maiden voyages, but also the means to maintain his business during the frequent ebbs in shipbuilding. The latter aspect must have been particularly important because Hilyard, unlike most of the long-term successful shipbuilders of Saint John, did not invest to any extent in shipowning. In 1856 or 1857 he further expanded by initially leasing and subsequently purchasing a neighbouring shipyard from John Haws*, for decades a leading shipbuilder in the area.

Hilyard launched at least 48 vessels – a number surpassed by few Canadian builders. An early vessel laid down at Portland in 1853 was his largest, the three-decked ship Clas-Merden of 1,768 tons. Most of his 28 or more large ships, from about 900 tons upward, were sold to major shipowners at Liverpool, England. These ships went into service in the 1850s carrying emigrants to Australia and later as merchantmen in the bulk trades. Hilyard's smaller vessels were generally sold locally, some for use in the West Indian trade. Near the end of his life Hilyard extended his business to include ship repairing. For that purpose he constructed in 1870 a marine railway to carry vessels out of the water.

Hilyard gained a high reputation as a shipbuilder. The Canute, 1,391 tons, built in 1863, was advertised for sale 16 years later by one of England's most reputable shipbrokers as "The very fine St. John built ship . . . built under special survey, by Hilyard. . . ." The ship was still afloat in 1905 in the United States as the barge Nyack. The quality and quantity of his ships and the extent of his sawmilling operations made Thomas Hilyard a leading figure in the economic life of the Saint John region. The business continued under two sons, Thomas K. and Henry, until 1915.

RICHARD RICE

N.B. Museum, Hilyard family papers, 1788–1955; Ward family papers, 1755–1850. Registry of British Ships, HM Customs and Excise, Custom House (Liverpool, Eng.), Liverpool Registers, 1850–52. Daily Telegraph (Saint John, N.B.), 23 April 1874. Liberal Review (Liverpool), 4 Oct. 1879. Biographical review: this volume contains biographical sketches of leading citizens of the province of New Brunswick, ed. I. A. Jack (Boston, 1900). Census of Canada, 1870–71 (5v., Ottawa, 1873–78), III. F. W. Wallace, Record of Canadian shipping: a list of square-rigged vessels, mainly 500 tons and over, built in the eastern provinces of British North America from the year 1786 to 1920 (Toronto, 1929). A. B. Lubbock, The colonial clippers (new ed., Glasgow, 1948). J. R. Rice, "A history of organized labour in Saint John, New Brunswick, 1813–1890," unpublished MA thesis, University of New Brunswick, 1961. Donald Ross, "History of the shipbuilding industry in New Brunswick," essay awarded the James Simonds prize in history by University of New Brunswick, 1933 (copy in N.B. Museum). S. T. Spicer, Masters of sail: the era of square-rigged vessels in the Maritime provinces (Toronto, 1968). Wallace, Wooden ships and iron men.

HINCKS, WILLIAM, Unitarian clergyman, theologian, and university professor; b. 16 April 1794, Cork, Ireland, second son of the Reverend Thomas Dix Hincks and Anne Boult; d. 10 Sept. 1871, Toronto, Ont.

William Hincks was born into a distinguished family. He was educated for the Presbyterian ministry, and served at Cork in 1814 and at Exeter, England, from 1816 until 1822 when he joined the Unitarian Church and became minister of Renshaw Street Unitarian Church, Liverpool.

His interests having shifted to science, he began a teaching career in 1827 and was tutor in mathematics and philosophy at Manchester College, York, until 1834. There he also became associated with the political school known as Philosophical Radicals and argued for the extension of popular rights. In 1839, in London, he resumed his ministerial work, and served as well from 1842 to 1847 as the first editor of the Inquirer, a Unitarian weekly journal. In it Hincks showed a special interest in education, peace, and temperance, and favoured the abolition of slavery and of the death penalty, the shortening of hours of labour, and the rational use of leisure. He obtained in 1849 the appointment of professor of natural history at Queen's College, Cork. Four years later at nearly 60 years of age Hincks came to Canada as the first professor of natural history at University College, Toronto.

Hincks' appointment has attracted more than passing attention because he was chosen in preference to the young, but later famous, Thomas Henry Huxley. The preliminary selection committee did not fix upon one person but placed Hincks, Huxley, and one Dr Ayres on an equal footing. Huxley had already an impressive list of zoological publications to his credit and had the support of 16 prominent British and French biologists including Charles Darwin. Success, however, fell to Hincks, probably "through the influence of his brother," Francis Hincks*, at that time premier of the Province of Canada, a "qualification," Huxley remarked, "better than all the testimonials in the world." Such political interference with university appointments was a long-standing problem.

In Toronto William Hincks served as president of the Canadian Institute (now the Royal Canadian Institute) from 1869 to 1871. For several years he was editor of its Canadian Journal and contributed 24 articles on subjects ranging from botany and zoology to economics and psychology. He also published in British journals and was a fellow of the Linnean Society in Great Britain. He was a prominent member of Toronto's Unitarian congregation and occasionally conducted its services.

Hincks was a gentleman beloved by his students, who nevertheless spoke of his ideas as "antiquated" and of his methods of teaching as out of date and "leaving much to be desired." "We learned to know his ways," asserted one student, "and to make our papers suit his peculiar taste." Another, James Loudon*, later president of the University of Toronto, commented that in Hincks' department "success . . . depended largely on memorizing."

Hincks married in 1817 Maria Ann Yandell by whom he had eight children; she died in 1849. The maiden name of his second wife, Sarah Maria, whom he married before leaving England, is not known.

J. DONALD WILSON

PAC, RG 5, C1, 375, 386. York County Surrogate Court (Toronto), will of William Hincks. "The late Professor Hincks," Canadian Journal, new ser., XIII (1871–73), 253–54. Inquirer (London), 30 Sept. 1871. J. of Education for Ont., XXIV (1871), 155. DNB (entry for Thomas Dix Hincks).

E. H. Craigie, A history of the department of zoology of the University of Toronto up to 1962 ([Toronto, 1966]). John King, McCaul: Croft: Forneri, personalities of early university days (Toronto, 1914). R. S. Longley, Sir Francis Hincks; a study of Canadian politics, railways, and finance in the nineteenth century (Toronto, 1943). Herbert McLachlan, The Unitarian movement in the religious life of England; its contribution to thought and learning, 1700–1900 (London, 1934). The Royal Canadian Institute, centennial volume, 1849–1949, ed. W. S. Wallace (Toronto, 1949), 197. W. S. Wallace, A history of the University of Toronto, 1827–1927 (Toronto, 1927). C. R. W. Biggar, "The Reverend William Hincks, M.A.," University of Toronto Monthly, II (1901–2), 232–33.

HODDER, EDWARD MULBERRY, physician, surgeon, and educator; b. 30 Dec. 1810, at Sandgate, Kent, Eng., son of Edward and Mary Hodder; d. 20 Dec. 1878, at Toronto, Ont.

Edward Mulberry Hodder was educated on the island of Guernsey and at Saint-Servan, France. At 12 he became midshipman under his father, a captain in the Royal Navy, but he left the service within a year, and went to study medicine in London, under Joseph Amesbury and James Blundell, and in Paris and Edinburgh. He became a member of the Royal College of Surgeons in 1834, and practised at London and later at Saint-Servan. In 1834 he married Frances Tench by whom he had several children.

About 1838 Hodder immigrated to Upper Canada, which he had visited three years before, and settled near Queenston. He moved to Toronto during 1843, and soon established himself as one of its leading medical practitioners. He was granted a CM by King's College (later the University of Toronto) in 1845. In 1850 he and James BOVELL founded the Upper Canada School of Medicine, and after Bishop John Strachan* returned that year from England – he had gone there to obtain support for the establishment of a Church of England university – they offered to have the school constitute the medical faculty of the proposed university. Introductory lectures in the medical faculty of Trinity College were given in November, and Hodder lectured on "Midwifery and Diseases of Women and Children." In 1851 he established with Bovell the Upper Canada Journal of Medical, Surgical, and Physical Science to which he contributed several articles.

Hodder continued to teach at Trinity College (which granted him an MD in 1853) until the closing of the medical faculty in 1856. He then became professor of obstetrics at the Toronto School of Medicine, affiliated since 1854 with Victoria College. When the medical faculty at Trinity College was re-established in 1871, Hodder returned to it. He was unanimously elected its dean, a position he held until his death in 1878.

As perhaps "the acknowledged leader of the profession in Toronto and in the Province of Ontario" Hodder was active in numerous medical institutions and societies. He was appointed the representative of Trinity College on the board of trustees of the Toronto General Hospital in 1853, and was for a long time associated with it as a consulting physician and with the Burnside Lying-in Hospital as the senior physician. He was made an associate member of the Medical Board of Upper Canada in 1853, and in 1858 was appointed its president to succeed Christopher Widmer*. In 1862 he was chosen president of the Toronto Medico-Chirurgical Society and, in 1875, of the Canadian Medical Association at their meeting in Halifax. He was elected a fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons in 1854, and of the Obstetrical Society of London in 1865. At the time of his death he was an honorary local secretary of the latter. He had also served as vice-president of the Canadian Institute in Toronto for 1868–70.

Hodder was an imaginative and respected medical practitioner. During the cholera epidemic of 1854 in Toronto he and Bovell made transfusions of milk into the veins of some patients – with mixed results. Hodder was one of the first to report the use of carbolic acid as an antiseptic in surgery. It was mainly, however, as an obstetrician and gynaecologist that he was prominent, and it was said that "as an ovariotomist he was admittedly the most successful in Canada." He has been called the "Father" of these two branches of medicine in Ontario.

Hodder retained a love for boating all his life. He was a founder in 1852 of the Toronto Boat Club, which became the Royal Canadian Yacht Club, and participated in many regattas. He published The harbours and ports of Lake Ontario in 1857, a useful compilation for sailors.

HENRI PILON

E. M. Hodder, The harbours and ports of Lake Ontario, in a series of charts, accompanied by a description of each . . . (Toronto, 1857); "A case of apoplexy, terminating fatally, in which the Caesarean operation was performed with a favourable result to the child," Upper Canada Journal of Medical, Surgical, and Physical Science (Toronto), I (1851–52), 4–7; "On the poisonous plants which are indigenous to, or which have become naturized in the neighbourhood of Toronto," Canadian Journal, I (1852–53), 204–7, 218–19; "Transfusion of milk in cholera," Practitioner (London), X (1873), 14–16.

MTCL, V. M. Roberts papers, memorabilia, 14. Canada Lancet (Toronto), X (1877–78), 215–16. Canada Medical and Surgical J. (Montreal), VI (1878), 428–31. Cyclopædia of Can. biog. (Rose, 1888), 647. Canniff, Medical profession in Upper Canada, 432–34. Middleton, Municipality of Toronto, II, 576, 618–22, 625, 634, 751. W. G. Cosbie, "J. Y. Simpson oration: Simpson and some Toronto contemporaries," Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists (London), Report, 1968, 73–80. G. W. Spragge, "The Trinity Medical School," Ont. Hist., LVIII (1966), 63–98.

HODGES, JAMES, engineer; b. 6 April 1814 at Queenborough, Kent, Eng.; d. 28 May 1879 on his estate of Penny-Hill at Bagshot, Surrey, Eng.

In Queenborough James Hodges received only an elementary education, and he took advantage of the industrial revolution to carve out a place for himself. He was apprenticed to a Brompton contractor at the age of 17, and soon turned to railway construction, taking part in some ten important projects and becoming works manager of the South-Eastern Railway Company. After that, as Sir Samuel Morton Peto's agent, he worked at the building of the suspension bridges at Norwich, Needham, and Somerleyton, accepted a post as engineer, and then undertook the construction of 50 miles of track for the Great Northern Railway.

With this valuable experience to help him, Hodges arrived in Canada in 1853 to represent the firm of Peto, Brassey, and Betts, which had just signed a contract with the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Until 1860 he directed the gigantic task of building a bridge (Victoria Bridge) over the St Lawrence near Montreal. He had to tackle numerous technical problems resulting from the speed and strength of the current and the intense cold of the winters. Furthermore, he could not count on a stable work force. The fitters and labourers, dissatisfied with the wage offers made them, periodically went on strike; some were signed on by other contractors who offered them better wages. Drownings occurred; cholera and blindness due to the reflection of the sun on the ice affected a considerable number of workmen. However, thanks to the assistance given by five doctors, the number of deaths among the 3,040 men employed during these six years was kept down to 26. The workers lived on the banks of the river, and had the advantage of a chapel, a school, and a library of some 1,000 volumes.

The Grand Trunk Railway Company wanted to do away as soon as possible with the ferry linking the two banks, which would lighten its annual budget by about £2,500. The contractors therefore decided in June 1858 to try to open the bridge to traffic by the following year. To meet this objective, Hodges used the support of the ice to place in position during the winter of 1858–59 the central deck of the bridge and its tubular structure, which measured 330 feet in length and weighed 771 tons. By this daring operation he completed his task before the time provided for in the contract. This achievement earned him the honour, on 25 Aug. 1860, of welcoming the Prince of Wales, the future Edward VII, who had come specially to open the bridge, named Victoria after the reigning sovereign.

His work ended, Hodges returned to England. But he soon found himself alone once more, as a result of his wife's death. In 1863 he came back to Montreal as the agent of the Grand Trunk, and endeavoured to obtain a cheap form of fuel for Canadians, who lacked coal. He developed a peat-bog on a 25,000 acre tract of land near the railway in the township of Bulstrode (Arthabaska County), which had been granted to him in May 1869. He met with little success and shortly before 1871 he returned to England to his estate in Surrey, where he died in 1879.

JACQUES MATHIEU

James Hodges, Construction of the great Victoria Bridge in Canada (2v., London, 1860). Langelier, Lands granted in Quebec, 1763–1890, 65, 1465. Le Courrier du Canada (Québec), 31 août 1860. Morning Chronicle (Quebec), 27 Aug. 1860. Morgan, Sketches of celebrated Canadians, 706–8. Notman and Taylor, Portraits of British Americans, I, 267–92. A. W. Currie, The Grand Trunk Railway of Canada (Toronto, 1957), 51. Raphaël Bellemare, "Inauguration du pont Victoria," BRH, V (1899), 189–90.

HODGSON, Sir ROBERT, lawyer, land agent, politician, judge, and administrator; b. 1798 in Charlottetown, P.E.I., eldest son of Robert Hodgson and Rebecca Robinson; d. 15 Sept. 1880 at his home in Charlottetown.

Born into an Anglican family of comfortable circumstances, Robert Hodgson completed his education at King's College, Windsor, Nova Scotia. He studied law with Simon Bradstreet Robie* and James W. JOHNSTON in Halifax and was called to the bars of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island in 1819. He then took up residence in Charlottetown and pursued an active career as a lawyer, land agent, and politician. He married Fanny McDonell in 1827, and they had two sons and one daughter. Hodgson did not remarry after she died on 2 May 1832.

Hodgson entered public life in 1824 by successfully contesting an assembly seat for Charlottetown. He rapidly became an integral part of the local élite. Sometimes in partnership with John Lawson, he acted as land agent for such leading proprietors as Robert Cundall, the Earl of Westmoreland, the Montgomerys, the Stewarts, and the Douglases. When William Johnston*, the attorney general of the colony, died in May 1828, Hodgson was named his successor on an interim basis. A year later, the appointment became permanent, and Hodgson resigned his assembly seat. He was then appointed to the Executive Council and the Legislative Council, becoming president of the latter body in 1840. An investigation carried out by the assembly in the following year revealed that Hodgson had close family connections with no less than three of his eight fellow executive councillors.

Hodgson nevertheless enjoyed bipartisan prestige among Island politicians. In 1846 the lieutenant governor, Sir Henry Vere Huntley*, described him as "clever and professionally well informed . . . [and] uniformly popular from his kind-heartedness." Four years later, during a crisis in the struggle for responsible government, when it seemed as though the Reformers might assume office, they offered to allow Hodgson to retain the office of attorney general and his seat on the Executive Council if he would join them. He declined, and when the Reformers did take power in 1851 he resigned the two positions. He remained president of the Legislative Council for another year.

In consideration of his long tenure as attorney general, Hodgson was granted an annual pension of £200, conditional upon his not accepting any office of emolument "under the Government of this Island." Stating that "the pension of that Gentleman . . . will be saved to the Colony," the Executive Council of George COLES appointed Hodgson to the vacant chief justiceship in 1852. He was an appropriate choice, as he had been the senior practising barrister on the Island for some years, and because, in the estimation of the governor, Sir Alexander Bannerman*, he had "a thorough knowledge of Colonial & Constitutional law." He held the position for 22 years, and three times within that period (July to December 1865, October 1868 to October 1870, and August 1873 to July 1874) acted as administrator when the governor was absent. In January 1869 both he and the chief justice of Nova Scotia, William Young*, were knighted.

Serious problems arose over the land question when Hodgson was administrator in 1865. The new and radical Tenant League, whose members were pledged to refuse payment of rent to landlords, caused such disorders in Queens County that Hodgson sent to Halifax for two companies of soldiers to restore order. The military presence was effective, and the administrator's action brought approval from London, from most of the Island press, and from the lieutenant governor, George DUNDAS.

Although Hodgson asked to be appointed lieutenant governor in 1869, he was maintained in his office as chief justice, and William Robinson* became lieutenant governor. Robinson left the Island in 1873, Hodgson was again appointed administrator, and was named lieutenant governor the following summer. Since his salary was now paid by the government of Canada, Hodgson demanded resumption of the pension granted in 1851 and withdrawn in 1852. Despite considerable criticism from members of both houses of the local legislature, he was successful in his claim. As a result, he was receiving one salary and two pensions (as retired attorney general and chief justice) during his tenure as lieutenant governor. He retired in 1879 and died the following year, leaving a considerable estate in land and money.

Sir Robert Hodgson was a life-long office-seeker; in fact, his indefatigable quest for offices, honours, and pensions more than once betrayed a lack of taste. Nonetheless, he was undeniably a man of distinction in the history of Prince Edward Island: he was the first native chief justice, the first native lieutenant governor, and the first Islander to be knighted. For most of his public career, he was also a very popular man. When he died, the Patriot described him as "an excellent specimen of the English gentleman. . . . He will be long remembered as the Good Sir Robert."

IAN ROSS ROBERTSON

PAC, MG 26, A (Macdonald papers), p.48274; RG 6, A1, 4, f.1465. PAPEI, Robert Bruce and David Stewart letter book, I (16 March 1821–21 Aug. 1834), 355, 359–60; Prince Edward Island, Executive Council, Minutes, 21 May 1852, 1 Aug. 1865. PRO, CO 226/78, 111–12, 158; 226/79, 192–94; 226/80, 183–86; 226/91, 48–51, 178–80; 226/101, especially 329–39, 345–63, 380–88, 664–67; 226/104; 226/105, especially 216–17; 226/106; 226/109. Prince Edward Island, Supreme Court, Estates Division, will of Robert Hodgson, 31 March 1879.

Prince Edward Island, House of Assembly, Journals, 1825–29; Debates and proceedings, 1875, 101–8; Legislative Council, Journals, 1830–52; Debates and proceedings, 1875, 231–32. Examiner (Charlottetown), 16 Sept. 1880. Patriot (Charlottetown), 16 Jan. 1869, 18 Sept. 1880. Pioneer (Summerside, P.E.I.), 22 Sept. 1880. Prince Edward Island Register (Charlottetown), 13 Nov. 1824. Royal Gazette (Charlottetown), 11 June 1850. Can. parl. comp., 1874, 513. MacKinnon, Government of PEI, 38, 145. T. R. Millman, A history of the parish of New London, Prince Edward Island (n.p., 1959), 7. J. B. Pollard, Historical sketch of the eastern regions of New France from the various dates of their discoveries to the surrender of Louisburg, 1758; also Prince Edward Island, military and civil (Charlottetown, 1898), 200.

HOLMES, JOHN, politician; b. March 1789 in Ross-shire, Scotland, son of John Holmes and Christy Monroe; d. 3 June 1876 at Springville, N.S. John Holmes married Christina Fraser in 1814; they had several children including Simon Hugh Holmes*, premier of Nova Scotia from 1878 to 1882.

In 1803 John Holmes and his parents migrated from Scotland to a farm in the East River area of Pictou County. The family became prominent as leaders in the religious life of the developing community; John Holmes Sr organized a congregation of Church of Scotland adherents, and his son later served for 50 years as a Kirk elder. By 1836 the younger Holmes was an officer in the Pictou militia and a justice of the peace. Maturing in a society torn by sectarian rivalries, Holmes took the side of the Church of Scotland, which was continually being challenged from within by a group of stern Calvinists (commonly known as Antiburghers) led by Thomas McCulloch*. In the early 19th century, Pictou's politics were, indeed, essentially an extension of the county's religious quarrels. In 1836 the Kirk Council named John Holmes as a candidate for election to the assembly, and, after complicated manœuvring, secured his return by acclamation.

Within the new assembly Holmes soon emerged as an opponent of Joseph HOWE's reform movement. Holmes' Toryism predictably had its roots in sectarian antagonisms: the Church of Scotland was an integral part of the Nova Scotian oligarchy and Kirkmen identified reform with the activities of the Antiburghers. This attitude on Holmes' part was reinforced during the brief coalition government of 1840–43 when Howe was able to influence the distribution of patronage in favour of his Antiburgher allies. Understandably, Holmes' attacks on reform increased until at one point Howe was provoked to describe him as a "political Rip Van Winkle" who had slept so long in the Sleepy Hollow of reaction as to be ignorant of the new world taking shape around him.

After the collapse of the coalition Holmes aligned himself with the attorney general, James W. JOHNSTON. Holmes lost his assembly seat in the 1847 provincial election, but was returned as member for Pictou in 1851 when disputes over railway policy had weakened his Liberal opponents. In the 1850s Holmes concentrated his efforts on the economic development of his constituency and urged the construction of an Atlantic seaboard railway which would pass through Pictou county. Holmes' identification with the business community proved politically costly, however. His close relations with the General Mining Association, an English corporation with monopolistic control over local coal deposits, helped secure his defeat in the 1855 general election.

After a mass defection of Roman Catholics from the Liberals restored the Conservatives to power in 1858, J. W. Johnston rewarded Holmes with a seat in the Legislative Council (1858). Holmes' loyalty to Charles Tupper* through the crisis over confederation resulted in his appointment to the first dominion Senate. Age had drained Holmes' energies by then and he contributed little to the federal scene. His death concluded a long political career which reflected faithfully the ideals of Nova Scotia's Conservative tradition.

D. A. SUTHERLAND

Belcher's farmer's almanack, for . . . 1837 (Halifax, [1837]). Acadian Recorder (Halifax), 1858–67. British Colonist (Halifax), 1866. Colonial Standard (Pictou, N.S.) 1876. Eastern Chronicle (New Glasgow, N.S.), 1843–55. Novascotian (Halifax), 1837–67. Pictou Bee, 1836–37. Pictou Observer, 1840. Directory of N.S. MLAs (Fergusson), 162. J. M. Cameron, Political Pictonians; the men of the Legislative Council, Senate, House of Commons, House of Assembly, 1767–1967 (Ottawa, [1967]). George Patterson, Studies in Nova Scotian history (Halifax, 1940). G. G. Patterson, A history of the county of Pictou, Nova Scotia (Montreal, Pictou, Halifax, Saint John, N.B., and Toronto, 1877). H. L. Scammell, "The rise and fall of a college," Dal. Rev., XXXII (1952–53), 35–44.

HOLTON, LUTHER HAMILTON, Montreal businessman, civic leader, and politician; b. 22 Jan. 1817 at Sheffield's Corners (now Soperton), Leeds County, U.C., the second son and fourth child of six children of Ezra Holton and Anner Phillips, who had migrated from Brandon, Vermont, to Sheffield's Corners in 1811; d. 14 March 1880 in Ottawa, Ont., and was buried in Mount Royal Cemetery, Montreal, Que.

When Luther Hamilton Holton was seven years old, his father, a poor farmer, died, and in 1826 he went to Montreal to live with his uncle, Moses Gilbert, a Vermont-born general merchant, who enrolled him in the Union School. A bright and determined student, he remained in this private institution for four years and received a good elementary education. In the 1830s and 1840s Montreal was an important centre for the growing western wheat trade with the United Kingdom and offered young men profitable mercantile opportunities. At the age of 12 Luther Holton started as a clerk in his uncle's counting house and quickly mastered the principles of book-keeping. In 1836 he left his uncle's business and was made a clerk in the forwarding and commission house of Henderson and Hooker. James Henderson of Montreal and Alfred Hooker of Prescott had founded this enterprising partnership in January 1825 and had built wharves and warehouses at Montreal, Prescott, and Kingston. On 27 April 1839 the tall, stern-visaged, industrious, and shrewd Luther Holton married his first cousin Eliza Forbes. They had three sons and three daughters, two sons and one daughter dying in infancy. His employers had a high opinion of Holton's ability and accepted him as a junior partner in their firm on 1 April 1841. With the death of Henderson on 22 March 1845, Holton became a senior partner and the firm adopted the name of Hooker and Holton.

The firm was a major participant in the carrying trade on the upper St Lawrence and Lake Ontario and Lake Erie, and it reflected entrepreneurial problems of capital formation, maximizing profits, competition, navigation, and the marketing of wheat. An owner-manager of the firm, Holton provided working capital by using the firms' schooners, steamboats, wharves, and warehouses as collateral for short-term bank loans. He borrowed money from the Commercial Bank of the Midland District and the City Bank of Montreal and was careful to preserve the good credit relations that his partners had established with these banks. In 1842 the firm's property was valued at about £20,000 and by the early 1850s it amounted to about £50,000. An efficient and hardheaded merchant, Holton increased profits through expansion of the firm's freight and passenger business, prudent outlays for additional steamboats, tight control of operating expenses, and effective advertising. In order to counteract the threat of ruinous competition Hooker and Holton cooperated with their principal rivals such as Macpherson and Crane and H. and S. Jones in a Montreal steamboat combination that maintained high freight rates, monopolized the upper St Lawrence carrying trade, and drove individual forwarders out of business. Hooker and Holton's solution to the problem of the unimproved St Lawrence waterway between Montreal and Prescott was to ascend by the indirect Ottawa-Rideau route, to trans-ship their cargoes at Kingston, and to descend to Montreal by running the St Lawrence rapids. After the completion of the St Lawrence canals in 1848 the firm acquired large, screw-propelled steamers for its new through line between Montreal and Port Stanley on Lake Erie and thus tapped the lucrative traffic of the west. The firm was strong enough to survive the commercial depression of 1848–49, and as a major exporter of wheat and flour and small importer of general goods Holton helped to build an impressive mercantile establishment.

With Britain's gradual abandonment of the imperial preference on Canadian wheat in the period between 1846 and 1849, Holton became prominent in the economic affairs of Montreal. In March 1846 he was made vice-chairman of the Montreal Free-Trade Association [see John YOUNG] and on 5 April he was elected to the council of the Montreal Board of Trade. He was an ardent free-trader and saw a flexible economy as a means of providing the St Lawrence commercial community with new markets for its export trade in bread-stuffs and as a way of lowering the cost of the necessaries of life. Working through the Free-Trade Association and the Board of Trade, Holton and other Montreal free-traders successfully sought the support of merchants in Quebec, Kingston, Toronto, and Hamilton, and they exerted enough pressure on the Canadian and imperial governments to secure the repeal of Canada's tariff on American wheat in 1846, the removal of the Canadian preference on British manufactures in 1847, and the establishment of free navigation on the St Lawrence in 1849. But Holton was dismayed by the failure of the Canadian government's attempt at reciprocity with the United States in 1848, and the upsurge of protectionism in the Montreal Board of Trade between 1847 and 1849 led to his resignation from the council.

On 15 Nov. 1849 Holton became a vice-president of the Montreal Annexation Association and during the next few months believed that in the scheme for the annexation of Canada to the United States he had the answer for the slump in his forwarding business and Montreal's commercial ills. On 24 Dec. 1849 the government punished him for becoming an annexationist by depriving him of his lieutenant's commission in the Canadian militia. This event made him lose his zest for annexationism. The revival of the St Lawrence economy and his re-election to the council of the Board of Trade early in 1850 provided him with a fresh sense of civic purpose. As president of the Board of Trade and as a harbour commissioner from 1856 to 1859 and from 1862 to 1863, Holton was attuned to the metropolitan aspirations of Montreal and carried through a St Lawrence improvement programme that helped to stimulate commerce and lift the level of affluence of the city's acquisitive business class.

Between 1852 and 1854 Holton gradually transferred his capital from forwarding and overseas trade to railway development and on 12 Jan. 1854 withdrew from the partnership of Hooker and Holton. In the 1850s the St Lawrence trade was still expanding, but railways became the focus of entrepreneurial activity and opened more attractive fields of investment. On 10 Aug. 1852 Holton was made head of the projected Montreal and Kingston Railroad, capitalized at £600,000 and designed to give Montreal command of east-west traffic. As he did not want the road to fall into the hands of the construction firm of William Jackson and associates of the United Kingdom, Holton, together with the other directors, bought control of the railway and raised £60,000 in Montreal but were beaten by the difficulty of obtaining the state aid and English capital that were necessary for construction and forced to surrender the railway charter to the Canadian government. Holton was a key figure in the negotiations that led to the consolidation of the St Lawrence-Atlantic, Montreal-Kingston, Toronto-Kingston, and Toronto-Sarnia roads as the private-public Grand Trunk Railway of Canada. On 10 Nov. 1852 he became a director of the Grand Trunk and in the same month joined Alexander Tilloch Galt*, David Lewis Macpherson*, and Casimir Stanislaus Gzowski* in forming the construction firm of C. S. Gzowski and Company. On 12 April 1853, shortly after Holton had resigned from the Grand Trunk, the firm contracted to build the 167-mile Toronto-Sarnia road for £1,376,000.

On 5 Sept. 1854 Holton entered the Canadian assembly as a representative for Montreal and as a principal member of the Liberal opposition from Canada East (Lower Canada). In the 1840s he had eagerly identified himself with the cause of responsible government and such Reformers as Francis Hincks*, but in 1854 he found Hincks too conservative and became a strong supporter of Antoine-Aimé Dorion*, who had succeeded Louis-Joseph PAPINEAU as the leader of the Lower Canadian Liberals. Holton proclaimed himself a progressive Liberal and called for an elective Legislative Council, secularization of the Upper Canadian clergy reserves, abolition of seigneurial tenure in Lower Canada, and reform of the financial machinery of government. He drew immense satisfaction from the success of these reform measures in the mid-1850s and continued to emphasize the importance of individual, religious, and economic freedom. Fundamentally, however, he was a moderate Liberal who displayed little radical fervour. He believed in free public education but felt that it was politically inexpedient to criticize the confessional schools of Lower Canada. Though he was distressed by the lack of unity between the Upper and Lower Canadian Liberals, his Lower Canadian sectionalism and his intimate business connection with the Montreal-oriented Grand Trunk Railway between 1854 and 1857 vitiated his attempts to build a provincial Liberal party out of the two sectional groups.

In fact, until 1857 Holton's railway business occupied most of his time. The main entrepreneurial problems confronting the Gzowski group from 1852 to 1857 were those of fostering good public relations, raising capital, keeping down costs, and dealing with the Grand Trunk. Holton and Galt as members of the Canadian assembly between 1854 and 1857 were under public attack for securing the Toronto-Sarnia contract through government favouritism and for influencing legislators to provide their firm with indirect financial assistance. In attempts to conciliate public opinion Holton drew attention to the importance of the railway as an agent for the economic development of Canada and the metropolitan expansion of Montreal and persuaded the editor of the Montreal Herald, Edward Goff Penny*, with whom he had close political and social relations, to give the Gzowski group favourable publicity. Although the capital required for building the Toronto-Sarnia line came largely from English investors and the state, Holton made a substantial contribution by channelling his money from steamboating into railway construction and borrowing for his firm from the Commercial Bank. Fearing that the rising prices of labour and building materials would wipe out the firm's profits, Holton made a convincing case for rapid construction, a reduction in the engineering staff, and speculation in land at Sarnia. With the outbreak of the Crimean War and the tightening of the London money market, the Grand Trunk was unable to sell sufficient stock to cover the cost of construction, fell behind in its cash payments to the Gzowski firm, and suspended all work on the line between St Mary's and Sarnia. Expecting a downturn in the business cycle, Holton was anxious to wind up his affairs with the Grand Trunk. According to its agreement with the railway on 4 Feb. 1857, the Gzowski group realized a net profit of £120,000, and on 12 March Holton withdrew from the firm and retired a rich man.

After his retirement from active business in 1857, Holton wished to turn his full attention to parliamentary politics and his defeat in the general election in December of that year left him deeply disappointed. From 1858 to 1862 Holton remained outside parliament but kept a watchful eye on the activities of the George-Étienne CARTIER– John A. Macdonald* Liberal-Conservative government and the Liberal opposition. In these years Holton's close relationship with George BROWN, editor of the Toronto Globe and leader of the Upper Canadian Liberals, was of considerable significance in the politics of the legislative union of Canada and represented an important link between the two parts of the province. Holton always admired Brown's talents for leadership and his effective oratory, although their divergent sectional loyalties often imposed a severe strain on their friendship. In February 1858 Holton was a chief participant in the discussions that became the basis of the union of the Upper and Lower Canadian Liberals in the common agitation for representation by population, constitutional safeguards for the Catholic religion and the French language, and a provincial school system that would meet the needs of both Protestants and Catholics. Holton became minister of public works on 2 Aug. 1858 when the Brown–Dorion Liberals came into office. But on the same day, before he had a chance to seek a parliamentary seat, the ministry was defeated. He was angered by the refusal of the governor general, Edmund Walker Head*, to dissolve parliament and believed that the very existence of responsible government was threatened.

Holton continued to stress the need for Liberal unity and in October 1859 he drafted a manifesto that appealed to the Liberals of Upper and Lower Canada to accept federalism as the remedy for the political instability of the Canadian union. When the majority of the Lower Canadian Liberals rejected Holton's scheme for a Canadian federation, he urged Brown to try to destroy the Cartier–Macdonald administration on a financial issue. In November 1860 he failed to persuade Brown to condemn the Bank of Upper Canada, the government's fiscal agent, as a corrupt institution for keeping the Liberal-Conservatives in power but was himself unwilling to find fault with the government-subsidized Grand Trunk Railway for buying costly land in Sarnia from the Gzowski firm. In the June 1861 general election Holton declined the Montreal Liberals' invitation to become a candidate for Montreal Centre because of his fear of being beaten by the Conservatives. On 11 Sept. 1862 the Montreal Liberals and Conservatives joined forces and elected him to the Victoria seat in the Legislative Council, where for a short time he enjoyed his work on the banking and commerce committee but had little scope for partisan action.

On 16 May 1863, when a reconstructed Liberal government under the leadership of John Sandfield MACDONALD and Antoine-Aimé Dorion took office, Holton resigned from the Legislative Council and became the minister of finance. In the general election in June 1863 Holton was defeated in the prized constituency of Montreal Centre but was then victorious in Châteauguay. Painfully conscious of the ministry's slender parliamentary majority, he did not dare to call upon the legislature to carry burdensome financial measures. With no provision for higher taxation and only a small reduction in total expenditures, his budget in October 1863 did not offer a solution to a deficit of $1,500,000. Holton paid the interest on the Canadian debt in London with the help of new loans, but his failure to achieve a budget surplus made a net repayment impossible. His desire to save public money largely closed his mind to the need for railway expansion to the Maritime provinces and for economic development in general. In his view his main task lay in providing the government with a reliable fiscal agency in Canada. The Bank of Upper Canada, which was in serious trouble because of its heavy involvement in land and railway speculation, could not lend money to the government. At Holton's urging the government transferred the public account from the Bank of Upper Canada to the Bank of Montreal on 1 Jan. 1864 [see Thomas Brown ANDERSON]. Though Holton sought to keep the Bank of Upper Canada alive, the removal of the government deposit contributed to the loss of public confidence in the bank and to its collapse two years later. As the new public banker, the Bank of Montreal gave strength to the ministry. But George Brown's dissatisfaction with the ministry for adopting a bank policy that favoured Montreal, combined with Dorion's inability to secure more Lower Canadian followers, led Holton to withhold his 1864 budget and insist on a reconstruction of the government. Depressed by the cares of the finance office, he was actually relieved when the unsuccessful attempt at reconstruction resulted in the resignation of the ministry on 21 March 1864.

From June 1864 until early in 1867 Holton opposed the coalition ministry's programme for the federal union of British North America and grimly clung to the unsatisfactory constitutional system of the Canadian union. His opposition to confederation in part derived from his party prejudice and his myopic view that the coalition ministers were politicians more interested in power than in improving the political system and providing new economic opportunities. His opposition also arose from his fundamental desire to preserve the integrity of the English and French societies of Lower Canada. He was sensitive to their cultural and religious needs and wanted to ensure that they would not suffer under a highly centralized government. Above all, he believed that the confederates had gone much too far in their plans for territorial expansion with all the financial burdens such expansion entailed. He thus found himself estranged from the Upper Canadian Liberals and many Montreal businessmen. He did not promote his Canadian federation scheme of 1859 as a counterweight against general union. Indeed, he himself was unable to provide a solution to the complex political and constitutional problems of the Canadian union. It was undoubtedly his realization of his inability to find an answer, combined with a warming in his relations with George Brown in mid-1866, that made it easier for him to change his mind about confederation. Once confederation became a reality, he began to appreciate its advantages and persuaded Antoine-Aimé Dorion and other Lower Canadian Liberals to accept the new political order.

Between 1867 and 1880 Holton gave some attention to the politics of the province of Quebec but devoted most of his time to federal politics in Ottawa. He represented Montreal Centre in the Quebec Legislative Assembly from 1871 to 1874 and was the member for Châteauguay in the Canadian House of Commons from 1867 to 1880. Though an infrequent and laconic speaker in the commons, Holton followed the debates closely and was a willing worker on the committees for banking and commerce; railways, canals, and telegraph lines; and public accounts. During the Liberal administration of 1873–78, he was a chief adviser to Prime Minister Alexander Mackenzie* but declined the finance office in 1873 as well as a second cabinet offer in 1875. Holton shrank from responsibility but wanted to exercise power, and was quickly offended when he was not taken into the confidence of the government.

Holton's conception of the new Canadian nation reflected the basic aspects of his Liberalism after 1867. He was against the repeal of confederation but was anxious to see that Nova Scotia obtained better terms than those under which it had entered the union. This anxiety was related to his aim of establishing a national Liberal party that would be sympathetic to provincial problems. He favoured amnesty for Louis Riel*, leader of the Red River Rebellion, deplored the Protestant attack on the Quebec Catholic clergy for their involvement in politics, and advised Alexander Mackenzie to accept the scheme of the colonial secretary, Lord Carnarvon [Herbert], for compensating British Columbia for the delay in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Though an ardent advocate of Canadian autonomy in domestic matters, Holton stressed that confederation was founded on imperial policy and legislation and felt that it was appropriate for Carnarvon to mediate between the federal government and British Columbia in order to settle the dangerous dispute over the railway. Holton opposed the Liberal proposals for complete Canadian independence and emphasized the necessity of maintaining the imperial connection and preserving British parliamentary institutions.

Concerned as Holton was about his business ventures, he did not let them dominate his life. He had a great deal of civic pride and combined community activity and private interest, a mixture that helped to build both Montreal and his own fortune and prestige. In 1850 he was a municipal councillor. He played a leading part in founding the Unitarian Society of Montreal on 6 June 1842. His Unitarianism sprang from his association with his uncle, Moses Gilbert, who was one of the earliest Unitarians in Montreal. As a member of the society's managing committee in the 1840s and 1850s, Holton participated in preparing the constitution of the society, installing the Reverend John Cordner* of Newry, Ireland, as the pastor, building a new church on Beaver Hall Hill, and securing legal status for the small congregation in spite of considerable opposition from the other Protestant denominations in Montreal. Though zealous in claiming the unity instead of the trinity of God, Holton was tolerant, refined, and more concerned with philanthropic endeavour than religious doctrine. He assisted in organizing the Montreal City and District Savings Bank on 23 May 1846 [see Marc-Damase MASSON]. As a director from 1846 to 1873, he encouraged workingmen to deposit their savings in the bank in order to improve their standard of living, and until 1871 invested these funds in profitable bonds and stocks for the exclusive benefit of the depositors. He received no remuneration before 1862 and used his own money and credit to help extricate the bank from difficulties in 1848–49. In 1871, when the savings bank became a joint-stock corporation, Holton was made president and during the next two years his investment in the reorganized bank brought him good returns. Holton resigned from the bank in 1873. From 1876 to 1880 he expressed his concern for the social growth of the city by serving as a governor of McGill University.

When Luther Holton died on 14 March 1880, he left a large fortune and his commodious Sherbrooke Street house to his family.

H. C. KLASSEN

AJM, Greffe de Charles Cushing, no.16403; Greffe de W. M. Easton, nos.4076, 4272; Greffe de I.J.Gibb, nos. 5643, 11051, 12133, 15257, 15281; Greffe de William Ross, no.275. Glynn Mills and Company (London), Incoming correspondence, Official letters, 1850–59, 1860–61, 1862–74 (microfilm in PAC). Montreal Board of Trade Archives, Minutes of the general meeting, 1842–63; Minutes of the council, 1843–63. Montreal City and District Savings Bank Archives, Minute book, 1846–62. PAC, MG 24, B40 (Brown papers), 1–11; D16 (Buchanan papers), 15, 18, 25, 27, 30, 31, 37, 46, 63, 94, 99; D21 (Baring Brothers and Company), 1–4; D36 (Glynn Mills and Company), 8; E9 (Gzowski papers), 1–3; MG 26, B (Mackenzie papers), ser.2, 1–6; MG 27, I, D8 (Galt papers), 1–4; I, E5 (Holton papers). PAO, Edward Blake papers, 1, 2, 3, 4, 9; Francis Shanly papers, 41, 42, 81, 85. Queen's University Archives, Alexander Mackenzie papers, general correspondence, 1–4. Unitarian Church Archives (Montreal), Minute book, A (1842–56); Minute book, B (1856–74).

Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1867–80. Canada, Province of, Legislative Assembly, Journals, 1841–67; Parliamentary debates, 1858–67. Canadian Economist (Montreal), 1846–47. Globe (Toronto), 1844–67. Montreal Herald, 1863–80. Montreal Witness, 1846–54, 1857, 1860–67. Le Pays (Montréal), 1852–71. Dent, Canadian portrait gallery, II, 193–98.

The ancestry of Ezra Holton of Northfield, Mass., and Soperton, Ont., 1785–1824; twenty-eight "stories" edited and correlated by Geoffrey Gilbert, comp. E.L. Moffat (Victoria, 1953 (copy in University of Toronto Library)). Careless, Brown, I, II. H. C. Klassen, "L. H. Holton: Montreal businessman and politician, 1817–1867," unpublished PHD thesis, University of Toronto, 1970. J. R. A. Pollard, "Luther Hamilton Holton, 1817–1880," unpublished MA thesis, University of Toronto, 1928.

HOPKINS, CALEB, farmer and politician; b. 1785 or 1786 in New Jersey, ninth of 13 children of Silas Hopkins and Mary Swayze; d. 8 Oct. 1880, in Toronto, Ont.

Of "late Loyalist" parentage, Caleb Hopkins farmed in Nelson Township, Halton County, Upper Canada. With three brothers, he founded the settlement of Hannahville. He played a major role in local affairs, establishing the area's first school in 1828, chairing the first township meeting for Nelson in 1836, serving as a district councillor in 1842, and as a prominent layman in the Wesleyan Methodist Church. He married Hannah, daughter of John Green, UEL, of Grimsby, Upper Canada; they had several children, and one of their daughters, Rachel, married Anson GREEN.

Halton County was a radical stronghold by the late 1820s and Hopkins was returned there in 1828 as a Reform member of the Upper Canadian House of Assembly. He was one of the few members consistently radical enough to be endorsed by William Lyon Mackenzie*'s Colonial Advocate, but he chose not to stand for re-election in 1830. However, he was again returned for Halton in 1834. Unlike so many of his radical colleagues he was not implicated in the rebellion of 1837; as a result, he rose by elimination, along with a number of other second rank Upper Canadian politicians, to a position of leadership in the Reform party. In the first election under the union of the Canadas, in 1841, he was one of the few to resist the pressure of the new governor, Lord Sydenham [Charles Poulett Thomson*], and was returned as an anti-Sydenham Reformer for the East Riding of Halton.

In Canada West the only effective parliamentary opposition to Sydenham was offered by six "ultra-Reformers" led by Robert Baldwin*. Hopkins was one of this obstructive six, but already he was demonstrating the maverick quality which would mark his later career. His first break with the Reform leadership came in 1841. As chairman of the house committee on the municipal corporations bill for Canada West, he consistently supported the measure against the vigorous opposition of Baldwin and other Reform leaders.

Hopkins returned to liberal orthodoxy and supported the Reform administration of 1842–43.

However, when Louis-Hippolyte La Fontaine* and Baldwin proposed moving the capital from Kingston to Montreal, the staunch Upper Canadian Hopkins in November 1843 joined the Tories in opposing the measure. More serious was his public disapproval of the resignation of the Reform ministers after their dispute over patronage with the governor, Sir Charles Metcalfe*, in November 1843. Hopkins' behaviour isolated him from the Reform party at both the local and the provincial levels, and in the election of 1844 he was rejected by the Reformers of East Halton who nominated John Wetenhall* at a highly disputed convention. But Hopkins refused to withdraw from the campaign. To avoid a split in the Reform vote Baldwin had to intervene. He sent two agents to East Halton in October 1844, George Brown and Thomas Ewart. Far from neutral in the local dispute, they were there to dispose of the troublesome Hopkins. As Brown reported to Baldwin, ". . . we found it necessary to blackball Mr. Hopkins. . . ." It was all to no avail. Hopkins stayed in the race, splitting the Reform vote and allowing a Tory to be elected in this liberal stronghold.

Hopkins was now an enemy of the party. His sense of grievance was strong but he would wait five and a half years to find his revenge. The opportunity came with the rise of a splinter group of radical Reformers, the "Clear Grits." Although there is no evidence that Hopkins was involved in the founding of the Grit movement, he was one of a group of "old Reformers" – men with lingering, if fading, reputations from the glamorous period before 1837 – whom the young Grit intellectuals adopted both as symbols and as political instruments. When Malcolm Cameron, another pre-union radical, bolted the "Great Ministry" of La Fontaine and Baldwin in 1849 and joined the new movement, he was replaced in the cabinet by Wetenhall. Required by law to seek re-election, Wetenhall faced a by-election in Halton County in March 1850. Hopkins announced that he would run against him, and Cameron and the Grits rallied to Hopkins, in hope of embarrassing the government. Under attack for its conservatism since the achievement of responsible government, the ministry found itself in serious difficulty in Halton. The task was further complicated by Wetenhall's poor health and apparent mental instability. To buttress the cause, James Durand, former member for West Halton, was drafted to manage Wetenhall's campaign, and the party press, notably the Globe of Toronto, was mobilized on his behalf. The candidates were shoved to the side as Cameron and Durand fought it out. The Globe description of the campaign was savage but accurate: ". . . Mr. Cameron . . . pinned this wretched Caleb to his coat-tails, and told off ex cathedra a catalogue of the iniquities of which his late colleagues had been guilty." Cameron's effective campaigning and the voters' resentment against the Globe's vicious abuse of Hopkins settled the issue: on 11 March 1850 Hopkins won a resounding victory. The shattered Wetenhall came out of the contest completely mad, and finished his days in an insane asylum.

The Halton by-election further embittered relations between the Grits and the Baldwinites. Hopkins was a special target of Reform abuse: ". . . that old Hypocrite Hopkins" as James Durand called him. Picturing him as a doddering old fool, the Globe derided the Grits as the "Calebites." But the ministry would find that there was much vigour yet in the "wretched Caleb." One of five Clear Grits in the assembly, Hopkins helped harass the government at every turn. Never a true leader, he nevertheless made an effective follower. Joining with Henry John Boulton*, W. L. Mackenzie, and Cameron, Hopkins in 1850 and 1851 helped put before the house a series of resolutions demanding basic democratic reforms and the separation of church and state.

The high point in the career of the Grits, and of Hopkins, came on 26 June 1851. Mackenzie moved a resolution, seconded by Hopkins, for the abolition of the Court of Chancery in Canada West. They had chosen their target well, for the recently restructured court was dear to lawyer Baldwin's heart. The resolution was defeated but a majority of members from Canada West had voted for it. Weary and angry, Baldwin resigned from the government, soon to be followed by his colleague La Fontaine.

It was the last hurrah for the Grits, who moved into an alliance with the new premier, Francis Hincks*. And for Caleb Hopkins. He did not contest the election of 1851, retiring into respectable obscurity on the farm in Nelson. About 1870 he moved to more comfortable surroundings in the city of Hamilton, Ontario. Time would heal the wounds of 1850 as the Reform party gladly accepted the once hated sobriquet of Clear Grit, and Hopkins lived long enough to become a grand old man of Ontario Liberalism. He died, aged 95, on 8 Oct. 1880 at the Toronto home of his son-in-law, lawyer and author William Leggo*. The party leadership, once so hostile, attended his funeral in strength: this congenital independent was carried to his grave in Toronto by a group of pall bearers which included the recently retired national Liberal leader, Alexander Mackenzie*, and the premier of Ontario, Oliver Mowat*.

Caleb Hopkins was a political curiosity. Never a leader, innovator, or thinker, he nevertheless played a significant role in many of the major political controversies of the Province of Canada. His career was, in microcosm, the story of the cross-currents in Upper Canadian Reform, and a vivid demonstration of the rugged independence, the maverick quality, which so often split the Liberal party in 19th-century Canada.

MICHAEL S. CROSS

MTCL, Baldwin papers, 35, nos.103–4; 43, nos.20, 59–63; 47, no.7; 49, no.15; 52, nos.25–28; 65, no 1; 76, no.35. PAC, RG 31, A1, 1851, Halton County, Nelson Township, 78–79. PAO, Mackenzie-Lindsey collection, 2482; William Reid collection, data on the United Empire Loyalists. Canada, Province of, Legislative Assembly, Debates (Nish), 1841, 618–36; Journals, 1841–51. Upper Canada, House of Assembly, Journals, 1828–36. Colonial Advocate (York, U.C.), 1828–34. Examiner (Toronto), 1840–51. Globe (Toronto), 1850–51; 9–11 Oct. 1880. Arthur papers (Sanderson), II, 161, 325, 334. [Bruce and Grey], Elgin-Grey papers (Doughty), II, 604, 690, 742, 836. Chadwick, Ontarian families, I, 25. Hamilton directory for 1872–3 (Montreal, 1872), 145.

Careless, Brown, I, 56–57, 112–13, 134. Charles Clarke, Sixty years in Upper Canada, with autobiographical recollections (Toronto, 1908), 78–79. Cornell, Alignment of political groups, 6, 15–17, 28–29, 93–97, 102. Dent, Last forty years, I, 137–38; II, 186. C. D. Emery and Barbara Ford, From pathway to skyway; a history of Burlington (Burlington, Ont., 1967), 53, 97, 125. L. A. Johnson, "The Halton by-election, March, 1850: a politician's view," Ont. Hist., LX (1968), 147–48.

HOPPER, ARTHUR, Orangeman, merchant, and farmer; b. Roscrea, County Tipperary, Ireland, in 1784, son of Arthur Hopper, a substantial farmer and landowner, and his wife Sara; d. Merivale, Ont., 14 Nov. 1872.

Arthur Hopper left Roscrea for Dublin, where he was living at the time of the union of the British and Irish parliaments in 1801. He became an Orangeman in 1802 and served in a yeomanry corps in 1803. Some time after, he returned to Tipperary where he became deputy grand master of the Orange order in County Tipperary. On 27 July 1807 he married Anna Sparling. Hopper left Ireland in 1821 although he retained land in Tipperary and continued to receive revenue from it.

Hopper with his wife and four children (three more were born later) settled in Montreal, where he opened a jewellery shop. Shortly after his arrival he organized, in company with several other Montreal Orangemen, what was possibly the first civilian Orange lodge in the Canadas. Moving to Huntley in the Dalhousie District, Upper Canada, in 1825, he opened a store, and established the first post office and the first Orange lodge in the township (first known as Hopperville, now Huntley). Two years later he settled at Bytown where he ran a jewellery shop for five years. He then acquired 600 acres of land in Nepean Township; the village that was established there was called the Hopper Settlement until 1864 when the name was changed to Merivale.

Hopper was instrumental in founding a number of Orange lodges in the Ottawa valley, the last being number 85, in Nepean, of which he was master. The authority to found such lodges came from a warrant which William Burton of Montreal had secured during a visit to Ireland in 1827, and it was over Hopper's signature that several of the warrants founding lodges in the Ottawa valley were issued, thus earning him a claim to the title of father of Canadian Orangeism. Hopper was among those who met with Ogle Robert GOWAN in Brockville in 1830 to form the Grand Orange Lodge of British North America, and he was elected to the grand committee in 1838. Throughout his life he remained an active Orangeman. Yet Hopper was on good terms with the Roman Catholics in the Ottawa valley and was never a violent partisan in politics. For him the Orange lodges were primarily fraternal societies, useful in providing social life in frontier communities.

HEREWARD SENIOR

The most extensive source of information on Arthur Hopper is a collection of papers privately held by his grandson, Henry Hopper, of Merivale, Ontario. Ottawa Citizen, 15 Nov. 1872. Times (Ottawa), 16 Nov. 1872. Davin, Irishman in Canada, 323–25. R. B. Sibbett, Orangeism in Ireland and throughout the empire (2v., Belfast, [1914]), II, 522. Harry and Olive Walker, Carleton saga (Ottawa, 1968), 146–52.

HORAN, EDWARD JOHN, Roman Catholic priest and bishop, scholar, and educator; b. 26 Oct. 1817, Quebec, son of Gordian Horan and Eleanore Cannon; d. 15 Feb. 1875 at Kingston, Ont.

Edward John Horan was born into an English-speaking family but received his early education in French. He entered the Petit Séminaire in Quebec in September 1830, where he had an excellent academic record. After then completing his course at the seminary of Quebec, he joined its faculty in 1839 as an instructor in English, a post he held until 1848. His scholarly interest, however, was in the sciences, then called natural history, a new subject in which he had been an apt pupil. He was especially concerned with scientific agriculture, seeking in technological advances some solution to the agricultural depression which had persisted in the St Lawrence valley through the 1830s. In 1843 he was appointed professor of natural history at the seminary.

His superiors encouraged his work and, in February 1848, agreed to send him to Harvard University in the United States for further training. Horan had hoped to study under the naturalist Louis Agassiz at Harvard but, unfortunately, Agassiz presented only infrequent lectures. Life in Boston, however, fascinated Horan; his letters reveal a wide circle of acquaintances, including publicist Orestes Brownson, then a Roman Catholic and in his conservative phase, who seems to have influenced the young cleric strongly. At the end of March 1848, Horan decided to transfer to Yale to follow the lectures of the celebrated scientist, Benjamin Silliman, and of his son Benjamin. The scholarly environment proved congenial, but the community of New Haven, where anti-Catholicism flourished in those early days of American nativism, did not. Horan wrote anxiously to his superior in Quebec that he "would be happy when the moment arrived when I can leave the United States, and exchange their vaunted liberty for the slavery of Canada, where at least one can serve God according to his conscience without fearing the torch of the incendiary."

Returning to Quebec in the autumn of 1848, Horan resumed his teaching duties at the seminary in the sciences, and conducted geological field trips down the St Lawrence River. He worked closely with Louis-Ovide BRUNET and Elkanah BILLINGS. Increasingly he became involved in the administrative life of his institution. He was a director of the Petit Séminaire and secretary of the Université Laval council in 1855, and in 1856 the first superior of the École Normale Laval. These careers came to an end in 1858 when he was appointed fourth bishop of Kingston to succeed Patrick Phelan*. He was consecrated on 1 May at St Patrick's Church in Quebec and moved immediately to his new diocesan seat. A continuing interest in the Université Laval was recognized in 1867 when he was named a director.

Bishop Horan was as efficient and firm an administrator in his diocese as he had been at Quebec. In the 17 years of his episcopate there was little disruption in its religious life. The surviving evidence of his social philosophy indicates that he had a conservative cast of mind, although his correspondence with the archbishop of Baltimore reveals a sympathetic attitude toward the trade union movement. In 1861 he introduced the Sisters of Providence of St Vincent de Paul who established the first house of providence in Canada West.

As bishop of Kingston, however, Horan's principal concern was Catholic education in Canada West, and he took a great satisfaction in the passage of Richard William Scott*'s act in 1863 which provided for the extension of public aid to separate schools. Horan had played his part well in obtaining this legislation although he had worked behind the scenes, preferring, for obvious reasons, lay leadership in the cause of Catholic education.

Horan almost inevitably became involved in the web of patronage and politics that characterized public life in Canada in the late 19th century. He established a firm relationship with John A. Macdonald* and other prominent Conservatives. Yet he had a curious correspondent in Edmund Bailey O'CALLAGHAN, once a Lower Canada rebel, and then the archivist of the state of New York. In a letter accompanying a new edition of the Jesuit Relations, which Horan was sending to O'Callaghan, there is evidence of a long and warm friendship between the two men. The major criteria for the bishop's political support were soundness on the school question and allegiance to Macdonald. In 1861, a year that was not untypical, he wrote to Macdonald, George-Étienne CARTIER, and Joseph Cauchon* (who had been a class-mate at the Petit Séminaire), seeking positions for various people, including his own brother-in-law. As the expected quid pro quo, Horan urged his parish priests to support the Conservative cause, writing, for example, to one correspondent, "I trust you will use your influence in this matter and direct the Catholic vote in a proper direction." Locally, he exerted himself in Macdonald's own riding. The Catholic vote of Kingston required careful cultivation and Macdonald relied heavily on the bishop through the years.

Horan retired in 1874 and was succeeded by John O'Brien. His death the following year prompted many laudatory obituaries, but perhaps his most significant accomplishment was the degree to which he furthered the integration of Roman Catholics into the public life of the province.

J. E. REA

Archdiocese of Kingston, Archives, E. J. Horan papers. P.-G. Roy, Le vieux Québec (2v., Québec, 1923–31). Arthur Maheux, "L'abbé Edward John Horan (1817–1875)," Le Naturaliste canadien (Québec), LXXXVI (1959), 77–92.

HOW, HENRY, chemist, mineralogist, and educator; b. 11 July 1828 in London, England, son of Thomas How; d. 28 Sept. 1879 at Windsor, N.S. He married, probably in Great Britain, Louisa Mary Watkins, and they had five children.

Educated at a private school in Beaconsfield and at the Royal College of Chemistry, Henry How then became assistant to Dr Lyon Playfair, professor of chemistry at the College for Civil Engineers, Putney. How was analytical chemist for the Admiralty Steam Navy Coal Enquiry; he also worked with Dr Thomas Anderson first at the University of Edinburgh and then at Glasgow university. In 1854, on Dr Anderson's recommendation, he was appointed professor of natural history and chemistry at King's College, Windsor, N.S. He was given an honorary DCL by King's in 1861, and appointed vice-president of the university in 1877; he also served as librarian and curator of the university museum.

In 1861 How was appointed to the Nova Scotia Board of Commissioners responsible for arranging displays at the London International Exhibition of 1862, and was selected to make an illustrative collection of Nova Scotia minerals. He was one of the organizers in 1862 (with John Matthew Jones, Dr Alexander Forrester*, Dr J. B. Gilpin*, John R. WILLIS, R. G. Haliburton*, Captain Campbell Hardy*, and others) of the Nova Scotian Institute of Science, an organization which grew out of the interest aroused by the display of the province's natural resources at the London Exhibition. Over the years he contributed ten papers to the Transactions of the institute.

How also prepared a collection of minerals for the Paris Exposition of 1867, and this collection became the basis of the Nova Scotia Museum, founded in 1868. He brought the most recent chemical techniques from Europe to Nova Scotia and provided Nova Scotia students with an alternative to classical studies. In addition to his 25-year career as a teacher, he constantly corresponded with learned men in Great Britain, carried on original research in both analytical chemistry and mineralogy, and served as a consultant to government and industry. Through his pupils and his writings, he strongly influenced science in Nova Scotia in the 19th century. His chief work was The mineralogy of Nova Scotia (1869), consulted and used for many years. He discovered and named several Nova Scotia minerals; "howlite" was named in his honour by one of his students. He contributed at least 44 papers on chemistry, analytical chemistry, mineralogy, and botany to British, American, and Canadian periodicals.

PHYLLIS R. BLAKELEY

Henry How, Sketch of the mineralogy of Nova Scotia, as illustrated by the collections of minerals sent to the Paris Exhibition, 1867 (Halifax, 1867); The mineralogy of Nova Scotia: a report to the provincial government (Halifax, 1869).

PANS, Nova Scotia provincial secretary's papers, 1867, 3189. Morning Herald (Halifax), 29 Sept. 1879. King's College (Windsor, N.S.), Calendars, 1855–80; Record, I (1879), 73–74. F. W. Vroom, King's College: a chronicle, 1789–1939, collections and recollections (Halifax, 1941). Harry Piers, "A brief historical account of the Nova Scotia Institute of Science, and the events leading up to its formation; with biographical sketches of its deceased presidents and other prominent members," N.S. Inst. of Sci., Proc. and Trans., XIII (1910–14), liii–cxii.

HOWE, JOSEPH, journalist, politician, and public servant; b. 13 Dec. 1804 at the Northwest Arm in Halifax, N.S., son of John Howe and Mary Edes; d. 1 June 1873 at government house in Halifax.

The most lasting influence upon Howe was exercised by his father, loyalist John Howe, whom he once described as "my only instructor, my play-fellow, almost my daily companion." The one member of his family who sided with Britain in revolutionary times, John Howe had a reverent, almost mystical, attitude towards the British connection, and he passed this attitude on to his son; indeed, it was one of two qualities which, more than any others, determined the son's conduct and shaped his career. The second quality was "a restless, agitating uncertainty" which made an ordinary, humdrum existence intolerable. "If I could be content," Joseph Howe wrote, "to go along quietly and peaceably like my neighbours and at the end of some fifty or sixty years tumble into my grave and be dust, I should be happy – very happy." But that was not to be.

Because his formal education was limited by impecunious circumstances, Howe was largely self-educated: he read late into the night "if the book is amusing and the fire does not go out"; he was an acute observer of the circumstances around him. "My books are very few, but then the world is before me – a library open to all – from which poverty of purse cannot exclude me – and in which the meanest and most paltry volume is sure to furnish some thing to amuse, if not to instruct and improve." To his Sandemanian father he owed not only his familiarity with the Bible and his "knowledge of old Colonial & American incidents and characteristics," but also the moral and physical courage which later stood him in good stead.

At the age of 13 Howe was already assisting his father in his duties as postmaster general and king's printer. Since these offices would go eventually to his older half-brother John Jr, he had to seek other employment. The fateful decision was made early in 1827 when he and James SPIKE purchased the Weekly Chronicle and began to publish it as the Acadian. However, within less than a year – in December 1827 – Howe took over the Novascotian from George R. Young* and soon made it the most influential newspaper in the province.

Joseph Howe married Catherine Susan Ann McNab on 2 Feb. 1828. Between 1829 and 1848 they had ten children; of these only five lived to become adults, and none achieved the preeminence of the father. Howe's enemies implied that he fathered numerous illegitimate children, but these implications were based more on rumour than on fact. His letters suggest that he was very close to his wife and that he greatly missed his family during the long periods when his political career took him away from home.

Howe, as Daniel Cobb Harvey* pointed out, did not spring Minerva-like from the waters of the Northwest Arm. Rather his career took the direction it did because of an intellectual awakening in Nova Scotia which he in turn did much to promote. In his hands the Novascotian became an instrument both for his own self-education and for the education of his readers. In the early years he personally reported between 150 and 200 columns of debate during each session of the assembly. By 1834 he could boast that he had written as much manuscript as he could carry and that without it the people would have been "about as incapable of judging of the conduct of their Representatives, as if they had assembled in the moon."

